2.] Other qualities of Deity are Impassibility, Power, Knowledge, and Goodness; and these also appear to have been imparted to human nature under such restrictions as to make it still human and not Divine, but yet in such fulness as to make man the Image of God. With reference to the first of these, it must be taken as a consequence of the gift by which immortality was attainable. With our present physical structure, incapacity for dying implies incapacity for the physical degeneration, disease, and decay which are the cause of all bodily suffering, and which form the initial and progressive parts of a process whereof death is only the climax. If, indeed, we believe, as we must in reason, that the nervous structure of the body now is identical with the nervous structure of the first created human bodies, we must also believe that the latter had the same capacity for physical pain as we have. But, on the other hand, if physical pain is the indication of an initiatory process which culminates, if not arrested, in death, then we are bound to believe that the same means which counteracted death in its final, prevented it also in its initial stages, and that physical pain was unknown to bodies which partook of the "tree of life." Mental pain or sorrow would also be absent from a nature not yet acquainted with evil, as was the case with our original human nature; and, indeed, its absence has ever been regarded as a special characteristic of the "happiness" which the first created human beings enjoyed. In this, too, we see the Image of that pure non-Incarnated Deity who created them, and who thus endowed them in body and soul with the high gift of a likeness to His own impassible Nature.

3.] The human image of the Divine Power and Knowledge are indicated in the authority delegated to man by the Creator, when He commissioned him and empowered him to "replenish the earth and to subdue it:" and to "have dominion over every living thing that moveth upon the earth;" a sovereignty, the evidences of which are too strong to call for any proof or elaboration of the Bible statement, and which is universally allowed to be a Divine gift or delegation.[1] The evidence in respect to knowledge is scarcely less strong, though revealed to us by one instance only of the possession of such supereminent knowledge in our original human nature as to be called Divine. "I suppose," says Plato in one of his Dialogues, "that a certain power more than human first imposed names upon things." "The Creator of every living thing," says the Bible, "brought them unto Adam to see what he would call them: and whatsoever Adam called every living creature, that was the name thereof. And Adam gave names to all cattle, and to the fowls of the air, and to every beast of the field" [Gen. ii. 19, 20]. As the great philosopher theoretically concluded that only a knowledge derived from God could be equal to this task, so we may, with all Jewish and Christian writers of eminence on this subject, consider that this is given as an illustration of the supreme capacity for knowledge with which God has gifted human nature; a capacity, the possession of which, and the exercise of it in this way, presupposes also the Image of God in man.

4.] In this enumeration of the Divine Gifts, bestowed on our nature in its vivification by the emanation from God, which is called the breath of life, nothing need be said in detail about the original Goodness or Righteousness which constitutes one special characteristic of the Divine Image. Let it suffice to mention here that the state of righteousness, goodness, or holiness in which human nature was first created, was not one in which he leaped at once to the climax of final perfection, but was like his condition generally, one of progress. This progressive or improveable character of human nature, even under such elevated circumstances of existence, distinguishes it from the Divine as much as a thing created is distinguished from one self-originated. Thus, a capacity for incorruptibility, for a knowledge only short of Omniscience, and for a power, the bounds of which we cannot set, were bestowed, by means of the communication of God's nature, in the degree which has been indicated to man's nature; but the full development of these capacities was as much a work of progress as is the present development of human capacities. Here, again, the old heathenism had a tradition of the truth, when it told of its noblest men that they passed by an apotheosis from the highest condition of which an earthly life was capable to a life which was all but Divine. And it is not unlikely that in the undying translation of Enoch and Elijah, we see types of the manner in which human nature in general was originally intended to be transferred, after a certain period of progress, from a paradisiacal to a heavenly existence; to a state of existence in which capacities would be developed into fixed habits, and indestructibility be no longer shackled by its union with "the dust of the ground." Great as the perfections of our original nature were, there was yet, from the very first, a higher perfection into which it could and must develope if it carried out the intention of its Creator. And although it was already made a partaker of the Divine Nature, a progress towards the Infinite in indestructibility, power, knowledge, and goodness was open to it, of which the Eastern theories about the final absorption of the human into the Divine are a faint and human expression, such scriptural sayings as that "God shall be all in all" a Divine revelation, and such scriptural prayers as that we "may be filled with all the fulness of God," a true devotional aspiration. It was but a misapplied truth, that "ye shall be Gods" [Elohim], "knowing good and evil." And it was the highest and most authoritative form of that truth which found utterance in the words, "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in Heaven is perfect" [Matt. v. 48]. From this it becomes evident that the true progress of mankind is its forward march in the track of its original destiny; that the lower and created nature rises in all its normal characteristics just in proportion to its participation in the higher, uncreated, and Divine; that the highest aspiration which humanity can utter is one that it may be changed into the same Image of God in which it was originally made, changed from a state which was capable of degeneration to the glory of a state in which that Image may be both perfectible and perfected. IMAGE WORSHIP. The use of the word "image" in ecclesiastical history and in theology extends to any representation, whether in sculpture or painting, of a holy person or thing, and there is a great variety of determinations, of more or less authority, respecting the use of such.

Early writers [e.g. Origen, Hom. viii. in Exod. Genebr. p. 52; Theodoret, i. p. 149, Sismondi], distinguish between "similitudo" and "idolum," defining the former as the similitude of that which really exists, the latter the representation of that which is feigned. Our homily against peril of idolatry asserts that idol and image are synonymous. Neither of these agree with modern usage, which has established the distinction that an image is an idol when it receives excessive veneration.

There appears to have been little or no use of images in public worship for the first three centuries. There was private use of symbols and images, as on rings [Clem. Alex. Pæd. iii. 11, p. 289, Pott], on vases [Tertull. de Pud. p. 721, Paris, 1641], and private use of statues [Euseb. Hist. vii. 118], but no public use is proved. It is agreed by both Romanist and Anglican authorities [e.g. Petavius and Jeremy Taylor] that this is sufficiently accounted for by the evident inexpediency of a public use of images while the remembrance of idolatry was fresh in men's minds. It is noticed also that the use of images by the Carpocratians [Irenæus, i. 5, 6] could not but tend to deter the orthodox from such use. Private use, however, naturally passed into public use, and against this the Council of Eliberis

[1] It may be remarked that this sovereignty was bestowed upon a naked, unarmed man, and seems to indicate that the obedience of the lower creation was to be obtained not by physical force, but solely by the power of the will.

[A.D. 305] gave a decision in Can. xxxvi., "Placuit picturas in Ecclesia esse non debere, ne quod colitur et adoratur in parietibus depingatur." Upon which the gloss may be allowed that it was "pro temporum illorum ratione."

At the latter end of the fourth century, pictures of saints and martyrs were more frequently found in churches. Paulinus, Bishop of Nola in the early part of the fifth century, ordered his church to be painted with them, and some intimations of the same practice in other places are found in St. Augustine, who condemns the "picturarum adoratores." Serenus, Bishop of Marseilles [A.D. 599], ordered all images to be defaced and cast out of all the churches in his diocese, but Gregory the Great blames him for doing so: "Et quidem zelum vos, ne quid manufactum adorari posset, habuisse laudavimus, sed frangere easdem imagines non debuisse judicamus; idcirco enim pictura in ecclesiis adhibetur, ut hi qui litteras nesciunt, saltem in parietibus videndo legant, quæ legere in codicibus non valent" [Epist. ix. 106].

The iconoclastic controversy has been already noticed under the word ICONOCLASM. It is only necessary here to say that the general principle of the Mediæval Church in the West on this subject is fairly represented by the Council of Trent, "Imagines porro Christi, Deiparæ Virginis et aliorum sanctorum in templis præsertim habendæ ac retinendæ sunt, eisque debitus honor et veneratio impertienda: non quod credatur inesse aliqua in eis divinitas vel virtus, propter quam sint colendæ; vel quod ab eis sit aliquid petendum; vel quod fiducia in imaginibus sit figenda, veluti olim fiebat a gentibus, quæ in idolis spem suam collocabant; sed quoniam honos qui eis exhibetur, refertur ad prototypa, quæ illæ repræsentant; ita ut per imagines quas osculamur, et coram quibus caput aperimus et procumbimus, Christum adoremus, et sanctos, quorum illæ similitudinem gerunt, veneremur" [Sess. xxv. 2].

There is no rule respecting the use of images given to us in the New Testament. It may be concluded, therefore, that the Church is left—[1] to that in the Old Testament which is of perpetual obligation; [2] to the rules of reason, enlightened by the principles of a complete revelation; [3] to the measures of spiritual prudence. Thus [1] the severity of the Mosaic law, by which God forbade the making images of visible creatures, was only of temporary reason, from the singular proneness of the people to idolatry; the precept of Deut. iv. 15, 16 [comp. Acts xvii. 29], giving a natural reason for a natural duty, is binding on Christians; [2] reason points out the instruction which may thus be given to the ignorant, the stimulus to a devout imagination, the aid to the memory, the suggestions which may holily minister to faith; while [3] spiritual prudence remembers that the more ignorance there is, the more proneness to superstition, and reminds us that we must ever be on the watch lest faith should become dependent on sight, lest the body should overweight the mind, lest any innate or proper holiness should be attached to the image, and the mind instead of being helped to pass beyond the image, should rest on it as an object of worship.

Upon such general principles, the Church has a lawful use of images. The human form of our Blessed Lord may lawfully be represented. So may the acknowledged symbols, as the Lamb, and the Good Shepherd. The objection of the Iconoclasts, that the representation of the human form suppressed the Divinity, and did not represent Christ, is valid to shew that the earlier paintings, with priestly robe and glory, are both truer and more pious than the naturalistic paintings of later artists. Why the symbol of the Lamb was in some cases forbidden does not appear; for it seems to be a symbol which cannot be misinterpreted, as does also the symbol of the Dove for the Holy Ghost.

Regarding images of the saints, there is not only the danger of attributing a proper holiness to the image itself, but the danger also of exaggerrating the true doctrine of the intercession of the saints, and introducing another species of false worship.

That all such images of holy things and persons are to be regarded with reverence flowing from our sense of the sanctity of the original, no well-constituted mind will doubt. That such reverence becomes superstitious when any inherent holiness is attributed to the image, when through it the power and presence of Almighty God is localized, or the intercession of the saints thought to be more prevalent in consequence of tendering devotion to them by aid of their images; this, too, we may assume not to need argument.

And lastly, to bring the matter down to the Church of England, that such errors both of doctrine and practice prevailed most deeply and widely at the time of the Reformation, the language itself of the Tridentine Canon, compared with other teaching, is sufficient to shew. The Schoolmen, many of them, taught, "Eundem honorem deberi imagini et exemplari, ac proinde imagines S. Trinitatis, Christi, et Crucis cultu latriæ adorandas esse." [See Jeremy Taylor, The Rule of Conscience, bk. ii. ch. ii. Rule vi. sect 26, where, however, we venture to differ from the extreme estimate of the second Nicene Council, and the supposed sanction of Trent to that estimate.] So, in practice, "image worship was become a gross and unspiritual adoration—the worship of the actual, material, present image, rather than that of the formless or spiritual power of which it was the emblem or representative. The whole tendency of popular belief was to localize, to embody in the material thing the supernatural or divine power. The healing or miraculous power dwelt in, and emanated from the picture of the saint. . . . These outward things were not mere occasional vehicles of the Divine bounty, indifferent in themselves; they possessed an inherent, inalienable sanctity" [Milman, iv. 7].

Against such teaching and such practice our Homily against Peril of Idolatry was directed. It is a controversial tract against an abuse, not a calm teaching of the truth. Of such teaching and practice our Twenty-second Article speaks. Written in 1553, it was adopted by Elizabeth's Divines in 1562, the Trent Article dating Dec. 4th, 1563. We may say, then, that our Church holds still the middle course, with the Council of Frankfort, between the Councils of Constantinople and Nicæa, and desires, with the Council of Paris, to learn what the general voice of the Fathers has taught, allowing the use, guarding against the abuse of images.

IMMACULATE CONCEPTION. The name given to a doctrine held by some theologians, and dogmatically asserted in the bull "Ineffabilis Deus," by Pope Pius IX., the substantial point of which is that the Blessed Virgin Mary was (by the grace and favour of Almighty God) preserved perfectly free from all taint of original sin, "ex primo instanti suæ conceptionis," from the very moment in which she was conceived by her mother. It is also the name of a Roman Catholic festival corresponding in date with the Feast of "the Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary" in the English Calendar.

[I.] THE HISTORY OF THE FESTIVAL AND OF THE DOCTRINE are closely linked together. From very early times it has been maintained that the Blessed Virgin was sanctified before, or at the time of her birth, that she might be a pure and undefiled tabernacle for her Holy Child; but no holy-day in commemoration of this fact and doctrine is traceable in the early ages of the Church. About the sixth century there is some uncertain indication of such a festival in a "Typicon" or "Directorium" of the Eastern Church, which was originally written by St. Sabba, and rewritten by St. John Damascene [A.D. 756]. This contains a liturgical hymn on the Annunciation, in which Mary is called "the only undefiled and beautiful dove," but there is no evidence whatever that this is really earlier than the eighth century. There is also another hymn, said to have been written by St. Andrew of Crete in the seventh century, in which the festival is spoken of as a commemoration of the conception of St. Anne, the mother of the Blessed Virgin: "Thy conception, religious Anne, we celebrate to-day, because, being loosed from the bands of barrenness, thou didst conceive her who was enabled to contain Him who is Incomprehensible." In agreement with this early idea of the festival, it has always been named in the Eastern Calendars "The Conception of Anne, the mother of the mother of God," the date of it being December 9th, a day later than in those of the Western Church.

But although the sanctification before birth of the Blessed Virgin was thus commemorated, no separate office for the day is known as having existed before the end of the fifteenth century, when one was composed under the name of Vincentius Bandellus, President of the Congregation of Rites in Lombardy [A.D. 1493]. This office does not recognise the doctrine of Immaculacy, the tone throughout being that of the Invitatory, "The sanctification of the Virgin Mary let us celebrate; Christ her Son the Lord let us adore;" and our Lord is addressed in a hymn as being "alone without sin." But the office generally used was that for the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin, slightly altered for the purpose of adapting it to the Conception.

In England the Feast of the Conception has been said to have been introduced by St. Anselm, but this assertion has no authentic foundation, and is probably as untrue as that the doctrine of the Immaculacy is to be found in his works. In the fourteenth century it was included among the festivals of the English Calendar for the first time,[1] by Archbishop Islip's Constitutions [A.D. 1362], though a special order was made for its observance throughout the province of Canterbury in 1328, by Archbishop Meopham. Neither the word immaculate, nor the idea conveyed by it, was ever associated with the festival in the English Office Books: nor was it, indeed, admitted into those of the Roman rite until the pontificate of Gregory XVI. The antiquity of the Festival of the Conception (or the Sanctification before birth) of the Blessed Virgin, is, therefore, no evidence as to ancient belief in the Immaculacy of her Conception. And, in fact, even Bellarmine asserts this, writing: "The chief foundation of this festival was not the Immaculate Conception, but merely the Conception of her who should be the mother of God. . . . Hence they even who hold that the Blessed Virgin was conceived in sin celebrate this festival" [Bellarm. De Cultu Sanct. iii. 16].

When or where the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception was first taught is quite unknown. Perrone says that some writers have ascribed its origin to France, and he himself is of opinion that it came from the East, and was recognised at Naples in the ninth century. Roman Catholic writers have very generally asserted that St. Anselm [A.D. 1033-1109] held the doctrine; but the Commentary on St. Paul's Epistles, to which they refer for proof of this allegation, was written by Hervé of Bourg-Déols at a later date, and the words relied on are not even his, but a still later interpolation [Patrolog. clviii. 41]. Natalis Alexander [xiii. 219] proves that St. Anselm was of a different opinion; as is also shewn by Mabillon [Annal. Benedict. vi. 121]. Nor ought any one to be doubtful about St. Anselm's opinion on the subject, who has read his treatise on the Incarnation, for there he writes without any hesitation: "Virgo tamen ipse, unde assumptus est, est in iniquitatibus conceptа, et in peccatis concepit eam mater ejus, et cum originali peccato nata est, quoniam et ipsa in Adam peccavit, in quo omnes peccaverunt" [Anselm. Cur Deus Homo, ii. 16, cf. 17, 18].

[1] It is usually said that the Council held at Oxford, under Archbishop Langton [A.D. 1222], included the festival in the Calendar, expressly declaring, however, that it was not a day of obligation, and that the observance was optional. But this assertion rests on the evidence of one Belgian MS. only, no English authority containing either the day or the reservatory clause [Pusey's Eirenicon, ii. 365, n.].

The first really historical trace of the doctrine is to be found in an Epistle of St. Bernard to the canons of Lyons, who observed the Festival of the Conception (as did the Franciscans at Rome) with a full recognition of the Immaculacy. This letter of remonstrance was written by St. Bernard in A.D. 1140, and in it he distinctly affirms the festival itself to be a novelty in the Church: "nova celebritas quam ritus ecclesiasticus nescit . . . et non commendat antiqua traditio" [St. Bernard. Ep. 174, ad Canon. Lugdun.]. It is significant that the clergy of Lyons justified themselves by stating that they had learned their peculiar rite from a document which the Blessed Virgin had sent down from heaven [Bulæus, Hist. Schol. Paris, ii. 185]. Half a century after St. Bernard's time the doctrine became a standing cause of contention between the Scotists and the Thomists; St. Thomas Aquinas having maintained the ancient tenet (which referred to the Sanctification of the Virgin before her birth), and Duns Scotus, at a later date [A.D. 1307], having energetically supported the most extreme theory of her Immaculate Conception in a disputation held before the University of Paris. The controversy was thus taken up by the two great and influential communities, the Dominicans and the Franciscans, the former following the moderate and reasonable doctrine of Aquinas, the latter the Immaculacy theory. In A.D. 1387 a Spanish divine, named John de Montesono, set forth some theses on the subject, in which he maintained it to be contrary to Scripture to assert that any one but Christ was ever free from original sin, and consequently to say that the Blessed Virgin Mary was not conceived in sin. He was censured by the Sorbonne, the then reigning Pope of Avignon, Clement VII., and the Pope of Rome, Urban VI., from which it is evident that the extreme doctrine was making way among Roman divines. More force was given to it by a decree of the Council of Basle [A.D. 1439]. They ruled as follows:—"Nos . . . doctrinam illam dissentem gloriosam virginem Dei genitricem Mariam, præveniente et operante Divini Numinis gratia singulari, nunquam actualiter subjacuisse originali peccato, sed immunem semper fuisse ab omni originali et actuali culpa sanctamque et immaculatam, tanquam piam et consonam cultui ecclesiastico, fidei catholicæ, rectæ rationi et sacræ Scripturæ, ab omnibus catholicis approbandam fore, tenendam et amplectendam, diffinimus et declaramus, nullique de cætero licitum esse in contrarium prædicare seu docere"[1] [Sess. xxxvi.; Harduin, Conc. viii. 1266]. Upon this the University of Paris made the subscription of the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception a condition of their degrees, and required doctors of divinity to maintain it with all their power, expelling those of their members who refused to subscribe to it. Later in the century Sixtus IV. published two bulls, "Cum præcelsa," dated Feb. 27, 1477, and "Grave nimis," dated Sept. 4, 1483, endeavouring to throw oil upon the waters so troubled by the contests of the Dominicans and Franciscans, by excommunicating all on either side who asserted or denied the belief in the doctrine to be heresy; his ground for so doing being that it had not yet been decided by the Apostolic See. The Council of Trent, after much controversy between the two orders, affixed a rider to their decree concerning original sin, declaring that they had no intention to include "beatam et immaculatam Virginem, Matrem, Dei genetricem" therein [Sess. v. 5]; and enforcing the constitutions set forth in the bulls of Sixtus IV., thus leaving the question still open. There was much subsequent controversy and bitterness on the subject during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries; and in 1834, a bull was issued by Gregory XVI. admitting the word "Immaculatam" into the Mass of the Conception, with plenary indulgence to all such as should join in celebrating the festival; and also inserting "Regina sine labe originali concepta" in a litany addressed to the Blessed Virgin. On December 8, 1854, Pius IX. promulgated the bull "Ineffabilis Deus," by which the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception was finally imposed as an article of faith on the Roman communion. The bull declares as follows:—"Auctoritate Domini Nostri Jesu Christi, beatorum Apostolorum Petri et Pauli, ac Nostra, declaramus, pronuntiamus, et definimus, doctrinam, quæ tenet Beatissimam Virginem Mariam in primo instanti suæ Conceptionis fuisse singulari Omnipotentis Dei gratia et privilegio, intuitu meritorum Christi Jesu, Salvatoris humani generis, ab omni originalis culpæ labe præservatam immunem, esse a Deo revelatam, atque idcirco ab omnibus fidelibus firmiter constanterque credendam." Such is the history of this much controverted doctrine.

[II.] THE THEOLOGY OF THE DOCTRINE has been the subject of many volumes [see Walchii Bibliotheca], but can be noticed here only in a very condensed form.

1. The actual sanctity of the Blessed Virgin-Mother during the period of the holy Child's formation in her womb was, beyond doubt, of an entirely unprecedented character. As, at His death, the holy body of the God-Man was buried in a new sepulchre wherein never man before had lain, so during the nine months that the same body was being formed of human substance it lay in a pure virgin shrine fitted to contain that holy thing which was to be born therefrom for the restoration of human nature to holiness. This is distinctly revealed to us in Holy Scripture. Considering, moreover, the circumstances of our Blessed Lord's indwelling for so long in the body of His Virgin Mother, it is impossible to believe otherwise than that her sanctity during that period was infinitely beyond that of any other merely human saint: a borrowed light, and a light inferior to that of the Sun of Righteousness, but yet a light exceeding all lights but His in brightness. The very first principles of practical religion, those which attribute sanctification in all its degrees to the work of the Holy Ghost, and the indwelling of our Blessed Lord, do in fact require us to draw the inference that the overshadowing of the power of the Highest and the advent of the Holy Ghost, the plenitude of grace vouchsafed to her, and the actual indwelling within her of the Divine Saviour, formed such an accumulated power of sanctification as almost, if not quite, to shut out the practical possibility of actual sin on the part of her on whose person it was gathered.

2. While we have nothing revealed to us in Holy Scripture as to the spiritual condition of the Blessed Virgin before this overshadowing, it is most reasonable to believe that God had chosen a very holy virgin for the purpose of receiving it; a person by whom His grace had been so specially co-operated with that it had received no hindrance from her will, and had thus been able to exert its full power of sanctification. It is reasonable to suppose, therefore, that during the fifteen or sixteen years which preceded the wonderful epoch of her miraculous maternity, the Blessed Virgin Mary had lived a life of surpassing innocence, one of purity such as is shadowed out in the sweet lives of some regenerate children in Christian times. Many saintly ones, following the Lamb whithersoever He goeth, have given living proof that God's grace could have such prevailing power; and if on any, certainly it would have such power on her who was predestined to be the mother of the God-Man.

3. Up to this point there is no real ground for controversy. There is no reason for supposing that the Blessed Virgin had ever committed sin before the birth of Christ, and there is every reason for supposing that she had not done so. The entire unresistance of her will to the will of God was an antecedent element of the Incarnation, and this is also the highest form of sanctification. But the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception is at once confronted with several difficulties. It is not supported by any evidence of Holy Scripture; it is a comparative novelty in theology; and it is distinctly opposed to the doctrine of original sin.

a] As to Scripture evidence, only two passages are adduced by the really learned defenders of this doctrine. The first is Gen. iii. 15, the πρωτευαγγέλιον of Divine revelation, "I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed: it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel." In the Vulgate the penultimate words appear in the form "ipsa conteret caput tuum," and some force is given to this reading by a few writers; but even if such a reading could be critically allowed[1] it does not make the verse applicable to the conception of the Blessed Virgin by her mother. There is absolutely no ground whatever for using it in such a sense, and it is only so used to meet the necessity of finding scriptural support for the doctrine. The other passage alleged is the Angelic Salutation [Luke i. 28, cf. 30], coupled with the words spoken by Elizabeth [Luke i. 42], "Hail, thou that art highly favoured, the Lord is with thee: blessed art thou among women. . . . Fear not Mary, for thou hast found favour with God. . . . Blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb." The argument founded on these words is that κεχαριτωμένη, translated in the Vulgate by "gratiâ plena," means fulness of grace in such a sense as necessitates exemption, from the beginning of existence, from all taint of sin; and that the same meaning necessarily belongs to the expression "blessed art thou among women" [Liebermann, Instit. Theol. ii. 833; Perrone, Prælect. Theol. ii. 651, Paris 1863]. But why these words should be so interpreted those who use them for the purpose do not say. They are, in fact, uncritically and illogically forced into the service of the doctrine; and, as in the case of the "Protevangelium" of the Old Testament, they offer no real support to it whatever. As for other passages, of a mystical type, which are used as a secondary evidence, they would be of value only as confirming and illustrating any in which the fact was directly and undoubtedly stated.

b] That the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception is a comparative novelty in theology is historically certain. There is not one writer before St. Bernard—that is, for the first eleven centuries of Christian history—who uses such strong language about the holiness of the Blessed Virgin as is used by St. Bernard himself in the letter to the canons of Lyons, previously referred to. Yet, he contends for the doctrine of her holiness by the power of God's grace exercised upon her after her conception by her mother, and against that of a sinless, or immaculate conception as a dangerous novelty doing dishonour to the Blessed Virgin and to Christ. "The mother of God," he writes, "was, without doubt, sanctified before she was born, nor is the holy Church in error in accounting the day of her nativity holy. I think that even a more abundant blessing of sanctification descended on her, which not only sanctified her birth, but also preserved her life from all sin, which happened to none other of the children of men. It was becoming, indeed, that the Queen of Virgins should pass her life in the privilege of a singular sanctity, and free from all sin, who, in bearing the Destroyer of all sin and death, obtained for all the gift of life.

"Whence, then, is the sanctity of her Conception? Can she be said to have been prevented by sanctification, as being already holy when conceived, and thus her Conception itself was also holy? But she could not be holy before she existed, as she existed not before she was conceived. Or, again, did holiness attach to her conception, "inter amplexus maritales," so that she was, at the same time, both sanctified and conceived? But reason admits not this; for how can there be holiness without the Holy Spirit to sanctify, or how could there be any union between the Holy Spirit and sin? or, again, how was there not sin where there was concupiscence? unless it be said, indeed, that she also was conceived of the Holy Ghost and not of a human father, which is hitherto unheard of. I affirm that the Blessed Virgin conceived, and not that she also was conceived by a virgin; otherwise where is her prerogative as the mother of God, by which she alone is believed to exult both in the gift of an offspring and in the spotlessness of her body, if you ascribe the same to her mother also? This is not to increase, but to detract from her honour: . . . although it is granted to a few among the sons of men to be born in holiness, it is not also granted them to be conceived holy; and thus to one alone would be reserved the prerogative of a holy Conception, even to Him who should sanctify all men, coming, alone of all, without sin, to make a cleansing of sins. Our Lord Jesus Christ, then, alone, was conceived of the Holy Ghost, who was alone holy even before His Conception; He only excepted, to all the other offspring of Adam apply the words spoken by one in humility and truth of himself—'I was shapen in iniquity, and in sin did my mother conceive me.'"

Exactly similar doctrine is found in Peter Lombard [Sentent. III. Distinct. iii.], in St. Alexander of Hales (the Irrefragable Doctor, and master of St. Bonaventure), a great commentator on Lombard, in St. Bonaventure himself, and above all in St. Thomas Aquinas [Summ. Theol. III. qu. xxvii. art. 1]. Duns Scotus [A.D. 1308] was the first theologian of any repute who advocated the theory of immaculacy; and it was even later before it became quite formalized into the shape in which it is maintained in the present day. It may be truly said therefore that it is a comparative novelty in theology.

c] Lastly, this doctrine is distinctly opposed to that of original sin. The very necessity for a miraculous conception in the case of Him who was to be without sin [INCARNATION] is in itself a proof that every person conceived in a natural manner must be conceived in sin [NATURE, HUMAN]. The Word of God is express and unmistakeable as to the fact that all are conceived in sin [ORIGINAL SIN]. There is not one particle of evidence that the Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary by her mother differed in any respect from that of other children by other women. Although, therefore, it is painful that any association should ever have to be made between sin and the name of the Virgin Mary—"de qua, propter honorem Dei, nullam prorsus, cum de peccatis agitur, volo quæstionem" [St. August. de Natur. et Grat. xxvi.]—yet it must, for the sake of truth, be asserted against those who dishonour Christ by the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception that, with all other human beings, His holy mother (how soon soever she was purified from its stain, and liberated from its power) was in the first instance conceived in original sin, because she was derived by natural conception from Adam, in whom all have sinned. [MARY.]

IMMERSION. [BAPTISM.]

IMPANATION. One of the many terms invented with the object of defining the mode of union between the outward part and the inward part in the Eucharistic Bread of Life. It is practically synonymous with the Lutheran term CONSUBSTANTIATION.

IMPLICIT FAITH. The child-like disposition which receives testimony without question, requiring no evidence or explanation, but relying wholly upon the trustworthiness of the person or persons giving it. On the same ground, implicit faith is a preparedness of mind ready to yield belief to propositions as yet undeclared. It can only be properly offered to an infallible authority, and, therefore, God alone is the only Person to Whom it can be offered without any reservation.

IMPOSITION OF HANDS. This ceremony was used by the early Church in benediction, absolution, and the unction of the sick, as well as in ordination and confirmation. But the phrase is often used in cases where actual placing of the hands on the head of each person was not practicable, as in the benediction of large bodies of penitents at the daily morning prayer [Bingham's Antiq. XIII. 10, viii.]: and although the ceremony is in such cases still called χειροθεσία, there can be no doubt it was modified into an elevation of the hands over the people, such as it is still customary to use when blessing them. In ordination and confirmation, imposition of hands has been used in both forms by the later Western Church; but in the Church of England an actual laying of the hand of the bishop upon the head of the person to be ordained or confirmed is strictly required. [CONFIRMATION. ORDINATION.]

IMPUTED RIGHTEOUSNESS. A leading article of Calvinistic theology, one of its advocates assuring us that "none ever died in denial of it, and escaped the damnation of hell."[1] It is thus defined by a celebrated modern author: "Justification is an act of God Almighty's grace, whereby He acquits sinners from their guilt, and accounts them righteous for the sake of Christ's righteousness wrought out for them and imputed to them. By Christ's righteousness, I mean the whole of His active and passive obedience, springing from the perfect holiness of His heart; continued through every stage of His life, and extending to the very last pang of His death: by the word imputed I would signify that this righteousness though performed by our Lord, is placed to our account, is reckoned or adjudged by God as our own; insomuch that we may plead it and rely on it, for the pardon of our sins, for the communication of grace, and for the enjoyment of life eternal."[2]

In support of this theory, the wedding garment which the rejected guest had not on [Matt. xxii. 11-13], has been explained as referring to Christ's imputed righteousness; but we find from our Lord's account of the Day of Judgment [Matt. xxv. 31-46], that the rejection of those on the left hand is attributed not to a want of Christ's imputed righteousness, but of those good works which afford proof of the faith of His true disciples and their meetness for His kingdom. In the description given of the proceedings of that awful day, the true meaning of the wedding garment is intimated: it is personal holiness, not a nominal imputation, but a real partaking of Christ's righteousness through the indwelling gifts of His Holy Spirit, which is evidenced by a life of faithful obedience. Again, the statement of St. Paul that Christ is made to us "wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption" [1 Cor. i. 30], or rather, "was made or became so" (ἐγενήθη), has been alleged in support of the Calvinistic tenet; but on the contrary, the passage is manifestly contradictory to it, by referring (according to the uniform teaching of Holy Scripture), to our justification, when, according to the true meaning of the phrase, Christ's righteousness was imputed to us solely through a past act of God in our regeneration by baptismal grace.

Again, several passages of Scripture which speak of faith being imputed to the believer for righteousness [Rom. ix. 30, x. 4-10; Gal. iii. 22] have been brought forward in support of this doctrine, yet with very little reasonableness, since the imputation of the believer's faith is obviously not synonymous with the imputation of Christ's righteousness, as a modern commentator clearly proves.[1]

It has been asserted, perhaps the most plausible plea in defence of this dogma, that nothing but thorough and perfect obedience could ever be available for acceptance before a God of infinite purity; and consequently that Christ's righteousness, which was alone perfect, must be imputed to the believer ere he can be accepted before God. This assertion is wholly destitute of proof, since it cannot be supposed that an all-perfect obedience to the Divine Will ever was or could be rendered by any created being whatever. If God, as Job says [iv. 18], charges His angels with folly, if "the heavens," or the inhabitants of heaven—to whom it will be admitted that no righteousness but their own is imputed—are said

[1] "The uniform doctrine of Scripture," says Macknight, "is that the believer's faith is counted to him for righteousness, by the mere grace or favour of God through Jesus Christ, that is on account of what Christ had done to procure that favour for them. This is very different from the doctrine of those who hold that by having faith imputed or counted for righteousness, the believer becomes perfectly righteous; whether they mean thereby that faith is in itself a perfect righteousness, or that it is the instrument of conveying to the believer the perfect righteousness of another. With respect to the first, it is not true that faith is a perfect righteousness, for if it were, justification would not be a free gift but of debt. And with respect to the second supposition, although the perfect righteousness of another were conveyed to the sinner by faith, it would not make him perfectly righteous, because it is beyond the power of Omnipotence itself, by any means whatever, to make a person not to have sinned who actually hath sinned. And yet unless this is done, no believer can be perfectly righteous." Commentary on Rom. iv. 3.

Imputed Righteousness

"not to be clean in God's sight" [Job xxv. 14]; may we not, since their imperfect obedience is accepted before God, by parity of reasoning infer that our inferior tribute of obedience, with feebler powers and opportunities of serving God imparted to us, will not pass unrewarded—nay, rather, worthless and imperfect though it be, will be more favourably received, being presented before the eternal throne, sprinkled with the atoning Blood of our great High-Priest and Intercessor.

But the theory before us is not only unsupported by the teaching of Scripture, it is even inconsistent with its primary and fundamental truths—it really sets aside the duty of obedience to God's commandments. If Christ's righteousness be imputed to every sinner who believes on Him, what can his striving to attain personal holiness avail? As covered with the righteousness of his Redeemer he is all-perfect; the attempt to improve such a state would certainly be unavailing, and would even seem to detract from the all-availing merits of his Substitute. He (the believer) cannot become less acceptable to God, however sinful may be his state of heart and life. As covered with our Lord's righteousness, he is still in a state of absolute perfection. Such is not only an obvious inference, but, as we shall shew, it is the inference which thoroughly Calvinistic writers themselves have always admitted and avowed. Such, for example, is the testimony of the following passages from the works of Dr. Crisp, a well-known writer of the seventeenth century: "Though a believer, after he be a believer, doth sin often, yet God no longer stands offended and displeased with him when he hath once received Christ. Except God will be offended where there is no cause to be offended (which is blasphemy to speak), He will not be offended with believers" [Serm. II. i. 15]. Yet again: "Let me speak freely to you, and in so doing tell you that the Lord hath no more to lay to the charge of an elect person, yet in the height of iniquity and in the excess of riot, and committing all the abominations that can be committed. I say, even then, when an elect person runs such a course, the Lord hath no more to lay to his charge than God hath to lay to the charge of a believer; nay, God hath no more to lay to the charge of such a person than He hath to lay to the charge of a saint triumphant in glory."[2] A few extracts may also be given from the works of modern advocates of the doctrine. Hervey says, "We consider believers in their personal and relative capacity, as they are in themselves, and as they are in their Surety. Notorious or confessed transgressors in themselves, they have a sinless obedience in Christ."[3] "We are assured that God justifies the ungodly; those who have nothing of their own but abominable iniquities. To these, therefore, something else must necessarily be imputed besides their own personal deeds."[4] Mason, in his Spiritual Treasury for the children of God, speaking of the elect, says: "As the Father gave their persons, so He imputed their sins to Jesus—He bore them away—God charges not trespasses to them—they are free from sin as viewed by God in Christ. To this truth the Spirit bears witness through the faith of Jesus. So, believer, reckon of thyself. Though black as hell, polluted with guilt, defiled with sin, yet in Christ 'all fair, without spot,' fully reconciled to God, and without trespasses before Him."[1] "If any man here present," says Bulteel, "believe on the Lord Jesus, that man is without spot of sin before God, although in himself he may feel them to be more in number than the hairs of his head, and his heart fails him. For God sees no sin in believers, because there is none in believers before Him; and though feeling, sense, and reason tell him it is not so, yet the Word of God tells him it is so. God sees no spot or blemish of sin in us who call on the Name of Jesus, because He hath covered us with the righteousness of Jesus, which is unto, and upon, and within, every one that trusteth in Him. And one thing more we may say, whereas the believer by faith hath made this righteousness his own, it is utterly impossible he should want any other. And whereas the righteousness is the righteousness of God, not only of God's appointing but of God's working, for it is of Christ, God-man, it were a blasphemy of us to say, either that it is not sufficient to make us accepted before God, or to affirm that any additions of man can make it more complete than it is. Therefore, as many as trust in Christ, being thus clothed, are not only counted, but made, perfectly righteous and holy, without any spot or blemish of sin in the sight of God."[2]

The extracts which have been given clearly shew that this dogma in itself, and not by any doubtful inference, is grossly Antinomian; that it really sets aside the plainest directions in God's Word of His hatred against sin and the fearful judgments impending over sinners; that it represents a man's life, whether he be living in obedience or disobedience to the Divine will, as having no influence on his state before God; and thus we can only exclaim with the Psalmist, "Verily, I have cleansed my heart in vain, and washed my hands in innocency;" in a word, that it is subversive of the very object and purpose of Divine Revelation—"to purify a peculiar people, zealous of good works."[3]

A brief statement may be added of the true doctrine of imputed righteousness. When we are made partakers of the Christian covenant in baptism, being cleansed from sin and regenerated by the Holy Ghost, we are hereby taken out of our fallen state by nature, and, in St. Paul's words, are "in Christ;" that is, are made members of Him by incorporation into His Body the Church, or, as the same Apostle also says, "we put on Christ" [Gal. iii. 27], are both accounted, and actually made, righteous by the infused gifts of the Holy Ghost. Thus, in a true sense, are we covered with the robe of Christ's righteousness, as being through His all-atoning merits pardoned, sanctified, and made one with Him—He dwelling in us, and we in Him. His righteousness is thus imputed to us, His perfect obedience and sacrifice on the Cross becoming in a certain sense our own, as being adjudged to our account; "being made sin (a sin-offering) for us, we are made the righteousness of God in Him" [2 Cor. v. 21]. But we have no intimation in Scripture that subsequently to baptism this plenary gift of pardon and sanctification will thus be unconditionally granted, or that on falling into sin, by an "act of faith" we can again appropriate to ourselves that robe of righteousness in which we were clothed once for all in Holy Baptism. The unconditional promises of pardon to the ignorant and unenlightened heathen must, we may be assured, essentially differ from those vouchsafed to Christians, who in baptism have received the Holy Ghost, and covenanted to obey the precepts of the Gospel. This essential difference between the Christian and heathen state is clearly laid down in Scripture, and is indeed obvious in itself if men's responsibilities be proportioned to their privileges and advantages, but being overlooked and forgotten, we have before us the fearful dogma which has been examined. Hence, also, we may account for those imperfect and inadequate views of the evil and danger of sin, arising from a forgetfulness of our Christian duties and obligations, which peculiarly characterize popular theology.

INCARNATION. The assumption of human nature by the Second Person of the Blessed Trinity.

The word expresses in a short form the fact stated in St. John i. 14, Ὁ Λόγος σὰρξ ἐγένετο, Verbum caro factum est, and is doubtless founded on the form of that statement. Its use can be traced back as far as the writings of Irenæus [A.D. 180], and to that still earlier summary of the Creed which he embodies in them. In this form our Lord Jesus Christ is spoken of as Τὸν σαρκωθέντα ὑπὲρ τῆς ἡμετέρας σωτηρίας, which is rendered in the nearly contemporary Latin version, "Incarnatum pro nostra salute" [Irenæus, Contr. Hær. i. 10]. The Nicene Creed and the writings of the Fathers gave the term a permanent place in Latin theology and in Divine service, and it is also found in all the Western forms of the Litany. In the earliest English, "incarnatus est" was translated "wearth geflæschamod," or "iflæschamod," but the Litany obsecration, "by the mystery of Thy holy Incarnation," and the present form of the word in the Nicene Creed, were introduced a few years before the English Prayer-Book was set forth [Blunt's Annot. Book of Common Prayer], and the word was freely used in the time of Hooker.

I. Scriptural Statements respecting the Incarnation of God. There is much in the Old Testament which, interpreted by the light of Gospel history and Apostolic exposition, shews that the Great Deliverer of the future, whom the whole world, in one form or other, expected, and for whom the Jews looked as their Messiah, was spoken of in the language of inspiration as Divine. Such texts as declare Him to be the Son of God are instances of this language, the meaning of which could not be perfectly known until revealed by the event to which it referred; but, being revealed, now assumes the nature of direct evidence. Thus, in the Psalms, God says, "Yet have I set My King upon My holy hill of Zion. I will declare the decree: the Lord hath said unto Me, Thou art My Son; this day have I begotten Thee" [Psa. ii. 6, 7], words which could be spoken of the Only Begotten alone, whose Eternal Generation is signified by the expression "this day," and whose Messiahship is predicted in the kingdom set up on Zion [Heb. i. 5]. Equally plain are the words, "Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever; the sceptre of Thy kingdom is a right sceptre. Thou lovest righteousness, and hatest wickedness; therefore God, Thy God, hath anointed Thee with the oil of gladness above Thy fellows" [Psa. xlv. 6, 7], in which the very name, as well as the office of Christ, is referred to, and in which He is also addressed, in words of adoration, "O God" [Heb. i. 8, 9]. Even in such prophecies as speak of the work of the Great Deliverer, it is almost impossible to dissociate the language from the idea of Divinity. When it is said that "a man shall be as an hiding-place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest; as rivers of water in a dry place, as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land" [Isa. xxxii. 2], the mind looks and longs for such an one as a person capable of doing that which a person only human could not do, and sees in such terms the promise of Divine Power as well as that of Human Love. But more direct assertions still are given that the Messiah will be Divine. Thus Isaiah prophesied, "Behold, a virgin shall conceive, and bear a son, and shall call His Name Immanuel" [Isa. vii. 14], the name so given having the meaning "God with us," and fixing at once, to us, the full sense of the text as a prediction that God would become incarnate.[1] Of a similar force are the words, "Unto us a Child is born, unto us a Son is given, and the government shall be upon His shoulder; and His Name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace" [Isa. ix. 6]; and, "Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous Branch, and a King shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In His days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely; and this is His Name whereby He shall be called, The Lord our righteousness" ["Jehovah-tsidkenu," Jer. xxiii. 5, 6].

Such prophetic tesimonies of the Old Testament—rays of light shed out of Divine Omniscience—are in strict accordance with the historical witness of the New Testament; St. Paul, especially, several times declaring that God had become Incarnate. Thus, setting forth to the Gentiles their freedom in Christ, he bases his doctrine on this statement: "When the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth His Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons" [Gal. iv. 4, 5]. Of a similar character are his words to the Jews, "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, He also Himself likewise took part of the same; . . . for verily He took not on Him the nature of angels, but He took on Him the seed of Abraham" [Heb. ii. 14, 16]. But more express still is the same Apostle's proclamation of the mystery of the Incarnation when writing to Timothy, "And, without controversy, great is the mystery of godliness: God was manifest in the flesh,[2] justified in the Spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory" [1 Tim. iii. 16], in which the same plainness of language is used as by St. John, when he de-

[1] It is by no means clear, however, that the Jews understood this prophecy in the sense in which the event proves it to have been written. Trypho the Jew, in disputing with Justin Martyr, said, "The Scripture does not say, 'Behold, the virgin shall conceive, and bear a son,' but, 'Behold, the young woman shall conceive, and bear a son,' and so on, as you quoted. But the whole propheey relates to Hezekiah, and it is proved that it was fulfilled in him, according to its terms" [Just. Mart. Dial. with Trypho, lxvii.]. The Christian philosopher shewed how absurdly pointless such a sense of the words would be, but it has been generally maintained by the Jews. Thus Kimchi writes, "עלמה (Almah) non est virgo, sed puella. . . . Puella vero hæc uxor prophetæ, vel uxor Achazi, quod probabilius videtur." But Christian Hebraists prove that עלם (Elem) signifies unmarried youth in the masculine, and that, as "Almah" is derived from it, the meaning of the latter word [here, as in Gen. xxiv. 43] can be nothing else than that of "unmarried young woman," or "virgin." [See note on Kimchi, in loco, ed. Cæsar Malanimeus, Florence, 1774]. The prophecy was, in fact, one which could only be properly understood by its fulfilment.

[2] There has been much dispute as to the true reading of this passage in the original. The words of our English version are translated from the Greek as it stands in the great majority of MSS., Καὶ ὁμολογουμένως μέγα ἐστι τὸ τῆς εὐσεβείας μυστήριον, Θεὸς ἐφανερώθη ἐν σαρκὶ. In some uncial MSS. the word Θεός is contracted into two letters $\bar{\Theta}\Sigma$ or ΘΣ, and in some the middle stroke of the Θ is missing, or (as in the Alexandrine Codex), has been tampered with so as to make it uncertain whether it was originally present or more recently inserted. Without this stroke the abbreviation stands for ΟΣ, "who:" and the Vulgate even reads "quod manifestum in carne," which would require the Greek to be Ὅ, "which," a reading not found in the Greek but supported by the Latin of St. Jerome and the Latin Fathers in general. The balance of manuscript authority is in favour of our English version; while Θεός also makes good grammar and good sense in the Greek, which ὅς does not: it is also used universally by the Greek Fathers.

clares, "The Word was made flesh." [Divinity of Christ. Word, The.]

II. The Incarnation of God effected in the Conception and Birth of Jesus. The preceding passages of Holy Scripture, and many others which refer to the Divinity of the Messiah, are clearly applicable to our Lord Jesus Christ: but there is also direct evidence that the Son of Mary was He of whom the Scriptures spoke when they declared that God would become, or had become, Incarnate.

The narrative of our Lord's Conception and Birth is given by two of the four Evangelists, St. Matthew and St. Luke. The simple language of the first is, "Now the birth of Jesus Christ was on this wise: When as His mother Mary was espoused to Joseph, before they came together, she was found with child by the Holy Ghost" [Matt. i. 18]. And, a few verses further on, this is said to be the fulfilment of God's Word, spoken by the Prophet Isaiah, and quoted in the previous section, "Behold, a virgin shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son, and they shall call His Name Emmanuel, which, being interpreted, is God with us" [ibid. 23]: this being ushered in by the statement of the holy angel to Joseph, "for that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Ghost" [ibid. 28]. The narrative of St. Luke is given in somewhat more detail, declaring how "the angel Gabriel was sent from God unto a city of Galilee, named Nazareth, to a virgin espoused to a man whose name was Joseph, of the house of David; and the virgin's name was Mary." After the salutation, "the angel said unto her, Fear not, Mary; for thou hast found favour with God. And, behold, thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and bring forth a son, and shalt call his name Jesus." . . . "Then said Mary unto the angel, How shall this be, seeing I know not a man? And the angel answered and said unto her, The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee: therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of thee, shall be called the Son of God" [Luke i. 30, 34, 35]. The accomplishment of this prediction in the birth of Jesus is narrated in the next chapter, where it is declared: "She brought forth her first-born son, and wrapped Him in swaddling-clothes, and laid Him in a manger; because there was no room for them in the inn" [Luke ii. 7]. To this it must be added that St. Matthew expressly declares Joseph "knew her not till she had brought forth her first-born Son" [Matt. i. 25].

Upon these statements the Church founds the article of the Creed which declares that Jesus Christ was "conceived by the Holy Ghost, Born of the Virgin Mary:" and upon these statements, combined with such others as have been previously noticed, rests the doctrine that God the Son became Incarnate, and was made Man.

It is plain that the doctrine of the Incarnation, as a fact already accomplished, is bound up with the history of our Lord Jesus, for He is the only historical man who ever claimed for Himself, and whose followers ever continously claimed for Him, that He was God Incarnate. It is necessary, therefore, to pursue into further detail the initial part of that history.

The Miraculous Conception and Birth of Jesus, although so clearly narrated in the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Luke, have been challenged by the doubts of unbelievers on two grounds, [1] that the facts alleged were within the knowledge of very few persons; and [2] that they were inconsistent with all human experience. Neither of these alleged reasons for disbelief, however, offer any real foundation for doubt respecting this mystery, as may be shewn by a careful examination of the facts of the case.

[1.] It was undoubtedly the case that few persons had any personal knowledge respecting the miraculous Conception of Christ. The first person to whom it was known would, of course, be the Blessed Virgin who was to be the instrumental medium of the Incarnation: and the second, so far as we are informed by Holy Scripture, was her subsequent husband and protector, Joseph. It cannot be reasonably supposed that the parents of the Blessed Virgin were unacquainted with the supernatural character of their daughter's conception; and the fact seems to have been communicated to Elizabeth by Divine revelation, perhaps at the moment of her cousin Mary's visit to her. But that this conception before her marriage to Joseph was not generally known to her relatives and acquaintances seems to be proved by the intention which he had formed of annulling their betrothal in some private manner by which he could spare her from shame.

It appears, therefore, to be a probable conclusion that the circumstances of our Lord's Incarnation were all of such a character as to lead those to whom the Divine secret was not confided to the conclusion, "Is not this the son of Joseph?" But the very fact that circumstances were so ordered as to make such an opinion possible shews that the revelation of the truth was not intended to be made, at that time, to the world at large. It was part of God's Providence that the Blessed Virgin should pass through the world as the wife of Joseph and not as a Virgin Mother, and that the mystery of the Incarnation should be concealed from all but a few until after the Resurrection of Christ.

The Primitive Church believed that this reticence had reference to the contest between Christ while in His unglorified Human Nature and the great Adversary whom He had come to defeat. So St. Ignatius says, "the virginity of Mary was hidden from the Prince of this world, as was also her offspring" [Ignat. ad Eph. xix.]. It may have been that, as our Lord did not gird Himself for the warfare until the Temptation, it was fitting that Satan should not know of His miraculous entry into the world, that until then Christ might be left in peace.

But it must also be remembered that the force, so to speak, of our Lord's miraculous Conception and Birth received its complement in His ministry. The Son of God became Incarnate that He might accomplish the work of Redemption, which work was not completed until He had ascended in His Human Nature to heaven. No object, as far as can be seen, would have been gained by a general disclosure of the mystery of His Conception before His work had been completed: and certainly, when the Jews would not believe the possibility of His descent from heaven, even though their minds were prepared for such a fact by the record of ancient theophanies and angelic visits, it is not probable that they would have believed an outspoken declaration of Christ's true origin.

Consequently it would be contrary to reason, under the circumstances, to expect that our Lord's miraculous Conception would have been known to any number of persons during the time of His ministry; and the absence of any attempt in the Gospels to shew that it was so known is evidence that the Evangelists and Apostles rested upon Divine revelation as the true proof of the fact.

[2.] It has also been said that the miraculous Conception by which the Incarnation of God the Son was effected is incredible, because contrary to experience, and beyond the bounds of possibility. To say that it would be contrary to experience is only to allege what every theologian at once admits, that one instance, and one only, of such a miraculous conception has ever occurred. To say that it would be impossible is equally to beg the question. No rational physiologist who believed an act of creation possible would allege that such an occurrence was beyond the power of the Creator to effect: and to call this exceptional and solitary instance of parthenogenesis an impossibility would be as absurd as to deny the possibility of any genesis of human nature.[1]

There being, thus, no reason for alleging antecedent improbability against the narratives of St. Matthew and St. Luke, their statements may be left to stand on the ground of the general credibility which belongs to their Gospels. This being fully established, beyond the power of all cavil to weaken, there can be no difficulty in identifying the Jesus whose miraculous Conception they record with the Incarnate God elsewhere spoken of in Holy Scripture. In what manner the Incarnation was initiated is a mystery respecting which the words of the Scripture are our only guide. The Holy Ghost overshadowed the Blessed Virgin, and henceforward for nine months "that Holy Thing, which should be born of her" was being moulded of her substance, so as to develope day by day as in the ordinary process of gestation; being yet from the same moment in such actual union with the Second Person of the Blessed Trinity, as that when born It should "be called the Son of God."

Had no other evidence existed, however, that Christ was God Incarnate, the language of the New Testament respecting Him is such as to teach this truth; such as could not be used except in subordination to it. In the Gospels and elsewhere the Man Christ Jesus is constantly exhibited to us with the attributes of Divine Personality. He is revealed to us as the Lord of Nature, exercising over it an equal authority with the Father [John v. 17], and shewing His power, especially by the instantaneous healing of diseases. With a word He healed the leper [Matt. viii. 3], the centurion's servant [Matt. viii. 13], the sick of the palsy [Matt. ix. 6], and many others. To Him "all power is given in Heaven and in earth" [Matt. xxviii. 18]; men are intrusted to Him that they may be taught and baptized [Matt. xxviii. 19, 20], and thus "quickened" to spiritual life [John v. 21]; and it is "His Voice" which will hereafter raise the dead from their graves, that He may "execute" upon them the "judgment committed" to Him [John v. 22-29], and "give eternal life" to those who have faithfully served Him [John xvii. 2]. All the spiritual world is subject to Him, devils are cast out in His Name [Matt. vii. 22], angels ascend and descend upon Him [John i. 51], sit in the sepulchre where His sacred Body had lain [John xx. 13], and will come with Him in His glory [Matt. xvi. 27]. He holds and bestows the power of binding and loosing the consciences of men [Matt. xviii. 18]. He is omnipresent, still "in heaven" when He had come down to earth [John iii. 13], and for ever "in the midst" of "the two or three gathered together in His Name" [Matt. xviii. 20]. He is omnipotent, "all power is given unto Him" [Matt. xxviii. 18], that He may "subdue all things" [Phil. iii. 21] and "uphold all things" [Heb. i. 3]. He is omniscient, for He alone "knoweth the Father" [Matt. xi. 27], and is able to "tell the heavenly things" which He has "seen" [John iii. 11, 12], since He alone has "seen the Father" [John vi. 46], and "knows the Father" [John x. 15]; and in Him are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge [Col. ii. 3]. He is eternal, saying of Himself "I AM" [John viii. 58], sharing "the glory" of the Father "before the world was" [John xvii. 5], and Himself being "Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, Which is, and Which was, and Which is to come" [Rev. i. 8]. His likeness to the Father is absolute: they work together [John v. 17], doing the same things [John v. 19], and exercising an equal power over the bodies and souls of men [John v. 21-26; ibid. x. 28, 29]; whilst those who

[1] The exclamation of contemporary Jews, "Is not this the carpenter's son?" has been taken up by more modern unbelievers on much less rational grounds. Against such a theory we have, what the Jews of Christ's day had not, the statement of the Gospel (bearing on its face the stamp of simple truthfulness), and the continuous tradition of the Christian world.

The Talmud, and some modern Jewish accounts of Christ, adopt the idea which arose in the mind of Joseph before the truth was revealed to him. It does not appear that any such reproach was cast upon the honour of our Lord's mother by contemporaries, not even by the generation which said of our Lord Himself "he hath a devil." Yet those who invented the blasphemy are dependent upon the Gospel, and that alone, for any account whatever of Christ's Conception and Birth, and might with more reason deny the whole than add to it this wicked invention.

know the Son are said to know the Father also [John xiv. 7]. His oneness with the Father is absolute, "I and My Father are One" [John x. 30]. "I am in the Father, and the Father in Me" [John xiv. 10]. He has an equal share in the honour due to the Father; "all men" are bidden to "honour the Son even as they honour the Father," and dishonour done to the Son is said to be at the same time a dishonour to the Father [John v. 23]. Again, He is set forth as the Creator of the world, "all things were made by Him: and without Him was not anything made that was made" [John i. 3]. "By Him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth: all things were created by Him and for Him" [Col. i. 16]. By Him the Father "made the worlds" [Heb. i. 2]; He "laid the foundations of the earth: and the heavens are the works of His hands" [Heb. i. 10]. He is the Preserver of the world, "by Him all things consist" [Col. i. 17]. He "upholds all things by the word of His power" [Heb. i. 3]. He is "the Brightness of the Father's glory, and the express Image of His Person" [Heb. i. 3]; "the Image of the invisible God" [Col. i. 15]; and "in the form of God" [Phil. i. 6]; "in Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead" [Col. ii. 9]. His glory is "as of the Only-Begotten of the Father" [John i. 14], "and we receive of His fulness" [John i. 16]. He is God, "the great God" [Titus ii. 13]; "the true God" [1 John v. 20]; "God blessed for ever" [Rom. ix. 5], Who "purchased the Church with His own Blood" [Acts xx. 28]; and of Whom it is said, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God," and "was made Flesh" [John i. 1-14]. Such language as this offers the strongest possible testimony to the doctrine of the Incarnation, shewing as it does that the glory, majesty, and power of God belonged to Jesus; and that the Son of Man was also the Son of God.

Accordingly, the fourth anathema of St. Cyril of Alexandria declares, "Whosoever divideth into two Persons and Hypostases those things which are contained in the works of the Apostles and Evangelists, and of the things that are said of Christ by the saints or by Himself, apply some severally to the man beside the Word of God, and others, as if worthy of God, to the Word of God the Father, alone, let him be accursed."

III. Results of the Incarnation. [1.] Human nature having been thus assumed by the Second Person of the Blessed Trinity, it is to be understood that it was assumed entire. The Body of Christ was not a phantom, as the Gnostics and the Docetæ maintained, but a true body, like the ordinary bodies of men. His soul was not identical with the Divine Word, as was believed by the Apollinarians, but a "reasonable soul," capable of willing, thinking, and actuating, as are the ordinary souls of men. Neither, again, did our Lord's Human Nature come down, ready formed, from Heaven, as was the opinion of the Valentinians, but was formed of the substance of His mother, of "human flesh subsisting."

Thus the Incarnate Word was "perfect Man" as well as "perfect God." He was capable of enduring in His Body all sufferings of which human bodies are capable, and in His soul all emotions which can be felt by human souls. Hunger, thirst, fatigue, pain, weeping, were all within the range of His possible, and of His actual, experience in the body, as sorrow, pity, love, and joy were among the experiences of His soul. It was only where the defects of our human nature are those that are specially associated with personal imperfection and sin, that a line of distinction began to be drawn between Christ and mankind in general. He assumed the capacity for bodily pain and for death [Death of Christ], but not for disease; He assumed capacity for mental suffering, but not for sin. His conception was perfectly immaculate, because He was conceived by the Holy Ghost, and as He thus took human nature without any taint of original sin, so that human nature continued utterly sinless, in perfect union and communion with God.

[2.] The mystery of the Incarnation also comprehends the truth that the Perfect Manhood of Christ was and is in natural, essential, personal union with His Perfect Godhead. It was the error of Nestorianism that Christ had two persons—the one human, of which Mary was the mother, the other Divine, the Person of the Son of God; and that these two Persons were only accidentally, not essentially, united; an error that reached its natural terminus in the theory of Adoptionism. It was the error of Eutychianism, on the other hand, to acknowledge one Nature only, as there is only one Person, in Christ, which was only another form of that Docetic folly which looked on the human nature of our Lord as a phantom and not a reality. Against these errors were contrived those clauses of the Athanasian Creed which declare that our Lord, "although He be God and man, yet He is not two, but one Christ. One, not by conversion of the Godhead into flesh, but by taking of the Manhood into God. One altogether; not by confusion of substance, but by unity of Person."

In this Hypostatic Union it is true that properties which belong to God, such as omniscience, are predicated of Christ's Human Nature, and those which belong to man, such as passibility, are predicated of His Divine nature [Communicatio Idiomatum. Theandric Operation]. But there is no error in this, because this kind of language is never used by exact theologians except when speaking of the Person of Christ. Thus, although it would be an error to say that Christ's Body is omnipresent, it is not an error to say that Christ, God and man, is omnipresent, because His two natures cannot be separated, and where He, i.e. the Person of Christ, is, there must be both natures, or "whole Christ."

[3.] The mystery of the Incarnation refers not only to a past time, when during a certain stage of the Eternal Word's existence He assumed human nature, but to all time, so that the Hypostatic Union exists still, and will exist, as long as time shall last. Holy Scripture has provided sufficient evidence as to this permanence of the Incarnation, in the accounts which are given of Christ's Death, Burial, Resurrection, Ascension, and Session in heaven. At each of these stages of Christ's work, the continuous identity between the human nature born of the Virgin Mary, and that which was dying, living again, or ascending to heaven, is carefully shewn; many witnesses combining their testimony to prove that He was "this same Jesus" [Acts i. 11]. Thus a great multitude were witnesses of His death; the burial of His body was so effected that evidence of its identity with that which arose on the third day after was secured at the hands of the Roman and Jewish authorities [RESURRECTION]; He was touched and seen by those who could declare afterwards that it was a material body, and not a phantom or spirit made visible, which ascended to heaven; and in His human nature He was afterwards seen by St. Stephen, St. Paul, and St. John [SESSION OF CHRIST], as He will be seen by all hereafter.

IV. THE PURPOSE OF THE INCARNATION. The preceding results of the Incarnation have been viewed chiefly as they regard Christ Himself. It is necessary also to consider the relation which they have towards the redemption and salvation of man; for it was "for us men and for our salvation" that the Son of God "came down from heaven, and was Incarnate by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary, and was made Man."

[1.] By becoming Man, the Son of God restored to human nature at large the capacity for union with God. A chief consequence of the FALL OF MAN was that it necessitated the propagation in all men of the likeness of their fallen forefather, instead of that of the IMAGE OF GOD; and up to the time of the Incarnation no remedy had been found by which this continuous force of the Fall could be counteracted. Thus the relation between God and man had become changed, not only in Adam, but in all his posterity. Human nature was not as God had created it, but as sin had changed it; and original sin was a constant bar between it and union with God.

Christ, coming into the world with human nature received from the substance of a virgin, was never brought under the influence of those circumstances by which original sin is propagated: and He, therefore, represented human nature in its original relation to God, i.e. as it existed before the Fall. He was human in form, and in organization; Man in flesh, blood, bones, in will, thought, and sensation; Man in soul, and Man in body; but He was man unfallen. Formed of the substance of His mother by a direct act of God, as Adam was by a similar act formed of the substance of the earth, it is probable that the words used of Him, "That Holy Thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God," are used in this case respecting that perfect humanity at first possessed by our original parent, of whom it is also said, "Adam which was the Son of God," by the same Evangelist [Luke i. 35, iii. 38]. So far, in His one individual person, the Holy Jesus had brought back human nature to its original starting-point, to the moral place and condition in which its Creator had originally set it. He was the representative of manhood in such perfection as none had ever attained to since men had been born of women. The Image of God was to be traced out perfectly in this "Holy Thing," and hence He was a second perfect man, a "Second Adam," possessed of such a nature as the first had when "God saw everything that He had made, and behold it was very good."[1]

[2.] It was this exceptional and original purity which qualified Christ to become an offering for the sin of the world. Entering on a state of probation analogous to that in which the originals of human nature were placed, He withstood temptation in its several representative forms. His hunger laid Him open to a temptation of the senses; His consciousness of the Divinity within to a temptation of "presumptuous sin;" His intense love of souls and desire for their salvation to a temptation prematurely to gain the kingdoms of this world for "the kingdoms of the Lord and of His Christ," forestalling the Providence of God. Such temptations were those offered to the first representatives of the human race, in the fruit "good for food, and to be desired to make one wise," in the presumptuous dealing with God's command, and in the craving after a premature attainment of that for which God's time had not yet come. In the one case the probation ended in a Fall, in the other in a Victory; and that being gained, a representative Man was, as it may figuratively be said, again placed in Paradise as if the Fall had never been. Thus qualified by a victorious probation, Christ, free from the sin of nature and from the sin of act, could go forth to bear the sins of His brethren, and in His one individual person to represent all sinners paying the penalty of sin, as Adam represented all mankind falling under it in his. For "as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive" [1 Cor. xv. 22], and "As by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous" [Rom. v. 19].

[3.] But it must be remembered that the second Adam was far more than the first, and that Christ was not only a special man in that He was a perfect representative of our species in its highest perfection. It may be doubted, indeed, whether even so perfect a nature, standing by itself, could have done more than give a very holy example. Perhaps there is reason to ask doubtingly, Could even such human nature have stood firm against a second trial, when it broke down under the first? And when it is considered that the work to be done consisted not only of a victorious personal probation, but also of a restoration and elevation of humanity, a redintegration in millions of human persons of the broken Image of God, it must be manifest that an infinitely higher power was requisite in the second Adam to restore others, than in the first to preserve himself. The problem of man's progress to perfection was not so simple as in its original form. It had become greatly complicated by the first deviation from the normal path, and by all the subsequent wanderings of mankind: and it required for its practical solution the construction of a new system of progression to replace the original one which had been so grievously distorted. Hence that more perfect and entire Unity between the Human and the Divine which resulted from the actual Incarnation of God was absolutely necessary for restoring human nature to its original fair prospect of development: since more than even the highest human perfection was needed to withstand the second probation; and since, also, new relations were to be established between the Person so victorious and those whom He came to benefit, which could not spring out of mere humanity, however perfect it might be. Christ therefore, to perfect human nature—united to, and elevated by, the Divine nature—became the source of a new generative process, a re-generation, by which others could be made partakers of Him, as all are of our first parent. By natural generation, mankind are partakers of the Fall of human nature; by this new generative process, of its restoration or rise; "The first man Adam was made a living soul, the last Adam a life-giving Spirit" [1 Cor. xv. 45]. This is so essentially a first principle of the religion of Christ, that when He discoursed with a well-educated Jew like Nicodemus, whose mind could follow up His sayings to their results, it was this that He made the very starting-point of His exposition of it, "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God" [John iii. 3]. These words, though spoken at the beginning of Christ's ministry, may well be taken as an actual sequel to those many expressions afterwards used by Him in which He presented His own person so prominently before His hearers and disciples as the one source of salvation, of "seeing," of "entering into," and having the full fruition of, "the kingdom of God." "I am the door," He seems to say, "come enter by Me, and by Me be regenerated to a new life, that you may enter into, and abide in, that kingdom which is now come from heaven to be in the midst of you."

[1] St. Paul thus calls Adam "the figure (τύπος) of Him that was to come" [Rom. v. 14].

Thus the sacramental life of the Christian soul is evolved out of the life of God Incarnate: sacraments become, in the words of Jeremy Taylor, "the extension of the Incarnation" [Worthy Communicant, i. 2], and the mystery by which the redemption of mankind in the mass was wrought is continually working out the salvation of mankind in the individual. IN CŒNA DOMINI. [Cœna Domini.]

INCOMPREHENSIBLE. The translation of ἀκατάληπτος in the Greek version [first printed at Basle by Bryling] of the Athanasian Creed, which the revisers of our Prayer-Book used. In the Latin original, however, the word is "immensus," and thus a question arises whether the meaning of the English word here used means "boundless" with the Latin, or "unintelligible" with the Greek. But one cannot think, since incomprehensibilis is the acknowledged rendering of ἀκατάληπτος [see Cicero, Acad. Quæst. i. 11, iv. 6, 10], that with the Greek in their hands, and believing it the original, our translators would have used incomprehensible for immensus, when they had the more exact word immeasurable of Hilsey's Primer. There was no reason for changing the word immeasurable if they were relying on the received Latin form: and the conclusion is that they adopted the Greek as that which was to be accepted by the Church. [See Waterland's Critical Hist. p. 233, n. and 234, n; Van Mildert, vol. iii.]

But it is remarkable that in Bishop Pearson's two lectures on the Immensity and on the Incomprehensibility of God, he uses both forms. In the former he writes, "Ita Symbolum quod Athanasianum dicitur, Immensus Pater:" in the latter, "Hoc verum esse patet et symbolo Athanasiano, Pater est incomprehensibilis" [Minor Theol. Works, Churton i. pp. 76, 128].

Κατάληψις is a word borrowed by the Fathers from the Stoic and Sceptic philosophers. [See Mr. Long's remarks on the sceptic notions of the Being of God, viz., that the sum of their objections, properly viewed, is this, that God is incomprehensible. Smith's Dict. of Biogr. art. Sextus Empiricus]. The Fathers, however, used the word to express, not an inferior degree of knowledge, but the highest degree of knowledge. The Stoics placed κατάληψις midway between ἐπιστήμη and δόξα; "doeuerunt . . . perfectissimam scientiam, imperfectissimam opinionem; comprehensionem imperfectiorem scientia, opinione perfectiorem." But St. Augustine writes: "Aliud est videre, aliud totum videndo comprehendere. Quandoquidem id videtur quod præsens utcunque sentitur; totum autem comprehenditur videndo, quod ita videtur, ut nihil ejus lateat videntem aut cujus fines circumspici possunt" [Epist. cxii. (cxlvii.) c. 9]. For this it is required that the knowledge be [1] intuitive; that it include not only [2] all that is formally contained in the thing known; but also [3] all that belongs to it virtually; and [4] that the object be known not merely as far as the subject, or mind which knows, is capable of knowing it, but so far as the object itself is capable of being known. Proceeding upon this, God according to His essence is incomprehensible to a created intellect [Matt. xi. 27].

As a proof from Scripture, Job xi. 7, Rom. xi., may be cited, upon which St. Chrysostom argues, If God's judgments are incomprehensible, then God Himself is incomprehensible.

Irenæus iv. 36 may be quoted as an authority for connecting the notions contained in the two words "immensus" and "incomprehensibilis:" "Secundum magnitudinem non est cognoscere Deum: impossibile enim est mensurari Patrem." [See Chrysost. Homil. de incomp. Dei Natura. Other authorities may be found in Pearson.]

So reason teaches that God can be infinitely known, but that it requires an infinite Being so to know Him. Man therefore cannot know Him as He is.

The same doctrine under another form is treated by St. Thomas Aquinas: De Nominibus Dei, Qu. xiii.; A consideration of his first conclusion will shew this: "Cum Deus in hac vita secundum quod in se est, minime a nobis cognoscatur, sed secundum quod principium omnium eminentissimum est, aliquibus nominibus hoc significantibus nominari potest; nullum est autem nomen divinam essentiam adequate repræsentans, Deo ab hominibus impositum."

Theodoret says that Eunomius dared to profess that he knew accurately the essence of the Deity [Hæret. Fabul. iv. 3]. Such language as this used by the Arians of France, against whom synods were held at Beziers, A.D. 356, at Paris, A.D. 362, gave occasion, it may be supposed, to the introduction of "immensus" into the Creed, if the words of Irenæus as given above were taken as a guide.

INDEFECTIBILITY OF THE CHURCH. [1.] The perpetuity of the Church, by which it is free from failure in succession of members. [2.] The inerrancy and infallibility of the Church, by which it is free from failure in holding and declaring the Truth.

Both these flow from the constitution and nature of the mystical Body of Christ. The Scriptures which speak to this point are John xv.; 1 Cor. vi. 15, 19, xii. 12; Eph. i. 23, iv. 12, v. 30; Col. i. 18, and cannot be explained away into metaphor. As Christ's natural Body was incorruptible, and yet before the Resurrection was liable to human infirmities [Matt. viii. 17], so His mystical Body, yet unglorified, is liable in each one of its many members to sin and falling from grace; but nothing can touch the life of the Body itself. As also the fulness of the Spirit dwelt in Christ, and Christ was the Truth, so the Spirit, by virtue of whose indwelling the Body is one, and one with its Head, guides the Church into all truth.

I. PERPETUITY. Plain promises of this are made in Isa. lxi. 8, 9; Dan. ii. 44; Matt. xvi. 18, xxviii. 20; John xiv. 16, 17.

There are also arguments to be drawn for it from the consideration of God's counsel and purpose. The consummation of all things is delayed only till the servants of God are sealed [1 Cor. xv. 28; Rev. vi. 9-11]. When faith fails in the earth, the end will be [Luke xviii. 8]. This is as regards God, in whose work we cannot suppose an interruption. So too as regards man. God will have all men to be saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth. The Church, which is the pillar and ground of the truth, could not fail without a failure of God's mercy. So long as there are men capable of salvation (and all men are capable of salvation, since Christ died for all), so long will the Church be preserved, that to it may be added both οἱ σωζομένοι, and οἱ σωθησόμενοι.

The promises of God are given to the Church as a whole. Each branch of the Church is on its probation, as is each individual member. And the law of probation, the law of their participation in the promise, is the same: "He that hath to him shall be given." To argue that because each particular church may fail, therefore the whole may fail, is not only a fallacy in logic, but a denial of Christ's power to impart to the whole that which He does not impart to each particular member.

II. INERRANCY AND INFALLIBILITY. The foregoing promises and arguments shew that the Church will not fail either by dying out or by apostasy. The work of the Spirit, as it will not fail in bringing sons to God, so it will never fail in providing that there shall always be a body persevering in the faith according to the election of grace.

This is to be considered more particularly as regards truth of doctrine. For this also there are promises, e.g., John xvi. 13; 1 John ii. 27. The Spirit which dwells in the Church is likewise declared to be the Spirit of knowledge and understanding [Col. i. 9, ii. 3, iii. 10]. Less cannot be implied in these words than that the Church shall always have a tenure of the truth sufficient for salvation. They shew, further, that any doctrine which can be said to be the deliberate ascertained voice of the Church, must be from God, whose Spirit is in the Church. But they cannot be pressed so far as to prove that the Church may not for a time hold such an error as does not directly deny the foundation of faith, or does not directly deny Christ. Even an error, which by logical consequence denies the foundation of faith, is not to be taken as such a denial. The consequence may not be perceived; and, if perceived, the premisses would be at once rejected. The case is doubtless of great improbability, but its possibility must be conceded.

When, then, can we say that the voice of the Church is sufficiently ascertained? This leads us on from the inerrancy or passive infallibility to the active infallibility, or declaration of the faith. No actual limits of time can be set for which, if a doctrine has been held, it must be considered as the ascertained decision of the Church. The circumstances of the Church may not be such as to lead to investigation. Ten years in one period may cause more sifting of the truth than a hundred years of another period. It is the condition of the Church militant to be always under trial, sometimes by persecution from the world, sometimes by blasts of contrary doctrine within itself. In different degrees these are blended, and with very different degrees of speed will the truth emerge. The degree of holiness also, and above all, will regulate the discovery and reception of truth. For knowledge and understanding in spiritual things is the flower and fruit, the plant itself is holiness springing from the root of faith. The certainty then of a doctrine enunciated by the Church is a growing certainty, varying in amount with the time the doctrine has been held, the degree of investigation to which it has been subjected, and the degree of holiness in the Church.

Thus the decrees of a council which we may believe to be œcumenical can only be known to be the genuine voice of the Church by their acceptance. We may agree to the abstract proposition that a truly œcumenical council cannot err; but the proposition is of little practical value at the time of holding a council, for none can prove that the council has not in some respect failed in œcumenicity. The authority of its decisions rests on their acceptance. For the Spirit of God is given to the whole body of the Church; and that can only be known to be the true voice of the Church which is expressed by sufficient deliberation of generation after generation. In this sense the infallibility of the Church is a reasonable doctrine; and one, in fact, which it would be unreasonable for any Christian to disbelieve.

INDEFECTIBLE GRACE, that is, grace which cannot be lost, or fail of its intended purpose, the salvation of those on whom it is bestowed. Such is the grace, according to Calvinism, given to the elect, which is represented as irresistible or necessarily leading to salvation. It is shewn elsewhere that, according to the teaching of Holy Scripture, grace is not irresistible, and that this Calvinistic tenet cannot be reconciled with man's free will. [CALVINISM. ELECTION. FREE WILL.]

INDULGENCE. [I.] In the Primitive Church a relaxation, by the bishop, of canonical penance, upon sufficient evidence of true repentance. [II.] In Roman Theology it is a remission of temporal pain, supposed to be due in the way of satisfaction, even after the remission of the guilt and eternal punishment of sin.

I. It is generally agreed, that a power of such relaxation of penance is vested in bishops. Canon lxxiv. of St. Basil states, "He that hath the power of binding and loosing may lessen the time of penance to an earnest penitent." This power is acknowledged also in Canon xii. of Nicæa, in Canon v. of Ancyra, in Canon xvi. of Chalcedon,[1] and in Canon v. of Lerida. Bingham notices that this was what some of the ancients called an indulgence, quoting Vigilius [Ep. ii. ad Eleutherium], "ut si qualitas et pœnitentis devotio fuerit approbata, indulgentiæ quoque remedio sit vicina." [LIBELLI PACIS.]

This power of relaxing canonical penance is generally stated by English theologians as the true and only permissible notion of indulgence. [Field, Of the Church, app. to bk. iii. ch. 25; Bp. J. Taylor's Dissuasive from Popery, I. i. 3; Hooker, Eccl. Pol. vi. 5, 8, and 9; Marshall's Penit. Discipline, iii. 2.]

II. The limitation of indulgence to this relaxation of penance, "quasi indulgentia præter nudam remissionem pœnæ canonicæ non etiam valeat ad remissionem pœnæ temporalis pro peccatis actualibus debitæ apud divinam justitiam," was condemned by Pius VI. in 1794, in the Damnatio Synodi Pistoriensis,[2] art. xl. De Indulgentiis, as "falsa, temeraria, Christi meritis injuriosa, dudum in art. xix. Lutheri damnata" [Canones et Decreta Conc. Tridentini, Tauchnitz ed., pp. 310, 271]. These words of Pius VI., referring to the condemnation of Luther by Leo X., may be taken as the basis of an authoritative definition, such a definition not being given by the Council of Trent.[3] In agreement with them, Perrone, whom we may assume to be a fair representative of Romish doctrine, defines thus: "Est autem indulgentia remissio pœnæ temporalis adhuc post remissam culpam et pœnam æternam peccatis debitæ, in foro interno coram Deo valida facta per applicationem thesauri ecclesiæ a superiore legitimo" [Prælectiones Theolog. viii.; Tract. de Indulgentiis, p. 367]. This definition is very nearly the same as Amort's [Hist. Indulgentiarum].

The doctrine of indulgences may then be reduced to two propositions: [1] That after the remission of sin there is a certain amount of temporal pain owing to the justice of God, either before or after death; [2] that this pain may be remitted by an application of the merits of Christ and of the saints, out of the treasury of the Church, the dispensation of which treasure is committed to the bishops.

1. From Conc. Trident. sessio xiv. c. iii. c. viii. [De Pœnitentia] and can. xii. xiii. xiv., it appears that the Romish doctrine respecting satisfaction, is, that while contrition and confession form the essence of the sacrament of penance, and serve for the forgiveness of sin and for remission of eternal punishment, satisfaction, or the compensation of wrong done to God by our sins, completes the sacrament, and serves for remission of the temporal penalties which remain to be paid in this world or the next. An anathema had been pronounced [sess. vi. can. xxx.] against those who say that, after justification and the remission of eternal punishment, there remains no liability to temporal pain, either in this world, or in the world to come in purgatory. [PURGATORY.]

2. Clement VI., in his Constitutio Unigenitus, first named this treasure of the Church: "Unigenitus Dei Filius . . . thesaurum militanti Ecclesiæ acquisivit; . . . ad cujus quidem thesauri emunlum B. Dei Genetricis et omnium electorum, a primo justo usque ad ultimum, merita adminiculum præstare noscuntur." Later

[1] Johnson translates τὴν αὐθεντίαν τῆς ἐπ' αὐτοῖς φιλανθρωπίας, "power of indulgence." Φιλανθρωπία appears to be the standard word for such indulgence. [See Nicene and Ancyran canons.]

[2] The Diocesan Synod of Pistoia was called in 1785 by Bishop Scipio Ricci, under the auspices of Leopold II., Emperor of Germany and Archduke of Tuscany, for the reform of monasteries and nunneries, for the correction of the superstitions connected with the use of images, indulgences, and the invocation of saints, and to encourage the reading of the Bible and common prayer in the vulgar tongue.

[3] At Trent, the Bishop of Modena urged the difficulty of determining all the doctrinal questions connected with indulgences, and represented that it would require no great disputation to decide that the Church may grant them, and hath done so in all times, and that they are profitable for the faithful who receive them worthily. The council adopted this course, and avoiding a definition, decreed [sess. xxv.], that indulgences are of Christ's authority, and have been used from all antiquity, and that their use is to be continued as profitable for Christian people.

popes confirmed this: and the opinion of Baius,[1] condemned by Pius V. and Gregory XIII., may be quoted for the sake of comparison with the doctrine of "The Institution of a Christian Man," which will be given presently. Baius' proposition was, "Per passiones sanctorum in Indulgentiis communicatas non proprie redimuntur nostra delicta; sed per communionem caritatis nobis eorum passiones impertiuntur, ut digni simus, qui pretio sanguinis Christi a pœnis pro peccatis debitis liberemur" [Damnatio errorum Baianorum, n. 60; Can. et Dec. C. Tridentini (Tauchnitz), p. 277].

The existence of this treasure then depends on the possibility of meritorious works of supererogation; and it is taught that Christ has committed to the Church the application of these transferable merits, the dispensation of this treasure.

The abuses of indulgences, which it is not necessary to repeat here, first moved Luther. Against them it was ordered at Trent [sess. xxv.], "pravos quæstus omnes pro his consequendis, unde plurima in Christiano populo abusuum causa fluxit, omnino abolendos esse." Other abuses are to be sought out by the bishops, brought before the provincial synod, and referred to the Pope.

By these and similar injunctions, such as the decree of Pius IV., A.D. 1562, "ut Indulgentiæ gratis concedantur," and the "Revocatio Indulgentiarum quæstuariarum" in 1567, by Pius V., the grossness of the abuses which prevailed about the year 1500 may have been lessened:[2] but the great practical evil, the sale of indulgences, with a graduated scale in proportion to the sin, has not been done away. Even now such graduated scales may be seen on church doors in Italy.

And while, theoretically, the remission is only of temporal pain, and that after repentance and remission of sins, it is to be feared that the indulgence is looked upon as if it were a sacramental remission of the sin itself, and that the terms of the indulgence lend themselves too easily to such a notion. The form used by Tetzel was as follows: "May our Lord Jesus Christ have mercy upon thee, and absolve thee by the merits of His most holy Passion. And I, by His authority, that of His Apostles Peter and Paul, and of the most holy Pope, . . . do absolve thee, first from all ecclesiastical censures, . . . and then from all thy sins, transgressions, and excesses, how enormous soever they may be, even from such as are reserved for the cognizance of the Holy See: and as far as the keys of the Holy Church extend, I remit to thee all punishment which thou deservest in purgatory on their account; and I restore thee to the Holy Sacraments of the Church," &c. [See the form at length in Seckendorf, Comm. de Lutheranismo.]

The comment of Richard and Giraud [Bibliothèque Sacrée, art. Indulgence], upon this point, viz. that the indulgence in its terms remits the guilt of sin, is: "Ainsi quand on trouve quelquefois dans le formulaire des indulgences la remission de la peine et de la coulpe, cela signifie précisément que le Pape remet la coulpe en ce qu'il donne bien des facilités de la remettre, telles que le choix d'un confesseur, la permission d'absoudre des censures et des cas réservés, un grand nombre d'œuvres pieuses qui disposent à obtenir le pardon du péché, et qui le rémittent par conséquent non d'une manière effective, prochaine, et immédiate, mais d'une façon médiate, dispositive, et préparatoire." The explanation, if orthodox, ought at least to be indorsed on the indulgence.

The transition from primitive practice to this later practice did not take place at an early period in the history of the Church. Primitive practice is an adaptation of the general rules of discipline to the case of individuals. Such, Amort agrees [Hist. Indulg. pt. II. civ. sec. 57], were the chief instances of indulgences for the first thousand years after our Lord. In the latter part of the thirteenth century, "the bishop still could give indulgences in his own diocese as much as he willed, unless he were limited by the Pope" [Pusey's Eirenicon, part i. 199.]

So far as the teaching of purgatory goes, we may well believe that it arose from a feeling, which if not true charity, was at least nearly akin to true charity. But the sale of indulgences can hardly be attributed to anything else than the desire to accumulate money for ecclesiastical purposes. The way was prepared by the Penitential of Theodore [for which in this respect see Marshall's Penit. Discipline, p. 129], or at least by the practice which then commenced of the redemption of penance at a stated and graduated rate. And the Crusades presented a purpose in which noble motives and thoughts largely entered. Plenary indulgences were chiefly issued in connection with crusades; and the abuse of these indulgences, and the exceeding wickedness incident thereon, was probably one cause of the failure of those wars [Eirenicon, p. 200]. From this the descent was easy to the recognised office of the pardoner.

In her Twenty-second Article, the Church of England has formally condemned the Romish doctrine concerning purgatory and pardons. This Article was framed before the Council of Trent; and the change of terms, from "Scholasticorum doctrina" of 1553 to "Doctrina Romanensium," appears in the Parker MS. of 1562, the Twenty-fifth Sess. of Trent being December 3rd and 4th, 1563. It is therefore the popular Romish doctrine that the Article refers to [Pusey's Eirenicon, part i. p. 207]. Yet, allowing this, the Council of Trent did not disown the principles upon which so gross a system had been built. It endeavoured only to remedy the worst abuses, and the principles involved in the system it virtually sanctioned.

[1] Baius (Michael), Professor of Divinity at Louvain, b. 1513. His works contained a great number of propositions condemned by Pius V. Baius, however, was far from allowing that he taught what was imputed to him. Yet, after the Pope's censure, he would not suffer the books containing the condemned propositions to be reprinted. The bull, dated Oct. 1567, does not name Baius, and was only privately notified to Louvain; but it was published by Gregory XIII. The reprint of Baius' works [M. Baii Opera Colon. Agrep. 1696] has a narrative of the proceedings. [See Bayle's Dictionary, where is a full account.]

In our Article XIV., works of supererogation are condemned; and upon such works rests the treasury of merits dispensable by the Church. But in what sense the Church of England holds a "treasure" we may learn from "The Institution of a Christian Man":—"Among all and singular the saints, that is to say, the quick and living members of the Catholic Church of Christ, which is His mystical Body, there is a perfect communion and participation of all and singular the graces of the Holy Ghost, and the spiritual goods and treasure which do belong unto the said whole Body, or unto any part or member of the same. And like as all the parts and members which be living in the natural body of a man do naturally communicate and minister each to other the use, commodity and benefit of all their forces, nutriment, and perfection, . . . even so, I believe that whatsoever spiritual gift or treasure is given by God unto any one part or member of this mystical Body of Christ, although the same be given particularly unto this member, and not unto another, yet the fruit and merit thereof shall, by reason of that incomprehensible union and bond of charity which is between them, redound necessarily unto the profit, edifying and increase in Christ's Body of all the other members particularly; insomuch that there shall need no man's authority to dispense and distribute the same, or to apply it unto this member or that (like as the bishop of Rome pretended to do by virtue of his pardons), but if the member which shall receive this treasure be a living member in this mystical body . . . he shall be made participant of the said treasure, and shall have and enjoy the fruit and benefit of the same, and that in such quantity and measure, as for the rate, proportion, and quality of the spiritual life, faith and charity, which he hath in the same body, shall be expedient and necessary for him to have" [Interpret. of Creed, Tenth Art. For the authority of "The Institution," see Blunt's History of the Reformation, A.D. 1514-1547, pp. 444, 465].

The principles of the Church of England concerning merit, works of supererogation, and purgatory, all of which are involved in the doctrine of indulgences, will be found under those words. But it is necessary to add somewhat regarding the doctrine of satisfaction, as stated above, which underlies the whole subject.

That with remission of sins the temporal effects of sin in this world do not cease is abundantly clear. That this temporal suffering is to be regarded as a satisfaction to the justice of God, due after forgiveness of sins; according to Perrone's definition, "Est autem satisfactio compensatio injuriæ Deo nostris peccatis illatæ"—this is denied by English theologians. On the other hand, they assert [1] that temporal pain, the fruit of sin, is in its nature remedial and disciplinary, both to the sinner, and to others that they may see and fear; and [2] that as such it is not remissible by any sacrament or ordinance entrusted to the Church. The former proposition is argued from such scriptures as Jer. ii. 19; Isa. iii. 9; from the examples of Moses and David, Numb. xx. 12; Deut. i. 37; 2 Sam. xii. 14. The whole tenor of Scripture shews that "sorrow dogging sin" is one instance of the "care with which God has begirt us round." And from analogy we may argue that if there be temporal pain after death it must be strictly remedial, a conclusion with which agree the slight but suggestive revelations made in Holy Scripture, and the consideration of the state of those who have departed in faith, but have not had time to bring forth fruits worthy of repentance [Pusey's Eirenicon, pp. 190-7].

The latter proposition follows from the former; for God's remedial discipline for fitting the soul for heaven must have its course. Our prayer must be not for its remission, but for the accomplishment of its purpose. To stop the means of God's appointing would be to hinder the end He designs.

Upon the whole, then, we may conclude that the Church of England does not condemn the idea of a purifying passage through the fire that is to try us, but declares that such temporal pain is not remissible by any sacrament or ordinance. Where there is any canonical penance, then indulgences must have place, as the adaptation of the general rules of penance to each man's case; and the cessation of indulgences among us is simply coextensive with the cessation of that godly discipline which must exist in every well-ordered Church.

INEFFABILIS DEUS. [IMMACULATE CONCEPTION.]

INERRANCY. [INDEFECTIBILITY.]

INFALLIBILITY. [INDEFECTIBILITY.]

INFANT BAPTISM. Although Holy Scripture teaches that faith and repentance are needed for a due reception of baptism [Mark xvi. 16; Acts ii. 38, viii. 37], it has been the usage of the Church from an early period to baptize infants who cannot have such conditions. It is important, therefore, to investigate the reasons on which an usage is founded which apparently has no direct scriptural sanction. Not that the want of scriptural proof is universally admitted, as indirect evidence for the usage at least has been generally alleged. Thus it is argued that as the household of Lydia and the jailer were baptized [Acts xvi. 15, 33], there were probably infants amongst them; but, admitting this probability, there is no proof that the Apostle baptized them. We cannot fairly prove the Apostolic origin of infant baptism by assuming the existence of the usage itself. As regards the jailer's household, we are told that Paul and Silas spake the Word of the Lord "to him and to all that were in his house," and that "he and all his were baptized." Now, it would appear from this statement, that the baptized were those to whom the Word of the Lord was preached, who assuredly were not infants. The evidence on this subject from Scripture amounts to this, that we only read of baptism after a profession of faith and repentance. This by no means, it is true, excludes the possibility of the existence at the same time of infant baptism without such conditions; but the fact must not be assumed without evidence, and the utter want of proof from Holy Scripture obviously leads to a different conclusion.[1] But independently of its supposed scriptural sanction, an attempt has been made to prove this usage in the Apostolic age from the alleged fact, that the Jews then baptized proselytes from heathenism. Now this alleged fact of the baptism of proselytes is very uncertain, and, even if admitted, would by no means establish the Apostolic usage of infant baptism. The baptism of proselytes is first mentioned in the Mishna, a collection of Jewish traditions completed in the third century [A.D. 219], and the usage there mentioned (baptism of adults and infants) might have been derived, directly or indirectly, from Christians. But whether this supposed Jewish usage existed at all (amongst Jews or Christians) in the Apostolic age is uncertain. It is not mentioned by Josephus, even when we might fairly expect it would have been recorded, as when he relates that the Idumæans were received amongst the Jewish people by circumcision, without mentioning baptism.[2] Were the usage undoubted, it would only have been an unauthorized addition to the scriptural command,[3] since it was by circumcision only that proselytes were to be added to the Jewish Church [Exod. xii. 48]. It is, however, very unlikely that the Jews would adopt the usage of baptism from Christians; and the Mishna being founded on previous collections reaching to the Apostolic age, there is just a probability that, at the time of our Lord and His Apostles, a Jewish custom prevailed of baptizing proselytes and their children. Even admitting this, yet before this custom can be alleged in proof or confirmation of an Apostolic usage, it must be proved that the Jewish custom was adopted by our Lord or His Apostles; but of this neither the Scriptures nor the early Fathers afford any proof whatever. Besides, it should be considered that the baptism of proselytes widely differs in theory from the Christian doctrine of baptism. The convert to Judaism was baptized and all his family then born; but if he had children born afterwards, they were not baptized, the previous baptism of their parents being deemed sufficient.[4] It is unnecessary to shew that the Jewish theory of baptism, if it may be so called, must have differed essentially from the belief of the Church, which is founded on the doctrine of original sin, and necessarily implies that all infants should be baptized. But let us ascertain from the teaching of the Fathers whether infant baptism prevailed during the Apostolic age. Two learned writers widely differ on this subject, and it may be very fairly doubted whether the theory of the one or the other can be implicitly received. Bingham[5] endeavours to prove that infant baptism must have prevailed during the age of the Apostles, and has thus an Apostolic or Divine sanction. Suicer, on the contrary, asserts that, during the first two centuries, adults only were baptized.[6] Now, let us examine the arguments, and patristic evidence, alleged by Bingham. He admits that there is no direct evidence to be found of infant baptism in the writings of the Apostolical Fathers, St. Clement and St. Hermas. He then asserts of Justin Martyr that he "very plainly speaks of infant baptism as used from the time of the Apostles." He quotes St. Justin, who says [1 Apol. sec. 15] there are many men and women of sixty and seventy years of age who were disciplined (ἐμαθητεύθησαν) to Christ from their youth" (ἀπὸ παίδων). Bingham argues that, "as St. Justin wrote his Apology A.D. 150, those whom he speaks of as baptized in their infancy must have been persons baptized in the first age, when some of the Apostles were living." But, unfortunately for this argument, St. Justin does not speak of any one being baptized in infancy, but of boys or youths [παίδες] being baptized, whose baptism would be the same as that of adults.[7] Bingham then refers to the Recognitions of St. Clement, written he considers by a writer contemporary with St. Justin, who, he admits, "does not speak particularly of the baptism of infants." St. Irenæus [A.D.

[1] Neander says: "Originally baptism was administered to adults; nor is the general spread of infant baptism at a later period any proof to the contrary; for even after infant baptism had been set forth as an Apostolic institution, its introduction into the general practice of the Church was but slow. Had it rested on Apostolic authority there would have been a difficulty in explaining its late approval, and that even in the third century it was opposed by at least one eminent Father of the Church. Paul's language in 1 Cor. vii. 14 is also against its Apostolic origin, where he aims at proving that a Christian woman need not fear living in wedlock with a heathen, since the unbeliever would be sanctified by the believing wife; as a proof of this he adds that otherwise the children of Christians would be unclean, but now are they ἅγια, therefore the children of Christian parents are called holy, on account of the influence of Christian fellowship. Had infant baptism been practised at that time the argument would have had no force; for they would have been ἅγια by means of their baptism. Infant baptism therefore cannot be regarded as an Apostolic institution." [History of Christian Dogmas, vol. i. 229-30 (Bohn's ed.)].

[3] The Jews allege, as scriptural authority, that on the giving of the Law they were commanded to sanctify themselves by washing, which they maintain was, in effect, baptism, and therefore that proselytes must be baptized on their entering the Jewish Church. Extracts are given by Wall [History of Infant Baptism, vol. i. p. 4, et seq. 1836], from Maimonides, the Talmud, &c., in proof of the Jewish usage.

Ergo prius erat credere. Inde ordo catechumenorum in Ecclesia." [Thesaur. Eccles. sub. voc. σύναξις.]

[7] Thus St. Augustine says of Dinocrates, the brother of St. Perpetua, a child seven years old: "Nam illius ætatis pueri et mentiri et verum loqui et confiteri et negare jam possunt. Et ideo cum baptisantur, jam et symbolum reddant et ipsi pro se ad interrogata respondent." [De Anima et ejus Origine, c. x.]

180] is then quoted, and if by being "born again" he means (which seems almost certain) according to the scriptural and patristic meaning of the word "baptized,"[1] his statement proves that infant baptism was then in use. He says: "Christ came to save all men by Himself, all I say who through Him are born again to God, infants and little children (infantes et parvulos), and boys and youths and old men."[2] Another subsequent proof of infant baptism will be found in Tertullian [A.D. 200], who although he speaks in disparagement of the usage, yet it is clear from his allusion to it that it then prevailed to some extent in the Church; and also that he could not have considered it as having Apostolic sanction, since it is incredible that he would have dissuaded parents from obeying a Divine command. He says: "the Lord indeed saith, Forbid them not to come to me. Let them come then when they are of riper years, &c. Why is the age of innocence in haste for the remission of sins?"[3] Here be it remarked, that he attacks infant baptism itself, and thus could not have believed that it rested on Apostolic tradition.

Infant baptism was undoubtedly to some extent the usage of the Church in the latter half of the second century, but it was not universal amongst Christians even in the fifth century. The Fathers of the Eastern Church, St. Chrysostom,[4] St. Basil,[5] St. Gregory Nazianzen,[6] and Nyssen,[7] censure the negligence of their hearers, and its fearful peril, in putting off baptism. St. Augustine was not baptized in infancy, though his mother, St. Monica, was a devout Christian. The reason seems obvious why infant baptism only thus gradually prevailed in the Church, and became the universal custom when the world had become Christian. Baptized parents, surrounded by heathen neighbours and the abominations which were inseparable from heathenism, did not think it prudent or desirable that their children should be admitted to baptismal privileges, involving great responsibility, when surrounded by the fearful, and to the young almost irresistible, temptation of heathen worship or society. And may we not, in like manner, account for the fact that there is no direct allusion to infant baptism in Holy Scripture, though we have clear intimations that "it is most agreeable to the institution of Christ,"[8] and we have no doubt, as our Church says (without pleading a Divine command), that Christ "favourably alloweth this charitable work of ours in bringing infants to His holy baptism," that it would not have been a mark of ordinary wisdom or prudence, at an early period of Christianity, to have exposed baptized children to the corrupting influences of heathenism which then universally prevailed. It was better under such circumstances to defer baptism to a mature age, when there was greater strength and earnestness to resist temptation and to fight the good fight of faith.

Thus, as we might have expected, infant baptism prevailed in the Church in proportion to the prevalence of Christianity itself, and it may be said broadly that it became universal when Christianity itself throughout the Roman empire became the universal religion.

Infant baptism must, therefore, be considered as founded on ecclesiastical sanction,[9] though there are intimations in Holy Scripture of its accordance with our Lord's institution.

Tertullian first mentions "sponsors,"[10] a fact quite unaccountable had infant baptism been of Apostolic institution, since sponsors, as an ordinary rule, would be necessarily required in baptizing infants. St. Augustine implies that the father was usually sponsor for his child, and in case of exposed or deserted children, that the holy virgins of the Church undertook the office, and that masters were sponsors for the children of their slaves.[11] He thus explains the "faith" on a profession of which baptism was administered in the case of infants: "That the faith of those who bring the child to baptism profits the child; being lost by another's (Adam's) sin, he can be profited or brought to salvation by another's faith;"[12] and afterwards, more clearly, that whether the sponsor be a faithful or unfaithful Christian, the child is regenerated on the faith of the Holy Church.[13] In proof of the necessity of baptism, he says that children are exsufflated and exorcised that the evil spirit may be expelled,[14] and that this is a most ancient and universal usage of the Church, which would be unmeaning unless they (infants) were born in sin and the children of wrath. Arguing against the Pelagians, he asserts that there is no "middle place" for children who die unbaptized, but not belonging to Christ by an incorporation into His body, they must be eternally lost.[1] [LIMBUS.]

[9] Origen [A.D. 250] says that infant baptism rests on Apostolical sanction [Homil. in Rom. lib. v. c. 9], and we read in the Apostolical Constitutions [lib. vi. c. 15], βαπτίζετε τὰ νηπία, but this only proves that children, not infants, were to be baptized, νηπίον, according to scriptural usage, meaning a child rather than an infant [see Matt. xi. 25, xxi. 16; Eph. iv. 14]. Besides, the Constitutions do not contain the oral teaching of the Apostles, though some portions may thus have originated, but can only be considered as shewing the doctrine and usage of the ante-Nicene age, i.e. during the first three centuries. The passage merely proves that the baptism of νηπία,—it matters little whether the word means children or infants,—was at that time a common usage of the Church. St. Augustine also speaks of infant baptism as resting on Apostolical sanction, but the statement, in the absence of all proof from the first two centuries, is of no weight or authority.

Another word is required with special reference to modern errors. When children are regenerated in Holy Baptism, Christian instruction by parents or Godparents, we must remember, is indispensable, otherwise the implanted seed of grace will be unprofitable, and cannot bear fruit. Forgetting this obvious truth, persons have denied the grace of regeneration, and the necessity of infant baptism; the seed does not in many cases grow to perfection, hence they suppose that it has not been sown, though the Divine seed, as in the natural world, can only fructify on good ground, and therefore instruction is needed for the clearing of the heart, that the fruits of the Spirit may grow and abound in new creatures in Christ.

Some over-zealous missionaries have baptized children (Jewish or heathen) without consent of their parents. This can scarcely be expected to benefit them (unless they die in infancy), since they cannot have the blessing of Christian instruction and example. Besides, children are placed under the care of their parents by the law of nature, which is confirmed and sanctioned by Christianity. When arrived at mature age, they should be invited, whether parents are willing or not, to Christian instruction and baptism. The teaching of St. Thomas Aquinas on this subject is clear and reliable.[2]

INFIDELITY. This is an inclusive term for all kinds of opinion in which non-acknowledgment, or rejection, of Christ's Person, Work, and Revelation, forms the principal element. Its earliest use in this sense is by St. Paul, who contrasts the πιστὸς, or "believer," with the ἄπιστος, or "unbeliever," in 2 Cor. vi. 15 and in 1 Tim. v. 9, where the one stands for the convert to Christianity, and the other for the person who has not made profession of Christianity. From the context of the passage in the Epistle to Timothy, it is clear that St. Paul used the term "infidel" in a negative sense, reckoning one who positively denied the faith (τὴν πίστιν ἤρνηται) as one who was worse than one who had only not acknowledged it (καὶ ἔστιν ἀπίστου χείρων). In this sense the word was generally used until the rise of Deism in the seventeenth century; but in more recent times, "infidelity" has been taken in the positive sense, that which points to the conscious rejection of Christianity. [ATHEISM. DEISM.]

INFINITE, without end or limit, the negation of finite: ἄπειρον, "un-endlich."

I. The Indefinite. Besides the definite consciousness of which logic formulates the laws, there is also an indefinite consciousness which cannot be formulated. Besides complete thoughts, and besides the thoughts, which though incomplete, admit of completion, there are thoughts which it is impossible to complete; and yet which are real, in the sense that they are normal affections of the intellect. Positive knowledge, however extensive it may become, does not and never can fill the whole region of possible thought. At the uttermost reach of discovery, there arises, and must ever arise, the question, What lies beyond? Regarding science as a gradually increasing sphere, we may say that every addition to its surface does but bring it into wider contact with surrounding nescience. There is always something which forms alike the raw material of definite thought and remains after the definiteness which thinking gave to it has been destroyed [H. Spencer, First Principles, p. 21 follg. 88, 90 follg.]. This vague element in thought, which is ineradicable, Spencer considers to be the groundwork of the feeling of awe, and of natural religion. It is the Infinite in this sense, the attempt to conceive which involves a contradiction in terms; which can only be believed to exist, but can never become an object to consciousness. "If all thought is limitation; if whatever we conceive is, by the very act of conception, regarded as finite—the infinite, from a human point of view, is merely a name for the absence of those conditions under which thought is possible" [Mansel's Bampton Lectures, p. 48; cf. pp. 30, 63, 80, 118; see especially notes on pp. 48 and 51, 4th ed.].

II. The Infinite as an interminable series. Aristotle mentions five ways [Phys. Ausc. 203, b. 15] in which the notion of the ἄπειρον is attained: [a] From the unlimited duration of time; [b] from the possibility of perpetually subdividing magnitudes; [c] from the continuance of growth and decay in nature; [d] from the fact that limitation is always relative and never absolute; and [e], "the strongest proof of all," from the inability to conceive a limit to number, magnitude and space. Any given moment of time is both preceded and succeeded by another, and that by another without end. Any magnitude admits of multiplication or division, and the

[1] De Peccat. Merit. et Remiss. lib. i. c. 16. St. Augustine argues, in regard to the future state of infants, that none can enter into God's kingdom except through baptism, and that there is no intermediate place between heaven and hell after the last judgment, and hence the conclusion is inevitable that unbaptized infants must eternally perish, though he speaks of their suffering as mitissima. Others have speculated whether in their case the punishment of original sin be actual suffering (pœna sensus), or only a deprivation of the vision of God (carentia visionis Dei), which is the general opinion. It can hardly, I think, be doubted that they do sustain a loss, of whatever kind. In the Institution of a Christian Man the Church of England declares, "Insomuch as infants and children dying in their infancy shall undoubtedly be saved thereby (i.e. by baptism), else not." In the last revision of the Prayer-Book we read, "It is certain by God's Word that children which are baptized, dying before they commit actual sin, are undoubtedly saved;" in other words, we are certain of the future happiness of the baptized, but have no assurance of the salvation of the unbaptized infant. The question must thus be left in obscurity, as we have no sufficient warrant to go beyond the cautious statement of our Church. [SPIRIT.]

multiples or parts are again capable of multiplication or division, respectively, without limit. Any effect in nature is the result of a cause which again is the effect of another cause in an endless regress; and, conversely, every effect is itself the cause of some other effect, and this in its turn is the cause of another effect, and so on in an interminable progress. Time, space, and causation thus exhibit infinity in the form of a straight line or series of terms without beginning or end. The characteristics of this mode of the Infinite are: [a] that it is purely negative, i.e. is the mere process of passing beyond limitations; [b] that it postulates the perpetual recurrence of limitations as its condition; and [c] that, as an endless series, it is incapable of being thought out, it is always possible and never actual, it cannot be said to exist, but always to be in the act of coming into existence.

It follows from this that, if infinity is an idea realizable by the mind, it must be conceived in some other way than as a linear series; it must be capable of an expression which is at once definite, and yet preserves the true character of infinity. Mathematical science does this by the summation of an infinite series in a finite expression, and manipulates both the infinite and the infinitesimal as terms having a definite meaning in calculation. The possibility of conceiving the infinite as complete may be seen more easily from the consideration that any object which we can see, handle, imagine, conceive, without any difficulty, e.g., a fruit, or a stone, is really the sum of an infinite number of parts into which it may be divided, an infinite therefore which is not merely coming into existence, but actually exists here and now. Regarded too under the aspect of a term in the line of causation, any object in nature sums up an infinite series in itself. For, as an effect, it is the result of all previous causes, and, as a cause, the germ of all succeeding effects.

These summations of the serial Infinite, whether achieved by the formulæ of mathematics or presented as complete, in every portion of space, in every period of time, and in every object in nature, are anticipations of a higher form of infinity which is revealed by the mind of man.

III. The Spiritual Infinite (Infinitum rationis, infinitum actu, ὅλον τέλειον) differs from the former, not so much in excluding as including the limit or boundary of which it is the negation, i.e. as not limited from without and perpetually passing beyond the limit, but as limiting itself. As the natural or mathematical infinite is represented by the line, so the rational or spiritual infinite finds its appropriate symbol in the circle, i.e. the line which is without beginning or end, and at the same time is limited at every point by itself. It is thus at once absolutely unlimited, and yet absolutely definite. The transition from II. to III. may be illustrated by the mathematical definition of a straight line as the chord of an infinite circle. Such is the Infinite as exhibited in [a] the thought and [b] the volition of man.

[a] Consciousness, and thought as a mode of consciousness, involve the opposition of the subject which thinks and the object about which it thinks. As a condition of thinking at all, the mind must set its thought over against itself as not itself, and, conversely, as the condition of an object being thought of at all, it must be presented as distinct from the mind which thinks of it. Here, then, is a limitation or barrier which constitutes what is called "the finiteness" of the human understanding. The thinker is limited and conditioned by his thought, the thought is limited and conditioned by the thinker. But as it is possible to present any object to thought, it is competent for the thinker to present himself as the object about which he thinks, i.e. to be at once the subject which thinks and the object which is thought about. This capability of self-consciousness, of which, so far as can be ascertained, the lower animals are destitute, constitutes at once the pride and the degradation of man, is a source at once of his best and his worst actions. Here we have the analogue of the line returning, as the circumference of a circle, into itself. The limitation of the thinker by the object thought of is as real as before, only it is a limitation of himself by himself: he is conditioned, as before, but self-conditioned, i.e. infinite. [Personalty.]

[b] The same infinity appears in free will. As free, a man does an action which originates absolutely with himself. But this action has a permanent effect on his character, and thus determines the quality of the next action. This new action is also originated absolutely by the free agent, but the agent himself is modified, conditioned, limited, by the previous action. The agent has thus his freedom limited and defined, and increasingly so with every fresh action, but he is limited by that of which he is himself the absolute originator. He is finite (limited, conditioned) and at the same time infinite (unlimited, unconditioned), because he is self-conditioned. [Liberty.]

It is in this sense, rather than in that of infinite magnitude, that infinity is an attribute of God. [Theism.]

IV. Relation to the Finite. It follows from what has been said above [a], that, although the essence of infinity is the transcendence of every limitation, yet that the finite and limited, even when excluded [I. and II.] is postulated as a condition of infinity, and that in the higher forms of infinity the limit is included, or rather imposed from within. Even in the sense of the indefinite residuum of thought, definite thinking is presupposed as the condition of our becoming conscious of the vague element beyond. The serial infinite, again, as the mere process of transcending every given term, postulates the perpetual recurrence of terms to transcend. ἄπειρον, says Aristotle, μὲν οὖν ἐστὶν οὗ κατὰ ποσὸν λαμβάνουσιν, αἰεί τι λαβεῖν ἔστιν ἔξω [Phys. Ausc. 207, a. 7]. "The quantitative infinite is that which always has something outside it, i.e. a term 'not yet reached.'" The spiritual infinite, lastly, as the self-determination of thought and volition, is, ex vi termini, a process of generating at every step the finite and limited. [b] On the other hand, it would be a reversal of the true order to conceive the Infinite to be, as its etymology suggests, the mere negation of the finite, and as such, a secondary and derived idea. On such a supposition, it becomes impossible to explain how we become conscious of limitation at all. How, it may be asked, do we know that thought is finite if we know nothing first of the Infinite? How is the consciousness of limitation possible except as the negation of what is unlimited? The Infinite is thus, as the condition of the finite, prior and positive; the finite, as the limit excluded, included, self-imposed by the Infinite, posterior and negative.

The relation of GOD, as the Infinite, to the world and the soul, as finite, is considered elsewhere. But unless [a] be borne in mind, the logical result is Deism, and if [b] be neglected, Pantheism.

V. Infinity as symbolized in the Imagination. We find the attempt to picture the Infinite to the imagination amongst non-European nations in the form of a state of vacancy immediately preceding creation. The constituents of the image are generally air and water. The image of mere air or mere water would be no realizable image at all, because involving no distinction. But in the contrast of the two we get that minimum of definiteness which renders the image possible. A beautifully pure representation of the imagined infinite is found in the sacred books of the aborigines of Guatemala [Max Müller's Chips, vol. i. p. 333]. It is as follows: "There was a time when all that exists in heaven and earth was made. All was then in suspense; all was calm and silent. All was immoveable, all peaceful, and the vast space of the heavens was empty. There was no man, no animal, no shore, no trees; heaven alone existed. The face of the earth was not to be seen; there was only the still expanse of the sea and the heaven above. Divine Beings were on the waters like a growing light. Their voice was heard as they meditated and consulted, and when the dawn arose, man appeared." Here we have as the constituents of the image "empty heaven," or space, and—which is introduced as if not at all contradictory to the statement that "heaven alone existed"—the "still expanse of the sea." [Compare this with the account in Holy Scripture, where the constituents of the image are [1] "darkness upon the face of the abyss," and [2] the surface of the waters, with the Divine Spirit hovering between the two, and calling light into being.] In the Hindoo account the creative spirit is represented as rowing about in a boat upon the ocean.

We have substantially the same image of the Infinite lying at the back of the Greek mind. But there are two differences. [1] The double image is dismembered. The symbol of Thales is water alone; of Anaximander, the void in suspense; of Anaximenes, the atmosphere; of Xenophanes, the globe of the sky. [2] The Infinite is not pictured as preceding the emergence of finite things, but as underlying the process of nature, as it is ordinarily known.

The Egyptian symbol of the serpent with his tail in his mouth approaches the mathematical representation of infinite length.

INITIATION. A common term in the early Church for baptism, having reference to the full instruction in the mysteries of Christianity which was given to the baptized, but withheld from the unbaptized. The baptized were thus called initiati, οἱ μεμυημένοι, μυστάι, or μυσταγώγητοι; and it is very common to find the Fathers using the expression "the initiated will understand" in their preaching to mixed congregations, especially when they were speaking of anything which belonged to the doctrine of the Holy Eucharist. This expression is said by Casaubon to occur fifty times in the sermons of St. Chrysostom alone.

INSPIRATION—the representative of the Latin word inspiratio, which has been used from the earliest times—from the days of Tertullian, who was the first theological writer employing the Latin language—to express the Holy Ghost's agency in the composition of Scripture. Some modern writers[1] have proposed to substitute for "inspiration" the term "theopneustia," the substantive which corresponds to the adjective employed by St. Paul [2 Tim. iii. 16], θεόπνευστος. This word θεόπνευστος[2] is translated in the Vulgate divinitus inspirata; as also the word φερόμενοι [2 Pet. i. 21] is translated inspirati. In the earliest Latin translation of the Bible, of which the date is placed soon after the middle of the second century, and which both Tertullian and the Latin translator of St. Irenæus seem to have used—the so-called Itala—the phrase "inspiratio Omnipotentis" is given as the equivalent of נשמת שדי [Job xxxii. 8, xxxiii. 4]; the Vulgate rendering in the former text inspiratio, in the latter spiraculum; the English version, "the inspiration," and "the breath of the Almighty;" while the LXX. has in both πνοὴ παντοκράτορος. The Greek translation is thus more accurate than either the Latin or the English, inasmuch as the Hebrew term corresponding to πνεῦμα or spiritus (and therefore to inspiration), is רוח, not נשמה.[3]

In order to understand what is meant by the "Inspiration of Scripture," this Divine influence must be carefully distinguished from that gift of the Holy Ghost conferred upon the Church of the New Covenant, to which in like manner the term inspiration has been assigned. Thus, in the Book of Common Prayer the word "inspiration," as used in the opening Collect in the Communion Office, and in that for the fifth Sunday after [1] E.g. M. Gaussen, in his eloquently written but not very accurate treatise, Theopneustia: the Plenary Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures, London, 1841.

[2] There can be no doubt that this word is to be taken passively, as ἔμπνευστος,—although other kindred derivatives have an active sense, as εὔπνευστος.

[3] The LXX. renders נשמה by πνεῦμα in one place only [1 Kings xvii. 17]; elsewhere, by ἀναπνοή, ἔμπνευσις, θυμός, πρόσταγμα, and in fourteen places by πνοή. It is to be noted that נשמה is the noun used for "breath of life" in Gen. ii. 7, a fact which disposes of the error sometimes committed of identifying this expression with "the spirit of life" [See Lee, On Inspiration, p. 552].

Easter, and the verb to "inspire" in the version of the hymn Veni Creator Spiritus, are employed in a sense quite apart from that in which we speak of the operation of the Holy Ghost in the composition of the Bible. "The inspiration of the authors of the Bible was an energy altogether objective, and directed to supply the wants of the Church. The inspiration of the Christian is altogether subjective, and directed to the moral improvement of the individual" [Lee, On Inspiration, 4th ed. p. 243]. In a word, "that Divine influence, under which the Bible has been composed, was absolutely unique, and specifically different from those preventing and assisting graces of the Holy Ghost which have been the gift of Christ to His Church" [ibid.]. In his elaborate discourse on the subject of the different gifts of the Holy Ghost [1 Cor. xii., xiv.], where he expressly lays down that "there are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit" [xii. 4], St. Paul pauses [chap. xiii.] in order to point out that the objective gifts may exist without the subjective: "Though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries, and all knowledge; and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing." This fact is clearly exhibited in the history of St. Peter's "dissimulation" [Gal. ii. 13], where the moral imperfections of the Apostle, just as his denial of his Master, are to be regarded as absolutely distinct from his official acts and official teaching. What we read of David, of Solomon, of Balaam, of Jonah, of the disobedient prophet in 1 Kings xiii., establishes the same distinction. Indeed, were this distinction lost sight of, there could be no such thing, properly speaking, as an "inspired" Book of Scripture before the Day of Pentecost, for those moral influences of the Holy Spirit to which the term inspiration is in popular language applied, are plainly represented in the New Testament as the peculiar characteristic of the Christian dispensation. Thus St. John writes of our Lord: "This spake He of the Spirit (περὶ τοῦ Πνεύματος), which they that believe on Him should receive (ὃ ἔμελλον λαμβάνειν); for the Holy Ghost WAS NOT YET (οὔπω γὰρ ἦν Πνεῦμα), because that Jesus was not yet glorified."[1] And yet Christ has expressly declared that the Holy Ghost co-operated in the composition of the Old Testament: "How then doth David in Spirit (ἐν Πνεύματι) call Him Lord?" &c. [Matt. xxii. 43]. It is a fundamental principle, therefore, that the Divine influence which qualified the authors of Scripture for their official labour was an influence specifically different from those spiritual gifts of which the object is the moral improvement of fallen man, although both proceed from "the same Spirit," and are, speaking generally, designated by the same name.

[1] Cf. also: "Verily I say unto you, Among them that are born of women there hath not risen a greater than John the Baptist ["A prophet? yea I say unto you, and more than a prophet," ver. 9]: notwithstanding, he that is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he." Matt. xi. 11.

Another distinction of great moment must be noted here—the distinction between Revelation and Inspiration. "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God" [2 Tim. iii. 16]; but all Scripture is not a Revelation [see art. REVELATION]. On this distinction is founded what may be regarded as the central truth as to this great doctrine—viz. that of the uniform and uninterrupted exercise of the Holy Spirit's influence from beginning to end of the Bible, an influence expressed by the term Inspiration; while the most superficial reader can mark out passage after passage in Holy Writ which every one will allow not to be a Revelation from heaven.

This distinction is to be regarded as the first of the two conditions of the problem of which the object is to establish the perfect inspiration of Holy Scripture. The second condition is the recognition of the fact that the Bible contains both a Divine and a human element, and can only be satisfied by showing how the two elements may be combined. Without the Divine element, Scripture would cease to be a communication from God; without the human, that communication must have been confined to the person or persons to whom it was originally made. That it should be possible for man to receive a Revelation from God, this Revelation must present itself allied to human conceptions, and clothed in human language. To attain this object, the same power which gave the message selected the messengers; and the grounds of this selection we can clearly discern to have been the natural capacity, and the opportunities, as well as the personal characteristics which marked the several writers of Scripture. Moses was skilled in all the wisdom of the Egyptians; St. Paul, brought up at the feet of Gamaliel [Acts xxii. 3], had also been a pupil in the Gentile school of Tarsus; the prominent features of St. John's character were zeal and love. In a word, certain grounds existing in the nature or position of each sacred writer were the qualifications which marked him as suited for his high office. Kings, or herdsmen, or Galilæan peasants, were, as God decreed, chosen to convey His will to man; while the principle which linked together the several parts of the chain of Divine knowledge thus constructed, was the fact that One Holy Spirit guided and inspired each and all of the succession of writers. And thus the actuation of the Spirit of God consists in the illumination and elevation of the human element supplied by the various penmen, so as to secure the attainment of the end proposed. This has been termed the "Dynamical theory" of Inspiration—i.e. the theory which regards the Holy Spirit as exerting an influence which guides and directs the human agent's activity, not as exerting a power which suppresses and obliterates all the energies of the man—and this principle, combined with the distinction between Revelation and Inspiration, will be found to establish the infallible authority of the Bible. [See Lee, On Inspiration.] degree or manner it may have been exercised,[1] guided by which the human agents chosen by God have officially proclaimed His will by word of mouth, or have committed to writing the several parts of Scripture." It results from this definition that Scripture can only be regarded as one organized whole—each part performing its appointed function, and each conveying its own portion of the truth. As to the language in which that truth is conveyed, it is sufficient to say that as in ordinary composition men have usually the power of clothing their thoughts in appropriate words, so the words adopted by the sacred writers must, in like manner, be the adequate expression of their conceptions, and therefore of that inward life produced by the Spirit. The same Divine power which breathed this life into the soul must surely be regarded as the vital principle of the language which represents it; and thus each and every portion of the Sacred Volume must be looked upon as no less than the Word of God Himself, inspired from beginning to end by the Holy Ghost in the full sense of the saying of Athanasius, ἔστι γὰρ ἐν τοῖς τῶν Γραφῶν ῥήμασιν ὁ Κύριος.

There are three lines of proof which conduct to this conclusion:—[1.] According to the immemorial doctrine of the Church of God, the Bible is the infallible record, composed throughout under the immediate guidance of the Holy Spirit, of the different Revelations, and of the different lessons which the Almighty has communicated to man. As such the Church, from generation to generation, has received it; regarding, that is, the entire series of writings as inspired, and as containing those articles of faith which are necessary to everlasting salvation.[2] [2.] The Bible being brought before each successive generation stamped with this recognition of its authority, the question naturally suggests itself—Does the Volume, thus commended to us as Divine, confirm by its own express statements the prepossessions under which we open its pages? The answer which Scripture gives to this question furnishes the second proof of the perfect inspiration of the sacred Books. [3.] The third proof, or "witness of the Spirit," is supplied by the testimony which the Holy Ghost Himself conveys to each reader of the Scriptures.[3] This argument is one which must always be employed with reserve. It contains no proof whatever for those who profess insensibility to the evidence on which it rests. Its proper function is to confirm, not to prove; it may suitably be addressed to the affections, not to the understanding. The second proof, however, viz. the answer of Scripture itself—the assertion of its own Divine authority which the Bible makes, is conclusive.

Of ancient propheey St. Peter declares that "Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost" [2 Pet. i. 21]; and St. Paul, writing of "the Holy Scriptures," which Timothy had "known from a child," declares that "all Scripture is given by inspiration of God" [2 Tim. iii. 15, 16].[4] The sacred writers—also Christ Himself, as in the thrice repeated "It is written" during the Temptation—invariably employ the expressions "Scripture," or "it is written," in a strictly technical sense, to denote portions of what we call the canonical writings. The New Testament, no less than the Old, is thus referred to. The saying in the Gospel, "The labourer is worthy of his hire" [St. Luke x. 7], is quoted verbatim by St. Paul as "Scripture" in the same sense as the passage from the Pentateuch which is coupled with it. St. Peter [2 Pet. iii. 16] classes the Epistles of St. Paul among "the other Scriptures." St. Paul [1 Cor. ii. 13] enforces his teaching by the declaration, "Which things also we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth;" and he appeals to those who were endowed with the highest spiritual gifts to confirm the Divine authority of what he had contributed to the New Testament Canon: "If any man think himself to be a prophet, or spiritual, let him acknowledge that the things that I write unto you are the commandments of the Lord" [1 Cor. xiv. 37]. Add to these texts, which by no means exhausting the number of passages

[1] In other words the real question is as to the result of the Spirit's influence on the Bible as a whole, not as to the manner according to which it has pleased God to distinguish any one of the sacred writers. Thus the writings of Moses, although he received the most eminent marks of the Divine favour, are not more trustworthy vehicles of the Divine will than the writings of Ezra or Nehemiah. The Gospel of the Apostle John is not of higher authority than that of St. Mark, who was not an Apostle.

[2] To give a few instances of the Church's teaching: St. Clemens Romanus thus quotes Isa. liii.—καθὼς τὸ Πνεῦμα τὸ Ἅγιον ἐλάλησεν [ad Cor. i. c. 16]. St. Ignatius refers to 1 Cor. iii. 16 with the words, τὸ δὲ Πνεῦμα ἐκήρυσσεν [ad Philadelph. c. vii.]. St. Cyprian writes: "Loquitur in Scripturis Divinis Spiritus Sanctus" [De Opere et Eleemos.]. St. Basil says that "all Scripture is divinely inspired and profitable," διὰ τοῦτο συγγραφεῖσα παρὰ τοῦ Πνεύματος, ἵν' κ.τ.λ. [Hom. in Ps. i.]. St. Jerome, "Absque Scripturis Sanctis ubi et verborum ordo mysterium est." [ad Pammach. Ep. 57]. St. Augustine, "Solis iis Scripturarum libris, qui jam Canonici appellantur, didici hunc timorem honoremque deferre, ut nullum eorum auctorem scribendo aliquid errasse firmissime credam" [ad Hieron. 82]. St. Chrysostom, οὐ γὰρ ῥήματά ἐστιν ἁπλῶς, ἀλλὰ τοῦ Πνεύματος τοῦ Ἁγίου ῥήματα, καὶ διὰ τοῦτο πολύν ἐστι τὸν θησαυρὸν εὑρεῖν καὶ ἐν μιᾷ συλλαβῇ [In Gen. ii. Hom. xv.]. St. Gregory the Great: "Quid est enim Scriptura S. nisi quædam Epistola omnipotentis Dei ad creaturam suam." [Ep. 31, ad Theodorum Medicum.]

[3] On this proof the Westminster Confession, e.g., relies [see ch. I. 4, 5].

[4] So the English Version renders πᾶσα γραφὴ θεόπνευστος καὶ ὠφέλιμος. Bishop Ellicot translates, "Every Scripture (i.e. every individual γραφή of those previously alluded to in the term ἱερὰ γρ.") inspired by God is also useful," &c. "It is very difficult to decide whether θεόπν. is a part of the predicate, καί being the simple copula, or whether it is a part of the subject, καί being ascensive, and ἐστι being supplied after ὠφέλιμος. Lexicography and grammar contribute but little towards a decision. . . . We are thus remanded wholly to the context." It may be observed here that γραφή, in the language of the New Testament, is strictly employed as a proper name: hence, according to the well known rule [cf. St. Matt. ii. 3; Acts ii. 30], the absence of the article does not forbid the rendering tota Scriptura. The similar construction, too, 1 Tim. iv. 4, is not to be overlooked.

that may be adduced, that Christ on four distinct occasions previous to His Passion promised His Disciples the assistance of the Holy Ghost—viz. Matt. x. 19, 20; Luke xii. 11, 12; Mark xiii. 3; John xiv.-xviii.;—the promise that the Holy Ghost should "bring all things to their remembrance" [John xiv. 26], receiving its fulfilment, as we read in John ii. 22, xii. 16; Acts xi. 16.

INTENTION. A deliberate motion of the will by which it is purposed to accomplish a certain act: first, taking in merely the act, secondly, taking in also the consequences of the act. An action may be done with a good intention, and may produce bad results: or it may be done with a good intention, and produce good results. It may also be done with an evil intention, and yet good results may follow: or with an evil intention, producing evil results. As a question of morals, therefore, the intention with which anything is done really determines the quality of the action as regards the person who does it. It is not possible that it should always determine the course of social policy in the matter of rewards or punishment: but it may mostly determine the verdict of conscience respecting the good or evil of an act, and has doubtless a large place in the Divine judgment of them. No intention can be good, however, which purposes the doing of an evil action, although with the object of securing good results; nor any which does a good action with the object of producing evil results. [CONSCIENCE.]

INTENTION in the celebration of Sacraments is considered by Roman theologians to be necessary for their validity. Thus the Council of Trent [sess. vii. can. xi.] decrees, "If any one shall say, that in ministers, whilst they effect and confer the Sacraments, there is not required the intention at least of doing what the Church does; let him be anathema." The same principle was enunciated in the Constitutions of Martin V. and Eugenius IV. in the early part of the preceding century. Much exaggeration has been used in interpreting this principle, many Roman writers giving grounds for the assertion of opponents, that if such exaggerated interpretations were to be admitted, there would be no certainty respecting the validity of a majority of the baptisms of the Church, or of the celebrations of the Holy Eucharist. If the minister of any sacrament were to celebrate it with the profane and perverse intention of openly ridiculing it, or making it invalid, then, indeed, there might be reasonable doubt whether his ministration would be effective. But if he uses the prescribed rites and words, he acts as the deputy of the Church, and no deficient or evil intention can affect the validity of what depends on his ministerial acts, and not on his private and personal will. The Twenty-sixth Article of Religion virtually repudiates this extreme form of the doctrine of Intention, declaring that the effect of a Sacrament flows (where there is faith in the receiver), from its due administration as to form and words, no wickedness of the minister, whether as to his life or his intention, forming a bar to its validity. For a moderate Roman account of Intention, see Liebermann's Institutiones Theologicæ, ii. 386-392, ed. 1861.

INTERCESSION OF CHRIST. Our Blessed Lord's Intercession is the action of that part of His mediation by which He acts on man's behalf towards God the Father. It is the exercise of that priesthood in which He is a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec; and the occupation in which He is engaged during His Session "at the right hand of God the Father Almighty."

The need of an Intercessor arose from the loss of the right of communion with God, of which Adam was deprived when he sinned. Before the Fall Adam was the high priest of all creation, and as such was privileged to hold free intercourse with God, and this privilege, lost by Adam when he sinned, was restored in Christ. "God heareth not sinners," and, whilst sin remained unexpiated, man forfeited the right of access to God. Until the fulness of time came a temporary provision was made for man's acceptance with God in the sacrifices of the Patriarchal age, and the ceremonies of the Mosaic ritual; but all these were shadows of the priestly functions of the Son of God, which commenced from the time when He offered up Himself as a sacrifice upon the Cross.

The Intercession of Christ is the exercise of His priestly office, which is carried on continually in heaven. It was represented by the entrance of the high priest once every year into the sanctuary with the blood of atonement, which was a type of the entrance of the great High Priest into heaven, to offer that sacrifice which had been slain on earth as the plea by which His intercessions avails. He was constituted to be our High Priest by the union of His Divine and Human Natures, through which He has become our medium of communication with the Father. "He is able to save to the uttermost them that come to God by Him, seeing He ever liveth to make intercession for them" [Heb. vii. 25]. The prophecy of Isaiah, that having borne the "sin of many," He "made intercession for the transgressors" [Isa. liii. 12], is fulfilled in Him who is our "Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the Righteous." His Manhood enables Him to plead on our behalf as the representative of human nature, and so to sympathize with those needs and those sorrows which require His intercessions, that He offers them up as one most deeply interested in our welfare, "For we have not an high priest who cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin" [Heb. iv. 15]. His priesthood, moreover, requires an offering, and it is still His Human Nature which furnishes both the victim and the priest. His Godhead renders that sacrifice an invaluable offering and His intercessions all-effectual. He is an High Priest, separate from sinners, and made higher than the heavens, because He is the Son who is consecrated for evermore, and "through the eternal Spirit" He "offered Himself without spot to God" [Heb. ix. 14].

Intercession of Christ

The sacrifice on the Cross once slain was the foundation of our great High Priest's intercessions, but when that sacrifice had been completed on earth, He entered into heaven to continue its perpetual offering. As the high priest carried into the holy of holies the blood of the sacrifice which had been slain in the tabernacle without, and with it made intercession for the people, so Christ has carried into heaven the sacrifice offered on Calvary, which He is continually presenting to the Father. That which Holy Scripture teaches and the Church believes, is that this work is continually going on, and that through this medium our Eucharists and our prayers reach the Father.

The Saviour's work in heaven is one in which the Church on earth takes part. He has said, "Whatsoever ye shall ask in My name, He will give it you" [John xv. 16]. The prayers which we offer on earth reach the Father through the intercession of the Son, and thus He not only intercedes for us but with us. He does not so intercede in our stead as to release us from the duty of prayer; for prayer on our part is necessary, since the Father has appointed this as the means whereby we may make known our requests to Him. The priesthood of our Lord rests upon His people, who are one with Him as the members of His Body; and therefore through this union they become intercessors as well for themselves as for their brethren, and their prayers are heard which otherwise would find no access to the ear of God.

But as our Lord's intercession implies a sacrifice continually offered, so does that of His Church on earth. If the members of Christ are intercessors, and their intercessions avail through His, they too must have a sacrifice to offer, and this also is provided. In heaven our great High Priest is continually offering Himself to the Father, and on earth provision is made by means of the Eucharist, that the offering may be continued; for the sacrifice once slain on Calvary is evermore to be offered not in heaven only but on earth. Do this (τοῦτο ποιεῖτε, a sacrificial term), was the command of our Lord, when first He instituted the sacrament of His Body and Blood; and St. Paul teaches us that as oft as we do this "we shew forth the Lord's death till He come" [1 Cor. xi. 26]. The sacrifice on the Cross was the central point from whence two streams diverged, to meet again continually, the Intercession of Christ in Heaven and the Eucharistic sacrifice of His Church on earth. The earthly priest shews forth the Lord's Death in the offering which he presents, but the offering ascending up becomes one with that which the great High Priest is continually presenting in heaven. The congregation too, as a kingdom of priests, ratify the offering and take their part in its presentation by pronouncing the Amen after Consecration. [Lay Priesthood.] At other times prayers are always offered up "through Jesus Christ our Lord," addressed to Him that He may offer them to the Father, mingled with His own intercessions; but the Holy Eucharist is one in act with our Lord's intercessions in heaven, since that which the Church offers on earth and Christ in heaven is one and the same sacrifice. And, therefore, although prayers to the Son are continually offered at other times, yet in the Holy Eucharist, it was directed by the Council of Carthage, that prayers should be offered to the Father alone, "Cum Altari assistitur, semper ad Patrem dirigatur oblatio" [Con. Carth. III., can. xxiii., Hard. i. p. 963]; and the reason for this, given by Cardinal Bona, is "quia missa repræsentatio est ejus oblationis, quâ Christus se Patri obtulit."

The Intercession of Christ was represented under the Mosaic ritual by the altar of incense. The altar of incense was placed between the altar of burnt-offering and the mercy-seat. It was situated originally within the veil, but afterwards outside, yet still in a line connecting the altar of burnt-offering with the mercy-seat. When, on the day of atonement, the high priest entered into the holy of holies, he filled his hands with incense from the altar of incense, and took with him a censer of coals from the altar of burnt-offering. Thus, for a little season, the priest, the sacrifice, and the incense, were all within the veil, signifying the entering of Christ within the holy place not made with hands, even into heaven itself, there to appear in the presence of God for us, "True priest, true sacrifice, presenting His Church in Himself through His all-availing intercession" [Freeman, Principles of Divine Service, vol. ii. part ii. p. 179].

It has also been observed by Archdeacon Freeman, that as the altar of incense stood before the veil which separated the holy of holies from the outer tabernacle, the smoke of the burnt-offering mingled with the fragrance of the incense ere it penetrated into the sanctuary. So the intercessions of Christ mingle with our sacrifices, whether it be the one great sacrifice of the Cross, the Eucharistic sacrifice, or that of the Church's prayers or praises, ere they are accepted in the holy place. The place of the Mosaic incense is supplied in the Christian scheme of the Intercession of Christ, by "that intercessory will of His, that willingness to be offered, that desire to save, which, using the sacrifice as its instrument or plea, wrought the redemption and sanctification of the world" [ibid. vol. ii. p. 181]. In the ritual of heaven, described in the Apocalypse, the Lamb as it had been slain stands before the Majesty of God, in the midst of the throne, and in the midst of the elders, so uniting the Church and the Father. The sacrifice took place once on Calvary, and it is not repeated [Art. xxi.], but continually offered up in heaven. There it stands as an abiding plea, and gives effect to the much incense which the Angel of the Covenant, Christ Himself, is offering on the golden altar which is before the throne.

The doctrine of our Lord's intercession in heaven is a key by which we may understand the worship of the Church on earth. For as this was represented in the Mosaic services, so does it find its counterpart, not only in the heavenly but the earthly ritual. The worship of the Church on earth mingles with that which is offered up in heaven, and it is through this union that our eucharists, our prayers, and praises, derive their efficacy. There is a door opened in heaven —Christ is the door—and through this door our offerings and petitions ascend. The angels take up the song, but the offering is made before the Throne by the great High Priest Himself.

The doctrine of our Lord's intercession is a protest against that rationalism which would make each man in himself, and each man's prayers by themselves, acceptable to God. This would destroy our dependence on Christ, and our humility and self-abasement, when we think of what we are in ourselves. This doctrine is also a comfort and encouragement, because it assures us that, however unworthy we are, our prayers are heard and our sacrifices accepted, because they are presented by One whose intercessions must be all-availing. It impresses an awful solemnity on our ritual when we remember that standing in the house of God and at the gate of heaven our services are part of those which are going on in heaven itself. Such a doctrine also encourages the penitent to draw near the throne of grace, for it represents Him who offers our prayers as One who can be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, who was the sinner's friend on earth, and is still the refuge of penitents and the defence of the humble and meek. It connects together the intercessions of departed saints with the prayers of the Church on earth, for they with us have equal right of access to the Father through the Son. It speaks of the Church now represented by the High Priest in heaven, but hereafter to be presented to the Father without spot or wrinkle or any such thing.

INTERCESSION OF SAINTS. The belief that the saints in paradise intercede for those on earth is a consequence of the doctrine of the Communion of Saints, and agrees with revelations made in Holy Scripture. The communion of the saints departed with the saints yet living is that part of the general doctrine which is especially insisted on by those of the ancients who first took notice of it in the Creed. And it can be no mere theory; but must involve correlative acts and duties. It is no presumption therefore to assert that the saints departed, recognising that communion, and living in a revelation of the presence of the Saviour the Intercessor, in and through the Spirit, Who is also an Intercessor, cannot but intercede likewise for us on earth. How otherwise should they be living the life of Christ, and breathing the breath of the Spirit? This conclusion agrees with an "à fortiori" argument founded upon Dives' prayer to Abraham; and with the notice in the Apocalypse of the souls under the altar, and the subsequent offering of their prayers with much incense. It may be noticed also that the dream or vision of Judas Maccabæus [2 Macc. xv. 12-14] must have been in accordance with the belief of the Jews at that time. This intercession of the saints is met by the prayers of the Church on earth for the dead in Christ. [PRAYERS FOR THE DEAD.]

But it must be observed that, when speaking of such a belief as one of the plainest doctrines of Christianity, it is not implied that the saints have any special or particular knowledge of the state of those on earth. It is sufficient that they know us to be still subject to temptation, and still engaged in the contest. There are no grounds whatever for attributing to them a supervision of all the changes and chances of this mortal life. Rather, it appears probable, inasmuch as to angels is assigned a ministry on behalf of the elect, and since the intermediate state is a state of incompleteness, in which the faithful are waiting for the powers of the resurrection body, that the employment of the saints is devotion and contemplation, rather than active ministry. INTERCESSORY PRAYER. [PRAYER.]

INTERDICT, an ecclesiastical censure frequent in the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth centuries, which is said to have taken its origin in France as regards local application. Lyndwood defines it as an ecclesiastical censure inflicted as a penalty on contumacy or offences, whereby people are prohibited from receiving sacraments. Sarpi refers the first instance of an interdict to the pontificate of Alexander III., but Bellarmine instances an earlier fulmination against Poland by Gregory VII., A.D. 1073. Du Pin says, that for seven centuries and upwards, he had never read in church-history of a society excommunicated or laid under an interdict. An interdict prohibits the celebration of Holy Communion, administration of Sacraments and Divine Service, and burial in holy ground. It is an ecclesiastical censure suspending ecclesiastics from their duties, and deprives the people of divine worship, sacraments, and burial. There are three kinds—local, confined to certain places and persons; personal, directed against individuals; and mixed, combining both characteristics. Local interdict is either general, which embraces a kingdom, province, castle, or town; or particular, where it is restricted to a place, a special church or individual, chapels and cemeteries adjacent to the church named being included. Personal interdict is also divided into general, including a community or number of persons; and particular, where launched against certain persons distinguished by name.

An interdict local and particular was inflicted on a cemetery of which the maker had, as a condition, purchased the right of burial, or one in which a heretic had been interred, or on a church where an interdict naming persons had been received. Interdict, denial of admission into a church, was pronounced on persons disturbing a church or clerk, and remaining impenitent, persons detaining legacies or gifts to a church, persons neglecting their duty to protect the Church, persons violating sanctuary, persons who had not paid Easter dues, physicians who failed to summon the priest to the dying, and clerks guilty of being accessories to the murder of a bishop.

Owing to the cruel wrongs caused to the unoffending in a general interdict, the Council of Basle laid down several restrictions upon its use.

During an interdict general Baptism and Confirmation were administered, and the Holy Communion in case of necessity; to consecrate Holy Chrism, to say service in a low voice within closed doors and without sound of bells, to inter clerks in holy ground without rites; to celebrate Holy Communion aloud with bells ringing and open doors at Christmas, Easter, and Whitsun, Days, and three other feasts; and on those days to admit the persons distinctly interdicted by name within the church but not to the altar; and to allow a service once a year to be celebrated by certain religious.

An interdict, unlike excommunication, did not cut off civil rights. Those who violated interdicts by forcing themselves into a church were punished by suspension, deposition, particular interdict, and excommunication. A clerk who celebrated, if a church was interdicted by censure, incurred irregularity. His violation of an interdict rendered him incapable of a benefice.

An interdict exhausted itself in time, either by lapse of the period of the original sentence, or its satisfaction. Absolution removed a simple interdict; in other cases, a superior—the ordinary, a legate apostolical or the pope—removed it. Excommunication and suspension have taken the place of interdicts. Properly speaking, places only were interdicted, and colleges and universities could be laid under the law. Communication with others was permitted in cases of interdict and suspension; on certain days interdicted persons were permitted to enter the church, and they could be admitted to penance. Excommunication was inflicted only on account of personal offences.

Interdict is also the denial of the power to minister in the diocese, or to preach, being a suspension of the exercise of his office in a priest made by a bishop. If a parish should refuse to provide the ornaments and necessary goods for Divine Service, the church and parish would be practically laid under an interdict. [André; Ferraris; Lyndwood.]

INTERIM. A name given to the scheme by which Charles V. endeavoured to conciliate the Protestants of Germany, and by means of which he wished to make it possible for them to continue in the Church during the time that a General Council was assembling and coming to a decision on the points in controversy between the Protestants and the Church.

The idea of an "Interim" originated in A.D. 1541, during the deliberations of a commission composed of three Catholics, Eck, Pflug, and Gropper, and three Protestants, Melanchthon, Bucer, and Pistorius, but they could not agree on sacramental doctrine. The name is, however, generally applied to the scheme issued in obedience to an order of the Emperor at the Diet of Augsburg in A.D. 1548, which was composed by two bishops, Pflug and Helding, and John Agricola, Protestant chaplain to the Elector of Brandenburg; and which made some important concessions to the reforming party, including the marriage of the clergy and the administration of the Eucharist in both kinds to the laity. The document so drawn up contained twenty-six articles, and dealt with most of the questions in dispute, but it met with little approval on either side, was rejected by the Pope, and was repealed in 1552. [Sleidan, De statu relig., &c.; Bieck, Das dreyfache Interim, Leipsic, 1721.]

INTERMEDIATE STATE, or the state between death and the resurrection. Its existence is clearly intimated in Scripture as in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, each of whom is represented immediately after death as being in a place of happiness or misery; also, in our Lord's words to the penitent thief [Luke xxiii. 43], and by St. Paul [2 Cor. v. 8], and St. John [Rev. vi. 9].

According to the teaching of the early Church, the soul after death was consigned to a place of happiness or misery in Hades, and there remained till the day of judgment.[1] St. Justin says "the souls of the good are consigned to a better place, and those of the evil and unjust to a worse, there to await the day of judgment."[2] Or according to St. Irenæus, "souls go to the place appointed for them by God, and there remain till the resurrection, awaiting it."[3] Tertullian alleges the example of the rich man and Lazarus, as proving that the soul is now in a state of happiness or misery, awaiting its union with the body, and the final award of judgment.[4] St. Cyprian also says "the just are called to refreshment (refrigerium), and the wicked hurried away to punishment."[5] Novatian speaks of Hades as "the place where the souls of the wicked and the righteous are brought, experiencing a foretaste of future judgment"[6] (futuri judicii præjudicia sentientes). And Lactantius, "let no one think that souls are judged immediately after death, all are detained in one and a common custody until the Supreme Judge shall examine their deservings"[7] (meritorum faciat examen).

An exception was believed to be made in the case of martyrs, who were supposed immediately after death to be admitted to the beatific vision.[8] All others were believed to remain in the intermediate state till the day of judgment.

The Church has always rejected an opinion, not unknown in an early age[9] and often maintained in modern times, that the soul after death

[9] Eusebius relates that about the middle of the third century there were certain persons in Arabia who held remains in a state of sleep or unconsciousness till the resurrection; for though the Scripture speaks of the death of the righteous as a falling asleep [John xi. 11; Acts vii. 60; 1 Thess. iv. 13], the metaphor is not intended to intimate that the righteous are in a state of unconsciousness, but of refreshment or repose from the trials and sorrows of life; and it especially implies their assured hope of a reawakening—a resurrection to eternal life.

INTERPRETATION [Hermeneutik], speaking generally, is the theory of the art of expounding words. It is founded on the principle that every word has a meaning. [1.] Applied to ordinary cases, that meaning is, for the most part,[1] merely the grammatico-historical (or literal) sense—the sense, that is, which the common use of language renders, and which may be proper or improper. [2.] Applied to the Books of Scripture, as inspired, and therefore not proceeding from the sacred penmen as the sole authors, a further sense—a ὑπονοία, a "sensus spiritualis"—is to be assumed. The interpretation of this underlying sense is either that which tends to edification—called indifferently spiritual, figurative, mystical; or typico-allegorical. The spiritual sense is commonly divided into the moral (or tropological), and the anagogical. The old Latin lines express these distinctions:—

> "Litera, gesta docet; quid credas, allegoria; > Moralis, quid agas; quo tendas, anagogia."[2]

Thus the Sabbath may denote tropologically the ceasing to sin; anagogically, the rest in heaven of the people of God; allegorically, the repose of Christ's body in the grave. [See Ersch. u. Gruber, Allg. Encyklop.; art. "Hermeneutik;" Perrone, Præl. Theol. pars II. c. iii.; Bonfrerius, Præloqu. in S.S. 20.]

INTINCTION. A mode of administering the Holy Eucharist, by breaking the consecrated Bread into the consecrated Wine, and giving the two Elements together in a spoon. The laity, but not the clergy, communicate in this manner throughout the Eastern Church, the object being to prevent any accidental loss of either Element.

The practice of intinction is said by some Greek liturgical writers to have been introduced by St. Chrysostom, but the traditional evidence adduced is not strong enough to support the assertion: and there is much written evidence to shew that the two Elements were commonly administered by two separate persons, which makes it improbable that their admixture for communion was the ordinary practice. Bona says, however, that it was forbidden by Julius I. [A.D. 337-352], whose decree, as given by Gratian [Distinct. ii. c. 7], speaks of it as a practice not warranted by the Gospel, in which Christ is represented as giving first His Body, and then His Blood, to the Apostles; and if this decree is authentic, it shews that the practice was known in the time of St. Chrysostom. The third Council of Braga [A.D. 675] forbad it in their first Canon, the words used being identical with those attributed to Julius I., "Illud, quod pro complemento communionis intinctam tradunt eucharistiam populis, nec hoc probatum ex evangelio testimonium recipit, ubi apostolis corpus suum et sanguinem commendavit; seorsum enim panis et seorsum calicis commendatio memoratur. Nam intinctum panem aliis Christum non præbuisse legimus excepto illo tantum discipulo, quem proditorem ostenderet." Micrologus [c. xix.] declares that the practice contradicted the primitive canon of the Roman Liturgy, but this is no real evidence as to the time of its introduction into the Eastern Church. In the eleventh century it was forbidden by Urban II. [A.D. 1088-1099], except in cases of necessity; and Pascal II., his successor, forbad it even in these, directing that where difficulty of swallowing the solid Element arose, the fluid Element should be alone given. But Bona quotes from Ivo of Chartres about the same time a canon of a Council of Tours, in which it was ordered that priests should always keep the reserved oblation "intincta in sanguine Christi, ut veraciter Presbyter possit dicere infirmo, Corpus, et Sanguis Domini nostri Jesu Christi proficiat tibi in remissionem peccatorum et vitam æternam." In A.D. 1175, the Convocation of Canterbury distinctly forbad the practice of intinction in the words, "Inhibemus ne quis quasi pro complemento communionis intinctam alicui Eucharistiam tradit." But the practice forbidden seems, from the word "complementum," to have been as much that of the consumption of the superabundant Elements by the laity (directed in one of our modern rubrics) as that of intinction. There can be no doubt, however, that the Western Church has always set its face against the practice. [Concomitance. Bona, Rerum. Liturg. II. xviii. 3.]

INTROIT. [Officium, Sarum; ἔισοδος, Eastern; Ingressa, Ambrosian.] A psalm or hymn, but more properly the former, sung immediately before the commencement of the office for Holy Communion. "Introitum autem vocamus antiphonam illam quam chorus cantat et sacerdos ut ascendit ad altare legit cum versu et Gloria" [Martene, De Antiq. Monach. Rit. II. iv. 9]. The name is from the Latin "introire," to enter, false opinions, asserting that the soul died with the body, and with the body would be raised at the resurrection. They were refuted by Origen. [Eccles. Hist. bk. vi. c. 37.]

[1] An ordinary book may be a satire, or treat of mythological subjects, &c., and therefore it also may have a figurative interpretation.

[2] This, the usual distinction, is open to obvious objections: E.g. The tropological and anagogical senses can scarcely be regarded as different, and both may sometimes be included under the literal. Some refer the distinction to St. Augustine, who says [Genes. ad. Lit. i. 1] that in Scripture we must seek æterna, facta, futura, agenda. Origen [In Levit. Hom. v. c. 5] saw in Scripture a threefold sense—historical, moral, mystical. These senses he compared to body, soul, and spirit. This distinction was followed by many; e.g. St. Eucherius of Lyons [fifth century] writes: "Corpus Scripturæ S., sicut traditur, in litera sive historia est; anima in morali sensu, qui tropicus dicitur; spiritus in superiore intellectu, qui anagoge appellatur." [Formulæ, seu phrases S.S., ap. Bibl. Max. Patr. Præf. vi. 8, 22.]

the priest entering the sanctuary while it is being sung, and preparing to begin the liturgy.

According to Freeman [Princ. of Div. Service ii. 316], the true introit consists of "the fine 'Hymn of the Only-Begotten Son' in the East, and the far nobler 'Gloria in Excelsis' of the further East and the whole West." Neale, too, remarks [Introd. p. 363] that "the Introits of the Liturgies of St. Mark and St. James, and the Armenian, consist of the Hymn 'Only-Begotten Son.'" The design of the Church is clearly to carry back our thoughts to the Incarnation, and from that to the Passion.

But connected with this true, or proper, introit, we find in the West a psalm, or hymn, with antiphon, varying according to the season; and in the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom, three antiphons: and this is what the name introit must be understood ordinarily to signify. In the West it is closely joined with the bringing in of the Elements, the Sarum rubric standing thus, "after the introit let him bring in the bread, wine, and water." This might be done until the end of the first Collect which followed the "Gloria in Excelsis." It is doubtful whether it has a similar connection with the "Great Entrance" of the East. But in both East and West we find some prelude to the great hymn of Incarnation [Freeman, ii. 319].

The origin of the introit is referred by Cardinal Bona [iii. 48] to Pope Celestine [A.D. 422-432]. Its structure is that of an antiphon, followed generally by a whole psalm or a portion of a psalm,[1] and the Gloria Patri, and then by a repetition of the whole or part of the commencing antiphon. In the old Gregorian introit the antiphon was repeated three times, a custom found also in the Sarum rite: this triple recitation being connected mystically with the three laws, viz., the Natural, the Mosaic, and the Evangelic.[2]

Part of the Prayer Book of 1549 was entitled "The Introits, Collects, Epistles, and Gospels to be used at the celebration of the Lord's Supper and Holy Communion through the year." There was a distinct Introit for each Sunday printed with the Collect,[3] these being entire psalms, with the Gloria Patri, but without antiphons. [Martene—De Antiquis Ecclesiæ Ritibus, and De Antiq. Monach. Ritibus; Freeman's Principles of Divine Service, vol. ii. and (for various examples from different Liturgies) Neale's Essays on Liturgiology.]

[1] It is not always from the Psalms or even from Scripture [Neale, Essays on Liturg. p. 138, &c.]; and in the Ambrosian Liturgy the Introit (there called Ingressa) is "a simple consecutive clause, not an anthem broken by ℣ and ℟." [Ibid. p. 175.]

[2] "In præcipuis festivitatibus ter cantatur introitus propter tres leges, scilicet naturalem, Mosaicam, et legem Evangelicam, gratiæ quia in unaquaque Deus habet præcones suos." [Martene, De Antiq. Monach. Rit. lib. ii. iv. 9.] The same writer also mentions that "In Dominicis diebus ad majorem missam introitus post versum dimidius solet recantari—post Gloria Patri, totus."

[3] The Sarum Introits will be found translated in the "Annotated Book of Common Prayer," as also a list of those enjoined in the First Prayer Book.

INTUITION. [ILLUMINATION.]

INVITATORY. A short antiphon, suitable to the season, sung before the Venite, and, in whole or in part, repeated after each verse, and after the Gloria Patri.[4]

The use of the 95th Psalm as an "invitation to praise" is of very great antiquity, and was probably adopted from the Temple service. In the East, the whole psalm is not used, but the following three clauses, without change:—

> "O come let us worship God our King.
> O come let us worship and fall down before Christ our King and God.
> O come let us worship before Christ Himself our King and God."

In the West, the whole psalm was always used, and with it, as a rule, the invitatory, which constantly varied according to place and season. It consists of two clauses: "both are said before the psalm, and at the end of the second, seventh, and last verses; the second clause only at the end of the fourth and ninth verses. The Gloria Patri is followed, first, by the second, and then by both clauses. The Breviary of Cardinal Quignonez restricted the Invitatory to the beginning and end of the Psalms." The ninefold repetition of the whole or a part of the Invitatory is very ancient, Durandus thus giving its mystical explanation: "The Invitatory is repeated six times at full length; because six is the first perfect number; and the sixfold repetition, therefore, sets forth the perfection with which we should endeavour to perform the service of God. Three is an imperfect number, and therefore the imperfect repetition takes place three times."

The only approach which we possess in our Prayer Book to the true Invitatory (unless the opening sentences of Mattins and Evensong be considered of a similar character), is in the fixed versicle "Praise ye the Lord" with its response, "The Lord's Name be praised." The singing of Alleluia after the Gloria Patri at the commencement of mattins was ordered in the Prayer Book of 1549. The response was inserted in 1661. [ALLELUIA.] The 95th Psalm, with this versicle and response, is to be considered as an unvarying Invitatory in the modern English rite, except on Easter-day, for which special provision is made. Bishop Cosin proposed to insert the following rubric before the Venite. "And upon any Sunday or Lord's day, this commemoration of His rising from the dead shall be said or sung. Priest. Christ is risen again, &c. And upon the feast of Easter, Christ, our Passover, is offered up for us. Therefore let us keep the feast, &c., ut in die Pasch. Then shall be said or sung the Venite." "The Invitatory pitches the key-note to the whole office: it directs the worshippers in what light they are at that particular time called on to regard God: and stamps its own meaning on the whole series of Psalms" [Neale's Liturgical Essays, p. 7]. For examples of the Invitatory from most varied sources, the reader is referred to this work, as also to the Commentary on the Psalms, by the same writer [vol. i. p. 43-46].

[4] The Rubric of the Sarum Breviary runs thus:—(after the Gloria and Alleluia), "Sequatur invitatorium hoc modo. Ecce Venit rex. Occurramus obviam Salvatori nostro. Ps. Venite. Post. i., iii., et v. vers. psalmi repetatur totum invitatorium. Post. ii. vers. iiii. et vi. vers psalmi repetatur solum hæc pars, Occurramus. Et deinde reincipiatur totum invitatorium."

INVOCATION OF THE HOLY SPIRIT IN THE EUCHARIST. There is now apparently a difference in the teaching of the Eastern and Western Church on the consecration of the Holy Eucharist. According to the belief of the Western Church, consecration is effected by the words of Institution only; such is the teaching of the Roman Missal and also of the Anglican Prayer Book. But in all the Eastern Liturgies we find after the words of Institution, a prayer for the descent of the Holy Spirit, that He would make the Bread the Body, and the Wine the Blood of Christ, which implies that the sacramental change had not yet taken place, or been completed. Thus, in the Liturgy of St. James, "Send down Thine Holy Spirit upon us and upon these Thy holy gifts here set before Thee . . . that He may sanctify and make this Bread the Holy Body of Thy Christ, and this cup the precious Blood of Thy Christ."[1]

Various explanations have been given of this apparent difference between the Eastern and Western Church. The Eastern Church, at the Council of Florence[2] [A.D. 1438], admitted with the Latins that consecration was really effected by the words of Christ's Institution, and explained the subsequent prayer for the descent of the Holy Ghost, as referring to His gracious Presence to prepare the communicants to receive the sacramental gift.[3] This explanation is only partly true; the prayer before us, though often expressly mentioning, yet really goes beyond, and has no primary connexion with, the sanctification of the communicants. Thus in the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom, the priest prays that the Holy Spirit will effectuate the sacramental change, will make the bread the precious Body of Thy Christ, and what is in the cup the precious Blood of Thy Christ, "changing them by Thy Spirit." On examining the teaching of the Latin Fathers, we often find an emphatic statement that consecration is effected by the words of Institution. Thus, Tertullian speaks of Christ "calling bread His Body,"[4] and St. Cyprian that Christ taking the cup, blessed it, saying, "This is My Blood of the New Testament."[5] Extracts are elsewhere given from St. Jerome, St. Ambrose, and St. Augustine in proof of the same point. [EUCHARIST.] Amongst early writers of the Eastern Church, we sometimes, though not universally, find different language. Thus St. Justin, it cannot be doubted, believed that the consecration was effected by the words of Institution;[6] though he afterwards says [sec. 67], "in all our oblations we bless the Maker of all things, through His Son Jesus Christ, and through the Holy Ghost;" and St. Irenæus, though, like St. Justin, attributing consecration to the words of Institution,[7] says in another place, "the bread receives the invocation (ἐπίκλησις) of God, and is no longer common bread." Other Greek Fathers are more explicit. Thus St. Cyril of Jerusalem says, "We call upon the merciful God to send forth His Holy Spirit upon the gifts lying before Him, that He may make the bread the Body of Christ and the wine the Blood of Christ; for whatsoever the Holy Ghost has touched is sanctified and changed."[8] This prayer is very remarkable as being used after the words of Institution, considering that St. Cyril previously said: "Since Christ had declared and said of the bread, 'This is My Body,' who shall dare to doubt any longer; and since He has affirmed and said, 'This is My Blood,' who shall ever hesitate saying that it is not His Blood." St. Chrysostom also often speaks of the Holy Spirit as the Agent in the Eucharistic consecration. Thus, he says that the priest "invokes the Holy Spirit and consummates the most awful sacrifice,"[9] and speaks of the Spirit "hovering over the gifts set before us."[10]

In the liturgies of the Eastern Church, we always find this prayer for the descent of the Holy Ghost inserted after the words of Institution. There are also some traces of the same doctrine in the Western Church, as in the Mozarabic[11] (or Missale Mixtum) and Gallican liturgies,[12] though the "Invocation" is sometimes omitted, and is rarely given in clear and express terms as in the Eastern liturgies. Paschasius Radbertus, a well-known writer of the Western Church of the ninth century, very clearly states that the bread and wine are changed by the ineffable sanctification of the Holy Spirit.[1]

[3] An account of the Council is given in Brett's Dissertation. He quotes Arcadius, who says, "The Greek Fathers in the last session of the Council of Florence being asked by Pope Eugenius the Fourth, why they added those prayers after the words of Christ as if the consecration was not yet perfected, answered—That they made no doubt but the consecration was made by the words of Christ, but nevertheless they said those prayers, that benefit might accrue to us by that sacrifice." This interpretation, as Brett afterwards says, "was given by the Bishop of Nice only, without the knowledge or consent of the rest" (the Greek bishops). The Eastern Church has always rejected the authority of this council, nor can we suppose that its teaching is there fairly represented. Constantinople was at that time besieged by the Turks, and the Easterns could only obtain a promise of assistance from the West by consenting to a reconciliation and union with the Latin Church. Her delegates, with the exception of Mark, Bishop of Ephesus, were harassed or starved into submission—a feigned acquiescence, for it was no better, with the Latin teaching. On their return, their acts were disavowed by the Eastern Church, and themselves deposed or imprisoned.

From what has been stated, it appears very probable that in all primitive liturgies there was, after the words of Institution, a prayer for the descent of the Holy Ghost. Why this prayer has been omitted, or very indistinctly stated, in the liturgies of the Western Church, cannot now be ascertained. It cannot, from the evidence before us, be deemed essential, as if without it consecration were invalid. By writers of the Eastern Church it is admitted, as we have seen, that the words of the Institution effect the sacramental change, of which fresh proof is added below from St. Chrysostom.[2] It cannot, therefore, be supposed that this prayer is indispensable, though undoubtedly the elements are consecrated by the instrumentality of the Holy Ghost; so that through His Divine Power, bread and wine become the Body and Blood of our Lord and Saviour. Christ who once on Calvary, through the Eternal Spirit, offered Himself without spot to God [Heb. ix. 14], is now through the same Spirit offered by the Church in an unbloody manner (ἄθυτως) in the Eucharistic Mysteries.

INVOCATION OF SAINTS. Asking the intercession of the saints departed for ourselves or for others still living in the Church Militant. The limits within which such requests may be lawfully made have been the subject of much controversy; but a great deal of needless difficulty has been thrown into the question through forgetting that "invoke" and "invocation," as also "pray" and "prayer," are generic words, and to be interpreted according to the nature of the person invoked. We may invoke God, we may invoke men. The former invocation is a prayer with worship, the latter a prayer without worship. But invocation of the saints is too often spoken of as if it necessarily implied worship.

I. With this caution, it is lawful to invoke the saints for those offices which we believe they can and do perform regarding us. They do not share (we have reason to believe) the angelic ministry on our behalf, and therefore we may not ask it. They do pray, and we have reason to believe they pray for us; their intercessions therefore we may ask. It is but a cold remark of Bull's [Corruptions of the Church of Rome, Works, vol. ii. p. 266, Burton's ed.], when having said that he denies not the intercession of the saints in general, he continues, "But this is no reason why we should pray to them to pray for us. Nay, on the contrary, if the deceased saints do of their own accord, and out of their perfect charity, pray for us, what need we be so solicitous to call upon them for their prayers, especially when our reason and Scripture also tells us, that we are out of their hearing, and that they do not, cannot know our particular wants and necessities?" Nor does he state what are the grounds of reason, or the places of Scripture to which he alludes. When we wind up the hymn Benedicite with "O ye spirits and souls of the righteous—O Ananias, Azarias and Misael, bless ye the Lord," we cannot bear to be asked what need to call on them to praise God when they do it of their own accord, or to be told "There is no certainty that they hear you." The mind has gone forth in praise, and is quickened by the thought that our praises are joined to the praises of the saints. And even so it is in prayer.

II. The question then arises,—In what light should we regard the holy saints with reference to this practice? The answer may be given in the words of the "Articles about religion set out by the Convocation, and published by the King's authority" in 1536 [Formularies of Faith, 1825, p. 14]. The article states that "saints now being with Christ in heaven be to be honoured of Christian people on earth; but not with that confidence and honour which are due only unto God, trusting to attain at their hands that which must be had only of God: but that they be thus to be honoured, because they be known the elect persons of Christ, because they be passed in godly life out of this transitory world, because they already do reign in glory with Christ: and most specially to laud and praise Christ in them for their excellent virtues which be planted in them; . . . and finally to take them, in that they may, to be the advancers of our prayers and demands unto Christ." The only questionable statement here is in the words, "they already do reign in glory with Christ." If any saints, being

[De Corpore et Sanguine Domini, c. ix.] "Non in merito consecrantis sed in verbo efficitur Creatoris et virtute Spiritus Sancti ut caro Christi et sanguis, non alia quam quæ de Spiritu Sancto creata est, vera fide credatur et spiritali intelligentia degustetur. Si enim in merito esset sacerdotis, non ad Christum pertineret; nunc autem sicut Ipse est qui baptisat, ita Ipse est qui per Spiritum Sanctum hanc suam efficit carnem et transfundit vinum in sanguinem. Quis enim alius in utero creare potuerit, ut Verbum caro fieret? Sic itaque in hoc mysterio credendum est quod eadem virtute Spiritus Sancti per Verbum Christi caro ipsius et sanguis efficiatur invisibili operatione." [Ibid. c. xii.]

[2] "For His Word cannot deceive, but our senses are easily beguiled. That hath never failed, but this in most things goeth wrong; since then the Word saith, 'This is My Body,' let us both be persuaded, and believe, and look at it with the eyes of the mind." [Homil. lxxxii. of St. Matthew. Oxf. transl.] The priest says: "This is My Body—that word changes the elements" (μεταρρυθμίζει τὰ προκείμενα). St. Chrysostom then contrasts the words of Institution spoken by our Lord, which are effectual until His coming again for Eucharistic consecration, with the words spoken by God at the Creation, "increase and multiply," which have been availing through all ages for the propagation of mankind. [De Proditione Judæ.] martyrs, do already "reign," through being received into glory with Christ, they do not so reign that we in the Church on earth may dare to approach them as subjects, and pay them honour and reverence equivalent to worship.

III. The primitive practice of prayer for the dead was corrupted by the mediæval myth of a penal purgatory, and so the invocation of saints was corrupted by erroneous teaching regarding the intermediate state. The Council of Florence, A.D. 1439, declared that "those souls which having contracted the blemish of sin, being either in their bodies, or out of them, purged from it, are presently received into heaven, and there clearly behold God Himself, one God in Three Persons, as He is" [Carranza, Summa Conc. p. 863]. The error remains in the Tridentine decree, and mars its otherwise unexceptionable language. It teaches that "the saints reigning with Christ offer their prayers for men to God, and that it is good and useful to invoke them as suppliants; and for the sake of the obtaining of benefits from God through Jesus Christ our Lord, who is our only Redeemer and Saviour, to have recourse to their prayers" [sess. xxv.]. The belief that the saints are already reigning with Christ naturally and logically leads to praying to them as protectors instead of invoking them as intercessors.

IV. The great liturgies which stand at the heads of their respective families scarcely recognize either the intercession or the invocation of saints. St. Mark has the AVE MARIA. St. James has it, but it is a later interpolation. St. Chrysostom recognises the intercession. The Malabar has "May Hormisdas keep you, may he pray for you" [see Neale's edit.]. It is a sufficient cause for this reticence that in the earliest times there was especial danger of "voluntary humility," as shewn regarding angels, and in the æons and emanations of heretics. When this especial danger was past the Church could more safely allow an expression of the Communion of Saints to enter into her worship. Against the errors of later times the true doctrine of the intermediate state is our safeguard.

V. Remembering that doctrine, we may conclude by again quoting the article of 1536, "Of praying to saints." "Albeit grace, remission of sin, and salvation cannot be obtained but of God only by the mediation of our Saviour Christ, which is only sufficient Mediator for our sins; yet it is very laudable to pray to saints . . . whose charity is ever permanent, to be intercessors, and to pray for us and with us unto Almighty God after this manner: 'All holy angels and saints in heaven pray for us and with us unto the Father, that for His dear Son Jesus Christ's sake we may have grace of Him and remission of our sin' . . . so that it be done without any vain superstition as to think that any saint is more merciful, or will hear us sooner than Christ, or that any saint doth serve for one thing more than another, or is patron of the same."

IRREGULARITY. The infraction of the rule laid down by St. Paul for the reception of orders: a canonical impediment precluding admission to holy orders, or the exercise of their office by clerks. The word is first used by Pope Innocent III., and only to be defined in its ramifications by a pope or general council. The usual division is into [1] irregularity "ex defectu," or involuntary, and [2] "ex delicto," that incurred by personal acts [Tit. i.; 1 Tim. c. iii.]. The Councils of Nicæa, Elvira, and IV. Toledo are precise against the admission of persons guilty of crime into holy orders.

The first class includes defects of [1] birth, illegitimate persons; of [2] mind, fools, ignorant, or clinics; [3] of body, in cases of grievous mutilation, defects in limb, leprosy, or constitutional infirmity—a restriction not earlier than the fifth century; [4] of age, when the Council of Neocæsarea in the fourth century laid down the canonical age; of [5] liberty, stewards, married men-slaves, or sons of priests under certain restriction, [6] of reputation, when notorious offenders; [7] of merciful temper, as soldiers or officers of justice; or in case of [8] bigamy.

The second class includes the homicide, those who have been rebaptized or receive orders irregularly, i.e. by deceit, from a bishop who is heretical, simoniacal or under suspension; those married without their wives' consent, or without his own bishop's permission, or out of the canonical terms, or receiving two orders in one day; those who have unlawfully used their orders or usurped the exercise of the functions belonging to an order not yet attained, or ministered in places under censure. In the latter case, the Pope, if the violation was open, or the bishop, if it was in secret, can give dispensation. Or irregularity "ex delicto" may end with the termination of the sin or fault, and that "ex defectu" is sometimes condoned by entrance into a religious order. Heresy in parents, connivance with heretics, or acceptance of a benefice in the patronage of heretics, constitutes irregularity "ex delicto." Lyndwood includes advocates in cases of blood, simonists, &c., and reduces it to three heads—origin in defect or sin, as from bastardy, bigamy, or marriage with an adulteress; in disobedience to the precepts or censures of the Church; in a sin or fault which entails incapacity to discharge the duties of the ministry, or to receive a higher order without a dispensation. At present persons unable to pass their examination, or with serious bodily and physical defects, or notorious offenders, or of uncanonical age, are reputed irregular. Archbishop Winchelsea included stipendiary priests not taking the prescribed oath. Reynolds added those who received confirmation twice; and Chichele, the bigamous, a term including many special cases. [André; Ferraris; Lyndwood.] The 113th Canon of A.D. 1603, declares the "pain of irregularity" to be incurred by any minister revealing or making known to any person whatsoever "any crime or offence committed to his trust and secrecy" in Confession. Such a breach of spiritual trust, therefore, involves the clergyman in loss of his benefice, if he have one; or, whether he has or not, in incapacity for holding one.

ΊΧΘΥΣ

ΊΧΘΥΣ. A mystic word used by the early Christians to set forth in a secret manner the principal articles of orthodox belief respecting the two Natures and the work of our Lord. It is found on the earliest monuments of Christianity, and in almost the earliest of uninspired Christian writings; and a full explanation of its meaning is given by Optatus in his treatise against the Donatists, written about A.D. 370. He writes, "This is the Fish, by which is meant Christ; which, by the invocation in baptism is introduced into the fontal waters, that what had been water might, from the word Fish, be called a fish-pool. The name of which Fish, in Greek, comprehends in one Name by each of its letters, a collection of holy names, Ἰχθὺς, which in Latin is Jesus Christus, Dei Filius, Salvator" [Optat. Contra Donat. i. 1]. The Greek form of the acrostic is—

Ἰησοῦς
Χριστὸς
Θεοῦ
Υἱὸς
Σωτὴρ

This is the earliest explanation of the symbolic word, but it is evidently of quite primitive origin, for it is used by Tertullian [A.D. 150-220], as if familiar to those for whom he was writing his Treatise on Baptism. "We, little fishes, are born in water in conformity with ΙΧΘΥΣ, our Lord Jesus Christ, nor can we otherwise be saved than by remaining therein" [Tertull. de Bapt. i.]. St. Clement of Alexandria also refers to the symbol [Pædag. iii. 2], as do St. Augustine and many other of the Fathers.

The connection of the idea with the immersion and emersion which occurred in primitive baptism is sufficiently plain. It seems also to be associated with a scriptural idea not unfrequently used in the prophecies of the Old Testament, in which the work of the Gospel is represented under the idea of fishing, as in Jer. xvi. 16; Amos iv. 2; Habbak. i. 15. How this idea was taken up by our Lord, and how it was associated with the secular occupation of some of the Apostles, is sufficiently familiar to the reader, to make a reference to Matt. iv. 18, 19; Luke v. 2, 10, all that is necessary.

JANSENISM. The rise of Jansenism may be traced back to the Council of Trent, and to the suspicion of semi-Pelagianism that had always attached to the teaching of the Schools. Baius, a learned doctor in the University at Louvain, was the precursor of Jansen. In the year 1567, certain statements of his, referring to the Augustinian theory of grace, were condemned by Pope Pius V. in seventy-six propositions, yet without naming the author. In A.D. 1580, Gregory XIII. was persuaded by the Jesuit Tolet to renew the condemnation, in which Baius tacitly acquiesced.

In the first year of the seventeenth century, the Dominicans were taxed by the Jesuits with teaching reformed doctrines. "Even a Protestant might subscribe Dominican doctrine," were the words of Cardinal Du Perron to Clement VIII. The Dominicans retorted by accusing Molina of Pelagianism; and not without reason, for he taught that free-will without the aid of grace can produce morally good works; that it can withstand temptation; that it can urge itself to effectual acts of love, hope, faith, repentance, &c.

In 1588, the Inquisition charged Molina with heresy. Acquaviva, General of the Order of Jesuits, caused the question to be transferred to Rome, well knowing how useful the Order had made themselves as Janissaries of the Holy See. Clement VIII., though expressing himself as opposed to Molinist doctrine, withheld any formal judgment. The spirit of discord continued to smoulder till nearly the middle of the century, when it broke forth, A.D. 1640, at Port Royal. Jean Verger de Hauranne, afterwards the Abbé St. Cyran, had been appointed confessor to the institution at Port Royal, by Zamet, Bishop of Langrès. The youthful Abbess La Mère Angelique, of the Arnauld family, having brought her house under a high state of discipline, according to the severe Cistercian rule, the inmates increased rapidly; and in 1626 a house was purchased in the Faubourg St. Jacques, at Paris, called also Port Royal, to which the nuns removed. In 1638, Port Royal des Champs was tenanted by male recluses, who were bound by no vow, under Verger, now St. Cyran, as their superior. Among the names of note that were connected with this establishment, are Arnauld, Lancelot, De Sacy Le Maître, of the highest legal reputation in Paris, Nicole, Tillemont, Quesnel, Singlin, the eminent physician Hamon, and the Dukes of Liancourt and Lunnez. Blaise Pascal also was on intimate terms with the associated members, though not himself an associate. Life at Port Royal was of primitive simplicity and austere sanctity. Three o'clock A.M. was the hour for rising. After common prayer, all kissed the earth in token of spiritual abasement before Him who heareth prayer. A chapter from the Gospels and another from the Epistles were then read kneeling, and another prayer concluded the morning devotion. Church fasts were rigidly observed. Two hours in the forenoon, and two in the afternoon, were devoted to daily labour in the garden and farm, where dukes might be seen drawing the furrow, basket-weaving, or constructing cells for themselves and their successors. A well conducted seminary, under Lancelot, was a principal feature among the many good works of Port Royal. To the regular clergy and the monastic orders they gave deep offence, by a harsh cynicism, and ceaseless charges of lax discipline; and if their piety was of a higher order, it was less useful as an example, by being mingled with superstition and fanaticism. Hence they were branded from the first with the by-name of Rigorists. Such was the discipline at Port Royal des Champs, when, A.D. 1640, a posthumous work, by Cornelius Jansen, Bishop of Ypres, was published, entitled Augustinus, a fellow-work to Petrus Aurelius, by his friend St. Cyran. In this, the doctrines of grace, free-will, original sin, and predestination, were set forth, as its name imports, in the spirit, and very often in the exact words of Augustine, the aim of the author being to represent, not his own views, but the exact teaching of the Father.[1] The introduction to the work exhibits the principal topics of fault found with the Scholastic theology, as being too highly dialectic, too little spiritual; and it contains the first exposure of that monstrous Jesuitical position "de probabili," which gave such scope for Pascal's wit; it being held by the casuists of the Order that any opinion with respect to the morality of an action that has been advanced by a learned and good man, may be accepted as probably correct and acted upon, however a man's own individual conscience may declare to him that it is wrong. Altogether the book appeared to be an express censure of the Jesuits. The whole weight of the Order, therefore, was brought into play to ensure its condemnation at Rome, which accordingly took place by bull of Urban VIII., A.D. 1642. The work continued to be the text-book in the Netherlands and at Port Royal des Champs. The clergy of France and the nobility sided with the Jesuits. The lower orders, always attracted by the ascetic spirit, and by anything like self-devotion on the part of the rich, took part with the Jansenists, whose following therefore was by far the most numerous. The hold of Jansenism upon the popular affection was riveted by liberality in politics, and by an intelligent zeal in conducting the work of instruction. Added to this, the Port Royal press poured forth accurate editions and useful abridgments of learned works, as well as elementary manuals for students. The Latin and Greek grammars by Lancelot for a long time were the best that could be placed in the hand of the student.

The following are the main points of Jansen's deductions from Augustine. Man, he taught, was created perfect and upright in his own nature, though capable of corruption. Righteousness was natural to him; and was no superadded gift of grace. His will was free, though subordinate to the will of God; yet only subordinate, as love is subordinate to its object. After the Fall his freedom became a mere lifeless form; he lacks all power of putting good resolve in execution; if he abstains from sin, it is from fear, or pride, or constitutional disposition—sin antagonizing sin. If he does good, it is in opposition to his will. This depraved condition can only be remedied by the grace of Christ, which infuses a Divine saving principle into the life of man, sets free the fettered will, and strengthens him for action. This grace acts with irresistible energy, and is always effectual. It supersedes that unreal freedom of will that came in with the Fall of Man, for grace alone is freedom, the converse of all external compulsion. When Scripture says that God "will have all men to be saved," it means, not every individual, but individuals of every class, Jew and Greek, high and low, rich and poor, who are predestined to salvation from all eternity; only for these did Christ die. This gift of grace manifests its inward presence by sensations of spiritual joy, as being the very indwelling of the Deity.

This being a matter of experience only to the few who are of the elect, it was assumed as a test of worthiness for sacramental communion, and all were repelled who fell short of it. "The sacrament is a feast for eagles, and not for crows."[1] It was in conformity with these principles of his friend Jansen that St. Cyran used to withhold the sacrament from those under his charge, that they might ascertain by the experience of their feelings whether they truly hungered for it. For this he was denounced to Richelieu, who had endeavoured in vain to make a political tool of St. Cyran. The Abbé was arrested and thrown into prison at Vincennes within eight days of the death of Jansen [A.D. 1638]. At the end of five years Richelieu died, and the Abbé was set at liberty, but he died in the same year, aged sixty-two, declaring that he left behind him twelve others stronger than himself. In the mean time, the Augustinus had been edited by Arnauld, and followed in A.D. 1644 by a defence of the Augustinus by the same hand, now Principal of Port Royal. Carnet, Syndic of the Theological Faculty at Paris, drew up a body of five articles condemning certain opinions said to be contained in the Augustinus, but without indicating the delinquent. These opinions were to the effect that,

1. There are precepts that are impossible for just men to observe with their present powers, however willing and earnest they may be, and grace is wanting to them whereby they might be possible.

2. No one of our fallen nature can resist the internal operations of grace.

3. In our fallen condition, freedom from inward necessity is not required to render actions meritorious or otherwise; it is sufficient if there be freedom from outward compulsion.

4. Semi-Pelagianism allowed that inward preventing grace was needful for the performance of particular acts, and even as the commencement of faith; but in this they were heretical, that they affirmed such grace might be thwarted or obeyed by the will of man.

5. It is semi-Pelagianism to affirm that Christ died for all men universally.

Jansen having embodied in his work a statement that had already been condemned by the Roman See in Baius, without perceiving that it was Augustinian, Innocent X., a weak illiterate pontiff, was easily persuaded by Cardinal Chigi that such contumacy was an impeachment of papal infallibility, and in the Bull "De occasione" condemned the first four propositions as heretical, and the last as rash, impious, and full of blasphemy [A.D. 1653]. Arnauld hit upon an expedient that for a time rendered the bull harmless. "True," he said, "the See of Rome has authority to decide with respect to doctrine, and every good Catholic must submit to its decree; but the Holy See may misapprehend fact,[2] whether a book contains certain statements or no: the meaning also of a writer may be misunderstood. Let the five propositions be heretical, yet, with the exception of the first, they are to be found neither in letter nor in spirit in the writings of Jansen." Hence arose the celebrated distinction of de facto and de jure. The elements of mischief were still smouldering, when the Duc de Liancourt was refused communion as a Jansenist, and Arnauld put forth two letters on the subject. From the second, two additional propositions were extracted and condemned by the Faculty of Theology, and the writer was expelled the Sorbonne. The work of business-like persecution now began, and two months after the expulsion of Arnauld, A.D. 1656, the civil authorities proceeded to enforce an order in Council that every novice and scholar should be removed from Port Royal. It was at this juncture that the eighteen famous Provincial letters of Blaise Pascal appeared.[1] It is impossible to overrate their effect; though while we read them, it should be borne in mind that they are the pleadings of an advocate burning with a sense of injury done to a bosom friend. Every advantage given by the moral obliquity of Jesuitical casuistry was diligently turned to account and made the butt of witty scorn, while the Jansenists, by force of contrast, shone forth as saintly men of an uncompromising virtue, and graces that came out brightly under persecution. Voltaire has said of these letters that the best comedies of Molière contained nothing more witty than the earlier, and that there was nothing more eloquent in Bossuet than the latter; in fact that they constituted an epoch in French literature. These letters "did more to ruin the name of Jesuit than all the controversies of Protestantism or all the fulminations of the parliament of Paris."[2] "The spirit of Pascal," says Macaulay, "was the spirit of St. Bernard; but the delicacy of his wit, the purity, the energy, the simplicity of his rhetoric had never been equalled, except by the great masters of Attic eloquence. All Europe read and admired, laughed and wept."[3] Possibly Pascal had no very intimate knowledge of the principles of the Order, and was determined to be blind to everything but the great wrong suffered by his friend of Port Royal. The blow was felt severely by the Jesuits, who knew that the wit, and irony, and cruel sarcasm that sparkle throughout these letters had made them the laughingstock of Europe. Yet forty years elapsed before any regular answer was attempted by Father Daniel. As a set-off for this heavy blow, A.D. 1656, Cardinal Chigi, now Alexander VII., confirmed the condemnation of his predecessor, and declared specifically that the five propositions contained de facto Jansenist error. In the following year, the faculty of Paris prepared a formulary for signature avowing an unreserved acceptance of this last confirmatory bull, and which the clergy, and the inmates of every conventual establishment, were called upon to sign. The nuns of Port Royal refused to sign, and were thrown into prison and refused communion. Fontaine and De Sacy were confined in the Bastille, where the latter proceeded at his leisure with his translation of Holy Scripture [A.D. 1666]. Four of the bishops also refused to subscribe, and as it was deemed advisable to avoid imprisoning the heads of the Church, they were left unmolested, until Clement IX. succeeded, A.D. 1668, when a compromise was effected, the prison doors were opened, the captive nuns set free, and the proscribed Jansenists came forth from their hiding-places. The Mère Angelique having witnessed the removal by force of seventy-five inmates of her house, breathed her last, A.D. 1671, aged seventy-eight years. A portion of the nuns having subscribed to the articles of condemnation, Port Royal de Paris was made over to them with a considerable portion of the revenue belonging to Port Royal des Champs; here, however, the seminaries were again frequented; the learned Tillemont became an inmate as a recluse, and Racine as a student. De Sacy having completed his work, the members circulated the Scriptures in French. Louis XIV., "abhorring Jansenism quite as much as he abhorred Protestantism, and very much more than he abhorred Atheism,"[4] was restrained from any outward act of persecution by the influence of the good Duchess of Longueville; but she died in 1679, when a royal edict was obtained by the Jesuits forbidding the admission of fresh members to the Jansenist community. Their schools gradually died away. In this year the Benedictines of St. Maur in France published their edition of St. Augustine's works from original sources, when it was found that preceding editors had unscrupulously tampered with the text; the Father now spoke more clearly than ever the language of Jansen. In 1684 De Sacy Le Maître died, Arnauld in 1694, Nicole in 1695, and Lancelot, as a Benedictine monk, in the same year. The sun of Jansenism shone forth brightly once more in Quesnel before it finally set. The Réflexions Morales of this Father of the Oratory attracted much notice for its deep fervour and religious spirit; but it was thoroughly Jansenistic. He had never signed the five propositions, and his confessor put the question to the Sorbonne whether he might admit to communion a spiritual person who had done no more than maintain the "reverential silence" of the four bishops. The Bull of Clement XI., "Vineam Domini" [A.D. 1705] declared that this neutral position was not sufficient. The nuns of Port Royal still refused to sign, and their refusal ended this time in a final break-up of the establishment. All the revenues were transferred to the rival house in Paris, and the title-deeds were seized by a commissary. The nuns were apportioned among the convents of other dioceses, the buildings were pulled down, and even the graveyard desecrated by a removal of the remains to other cemeteries. It was the centenary year of the first reforms of the youthful Mère Angelique. Father Quesnel had been an unconscious cause of the suppression of Jansenism as an institution in France; he was equally so of the rise of the Jansenist archiepiscopal see of Utrecht that still exists. His Réflexions Morales had been condemned by the Bull "Unigenitus" [A.D. 1713]. Noailles, Archbishop of Paris, four prelates, and several doctors of the Sorbonne, appealed against the Papal judgment to a general council; hence they gained the name of "Appellants." By a fresh Bull, "Pastoralis Officii," subscription was enforced as a necessary act of canonical obedience. The Archbishop, in true keeping with his character, gave way. Others preferred exile to subscription. Holland gave an asylum; and, according to Ranke,[5] Jansenists were to be found at this period in Vienna and Brussels, Spain, Portugal, and Italy, disseminating their doctrines throughout Christendom, either openly or by stealth. Utrecht had been raised in the time of Philip II. of Spain to the dignity of an archiepiscopal see [A.D. 1559]. The other United Provinces, on shaking off the Spanish yoke, became Calvinist, but Utrecht and Haarlem continued in the Roman communion. In 1702 Archbishop Codde, an intimate friend and pupil of Arnauld's, was denounced at the Court of Rome as a Jansenist, and suspended. A papal nominee, recommended by the Jesuits, was rejected by the chapters of Utrecht and Haarlem, though he was afterwards accepted by the latter. Hence a schism was the result, and Utrecht was the point for which Quesnel and the French refugees naturally made. The appellant bishops communicated without reserve with the Jansenists. In 1763 a synod was held by Archbishop Meinarts at Utrecht, and its acts were sent to Rome for confirmation, but no notice was taken of them. Newly elected bishops have in the same way notified their appointment, but with no other result. The suffragan sees of Haarlem, restored in 1742, and Deventer in 1752, still maintain their connection with Utrecht, but can scarcely have a long existence in their present condition, it being stated that there are only twenty-five congregations, with four thousand souls; a body of thirty clergy, and a seminary at Amersfoot with a very limited number of students [Wetzer u. Welte, Kirchen Lexicon].

If this be the germ of a national Episcopal Church, it may prove a source of blessing far and wide in Northern Europe. The doctrines of Jansen and Calvin are near enough to form a firm stepping-stone to something more Catholic and better.

JEHOVAH. The Tetragrammaton, or Ineffable Name of God, as known by the Hebrews, or covenant people, is a word of the greatest importance, for it is not only that in this, as in other cases, the name given to God by a nation implies the character of its own moral development, but this Name being given to them as a Revelation from God Himself, involves, of course, elements of thought beyond what they had attained to, and in Holy Scripture the very giving of a name is, even in ordinary cases, understood to express the true idea of the person or thing so named, so that in the case of God the revelation of the Divine Name is really a revelation of the Divine Nature. The Name of God is thus distinct from the general title of His Godhead, which has been separately considered. [ELOHIM.] His Name is that which distinguishes Him as the true God from all the personages, whether imaginary or mythical, who claimed the title of Deity amongst the heathen. Besides these names, we find God spoken of as אֲדֹנָי, Adonai, my Lord, or Master; אֵל or אֵל שַׁדַּי, El or El Shaddai, the Almighty; אֱלֹהֵי צְבָאוֹת, the God of Sabaoth or Hosts; קְדוֹשׁ יִשְׂרָאֵל, the Holy One of Israel. Such names express various attributes or relationships of God, but Elohim and Jehovah are His true names, the one expressing His Divine Nature, the other His essential character as distinct from all who are supposed to possess that Divine Nature. The antiquity of the knowledge of the actual name of Jehovah is therefore a matter of interesting inquiry, in addition to the real meaning of that name, for it supplies a criterion by which to determine the spiritual advancement of the Hebrew race in its earliest period.

[I.] DERIVATION OF THE NAME. There can scarcely be any doubt that the letters of this name are derived from the substantive verb [יְהֹוָה, from הָוָה,] according to its most ancient spelling. The point is almost settled by the words of God Himself, in which He develops the meaning of His Name as the Self-existent, "I AM THAT I AM." The opinion of Luzzato, quoted in Rosenmüller's Scholia, from his Animadversions on Isaiah, only needs to be stated, viz. that the word is derived from the interjections וָהּ, an exclamation of sorrow, and יָהּ, of joy; so that it should signify that God is the author of all joy and sorrow.

[II.] ITS PRONUNCIATION. It is literally certain that the ordinary pronunciation is not the true one. The vowels of Jehovah are derived from the Name of God, Adonai. The custom of the Jews was to read Adonai, wherever the sacred Name occurs alone, but when Adonai occurs in juxtaposition with it, then Elohim was read as the substitutional word. Accordingly, the vowel points are borrowed in the one case from Adonai, in the other case from Elohim. Accordingly, in the translation of the LXX. יהוה is ordinarily rendered by ὁ κύριος; in the Syrian Peshito ܡܪܝܐ; in St. Jerome, Dominus. In the English version we have the word LORD given as its rendering, which carries on the ancient traditional habit of reverence, while at the same time the practice of printing it in capitals when it stands as representing the τετραγράμματον, enables the reader to know the fact, which in the ancient translations was left undistinguished. St. Jerome even gives the word Adonai in Exod. vi. 3, shewing thus that his Jewish instructors were in the habit of making this substitution. Moreover, the prefixes מ כ ו ל ב would take chirik before י, whereas they take pathach or tsere before יהוה. This is another proof that אֲדֹנָי was intended to be pronounced instead of the written consonants. Also the ב ג ד כ פ ת letters take dagesh lene after this word, whereas they should not do so after a quiescent consonant.

We must therefore look to some other source than the punctuation for the true pronunciation of these letters.

Some have looked to the paraphrase of St. John as supplying the clue. Since he writes, ὁ ὢν καὶ ὁ ἦν καὶ ὁ ἐρχόμενος [Apoc. i. 4, 8], it has been thought that יהוה was compounded out of the future (whence י), the participle (whence הוֹ), and the preterite (whence וָה); so that יְהוָה should mean He Who is, and was, and is to come. This is, however, untenable, for it was plainly unknown to the ancient Jews, nor does St. John always use the triple idea, whereas he could not but have done so had it been thus essential to the name. The LXX. would not have interpreted it by ὁ κύριος and ὁ ὢν if they had known of this derivation. All the passages quoted in its favour from the Targums merely express the eternity of God, and this unchangeable continuance of the Divine Nature is expressed by the mere fact of the noun being formed from the future. There is therefore no need to attribute to this word an origin so singularly composite, but it will rather take its place amongst the futurist substantives of the language, like Isaac, Jacob, Israel, Jabin.

We may therefore reject the usual vocalization, as belonging really to another set of consonants. What, then, should the vowels be? The variety of opinion on the subject is shewn by the fact that יְהוָה, יַהְוֶה, יְהוֹה, יַהֲוֶה, יְהוֶה, יַהְוֶה, יַהְוֶה, יְהוָה, have all met with their supporters.

We cannot go to the Jews for the determination of this question, because they steadily refuse to pronounce this holy Name. Their saying is that whosoever pronounces it will have no share in eternal life [Talmud, Tract. Sanhedrin, fol. 90, col. 1]. This was grounded upon Levit. xxiv. 16, where the mention of the Name in way of blasphemy is forbidden, and this was extended by the Jews to all mention of it. It was only to be pronounced by the High Priest once a year, on the Day of Atonement. Simeon the Just, the last High Priest, is said to have been the last who pronounced it. The Jews, unable to deny our Blessed Lord's miracles, have asserted that He wrought them by being in possession of this secret respecting the pronunciation of the ineffable Name. It was, however, a solemn secret amongst them, and therefore we cannot expect to learn it from their authorities.

If we turn to ancient authors we find that it is variously represented in Greek. Ἰαώ, Jao, in Diodorus Siculus, Plutarch, Johannes Lydus, Macrobius, Origen, Irenæus, Epiphanius, Eusebius, the Abraxas gems of the Basilidians; Ἰευώ, Jeuo, in Porphyry; Ἰαού, Jaou, in Clemens Alexandrinus. These forms, however, seem to be intended as Greek equivalents for the consonants alone, without regard to the vowels, thus, $I^{A}_{E}U^{A}_{E}$. We do not then learn anything from these forms, even supposing them to be of Hebrew origin, but it is quite probable that some of them, at least, are traceable to another source, and have nothing to do with the Holy Name.

In Theodoret and Epiphanius we find the word Ἰαβέ. Theodoret says this was the Samaritan pronunciation of the word which the Hebrews call "ineffable," but the Jews pronounce it Aia. Grammatical analogy is in favour of this form יַהְוֶה, Jahveh. From this form also would naturally be derived the abbreviated and suffixed forms Jah, and Jah and Jahu, as in Isaiah, Isaiahu [יְהוּ for יַהְוֶ]; and Jeho-, Jo-, as in Jehonathan, Jonathan.

This form, Jahveh, is adopted by Ewald, Donsius, Gesenius, and Hengstenberg.

Analogies will be quoted for the form יַהְוֶה or יְהוָה, Jahvah; but the abbreviations favour the termination in וָה, veh, and also the grammatical custom that the termination in ah should belong to feminine abstract nouns. Nor is it necessary to refute the forms יְהוֶה or יְהוָה, Jehveh, proposed by Gussetius; יְהוֶה, proposed by Mercer and à Lapide; יַהְוֹה or יְהוֹה, Jahvo, proposed by Ludovicus Cappellus, for no sufficient reason can be suggested on their behalf. The form Jehveh is inconsistent with the suffixed form in the proper names, which would then require to be written Isaiehu. Jahvo is inconsistent with grammatical usage. Untenable, also, is the proposition of H. E. G. Paulus, that the word is of the Piel form, Jehova, He who makes to be; also, the idea of Reuss, approved by Gesenius, that Jahveh is not a future of the Kal but of the Hiphil form, meaning, He who made to exist, the Creator. The Hiphil form of היה does not occur. The Greek interpreter Venetus does indeed render it ὁ ὀντουργός, or ὁ ὀντώτης, perhaps with this meaning. In both Old and New Testaments the idea attaching to this Name is not that of creation but of self-existence, so that this notion may be entirely set aside.

[III.] Its Origin. Various learned men have maintained that this word has a foreign origin, generally supposed to be Egyptian; it being fancied that Moses learned it in Egypt, and introduced it amongst the Hebrews. So Gesner, Reinhard, Voltaire, Peter von Bohlen. It is a mistake to suppose with Gesner that the seven vowels with which the Egyptians are said in Eusebius [Præp. Evang. lib. vi. c. 6], to have praised God had any reference to the Name Jehovah. The vowels are merely used as a musical stave, ι ε η ω ο υ α. They are signs of the Moon, of Mercury, of the Sun, of Mars, of Jupiter, and of Saturn, and served thus the purposes of astrological worship-song. Eusebius was led astray by imagining that the Divine Name of the Hebrews consisted of vowels, but no author, Christian or Jewish, can be quoted to shew that the Egyptians made the word Jehovah out of their vowels.

Equally mistaken is the attempt to connect the Name with the inscription on the Temple of Isis [Plutarch, περὶ Ἰσ. καὶ Ὀσιρ. sect. 9], even if that inscription be genuine, for Isis represents at best but the Pantheistic idea of Nature, and is quite distinct from the idea of absolute, eternal subjectivity, which constitutes the Hebrew theology.

Neither does Pharaoh's use of the Name, in that he called Eliakim Jehoiakim, prove anything on behalf of the Egyptian origin, any more than the name of Zedekiah, similarly given to a king of Jerusalem, would prove it to be Babylonian. A much earlier Pharaoh had said distinctly to Moses, Who is Jehovah? I know not Jehovah [Exod. v. 2]. Moses with equal distinctness asserts, in answer, that Jehovah is the God of the Hebrews. The narrative clearly supposes the Name to signify the self-existent God, in a sense quite unknown to the Egyptians, and it is even unlikely that Moses would have borrowed the name of a national god from the people who had oppressed the nation.

The work of Apollo Clarius [apud Macrob. lib. i. Saturn, c. 18], where the name Ἰαώ occurs, is probably spurious, as is generally allowed. Movers, who maintains its genuineness, connects it not with Jehovah, but with חַוָּה, the life, the Life-giving Sun.

A Phœnician origin has been asserted, because we find Sanchoniatho mentioning a priest of the God Jevo, from whom he derived the information which his fragmentary remains contain. We find here many points of agreement with the Old Testament; e.g. Βεελσαμην = בַּעַל שָׁמַיִם, Ἔλιουν = עֶלְיוֹן, Ἴλος = אֵל, Ἐλωείμ = אֱלֹהִים. Hartmann supposes that the Name may have been borrowed from the Phœnicians, because of this evidence of their intercourse with Palestine, but then not before David's time. This is of itself fatal to the idea, for the Old Testament writers plainly indicate the Name as existing long before David. Besides which the supposed fragments of Sanchoniatho are very probably the forgery of Philo Byblius, in the time of Nero. Also, Porphyry quotes the name Jevo, not as a Phœnician, but a Jewish name of God.

Hamaker [Miscell. Phœn. p. 174], tries to prove the Phœnician origin out of the words of Hiram to Solomon, "Blessed be Jehovah" [1 Kings v. 7], but this proves nothing. The name is evidently borrowed from Solomon's own words, "David my father could not build an house unto the name of Jehovah his God" [ibid. v. 3], and it is equally clear that according to habits of heathen thought, Jehovah is spoken of as being the God of David, in distinction from the God of Hiram. We find no mention of Jehovah amongst Phœnician gods, and even if any trace of it can be found, it may have passed to them from the Hebrews, or lingered on from early times, as we find אֲדֹנָי, Adonai in the Greek name of Adonis. The supposed traces are in the following names: [1] Abdæus, a Tyrian Suffete [Joseph. cont. Ap. i. 8], which is supposed to = Obadiah; [2] Uriah the Hittite; [3] Araunah [2 Sam. xxiv. 18] the Jebusite; [4] Tobiah the Ammonite; [5] Bizjothjah [Josh. xv. 28], an ancient town which fell to the lot of Judah. But then Uriah may very likely have taken the name upon his admission amongst the covenant people, and so with the rest. It is plain that Tobiah had become a proselyte. The city, too, may have been renamed by its conquerors, or the name of the true God may well have lingered on amongst the inhabitants of Canaan, as His worship did in the case of Melchisedec. The name Abdæus probably represents Abdai rather than Obadiah. The cosmogonic name Colpia (supposed to be "the voice of the mouth of Jehovah"), and the Punic name Bithias (supposed to be "Daughter of Jehovah"), are too uncertain to afford ground for argument. They may be traces of the name Ἰαώ, Jao, and this name itself be a relic of the primitive nomenclature. That the Name was widely spread is shewn by what Johannes Lydius says, that it was the name of Dionysus among the Chaldees. The Name apparently remained, but it no longer signified the one true God.

[3] The Latin "Jovis" has been regarded by others as a kindred word. So Morinus, Masius, Marianus Victorinus, Voltaire, Buttmann, Delville. It is strange that even more recent authorities sanction this view. Even St. Augustine rejects it [De Civitate Dei, vi. 6]. The very pronunciation is scarcely alike. The small similarity between Jehovah and Jovis disappears when the Sacred Name is pronounced, as we have seen it should be Jahveh. And then the Latin word was originally Diovis, [Varro, de Ling. Lat. v. 10], coming from the root div, to shine, whence Deva in Sanscrit, and Deus, ΔιFὸς.

[4] The Chinese language has also been appealed to for the origin of this Name. In the teaching of Lao-tse, says Abel-Remusat, "That which ye gaze upon and see not is called Ji; that which ye listen to and hear not is called Hi; that which ye touch and feel not is called Wei. These three are unsearchable, and in their union make but one. The upper of them is not more shining, nor the lower darker. Formless Form! Shapeless and undefined Being! Run before Him and thou findest not His beginning. Follow Him and thou findest not His end." These three letters, I, H, V, are thus believed to represent the letters of the tetragrammaton. So Wiseman, who substantiates the foreign origin of this name of the Chinese Trinity, by the fact that the three syllables have no meaning in Chinese. Lao-tse, even if he did not learn this name in Palestine, may have heard it from Jews of the Captivity in Babylon. But here again the similarity vanishes into accident. Stanislaus Julien overthrows Remusat's assumption, and shews that Yi means without colour; Hi, without sound; Wei, without body. Missionaries have discovered no trace of the name Jehovah in China. It is true that amongst the Karens the name Jova does occur, and the missionary Plaisant gives an account of their faith containing various points of identity with truth, but perhaps these have originated in some wandering Israelites or Christians. At any rate, it is not likely that the Hebrews got the name of God from the Karens.

[5] The ancestral origin of the Name is therefore the most reasonable theory to rest on; and we have no reason for abandoning what we know upon the testimony of Scripture to be the case, that the Name of Jehovah or Jahveh was indeed handed down to the Hebrews from their own forefathers.

[IV.] Meaning of the Name. Since the origin of the Name is thus to be sought in the ancestral revelation of the Hebrew race, and its letters are plainly derived from the verbal root which signifies existence, let us now consider the exact character of its meaning. The Name Yahveh (which we have seen to be the pronunciation most approximating to truth), expresses continual unchangeable existence, and consequently eternity. Nouns formed from the future of the verb express the indefinitely continuing existence of that which they signify [Ewald, Smaller Heb. Gram. sec. 264]. Yahveh, therefore, is He to whom the attribute of existence constantly belongs, who at no time is not—"Yahveh, Thy Name is everlasting" [Psa. cxxxv. 12]—the Eternal, the Unchangeable, who remains what He is and was. So He says of Himself, "I Am that I Am" [Exod. iii. 14], and again, "I am Yahveh, I alter not" [Mal. iii. 6]. So is His title in the Apocalypse, ὁ ὢν καὶ ὁ ἦν καὶ ὁ ἐρχόμενος. But then, besides this, it implies the Sole-existent. He absorbs into Himself the very idea of existence [cf. Fürst, Concord. Bibl. under the word יהוה], the only true God, outside of Whom it is impossible even to conceive another God. "Jehovah our God is one Jehovah" [Deut. vi. 4]. The singularity of the Divine existence involved, as it is in the name Yahveh, is constantly expressed throughout the Old Testament. The Divine titles culminate therefore in this Name. "El Elohim Jehovah knoweth," say the two tribes and a half [Josh. xxii. 22], and again, "El Elohim Jehovah hath spoken," says the Son of Asaph [Psa. l. 1]. The three titles are in progression of intensity. It is not the God of Gods Jehovah, as many interpret—for the accents and phraseology would be different—but [1] El, i.e. God; [2] Elohim, i.e. He who sums up all the attributes of Godhead; [3] Jehovah, i.e. Eternal Self-existent One [cf. Hengstenberg and Vaihinger in loc.]. As He alone is the True, the Self-existent, He is the Creator of all. "In six days Jehovah created the heavens and the earth." He from Whom all existence comes, is Himself also necessarily the Lord or Ruler of all; and then in that He, the Creator and Lord of all, has called Israel to Himself to be His own more immediate covenanted people, He also makes Israel to know Himself in a way distinct from the knowledge which other nations have, and of which the Name Jehovah is the express symbol. Thus the Name expresses the One, Almighty, Eternal, True, Personal God, who has revealed Himself to Israel, giving the Law and the Covenant. It is generally the covenant, the commands, the sabbaths, the feasts, the altar, the priests, the prophets of Jehovah that are spoken of. Otherwise it is the "commands, &c. of my God," and the article or some other word is inserted, which shews that Jehovah is intended; but we have the covenant "of God" only once named [Psa. lxxviii. 10]. Of the utterance of the true God by one of the prophets, the phrase is "Jehovah saith," never merely "God saith," or if it be said, "I have a message from God unto thee" [Judg. iii. 20], it is to the Moabitish king, who, like Pharaoh, "knew not Jehovah, just as when Joseph speaks of "sinning against God" it is to Potiphar's wife, the alien; but the real aggravation of evil is when the children of the covenant "are wicked in the sight of Jehovah" [Gen. xxxviii. 7]. So is Jehovah the accepter of service, the avenger of evil, the witness of all actions, the author of all blessing, by whom the covenant people are to swear [Gen. xxiv. 3]. The day of retribution is the day of Jehovah [Isa. ii. 12]. The continuance of grace is "an acceptable day to Jehovah" [Isa. lviii. 5]. So that the idea which attaches itself to the name of Jehovah is no mere idea of abstract existence, a helpless omni-essence, but it is the idea of personal intervention by creation, providence, covenant, grace, judgment. When God is spoken of merely as known by the heathen, or merely in His abstract being, then Elohim suffices. But whenever God is appealed to in His truth, as He has revealed Himself, then the name Jehovah is demanded. The serpent says to Eve, "Hath God said?" but when Adam and Eve hear God's voice, it is said, "they heard the voice of Jehovah Elohim." Solomon, awaking to the sense of his sin, feels himself outcast from Israel, and ventures not to use the name Jehovah in the Book of Ecclesiastes. The people recovered from their idolatry in the days of Elijah, cry out "Jehovah, He is the God" [1 Kings xviii. 39]. If Daniel bewails his people's sin, it is "because we made not our prayer before Jehovah our God" [Dan. ix. 13]. The acceptance to which the faithful look forward, as taught by Malachi, is still gladdened by the knowledge of Jehovah Sabaoth. The Divine life communicated in the covenant of promised grace would have been represented by a meaningless juxtaposition of ideas, if it had been said God our Righteousness, but "this is the Name whereby He shall be called Jehovah our Righteousness," for the communication of the indwelling righteousness requires the previous revelation of the personal covenanting love of God. The revelation of God in the Old Testament is perfected by Him who dwelleth in the bosom of the Father, and hath come forth into the world to declare Him, to manifest His Son, to bear witness to the truth, and we are made the righteousness of God in Him.

It is well said by Dr. Kay, in "that oft-recurring phrase, 'I am Yahveh, your Elohim,' it is clear that we could no more transpose the two words than in the expression, 'I am Joseph your brother.' . . . Yahveh, though etymologically signifying self-existent, yet as being the personal Name, gathered up into association with itself whatever attributes were manifested in God's condescending intercourse with men, especially therefore His righteousness, faithfulness, and mercy" [Crisis Hupfeldiana, p. 9].

[V.] ANTIQUITY OF THE NAME. It becomes then a matter of the highest interest to determine whether this Name, the foundation of so vast a system of ennobling sentiments of piety and religion, was in use amongst the Hebrews at an early period, or was first introduced by Moses.

[1.] It is altogether improbable that Moses would introduce a new Name of God, when appealing to it as he did to rouse the people from their slavery. A new Name of God they would have rejected with scorn. An old Name retained from their ancestors would, on the contrary, be the natural germ of the fuller revelation of that Personal Being with Whom their fathers had held close communion.

[2.] The form of the word is itself an evidence of its antiquity, for had the name been introduced by Moses, or subsequently, it would have been written with Yod instead of Vau—יהיה not יהוה. The form of the verb הוה was by the time of Moses become obsolete, as is seen by the very interpretation of the Name which God gives אֶהְיֶה אֲשֶׁר אֶהְיֶה. The old form remains in the other proper Name derived from it in the earliest times חַוָּה, Havva, or Eve, which in like manner Moses finds it needful to expound, because the Israelites of his own day would not recognise its appropriateness. The Name, therefore, which cannot have been learnt by Abraham from the polytheistic nations of Canaan, seems to belong to the Aramaic period of the language, and to have been brought by him out of Ur of the Chaldees.

[3.] In the narrative of Genesis, Jehovah occurs one hundred and sixty times, Elohim one hundred and ninety times. It is unnatural to conceive that this Name did not belong to those days. Even if it were used by the historian by anticipation, yet it is impossible to conceive that he would put it into the mouth of God Himself as, "I am Jehovah, who brought thee out of Ur of the Chaldees" [Gen. xv. 7]. So the Patriarchs are habitually introduced, using it with emphasis; as Dr. Kay says, "Jacob, in the centre of his dying address, records in one brief sentence what was at the core of his spiritual life, 'I have waited for Thy Salvation, O Yahveh'" [Cris. Hupf. p. 17].

[4.] Accordingly, when God reveals Himself to the Israelites by Moses under this name, it is expressly as the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, who are thus represented as having worshipped Him under this name.

[5.] This is made the clearer by the occurrence of Proper Names compounded with the Sacred Name of God. Such is the name Moriah, Shown by God, Jochebed, Jehovah is Glory. True, such names are rare as compared with later times, but it is what we might have expected, for as the Mosaic dispensation brought to light the definite meaning of the Name, so it would raise it to a prominence of use before unknown.

[VI.] ALLEGED REASONS FOR DENYING A PRE-MOSAIC KNOWLEDGE OF THE NAME. In Exod. vi. 3, God says, "I am Yahveh: And I appeared to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob in (quality of or as) God Almighty: and (in regard to) My Name Yahveh I made not Myself known to them" [Dr. Kay's translation]. This text has been the principal ground for denying that the Name was known before.

It is also supposed to be of later origin by some, because of their notion that the early Hebrews were polytheistic, and that the idea of Abstract Being, and of the Unity of the Godhead, were developed gradually in later times by the teaching of the Prophets. The plural form Elohim was regarded by these writers as a trace of the original, and the change to the double Name, passing over into the more fixed use of Jehovah, was taken as a gauge of the growth of the pure Hebrew theology [So Schwind, Semitische Denkmäler, 1792].

Such theories, however, refute themselves; while the real and only ground of the denial is the text quoted above.

But then God does not assert in this text that He had not made His name Jehovah known to the Patriarchs (this is what the LXX. erroneously makes Him to say, τὸ ὄνομα μου κύριος οὐκ ἐδήλωσα αὐτοῖς). He only asserts that He Himself was not known to them in those aspects which this Name implies, that they had no experimental knowledge of His character as Jehovah. The word יָדַע is continually used of experimental knowledge, e.g. Cyrus shall know that He is Jehovah by his experience of the Divine assistance in his conquest of Babylon. So in many places God is said to make Himself known when it is not the intellectual manifestation of a truth, but the moral revelation of His Being which is intended.

The passage however, when it is rightly considered, does imply the knowledge of the mysterious word, by the very fact of asserting their ignorance of the mystery. Had God intended to reveal Himself in a form altogether new to Moses, He would have declared the mystery of which He might afterwards have given the name as a symbol. But He appeals to His Name, because Moses already knew that Name, and He expounds that ancient Name in order that Moses may understand that the present revelation of Himself is but a fulfilment of what had been given in the germ to the fathers long before.

So the narrative assumes that the Israelites would find no difficulty in the Name. Their only difficulty would be to realize that their fathers' God had kept them in remembrance. The ancient Name was therefore taken up by God from the treasury of their ancestral traditions, where its true value never had been known, and it became the basis of a moral theology. It was shewn to be no mere arbitrary appellation, like the names of demons or nonentities which the heathen worshipped, but the Name of a Being who is the very source of all Being, the pledge of His Eternal care as it was the expression of His Eternal Existence. The power of expounding this Name was in Moses a moral evidence to the Israelites of his having been commissioned to speak to them by Him Who bore it. The difficulty which Moses at first felt was this, that the people would expect him if he had really spoken with God to tell them something about God. They would not look for a name, but they would look for a fuller knowledge of His Being, such as was consistent with the Name which they had long known. "They shall say to me, What is His Name?" i.e. what does His name imply, what do you know about Him more than we know already? [Exod. iii. 13.] His difficulty was not that they would not know Jehovah, but they would say "Jehovah hath not appeared unto thee" [Exod. iv. 1]. He was to convince them by a twofold evidence, by physical miracle and by a revelation of the moral character of their fathers' God, latent hitherto in the very Name by which their fathers had taught them to call Him.

The revelation of the Name of God by Moses was a step towards the fuller and grander revelation of God by the Greater than Moses. The revelation of the Name of God is the guarantee of personal communion with God: and so no one hath seen the Father at any time; the Only-begotten Son which is in the bosom of the Father, He hath declared Him. And our Lord says this of Himself in His prayer to the Father: "I have declared unto them Thy Name, and will declare it; that the love wherewith Thou hast loved Me may be in them, and I in them" [John xvii. 26].

The fact that the real import of the Name was thus now for the first time revealed, is a sufficient explanation of the infrequent use of its form in human names previous to this time. If the moral purport of the Name was not understood, it was not likely that much stress would be laid upon it. Heathen nations would indeed take the special Name of their God as an element of their national nomenclature, because they believed in their gods as local gods, not having a true conception of the Unity of the Divine Nature. The Israelites who believed in God as God, would think more of the physical power of the Divine Being and of the Name which expressed it, than of the special personal Name of Jehovah, until that Name had been unfolded to them in its moral significance. As soon as they became aware of its special meaning, it rapidly assumed a position of importance in their affections.

[VII.] Elohistic and Jehovistic Writers of the Pentateuch. The endeavour to break up the Pentateuch into various portions according to the use of the two Divine Names, Jehovah and Elohim, rests simply upon the supposition that the first Name is of recent introduction. If then it is recognised as the original Patriarchal Name of God, the whole purpose of the endeavour falls to the ground. As a mere matter of criticism, however, the attempt to distinguish the Pentateuch upon such a hypothesis as that alluded to is utterly futile. More than one Elohistic writer is assumed and more than one Jehovistic writer also, and then Dr. Colenso after all finds himself bound to assume (which is indeed a step backwards towards the truth) that one of the Elohistic writers is also to be reckoned on the Jehovistic side, or as he expresses it, $J^1 = E_2$. The distinction is purely arbitrary, so much so that at times it becomes necessary even to break up a single verse in order to assign half of it to one class of writers, and half of it to another. For an exposure of the utter worthlessness of the so-called criticism by which the unity of the Pentateuch has been recently assailed, the reader may be referred to Dr. Kay's small but valuable work entitled Crisis Hupfeldiana.

We must not omit our acknowledgments to the well-nigh exhaustive treatise upon the Name Jehovah in Dr. Reinke's Beiträge zur Erklärung des Alten Testamentes.

JEJUNIA QUATUOR TEMPORUM. "The fasts of the four seasons." This expression is thus used and explained in the thirty-first Canon of 1604: "We do constitute and decree that no deacons or ministers be made and ordained, but only upon the Sundays immediately following 'Jejunia quatuor temporum,' commonly called Ember Weeks, appointed in ancient times for prayer and fasting (purposely for this cause at their first institution), and so continued at this day in the Church of England." The phrase thus comes to signify the Ember Days at the four seasons of the Calendar, though Bingham shews [xxi. c. ii.] that originally "the fasts of the four seasons" were designed "not to be the seasons of ordination, but to beg a blessing of God upon the several seasons of the year, or to return thanks for the benefits received in each of them; or to exercise and purify both body and soul, in a more particular manner, at the return of these certain terms of stricter discipline and more extraordinary devotion." In support of this view, he cites St. Leo [Serm. viii. De Jejunio Decimi Mensis], who speaks of the spring fast in Lent, the summer fast in Pentecost, the autumn in the seventh, and the winter in the tenth month.

St. Gelasius is one of the first to mention the four solemn times of ordination [Epist. ix. Ad Episc. Lucaniæ, c. xi.], and may probably have himself instituted them. Rabanus Maurus bears testimony to them thus: "Sacras ordinationes quatuor temporum diebus oportere fieri, decreta Gelasii papæ testantur" [De Instit. Cleric. lib. ii. c. 24]. The Council of Mentz [A.D. 752] names the "quatuor tempora" as observed with fasting, but does not say whether or not they were times of ordination. It was during the Pontificate of Gregory VII. [A.D. 1073-1085] that fixed regulations about the Ember Weeks were made [Muratori, Diss. de Jej. IV. Temp. c. vii.]; and the precise days at present kept were settled by the Council of Placentia [A.D. 1095]. These are thus given in the old couplet—

> "Fasting days and Emberings be > Lent, Whitsun, Holyrood, and Lucie."

i.e. the Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday, after the first Sunday in Lent, Whitsunday, Holy Cross Day [September 14], and St. Lucy [December 13]. These days the Church of England has enjoined very strictly; and ordinations at other seasons, unless from plain neeessity, are a breaeh of her law. The eommittee for the revision of the Ordinal in 1661 resolved, "quod nullæ ordinationes elericorum per aliquos episcopos fierent nisi intra quatuor tempora pro ordinationibus assignata" [Cardw. Synodal. ii. 670].

The phrase is eonsidered by some to explain the etymology of the word "Ember"—"quatuor tempora" becoming in German Quatember, and in English Ember. In French and Italian the Latin name remains: in Spanish and Portuguese the seasons are ealled simply "Temporas."

JESUITS. Inigo (Ignatius) Loyola, born A.D. 1491, in the chivalrous period of Spanish history, passed his early years at the court of Ferdinand V. Having ehosen the military profession, he served in the army of Charles V. against the Freneh. A severe wound drove his thoughts back upon himself, and in his hours of solitude he developed the scheme of his order. He imagined to himself the Saviour as General, with the Chureh militant for His host, every one of whom was bound to render implicit obedienee to the eommands of His captain. He determined to collect a band of kindred spirits, and on their banner should be emblazoned the letters A. M. D. G. "ad majorem Dei gloriam." In a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, he made a vow before the Holy Sepulchre of perpetual chastity, poverty, and devotion to the service of the Lord, A.D. 1523. On his return he found the men he sought at Paris in Franeis Xavier, Lainez, Dalmeron, Rodriguez, Alphonso, and Lefevre, and with them, after solemn mass in a ehapel under Montmartre, renewed the same vow, which was their future bond of union, A.D. 1534. It was on the Feast of the Assumption, that, as Loyola said, the infant institution might be laid in the bosom of the glorified Virgin. In 1538, the Soeiety is first found at Rome, where to the previous vows was added another of complete obedience to the Pope. In 1540, the papal bull, "Regimini militantis Ecclesiæ," established the new order as the "Soeietas Jesu," with Loyola for its first general. He died A.D. 1556, and was eanonized A.D. 1622.

Though the eonstitution of the order, in its general features, was the idea of Loyola, its development and general eharaeter was entirely the work of Lainez. It was he who infused into it the peculiar spirit of Jesuitism [Ribadeneira, v. Jacobi Lainis Col. 1604].

The society is under the sole rule of the General, but is eorporate rather than monarehieal in its eonstitution. The General is chosen by an eleetoral body, eonstituted by the votes of every grade. He is compelled to reside at Rome, and render a thorough obedience to the Pope. A council assists the General with its adviee, but in no way eontrols his action. The power of the General is limited by the eonstitution of the Soeiety, whieh for any temporary purpose he may suspend, but not alter. The course of study and training is extended over several years. The noviee having renouneed all family ties, remains in a state of probation for two years, in whieh he learns the first lessons of that passive obedience that is to render him as devoid of will as a eorpse or a stone [Bartoli, de Vita et Morib. Ign. Loyolæ, Lugd. 1565, iii. p. 234]. For this period study is wholly suspended, and the novice gives himself up entirely to devout meditation and prayer; no vow as yet has been taken, and he is free to return to the world if he should so determine. Then his studies begin; two years being devoted to rhetorie and literature, and three more to mathematies, with moral and natural philosophy. After this the student assists in the tuition of elasses, from lowest to highest, for five or six years. At length, at about twenty-eight or thirty years of age, the student is allowed to eommenee theology, to whieh he devotes from four to six years, and in his thirty-second year, at the earliest, he reeeives ordination. Every successive step is only attained after rigid examination, and the final ordeal in the subjects of the entire eourse determines the destination of the eandidate. Yet even so, as if the spirit of the natural man were not sufficiently broken in, another year must be passed like the first in seelusion from the outer world. It is the 'sehooling' of the heart, "schola affeetus" [Ravignan, Const. d. Jesuites]. The end of the protraeted course is now reaehed, and the last vow is taken as [a] professed or [b] assistants. The professed take the vow of obedience to the Pope, and from this order alone the general and prineipals are eligible. The assistants act as subordinates to the preceding; either diseharging spiritual duties, such as teaching and preaching, or menial service as lay brothers; [c] are students; [d] noviees. [Corpus Institut. Soc. Jesu, Antwerp, 1709; Constitutiones, &e., Pragæ, 1753.]

That the Jesuits should have been a learned body is not surprising, though of real genius not many traees are to be noted. Indeed, it is seareely possible that intelleet of the highest order should submit itself to the eramping influences of the Jesuit noviciate. But there was no waste of power. No talent was misapplied by them; every member was placed at his proper post. If the plodding student was declared suited for the seminary, to the seminary he devoted himself; if the resolute and strong willed eould do good battle with the world, he attacked it with an indomitable eourage; if there were fears for the enthusiastie, that he would be dangerous at home, and would do less mischief at Canton or Goa, he left Europe without looking baek. The sagaeious and imaginative were allowed to pursue the various paths of literature, and dignify the Soeiety with their labours.

A literary glory encircled the institution. The praises of the Collegium Romanum were sounded as early as 1563, by Aldus Manutius, in the prefaee to his Sallust.[1] "Consule seholas Jesuitarum," Lord Bacon writes, sixty years later, "nihil enim, quod in usum venit, his melius;[2] and addressing their institution, he says, "Talis cum sis utinam nostra esses." It is certain that the Jesuits gave an immense impulse to sound learning in the seventeenth century, trusting to other principles of their order to hold in check the intellect in its yearning for self-emancipation through the humanizing influence of liberal knowledge. Their contributions to the exegesis of Scripture have been most important, and the scriptural commentaries of Cornelius à Lapide, too voluminous for general use, are still invaluable to the student. No lectures were ever more thronged than those of Maldonati at Paris, A.D. 1564. The labours of Hardouin and Labbe on the Councils are beyond all praise. The painful calculations of Petavius form the groundwork of scientific chronology; and other members of the order have done good service in mathematics, classical studies, inscriptions, numismatics, and natural history.

The discoveries of Galileo were witnessed by Jesuit eyes almost as soon as made.[1] When his theory of comets was impugned by the Jesuit Grassi, the Father had the best of the argument. No Latin verse has been written in modern times by any body of men to equal that of the Jesuits,[2] and no praise can be desired by any religious order higher than that which Macaulay has awarded, when he paints the zealous Jesuit in his last ministrations on the plague-smitten patient:—"Even then the Jesuit was found by the pallet, which bishop and curate, physician and nurse, father and mother, had deserted; bending over infected lips to catch the faint accents of confession, and holding up to the last before the expiring patient the image of the expiring Redeemer."[3]

But, on the other hand, the dangerous principles that were the very pulse of life to the Jesuit system were detected from the first by keen-sighted men, and the fears of Melchior Canus,[4] avowed as soon as the bull of Paul III. was published, A.D. 1548, were fully justified by the event. The theory of Jesuitism was the theory of an enthusiast, determined to go straight to his point, and to make everything else subservient to his purpose. Lainez and his followers carried out in cold reason the high-wrought musings of Loyola, and set aside every feeling of the heart and every dictate of morality that interfered with the continuous onward march of the Society and its principles. Those principles were non-human as the working of any lifeless piece of machinery; cold, calculating, and cruel in their severance from all kindliness of feeling; inexorable as fate in their rigid application. Neither had the Church any power to humanize the stern rule; with the Jesuit Church authority was virtually a nullity. The Pope was sole and supreme, and the bishops of the Church had no authority excepting[5] as derived from him. He could deprive them, and also depose princes; all human authority emanated from the Pope, and might be revoked by him at pleasure. "As they grew bolder," says Hallam,[6] "some went on to pronounce even the Divine laws subject to his control." The assumption of such high prerogative offended the universal sense of mankind. The stream of civilization appeared to be flowing back to its source, and even good was refused from hands that helped to sow confusion. Kings began to doubt where these things should end, when in the last year of the sixteenth century, the book of Mariana was published, in which it was boldly asserted that bad kings might be put to death by their subjects, and the deed would be praiseworthy and glorious.[7] The book came out as the work of a Jesuit, and stamped with the "imprimatur" of a Jesuit censor; and from that moment the Society has been held justly responsible for the regicidal crimes that darken the page of the two next centuries.

But it was in the confessional that the power of the Jesuit was most fully exercised; and secrets of state policy, as well as the internal history of every family of consequence, were laid bare before the eye of the Society. The numerous issue of books of casuistical divinity betrays that peculiar cast of unprincipled obliquity and equivocation known as Jesuitism. The same "vitium originis" is perceptible throughout; a great object, the maintenance of the faith, was to be worked out, the means for effecting it were only tools in the workman's hand, and might be bent and twisted and variously combined to suit his purpose. The subjective nature of moral obligation was of no moment, as compared with the objective importance of a step made good in the right direction. If casuistical teaching had been confined to books, the mischief would have been less palpable. But such books are the guide of the confessional; and the Jesuits, from the supple manipulation of the conscience, varying their tactics with the varying individual, were always the favourite confessors; penitents of every grade sought them out, from the king on his throne to the peasant girl from the market. The power wielded by the order was so great that it made the members first an object of dread, then of hate, until every country almost in turn has cast out the name of Jesuit as evil.

The Spanish Jesuits who were compelled to leave France on the outbreak of the Spanish war settled in Antwerp, and in other towns of the

The assertion of Cyprian was forgotten: "Nemo nostrum se dicit Episcopum Episcoporum;" and of Gregory the Great to John of Constantinople, "Si unus Patriarcha universalis dicitur, patriarcharum nomen cæteris derogatur" [iv. Ep. 36].

Netherlands, and their great college was established at Louvain within seven years of the death of Loyola; the college at Coimbra in Portugal was opened A.D. 1546. It was in the Netherlands that the untoward character of Jesuit teaching first made it an object of suspicion.

The assassination of the Prince of Orange, A.D. 1584, was ascribed to the vengeance of the order of Jesuits, and the unsuccessful attempt on Prince Maurice of Nassau, A.D. 1595, was also laid to their charge. The murder of Henry III. of France by Clement, a Dominican monk, A.D. 1589, was the act of a fanatic, but the enemies of the order pretended to trace his frenzy to the principles of Loyola. The attempt made by Châtel on the life of Henry IV. of France, A.D. 1594, was by a Jesuit pupil; and his tutor, the Frère Guignard, was executed with horrible cruelty for having expressed the regicidal tenets that led to the pupil's crime. [Bayle, arts. Guignard and Châtel.] In A.D. 1610, Henry IV. fell beneath the knife of Ravaillac, and his crime was in like manner referred, whether justly or not, to the book of the Jesuit Mariana. The assassin, it appeared, was unable to read his own language, much less Latin, but evil principles assail the heart through other approaches than the sight of eyes, and he who teaches anything wrong can never be certain to what extent of evil his principles may reach, or where they may produce their crop.

In France, the Jesuits with difficulty had gained a footing. The Spanish war at first, and then the jealousy of the Sorbonne, that tolerated no rival teaching, prevented their rapid increase in the capital, though they had better success in the provinces. They were expelled, and their property confiscated, after Châtel's attempt, A.D. 1595, but restored again by royal edict of Henry IV., A.D. 1603.

The conflict with Jansenism [q. v.] helped to gain credit for the Jesuit cause with the Ultramontane party, it being considered that Jansenism was an approach towards the doctrines of the Reformation, and more especially of Geneva. But as a set-off on the popular side, the infidel philosophy of Voltaire worked far more powerfully to their prejudice.

Even in Italy the Jesuits had no secure home. A question having risen between the Council of Venice and the Pope with respect to ecclesiastical rights and privileges, the Pope threatened to lay the State under an interdict; to this the Doge and Council responded by ordering every Jesuit to quit the Venetian territory instanter, A.D. 1606, and half a century elapsed before they were permitted to return. A serious blow prostrated the order in Portugal, when Joseph I. occupied the throne, a weak voluptuary, moody, indolent, and heartless. His minister, the Count Pombal, had risen from a low origin, or if there were any gentility attaching to his family, he was, as St. Priest says, "tout au plus très mince gentilhomme." Repulsed in an attempt to ally himself by the marriage of his son with one of the proudest families of the "blue blood," he vowed a vengeance that should be more cruel than history could shew. The Jesuits also were doomed to expulsion, not that they were obnoxious to him personally, for they had helped his rise to power, and looked for a return of good offices. But he took a public spirited view; they were dangerous to the welfare of the community, and therefore they must be suppressed. The Jesuit confessors were dismissed from court, and replaced by the regular clergy; and one of the last orders of Pope Benedict XIV. was obtained by Pombal, directing that the Jesuit establishments of Lisbon should submit to the visitation of the patriarch. An event occurred at this critical time that enabled the minister to carry out with one blow both his cherished plans of vengeance and of state policy. The king, returning in his carriage to his palace, was shot at and wounded in the arm on the night of September 3, 1758. The matter was kept quiet as long as possible, while an intricate "coup d'état" was in preparation; and nothing was neglected by Pombal to lull his victims under a sense of security. When the chain of evidence was complete and strong enough in all its links, the Duke d'Aveiro, and the highest dame of the aristocracy, La Marchese di Tavora, were seized in their palaces in the dead of night, under a charge of complicity in the regicidal attempt; the Jesuits being placed in the head and front of offence as chief instigators of the crime. The sequel is soon told. A commission was appointed to try the accused, and a speedy sentence was obtained against one and all. On January 12, 1759, a scaffold eighteen feet high was erected by night in an open space by the Tagus, the Belem, and the enclosure was lined with troops. Here in the morning the Marchese di Tavora, to whom Pombal had owed his humiliation, was beheaded, the Duke d'Aveiro broken on the wheel, the wretched domestics of either house tied to their stakes, and when death had secured the noblest of the prey, fire was set to the scaffold, and the mingled ashes were eventually thrown into the Tagus and swept away by the current. The order of Jesuits was proscribed in Portugal and throughout the dependencies by royal edict; and the members of the order having been put on board ship, were landed in Italy, while an edict of confiscation declared the whole property of the Jesuits to be forfeited to the crown. The patience with which the order submitted to this reverse encouraged their enemies in France. The philosophers and friends of the dispersed Jansenists saw their opportunity; the former acted upon the instinct of deadly enmity for religion; the latter had suffered so severely at the hands of the Jesuits, that it was only human nature to use the weapon that the course of events, as a true Nemesis, had placed in their hands. Fortune soon gave ample opportunity for its exercise. Father Lavalette, in the island of Martinique, observing, as he thought, an opportunity for driving a lucrative business, engaged in trading speculations that were directly opposed to the spirit and letter of Loyola's foundation. His plans resulted in bankruptcy. The whole order was held to be chargeable, and was condemned by legal process to pay a sum exceeding £60,000, with costs. The rules and laws of the order, shrouded as they had hitherto been in mystery, were brought under the cognizance of a court of justice, and matters of historical fact that had died away were again raked up by its enemies. The parliament of Paris decided, August 6, 1761, that no Frenchman for the future should enter the order of Jesuits; that their colleges should be closed, and that any person who sought instruction from them should be incapable of entering the service of the State. The king, under the influence of a Jesuit confessor, and with the warnings of history before his eyes, hesitated to confirm this severe sentence; and the Duc de Choiseul proposed, as a compromise, that the order, instead of being ruled by the general at Rome, should be under the control of a vicar-general residing in Paris, and amenable to the laws of the country. The proposal met with the characteristic reply from Ricci, the general, "Sint ut sunt, aut non sint;" on which followed an order for their instant departure from France, A.D. 1764. In the following year Clement XIII. marked his approval of the Jesuits by confirming once more the constitution and privileges of the order by the bull "Apostolicum."

The scene of trouble next shifted to Spain. The lion seemed dead, and might be kicked with impunity. In an obscure riot at Madrid, cheers had been given for the Jesuits, which were noted and not forgotten. The minister having made himself obnoxious, he was besieged in his palace, which was destroyed, the owner barely escaping with his life, March 27, 1766. Neither a regiment of the Walloon guards, nor the king's presence, greatly as he was respected, could restore quiet; but the Jesuits effected this with so much ease, that it became fresh matter of suspicion. A year passed, and the "émeute" had ceased to give matter for talk, when April 2, 1767, a royal decree appeared, abolishing the order of Jesuits, and expelling them from the kingdom and from the colonies. The blow was the heaviest that the Society had yet received, for it was no pusillanimous, enervated monarch who had dealt it, but one who was frankness and loyalty itself in his dealings with his people. The cause for this severity was declared by the king to the French ambassador, affirming that there was proof that the Jesuits had scattered money among the people in the riot of 1766; that they were in the habit of encouraging seditious language in the disaffected; and that a design had been formed at their instigation to surprise the king at his public devotions in the Holy Week, and extort from him popular concessions. It took a year to mature plans for striking the blow, of which the king, Aranda the chief minister, and three others, were the silent contrivers. It was a masterpiece of Spanish taciturnity. The deportation of the Jesuits was immediate, more than six thousand men of high birth, of venerable age, and of profound learning, were hurried on board slavers, March 31, 1767, and landed on the island of Corsica. Sicily and Naples were cleared in like manner before the close of the year, and Parma in the following February. Before the year came round, Pope Clement XIII., having died of apoplexy, was succeeded by Cardinal Ganganelli, as Clement XIV., through the joint influence of France and Spain. Morino, one of the trio, who had given a zealous and discreet aid in expelling the Jesuits from Spain, was now ambassador at the Court of Rome, and wrung from the reluctant Pope a promise that the order should be suppressed. Indication of the coming storm was prepared. Their old liabilities under Lavalette were pressed home, and Jesuits, like other citizens, were made to feel that they were amenable to the law. Their debts and maladministration were exposed to the eye of day, and their property in the Collegio Romano confiscated for the benefit of the creditors. The same was done in their establishments at Frascati and Tivoli, and in all other towns of Italy. The fatal hour at length struck, and the Bull "Dominus ac Redemptor Noster" was signed for the suppression of the Jesuits; though with the pen still in hand, the Pope uttered the prophetic words, "Questa suppressione mi darà la morte." The sibylline warning of a peasant woman at Valentano, named Bernardina, may also be noted, who, under the mystic letters P. S. S. V., declared "presto sarà sede vacante." The bull was put in force July 21, 1773; a seal was placed on the Jesuit establishments; their schools were closed; Capuchins took charge of their churches, and Ricci was confined in the castle of St. Angelo. In acknowledgment of the papal acquiescence, Avignon was restored to the Holy See by France, and Benevento by Naples. But the prophetess of Valentano continued her ill-omened vaticination, and the Pope, though of a robust constitution, was seized at table with a convulsion, followed by shivering fits, March 1774; loss of voice followed from inflammation of the throat; painful sicknesses ensued, and prostration of strength, whereby he became so much reduced, that when the ministers of the principal powers were admitted to an audience in August, they scarcely recognised the hale and hearty ecclesiastic in the skeleton form before them. At length death put an end to his sufferings, September 22, 1774, and the appearance of the body after death confirmed Clement's suspicion that he had been long under the action of some cumulative poison.[1]

The order of Jesuits has never again recovered its former position. If, however, they were proscribed by their natural allies, an asylum was found for them in countries that might have been thought the most hostile to their principles. Frederick of Prussia declared that they were the best clergy in his dominion, and retained them in favour; as did Catherine of Russia. Elsewhere, forbidden the name of Jesuits, they continued to exist as the fraternity of the "Sacred Heart and Faith of Jesus." In 1801, Pope Pius VII. revoked the bull of Clement XIV., and restored the order to all its privileges, as far as Russia was concerned.

with the power of electing a new general. But within a dozen years they were expelled again from St. Petersburg and Moscow in 1813, and from the Russian empire generally in 1822, because they were opposed to the union of Russians and Poles in one Greek Church. Three years later Ferdinand IV., who had rejected them in his younger days from Naples, prayed for their restoration, which was accorded by bull dated 31st July 1804; and at length the same Pope in 1814 by the bull "Sollicitudo omnium ecclesiarum," restored the Jesuits to all their former privileges and immunities throughout Christendom. But theirs was still to be a chequered fortune. They were driven from Spain in 1820, and only restored in 1823 to be expelled again in 1835. In France they were tolerated for a time, and fully restored in 1822, but they were "de malo suspecti," disliked by the chambers, and finally abolished in 1845. In 1833 they were banished from Portugal and its foreign dependencies, Brazil, &c. Admitted in Austria, with the exception of Bohemia, and in Bavaria, the rest of Germany was closed against them. In England, the formation of any Jesuit college is forbidden by law, though the working of the order may be felt; but they are established in Malta, the East Indies, and Canada; as also in America. The present census would show about five thousand members spread over sixteen provincial districts, with three hundred establishments, and not less than seventy thousand pupils. The Collegium Romanum at Rome is still the headquarters. [See Crétineau-Joly, Hist. de la Cie. de Jesus; L'Abbé Georgel, Mémoires; Institut. Soc. Jesu, Pragæ, 1762; Ribadeneira, *Vita Ign. The society of Jesus has been indefatigable in pouring forth its publications. Backer [Bibliothèque des Ecrivains de la Cie. de Jesus] has given a long series of its authors as a "catalogue raisonnéc" in seven octavo volumes. The Jesuit press, so severely taxed, has poured forth copious streams of vapidity; but there are also many names that are redeemed from mediocrity; while others are an honour to their Society, their country, and their age. The writings of these may be classed under the heads of [1] theology; [2] homiletics; [3] spiritual and devotional works; [4] controversy; [5] biography; [6] poetry; [7] learned editions; [8] general literature; [9] history; [10] mathematics; [11] astronomy; [12] chronology; [13] archæology; [14] numismatics; [15] physical science; [16] fine arts. The representatives of these various sections are:—

[1] Bellarmine, Gretser, Suarez, and Sanchez, memorable for his unfortunate treatment of the subject of matrimony; Turrianus, the papal theologian at the Council of Trent; Vasquez, the Augustine of Spain; Cornelius à Lapide, the prince of Biblical annotators; Cajetanus, and others of minor note.

[2] Bourdaloue and Segneri, second only to Savonarola in the pulpit oratory of Italy.

[3] Arias, Drechselius, Rodriguez.

[4] The writers against Jansenism and Port Royal, of whom Annat was the soul, Le Tellier, Nouet, de Vos, and many others, his subordinate agents. Controversial writers also against the principles of the Reformation abound.

[5] Feller and Backer.

[6] A shoal of Latin poets; versification being the only direction in which the Jesuit imagination was allowed to run wild; Sarbievius was the modern Horace, and René Rapin the Virgil; Vanière also, the author of the Gradus ad Parnassum, may here have a place; and Arevolo, the hymnologist of Spain.

[7] Canisius, Fronto Ducæus, Garnier, Hardouin, Petavius, Sirmond, the Bollandists, Glasquière, Papebroch, Henschenius, Angelo Mai, "instar omnium;" Berthier, who as editor of the Journal de Trevoux, engaged on the one side with the Encyclopédist infidelity of Francc, and on the other with offending brothers of his own community, such as Hardouin and Berruyer.

The missionary spirit of the Jesuits has been its great redeeming point, although a distinction must always be drawn between the voluntary self-sacrificing spirit of our missionaries and the work of the Jesuit, whose vow of implicit obedience compelled him to go whithersoever the General of the Order gave him his direction. "If he was wanted at Lima, he was on the Atlantic with the next fleet; if he was wanted at Bagdad, he was toiling through the desert with the next caravan" [Macaulay, H. E. 1686]. "They were to be found in the garb of mandarins superintending the observatory at Pekin. They were to be found spade in hand teaching the rudiments of agriculture to the savages of Paraguay" [ibid.]. The most honourable names under this head are those of Andrada, Irigault, Amyot, Beschi, Cibot, Gaubil, Fromage, De Nobilibus, Ricci, founder of the Chinese missions, Schall, Vieyra, Vindelon, Fontenay, Tachard, Gerbillon, Le Comte, Bouvet. Maffei the historian, and Vieyra, the organizer of Jesuit missions [see Collection of Missionary Letters, Paris, 1838, and German by Stöcklein, Annales de la Profession de la Foi, Paris, 1853]. Others have literally laid down their life for the brethren in nursing fever patients, exemplifying the spirit-stirring description of Manzoni (I promessi Sposi), and the eloquent paneygric of Macaulay. Such were Rosweyde, Giustinelli, Gonzague, Rémond. In England Campion and Parsons were the two first Jesuit emissaries sent "in messem Britannicam," A.D. 1580 [Sanderus, de Sch. Angl. p. 377], with a band of associates from the English college at Rome. The first gained admittance into families of every grade in society, often in disguise, often under a feigned name "Habitu dementissimo [demissicio] sum, quem sæpe commuto, itemque nomina" [Ep. Camp. ad Ordinis Ducem.]. After a service of two years he was arrested as a teacher of sedition, and put to death in the Tower, December 1, 1581. His comrade was confessor to the King of Spain, to whom he sent regular information from England [Sanderus, Append. 80]; but he appears to have kept himself out of danger. Father Garnet, for receiving the confession of the conspirators in the Popish plot while it was in process of formation, was hung, drawn, and quartered as an accessory. Osborne, in his Secret History of the Court of James I. [p. 448], says that information of this plot was communicated to James by Henry IV. of France, who had gained knowledge of it from the Jesuits; the sagacious monarch at once turned it into capital. Archbishop Laud's conference with Fisher the Jesuit is a valuable piece of controversial divinity. Father Petre was an especial favourite with James II., who made him clerk of the closet; "of all the evil counsellors who had access to the royal ear, he bore perhaps the largest part in the ruin of the house of Stuart" [Macaulay].

JESUS. The name assumed by our Lord when He assumed human nature. The Greek form Ἰησοῦς represents the Hebrew Joshua, Jeshua, or Jehoshua [יְהוֹשֻׁעַ], which is a contraction of Jehovah Jeshua, i.e. Jehovah Salvation. It was given typically [1] to Joshua the son of Nun, whose original name was Oshea, "Salvation" [Numb. xiii. 16], but who received the Divine Name for a prefix when appointed to lead Israel into the Promised Land: and [2] to "Joshua the High Priest," who, with Zerubbabel, led Israel back from the Captivity, and restored the Temple at Jerusalem [Ecclus. xlix. 12]. The name may also have been borne typically by others who are mentioned in Holy Scripture, and seems to be identical with that of Jason, the Greek legend respecting whom is not without significancy as a parable of the work of Jesus our Saviour.

This name was twice given as that of our Lord by special revelation. The first time was when the angel Gabriel announced the coming Conception of Christ to the Blessed Virgin: "Behold, thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and bring forth a Son, and shalt call His Name Jesus" [Luke i. 31]. The second designation of the name was made to Joseph some months afterwards, when it was also accompanied by a reason for its being given, "Thou shalt call His Name Jesus; for He shall save His people from their sins" [Matt. i. 21]. It is also identified by the Evangelist with "Emmanuel, which being interpreted is, God with us" [ibid. 23]: and the combination of this interpretation with the reason assigned by the angel of the Lord appears to fix the Christian sense of the name as that of "God the Saviour." So Mary said, "My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour" [Luke i. 46, 47]: and so St. Paul writes, "After that the kindness and love of God our Saviour towards man appeared" [Titus iii. 4].

The sanctity and majesty associated with this holy Name are clearly set forth by the same Apostle in Phil. ii. 9, 10, "Wherefore God also hath highly exalted Him, and given Him a Name which is above every name: that at the Name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father." In literal obedience to the implied injunction contained in these words, it has always been the habit of thoughtful and reverent Christians to make a genuflexion, or else to bow the head, whenever the Name of Jesus is spoken; and the latter gesture is specially enjoined in the Church of England by the eighteenth canon. The English calendar also contains a festival dedicated to "The Name of Jesus" on August 7th, which has been celebrated on that or some other day of the year from very ancient times.

A symbol of the holy Name, IHC, formed from its first three letters in old Greek characters, I H C, is well known, though some confusion has arisen from the substitution of the English or Latin S for the Greek C or Σ, and from the Jesuits' assumption of these modern letters for their badge and motto, in the form, I.H.S. Iesus Hominum Salvator.

JUDAISM. From the time of its inauguration amid the terrors of Mount Sinai, Judaism was marked as a temporary system, "brought in because of transgressions," and engrafted on the wide promise made to Abraham, that in him "all the nations of the earth should be blessed." The sacrifices that the Law prescribed, to be offered in the place which Jehovah should choose "to put His Name there;" the pilgrimages enforced upon every adult Israelite, three times in the year, to the national altar of his race; the definition of those holy times by the natural climate of Judæa; and numberless other particulars, showed that the Law could only be for a time. For if at some future period the knowledge of the Lord should cover the earth as the waters cover the sea, the local sacrifices must come to an end; the solemn pilgrimage must fall into desuetude; the thanksgiving feasts for the first ripened grain at Passover, for the corn crop gathered in at Pentecost, and for the oil and wine duly secured at the Feast of Tabernacles, must be ruled according to the peculiarities of other climates, and vary with the varying degrees of the ecliptic. The festal occupation of booths "sub dio," pleasant enough in a Syrian climate, would be of impossible observance in northern latitudes.

But such a false position ought never to have been taken up by the ancient people of God, for the terminable character of their religion was everywhere impressed upon it. The Sion to which all nations should flow [Mic. iv. 1, 2, 7; Joel ii. 28, iii. 16], as the Jews did to their high festivals, could only be understood in a figurative sense; as the creation of a new heaven and a new earth is manifestly symbolical, meaning that the narrower dispensation should be indefinitely widened out. The same sure word of prophecy at every step makes revelations that are incompatible with the maintenance of the Law. To invade the office of the priesthood was a capital offence [Numb. xvi. 40, xviii. 7]; yet prophecy speaks of a future dispensation, when priests and Levites should be taken out of every nation [Isa. lxvi. 21], with a high priest after the order of Melchisedek, who should bestow spiritual benedictions, and no longer offer the blood of bulls and goats. Prophecy itself should be enlarged out into a world-wide institution; and when the older vision and prophecy should have been sealed [Dan. ix. 24], its spirit should be poured out upon all flesh [Joel ii. 28, 29], so that the bond-servants and handmaids should be filled with it. The case is that Judaism such as Moses established is now nowhere to be found; an universal religion has succeeded it; and he that is not wilfully blind may see that such was God's good pleasure from the beginning.

And it might have been determined also by "à priori" reasoning that Judaism could only have a temporary character. It was in its institution adapted only to a small nation, "the fewest of all people" [Deut. vii. 7]; so small that a seal was perpetuated in their flesh, that they might not be lost among the nations of the world; so small that Herodotus, who gives minute details of the policy of the Egyptians, Assyrians, Persians, and other nations with which the Jews had been been brought into closest relations, says absolutely nothing of them. Everything in Judaism was cramped and limited, and by its very narrowness showed that it was only for a time. "God did not by it speak His mind to all, and so did He not in it speak out all His mind." [Barrow, Serm. on Creed, xv. 2.] Duties were enjoined that could only be discharged by the Jews; promises were made that were bounded by the limits of an earthly Canaan; they were dealt with as children, and led on to the hope of present reward, while rebellion was threatened with a withdrawal of the promised blessing. But nothing was openly revealed with respect to a future state of rewards and punishments, and that very defect shewed that some better covenant yet lay hid in the womb of time. The religion of Judaism was a mere system of fleshly justification, consisting wholly in matters of external observance, in washings and purifyings, in a costly ritual, and burdensome observances of times and places; their Passover was a thanksgiving feast in which the world at large could never be called to share. The Levitical tithe to be offered at the national sanctuary could never be a matter of œcumenic observance. The whole code had a private character, and could no more apply universally than any municipal law can be made a matter of imperial or international obligation. In its ordinances moral duties are sparingly enforced; the devotion of the heart barely indicated; the building up of the inner man as a temple of God wholly ignored; while such things as even heathenism knew to be non-natural to man, polygamy, divorce for any trifling cause, a morose spirit of retaliation and of bloodthirsty revenge, were connived at for the hardness of the Jewish heart, if not sanctioned by positive enactment, "concessa apud illos quæ nobis incesta" [Tac. H. v. 4].

The whole system also seemed to have been framed on a divine forecast of the peculiarities of the Jewish nation, as a people to whom the partial glimmering of dawn, and not the noontide light, was best adapted. Its mental attributes are as marked as its physiognomy; the first historian who mentions the Jew has photographed him with unerring fidelity, and describes him as one fitted only to live by himself apart from the rest of the world, with no active sympathies ranging beyond those of his own race; "apud ipsos fides obstinata, misericordia in promptu, sed adversus alios hostile odium, separati epulis, discreti cubilibus, projectissima ad libidinem gens, alienarum concubitu abstinent. . . . Judæorum mos absurdus sordidusque" [Tac. H. v. 5]. In a similar spirit Barrow has summed up the plea of humanity against the Jews: "Such are the obvious characters of them, such were their humours noted to be; humours, not only implausible but really blameable, deserved offensive and odious, being contrary to the common sense, to the natural ingenuity of man. They have been long, as we see them now to be, partly for the vanity of their conceits, partly for the baseness of their mind and manners, and partly also for the wretchedness of their condition, the scorn and obloquy of all nations. Now the tree which hath borne such fruits, so unsavoury, so unwholesome, we have no reason to admire, to esteem excellent and perfect. It might be good for those times, when men willingly did feed on acorns, on crabs, on brambleberries; but cannot so well serve now, when higher improvements of reason, when philosophy and learning by a general influence upon the world have prepared the palates of men to relish, the stomachs to digest more delicate and more wholesome fare" [Serm. on Creed, xv. 2].

The insufficiency of the Law has been so completely felt by the Jews that they have been compelled to supplement its defects. It did well enough for the time for which it was intended, but after that time it became obsolete, a law "à main morte."

It was not possible that the whole world should be brought within the pale of the Law, therefore a general return to spiritual religion was needed, if all the world was to have its blessing in the seed of faithful Abraham. The Law was given to Israel for the purpose of fencing him in from the idolatry of the surrounding nations; hence if those who were without the Law renounced their idolatry, and adopted the worship of Jehovah, the Law would no longer be needed as a fence. Irrespectively therefore of Revelation, it might have been determined by "à priori" reasoning that the Law must come to an end; both because its demands could not possibly meet with universal observance; and because its use as a pale of separation would be no more needed, when its own forecast of the future had been realized, and nothing remained to be fenced out of the sacred precinct. Again, if the Law was an excrescence engrafted on to the free unfettered form of patriarchal religion, the restoration of that free form might be expected under a better dispensation. And Revelation confirms the reasoning; for Moses claimed no exclusive allegiance. It should be extended at some future time, as he said, to the prophet like unto himself, whom the Lord should raise up; "unto him shall ye hearken" [Deut. xviii. 15, 19]. The Law also given in Horeb should make way for a better dispensation, and one "not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day that I took them by the hand to bring them out of the land of Egypt" [Jer. xxxi. 31-34]. The Law should continue to exist as a moral code; but its carnal ordinances should be spiritualized; the light that shone from the face of Moses [Exod. xxxiv. 29] should pale beneath the "bright cloud" of the Transfiguration [Matt. xvii. 5]. This temporary and local character of the Law compelled those who still clung to it, when its mission had been accomplished, to supplement its teaching, and adapt it by various glosses to the altered condition of Judaism. The vineyard fence had been thrown down as had been foretold [Isa. v. 5], and rubbish of whatever kind was used to repair the breach. Hence the false position of Judaism from the day of Christ to the present.

These glosses on the Law are scattered up and down the Talmud as various HALACOTH, or constitutions framed from time to time by eminent rabbis, and preserved by oral tradition. So long as it was unlawful to commit them to writing, they accumulated daily, and the latest of them when duly accepted obtained the same authority with the earliest; for all came to be regarded as contemporaneous expositions of the Law derived from Mount Sinai. In the tract Pesachim [lxvi. 71] it is said of the second of Rabbi Ishmael's exegetical rules [A.D. 121], "No one may rest his decision on 'Gezere Shave,' textual analogy, unless he have learned it from his teacher, who must have received it from his teacher, and so back from Moses and Sinai." But who was to prove the negative proposition, that the enouncer of an original exposition had not derived it from his predecessors, and yet carried it to the Sinaitic account? The Law in Talmudic parlance is not simply the Mosaic law, but also the oral law; ת"ש שבעל פה as well as ת"ש שבכתב; and the two together make up the law of which it is said, "The Law of the Lord is perfect converting the soul." Both are of co-ordinate authority as one Torah.

It was by means of the unwritten Law they say that the "Lex scripta" was explained to the people after the Captivity; for "they read in the Law of God [מפרש] explained" (not "distinctly," as the English Version, nor "interpreted," which would be מתרגם), "and gave the sense and caused them to understand the reading" [Neh. viii. 8]. Pace Rabbinorum, however, this passage is much more rationally interpreted of the origin of the Targums, or paraphrases of the sacred text, delivered at first orally, and eventually in the written forms that have come down to us. The Jews, however, hold that it applies to those exegetical glosses and interpretations of the Law that came down to Ezra from the time when Moses began to "declare the Law" to the people in the desert [Deut. i. 5]; that the same were handed on to after generations, and were eventually stereotyped in the Talmud.

But the Talmud, from the date of its completion, has by no means commanded universal loyalty. In the middle of the eighth century, the Karaite sect arose; so called from its reception of the text of Scripture alone, such as had always been read in the synagogue, while it rejected the traditional glossemata of the Talmud. This sect, therefore, is wholly separate from Talmudic Judaism. The Cabbalists also in their mysticism were always more or less at variance with the teaching of the Talmud; though in old days the two systems marched hand in hand. Akiba and Simon ben Jochai, Tanaim (traditionists) of renown, were the reputed fathers of the Cabbala; and many of the most learned rabbin were adepts in this Jewish form of Zoroastrian lore. [CABBALA.] In the middle of the twelfth century, Maimonides, the "second Moses," the "eagle" of Rabbinism, declared that the obedience required by the Law was not an observance of the letter, but conformity with its spirit. Hitherto a blind faith in the Talmud had been demanded of the Jew. He might ask "what" was commanded, but the "why" never. Before Maimonides was twenty-three years of age, he commenced his commentary on the Mishna in Arabic. The law of Moses and the philosophy of Aristotle, obtained through Arabic translations, were to him the sources of all knowledge and wisdom. His work betrayed as yet a rather nervous anxiety to find a deep meaning in the various puerilities of the Talmud. The "eaglet" had not yet gained his pinion feathers. The Mishneh Torah and Moreh Nevochim followed, works of Titanic grasp. In the first of these, the subjects of the Talmud are worked up in a spirit of rational exegesis, and the chaotic salvage of the Mishna and Gemara are brought into something like order. The work, as a commentary on the Talmud, was well received; though afterwards Talmudists attacked it for its rationalism, while the Averroist Jew found fault with it as not sufficiently Aristotelian. The Moreh Nevochim, a more important work than either of the preceding, was then taken in hand, but written in Arabic, with the Arabic title Dalila al Haïrin (guide for the perplexed). In this work, the Anthropomorphia of the Talmud is set right, and the same views of prophecy reappear that were condemned four centuries previously in the Karaites. The fullest freedom is claimed for man; and the reasoning power, now almost for the first time shewn by a Jew, caused Scaliger to say of him "primus inter Hebræos nugari desivit." Such are the principles of Judaism; such also is the direct opposition, or the loyalty with a difference, that they have encountered within the families of Israel. We proceed to consider Judaism as it presents itself in contact with the external world; and Judaism in the modes of thought that are now rapidly qualifying its first principles.

Judaism in history is as marked in its character as the Jew is in his features among the human brotherhood. Both have their one type of humiliation, as outcasts amid the nationalities of the world. Their admission in later days to social and municipal privileges may have softened down something of the extreme bitterness of their hate for Christianity, but the core of infidelity remains unchanged. The Jew, expectant of political existence, may have asserted, like Maimonides, that the world is greatly indebted to the Christian religion for reclaiming the wilder races of men from their idolatry and its accompanying horrors [Dr. Raphall, Rabbi of Birmingham]; but the deep feeling of Judaism still betrays itself in the assertion of Geiger [Lectures on Judaism], which any one who knows ever so little of the Talmud may prove to be false, viz., that our Lord never uttered anything new, all the good of His teaching having been derived from the rabbinate of His day. The same untruthfulness also lurks in the article on the Talmud in the Quarterly Review [October 1867], that has met with so much inconsiderate praise from Christian journalists.

The external history of Judaism in Europe presents much sameness. Usury and oppression, oppression and usury, are its tale. The first connection of the Jews with Britain within the limits of history, shows them as dealers in the slaves that Danes and Norsemen made from the coast population before the Conquest. Under the Normans they figured alternately as moneylenders and as the victims of their lordly clients. Risk of confiscation prevented Jews from embarking their capital in fixed occupations, such as manufactures and agriculture; they have been traffickers rather in the precious metals and jewels, property that is either easy of concealment, or light of transport. The Jews of Amsterdam have always been the lapidaries of the world. The most precious brilliants of Europe have been cut and split by them, the purest pearls are of their piercing. And as an accompanying circumstance, their trade as money-lenders has been a thriving one. In the old smuggling business, one successful run was found to cover a multitude of losses; so Jewish usury, seeing that repayment was a matter of expectation rather than certainty, has always been grinding to a proverb.

The rate of interest of two shillings per week, demanded on a loan of twenty shillings, or five hundred and twenty per cent. per annum, caused a massacre of seven hundred Jews in London [Stowe, A.D. 1262]. Shortly after every money-lending Jew was compelled to wear a plate of metal on the front of his dress, or to quit the realm. A.D. 1278, two hundred and sixty-seven Jews were hanged and quartered for clipping coin; and twelve years later, sixteen thousand Jews were banished the kingdom [Rapin]. This edict remained in force for three hundred and seventy years, till it was reversed by Cromwell, who, as a set-off for ancient hard-usage, granted a state pension to Manasseh ben Israel.

The individual servility of the Jew contrasts strongly with the collective spirit and "thorough" quality that has distinguished the people in one or two passages of their history.

As in the siege of Jerusalem, thousands of families perished by self-immolation rather than encounter the brutalities of a Roman soldiery; so history tells us of the Rhenish Jews in the twelfth century putting to death first their wives and families, and then themselves, rather than fall into the hands of crusaders, whose plea for pillage and ill-usage was the destruction of the Holy Sepulchre by the Saracens [A.D. 1009]. Similarly five hundred Jews [A.D. 1189], in the reign of Richard Cœur de Lion, took refuge from a massacre in York Castle, where, rather than fall into the power of their persecutors, they slew their women and children, threw their bodies from the battlements among the besiegers, and then killed themselves; when, as usual, a general burning of bonds and securities followed.

Alternate proscription and recall mark the course of the history of Judaism throughout Europe; cupidity of rulers being in either case the moving impulse. The marks of degradation also were various. Louis IX. of France compelled every Jew, man, woman, and child, to wear a "rouelle," or wheel of conspicuously-coloured stuff on the breast and back of the dress, that the Hebrew might be known at a distance. Most German towns of importance had their "Juden Gasse" [Jew lane]; and some of these have still at either extremity the massive hooks on which the gates were hung that secured the inmates by night. So late as the time of Mendelssohn [A.D. 1729-1786], any Jew who journeyed from Amsterdam to Frankfort was compelled to make a detour of several miles at Cologne, it being forbidden for him to enter within the municipal boundary.

Down to the present day, on the last Saturday before the Carnival, the Jews at Rome are compelled to proceed "en masse" to the Capitol, and ask permission to remain in the sacred city for another year. At the foot of the hill the petition is refused, but, after much entreaty, granted on the summit, and the Ghetto is assigned to them. Elsewhere a reaction has long since set in. In France, one of the first acts of the Revolution was to declare the banished Jews of Spain, Portugal and Avignon to be citizens of the Republic. In 1806, the Emperor Napoleon summoned the Great Sanhedrim at Paris, and conferred upon the Jews of France a constitution which every succeeding government has recognised, while Belgium and Holland have also adopted it.

Moses Mendelssohn, the original of Lessing's Nathan der Weise, grandfather of Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy, may be regarded as the regenerator of Judaism in the present day. In his time, Rabbinism had sunk to its lowest ebb, the people had gravitated with their teachers deep in the slough of ignorance and superstition. It was the great work of the "third Moses" to build up the people; first to educate them, and then to lead them into position among the nations of Europe. As the bosom friend of Lessing, he was a pronounced rationalist; this only brought him into closer anology with Maimonides, whom he also resembled in his faint liking for Rabbinism, though he lived in all "faithful" Talmudic observance. His philosophy had points of similarity with Spinoza's system, but they were only such as both had derived from the philosophizing Rabbi of Cordova. He had more in common with Kant, of whom he was the immediate precursor. Mendelssohn did very much to kindle up something like thought among the most unintellectual of all religious communities, and brought the learning of Kimchi and Iarchi to bear once more upon the language and exegesis of Scripture. With him, as with every other Jew, religion was not a matter of faith but of practice. The law did not say, "this believe," but "this do." He considered the Talmud to be overrated; but it was not to be set aside on that account; it is hazardous to discard anything that is of established use until there is something better to supply its place. There can be no doubt but that, if he could have had his own way, he would have sifted out with a wide mesh all that is puerile and objectionable in the Talmud, and have given to the residue a more spiritual application, after the manner of the Moreh Nevochim of Maimonides.

In our own country, the strongly marked repugnance of Christianity for Judaism has been shown clearly in the history of the Removal of Jewish Disabilities. That which the people in its inmost heart has felt to be wrong, has been carried into execution, as will sometimes be the case, by the persistent efforts of politicians. The history of this political movement is briefly as follows:—On the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts [9 Geo. IV. 17 and 10 Geo. IV. 7], the Abjuration Oath and the Declaration substituted for the sacramental test being affirmed "upon the true faith of a Christian," debarred Jews from sitting in Parliament. This oath also, tendered at the hustings, deprived them of the franchise, while it wholly prevented them from practising at the bar, and from entering upon any corporate office or Crown appointment. The words in question were originally enacted in the beginning of the eighteenth century in order to secure the House of Hanover from the designs of the Pretender; they were no substantial part of the modern oath, but simply an emphatic form of asseveration. Various abortive efforts were made to remove this disability by bills introduced into Parliament; though in the meantime the annual Indemnity Act enabled Jews to pursue the profession of the law, and to fill such offices as sheriff, magistrate, and deputy-lieutenant. The Act 5 & 6, Will. IV. 36, for shortening the duration of polls, put an end to the unnecessary oath at the hustings, and in this indirect way the Jew became enfranchised. A Government bill in 1845 under Sir R. Peel enabled Jews to hold municipal offices; ten years later, Alderman Salomons was the first Jewish Lord Mayor; and it became only a question of time when the Jew should be admitted to a seat in Parliament. This was at length effected by a resolution of the House of Commons, July 1858; though it was not till 1860 that the disqualifying words were struck out from the oath that had hitherto prevented the Jew member from taking his seat.

The Jews of the present day have a literature of their own, which has brought them into closer relation with European thought of the liberal cast. The principal issue from the press, whether in point of date or of importance, has been Geiger's Zeitschrift für Hebr. Theol. [1835-1842]. It aroused opposition at once to what was thought a factious demand for reform; at the head of which was Raphael Samson Hirsch, Rabbi at Oldenburg. While the party of progress insisted upon a continued intellectual development, he maintained the perfectness of the Law, as that which, properly understood and worked into the inner life and being of Judaism, would secure the practical fulfilment of all social and civil duties [Hirsch, Horeb. 1837]. The worship of God, he said, was the highest act of piety, and all the more effective if united with a rigid self-denial. The cry for reform was pretentious, self-interested and reckless, and every faithful Jew should set his face against it. Civil equality would be dearly bought by the sacrifice of religious principle. Man's natural rights are of this world, his soul of religion is for the next. Regard for worldly advantage shews a want of self-discipline, and is therefore demoralizing, &c. The determination with which he defended the ground of prescription against the advocates of progress encouraged resistance to Geigerism. This war of opinion has led the younger Rabbin to introduce various reforms into the synagogal services, and greater attention has been paid to the education of the rising generation. But it is evident that the two schools can never be reconciled; the one must supersede the other; "Serpens nisi serpentem vorat non fit draco;" which is to be the rod of Aaron?

The Allgemeine Zeitung des Judenthums was started in 1837, by Ludwig Philippson, a well-known Jewish author [A.D. 1830-1860], who has contributed more than any one else to make Judaism intellectually respectable. His twelve lectures are worthy of attention. The Voice of Jacob and the Hebrew Observer, of the last generation, have given place to the Jewish Observer and the Jewish Chronicle, the present organs of Judaism in England. The Jewish Intelligence, published by the Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews, records carefully the various phases of Jewish opinion as they unfold themselves. L'Universe Israelite is published in Paris; and in Italy, L'Educatore Israelita. In Germany, Der Israelit was preceded by Stein's Volkslehrer in the reformed, and Hirsch's Jeshurun in the orthodox interest. A Jewish literature also has sprung up, to which the principal contributors have been the historian Jost, and the careful exponent of Rabbinism Zunz, Steinheim [Die Offenbärung, &c.], Formstecher [Rel. d. Geistes], S. Hirsch [d. Religionsphil. d. Juden], Hirschfeld, Creisenach, Hildenheim, Johlson, Herzfeld, Lusatto, Gratz, Löwenstein, Sachs, Dukes, Schultz, Frankel [Vorstudien zu d. Septuaginta and Intr. to Mishna], Fassal, Jellenick, Rapoport, and Steinschneider. Under this influence, Jewish liberalism has run wild, and has taken up the Pantheistic views of German Rationalism, while, as a matter of course, the hope of all antecedent Judaism has been discarded by many. Cassell's History of the Jews, in Ersch and Gruber [Encycl. vol. xxvii.], traces out the fortunes of the people in different countries in a fragmentary yet instructive manner.

In 1840 an association was formed at Frankfort, whose object was the abjuration of Talmudism. The three propositions that it adopted were: [1] That unlimited religious development is not inconsistent with the law of Moses; [2] that the compilation called the Talmud has no authority over the associated, either in a doctrinal or a social point of view; [3] a Messiah who is to lead back the Israelites to Palestine is neither expected nor desired by the associated; and they acknowledge that alone to be their country to which they belong by birth or civil relation. The movement was short-lived, but the avowal of these principles has had a permanent effect, and they are held by an increasing number of Jews at the present day.

Thus, in the summer of 1869, a meeting of Jews was held at Leipsic, at which eighty-four members of different Jewish congregations, including twenty-five rabbis, attended. The great object proposed was to get rid of the peculiarities of Judaism. The meeting pronounced for [1] individual authority in religious matters; [2] the primary importance of free scientific investigation; [3] rejection of a belief in Israel's restoration. The following resolution also was adopted: "Those portions of our prayers which refer to the re-establishment of annual sacrifices at the Messianic period, or to the return of the Jews to Jerusalem, must be modified." Orthodox Judaism has stood aghast at this enunciation of opinion; but has consoled itself with observing that the congregations represented but a very small percentage of German Judaism, and that no great significance attached to the meeting. Yet it would be difficult to produce eighty names from the orthodox party of greater learning in Hebrew matters. As to Messianic hope the Jewish Chronicle [July 30, 1869] says: "Although every Jew is bound to believe in a Messiah, the question whether that expression indicates a person or a time, and whether He or it has arrived or not is, according to the Talmud, an open question."

Judaism, as it now shows itself, may be devided into extreme right, extreme left, and centre. [1] Represents orthodox Talmudism subdivided into literal and modified observance; [2] embraces the reforming party, who would sweep away Talmudism and the ceremonial law; claiming to take their stand on "prophetism," i.e. a complete emancipation from religious thraldom, as their indefeasible right; and [3] is the more moderate party, which hopes to develope a higher spirituality from the old historic form of Judaism. With them the ceremonial law is valuable only as a hedge to keep the people apart from other forms of religion till the times are fulfilled. For Judaism, moving with Christianity and Mohammedanism in converging lines, is destined in the end, as they say, to lead to one form of transcendental truth, divested of external ritual; the sum and substance of which will be the national Shema, "Hear, O Israel; the Lord thy God is one Lord; the Eternal is one."

Such is the Jew of the nineteenth century, "semper idem," hardened in his infidelity, bigoted in his self-regard, and inveterate in his hate for the Christian name. [Jost, *Gesch. d. JURISDICTION, ECCLESIASTICAL. Some of the functions of the Crown of England are closely connected with the external government of the Church, and these constitutional functions are often called "the Ecclesiatical Jurisdiction of the Crown." What it is necessary to say respecting this jurisdiction will be found under the head of SUPREMACY, ROYAL: and it is only necessary here to warn the reader against confusing these with the more truly ecclesiatical function, which is treated of in the next article. Such a confusion is expressly guarded against, however, by the Thirty-seventh Article of Religion.

JURISDICTION, SPIRITUAL. This term is usually understood to mean the lawful authority and power exercised by the clergy, under a commission received from some competent source. But "jurisdiction" rather expresses the extent and the limits within which any functions of authority, legislative or executive, may be lawfully exercised.[1] Spiritual jurisdiction is, therefore, the definition of such extent and limits in respect to those functions which belong to "spiritual persons," that is, to the clergy; just as judicial jurisdiction would be a definition of those limits as regards the executive authority of magistrates and judges, or parliamentary jurisdiction a similar definition as to the legislative functions of Parliament.

Spiritual jurisdiction consists of two elements, the one essential, the other accidental. The essential element is usually termed "Habitual jurisdiction," the accidental element being called "Actual jurisdiction." These will be considered separately.

I. HABITUAL JURISDICTION belongs to the bishops and priests of the Church as the deputies of our Lord, the Supreme Head of the Church, and the ultimate source of all spiritual authority. It relates to the spiritual discipline of the clergy and laity, to the administration, or the withholding, of sacraments and sacramental ordinances, and to the general affairs of the Church as a spiritual body. Habitual jurisdiction is, thus, a result of ordination or consecration, an authority derived from Christ, the Supreme Head of the Church, by successive delegation through apostles and bishops [APOSTOLICAL SUCCESSION]; and is not, in reality, to be distinguished from the "power of order."[2] It extends the power and authority of one human being over others, so far as the supernatural power, and the disciplinary authority, of Christ is delegated to bishops and priests; it limits that authority and power strictly within those bounds: but it has, in itself, no local associations. It relates only to spiritual qualifications such as, e.g., enable a bishop to turn a layman into a priest, or a priest to turn bread and wine into the sacramental media of spiritual substance. But such spiritual qualifications belong to bishops and priests wherever they may be; and are neither annihilated nor diminished by any local circumstances or legislative limitations. So that whatever acts may be done by any bishop or priest, in any part of the world, by virtue of such qualifications, those acts are valid through the "habitual jurisdiction" which accompanies his ordination to the priesthood, or his consecration to the episcopate.

Thus, habitual jurisdiction is so associated with "order" that so far as Holy Orders are indelible so far also is this form of jurisdiction. Neither the civil nor the ecclesiastical power can extinguish it, though one may prevent it from being exercised by compulsory measures, and the other may forbid its exercise by a solemn judicial act. [DEGRADATION.]

II. ACTUAL JURISDICTION is the local limitation of habitual jurisdiction. It defines the boundaries within which bishops and priests are to exercise their functions, and so far regulates that exercise as to organize the work of the clergy for the common good. The different modes in which this has been carried out may be classified under four systems, the Apostolic, the sub-Apostolic, the Patriarchal, and the Papal: and, since priests are generally allowed to receive all the authority they possess by delegation from bishops, these four systems need only be considered here as they relate to the higher order. [PARISH.]

[1.] Apostolic system of jurisdiction. The Apostles derived their authority from our Blessed Lord, Who claimed the right to give it to them on the ground of His own universal authority, prefacing their commission with His own in the words, "All power is given unto Me in heaven and earth, Go ye therefore . . ." [Matt. xxviii. 18, 19]. In the commission thus given there is no reference to any local restrictions or divisions; nor to any distinction between the Apostles, as if one had received a jurisdiction of greater extent than another. It was, on the contrary, a commission of the same universal character in its degree as that which Christ Himself had received, a fact which is strongly illustrated by the form in which He put it on a previous occasion, "As My Father hath sent Me, even so send I you" [John xx. 21]; and also by the form in which it is given by St. Mark, "Go ye into all the world" [Mark xvi. 15]. Thus the kingdom of Christ which extended throughout the whole world was constituted into an Apostolic diocese, over which not one but all of the Apostles, individually and collectively, had spiritual authority given them. It does not appear, indeed, that our Lord intended the whole twelve Apostles to keep together during all the time of their ministry; and as He had sent them forth "two and two" during the time of His own ministry, so doubtless He meant them to go forth afterwards in small companies or separately, one Apostle to one part of the world, and another to another part. But whatever such subdivisions of the kingdom of Christ and the universal Apostolic diocese might seem expedient, the arrangement of their several fields of labour was left to the Apostles themselves, and was not ordained by our Lord; though, no doubt, special men were sometimes specially designated by the Holy Ghost to work in special localities, as was the case with St. Paul and St. Barnabas [Acts xiii. 2]. Thus the Head of the Church gave an universal mission and jurisdiction to the Apostles, leaving them to arrange among themselves any rules, boundaries, or limitations, that might be necessary for the sake of orderly labour; and to divide that labour so as to take in "the whole world." How their respective limits of jurisdiction were mapped out, or whether such limits were adhered to with strictness, we do not know enough of their fields of labour to determine. Yet traditions of some weight point out the different parts of the world in which the Apostles respectively carried on their work [APOSTLE]; and St. Paul uses language which seems to imply that he, at least, scrupulously abstained from intruding within the jurisdiction of any other Apostle [2 Cor. x. 13-16], where the word "rule" [κανὼν] points to a definite, mapped out, territory. We may thus conclude that the universal jurisdiction given to the Apostles individually and collectively by our Lord, was so exercised that each Apostle had his own particular jurisdiction, within which he laboured as in a territory appropriated to himself, and which no other Apostle would, ordinarily, work in. As their number was gradually diminished by death, the jurisdiction of the remainder would naturally expand, until, at last, St. John was left for many years as the sole living Apostle of the Church, when all Apostolic jurisdiction would, of course, be centred in him, for the remainder of his life on earth.

[1] Aulus Gellius, x. 16, xx. 10.

[2] Such distinction is made for the sake of supporting the theory that priests and bishops are the same as regards all points except jurisdiction: and that, hence, the former may confer orders. [See Field, On the Church, iii. 39].

[2.] Sub-Apostolic system of jurisdiction. It seems to have been during the time of St. John's sole Apostolate that the Episcopal system of the Church was finally organised, so as to become the permanent system of the Church after the temporary office of apostle had ceased to exist. It is in this sense, doubtless, that Tertullian says "the order of bishops, if traced back to its origin, will rest upon John as its author" [Tertull. adv. Marc. iv. 5]. Bishops had been ordained by St. Paul, and by the other Apostles; and they had been exercising their functions in all parts of the Church for many years before St. John became its sole Apostle. But the orderly rules by which a definite field of labour should be mapped out for each probably originated with St. John, who thus extended the apostolic system of jurisdiction into the diocesan system of jurisdiction. In the latter each bishop had his παροικία assigned to him, within which he had authority and beyond which he had no authority. He owned no superior except a council of bishops, and was looked upon as the temporal fountain of all spiritual authority within the boundaries of the territory placed under his charge.

This jurisdiction within the particular limits of his mapped out district was defined and settled by the act of consecration, in which the person consecrated received authority for ordinary ministration in a particular see, he who was consecrated for ministration in the See of Carthage having no jurisdiction in the See of Rome; he who was consecrated for ministration in the See of Rome having no jurisdiction in the See of Carthage. Thus the limits of a bishop's ordinary ministrations, or his actual jurisdiction, were formally assigned to him by the consecrating bishops; and jurisdiction being sometimes spoken of as an authority, instead of a limitation of authority, it may be said to have been "conferred" by the act of consecration, though this is not a strictly correct form of language. The boundaries of dioceses were arranged under the influence of geographical features, divisions made for purposes of civil government, and circumstances of mutual convenience,—more often the second than any other influence,—but when once arranged they were called by certain names, and the consecration of a bishop to the See of Rome, or the See of Carthage, was as well understood in respect to its jurisdictional force as is the appointment of a governor to the Cape of Good Hope, or to New Zealand. As the jurisdiction of the latter is fixed by the formal document which confers the governor's commission, so the jurisdiction of the former was fixed by the act of consecration which conferred the bishop's commission. No further commission was needed for "conferring" jurisdiction, and no further commission was given. A bishop was only consecrated at all because a particular see, that is a particular sphere of episcopal jurisdiction, was vacant; and when he was consecrated, he was consecrated to that particular see, that is to that particular sphere of jurisdiction. Thus his "habitual" jurisdiction was limited to "actual" jurisdiction in the very moment of its birth; and his "power of order" could be lawfully exercised beyond his own sphere of actual jurisdiction, only by the permission of any brother bishop within whose diocese he wished to exercise it; to act otherwise being to act schismatically. Within the bounds of his see each bishop had full authority, independent of all other bishops, for conferring orders, for calling synods, for exercising discipline, and for doing every other authoritative act that belongs to the office of a bishop. But all acts so done must be done with relation to his own diocese; no Bishop of Carthage ordaining priests for the diocese of Rome, nor a Bishop of Rome calling a synod for the diocese of Carthage.

That jurisdiction was thus settled by the act of consecration, and not by any separate or subsequent mode of "conferring" it, is clear from the disputes between those who opposed each other in their claims to particular sees, as, e.g., in the case of Cornelius and Novatian, who each claimed to be bishop of Rome. The point universally understood to be in question was not On which had jurisdiction been conferred? but Which had been lawfully appointed and consecrated [Cypr. ad Cornel. ep. xliv. al. xl.; ad Antonian. lv. al. li. sec. 24]. Further confirmation is given by the Canons of the Primitive Church, in which it is decreed that "If any one who has been ordained bishop does not undertake the ministry and care of the people which is committed to him [τὴν ἐγχειρισθεῖσαν αὐτῷ], let him be suspended until he undertakes it" [Canon. Apost. xxxv.; Canon. Antioch. xvii.]. Similar evidence is also afforded by the primitive office for consecrating bishops, in which the idea of full authority accompanying the reception of the episcopate is evident throughout [Gelas. Sacram., in Murator. i. 625, 626; Leon. Sacram., ibid. ii. 431].

The sub-Apostolic system of jurisdiction was therefore, essentially a "diocesan" system. Every bishop was ordained to a particular see; and thus, in the act of ordination, his jurisdiction was defined and limited within the bounds of that see. His "power of order" as bishop he received from the bishops who ordained him to his episcopal office; and from the same hands he received authority to exercise his office in all things pertaining to it, within the sphere of jurisdiction marked out for him as his diocese.

[3.] Patriarchal system of jurisdiction. As the number of dioceses increased by the subdivision necessary on the extension of the Church, it was found desirable to organize them in groups of larger or smaller number, under some one of their body, to whom a certain authority over the rest was assigned, who received the title of Patriarch in the case of the five principal divisions of the Church [PATRIARCH], and Archbishop or Metropolitan in subordinate divisions [ARCHBISHOP]. In the patriarchates or provinces so formed, the bishop placed above the rest has no more episcopal authority than any other bishop; he cannot do more than they in conferring on others the power and authority of the episcopal office: nor does actual jurisdiction—the ordination to a particular see—proceed more from his hands than from theirs. The "speciality" of an archbishop's authority above that of other bishops is that he can suspend the jurisdiction of any bishop within his province for a time, and act as its bishop himself; that he has a disciplinary authority over the bishops within his province; and that appeals can be made from them to him in some matters. In a higher degree the same remarks apply to the Eastern system of Patriarchs, a number of archbishops or metropolitans being included within a patriarchate.

This addition to the sub-Apostolic system was, therefore, a further organization of the diocesan system, and established a new jurisdiction, that of a chief bishop over ordinary bishops. But it made no change in the older system as regarded the reception of jurisdiction within a particular see by the rite of ordination or consecration to it. Because of the new and supplemental jurisdiction given to the chief bishop, he had the privilege given to him of taking part in the consecration of every bishop consecrated to sees within his province [Can. Nic. vi.; Can. Chalced. xxviii.]; and his assent thus became necessary: but this neither added to nor took away from the old jurisdiction belonging to every bishop. For even when an archbishop joins with other bishops in consecrating to a see within his province, the authority which he conveys is precisely the same—neither less nor more—as that which is conveyed by them, the authority which belongs to an episcopal consecrator.[1]

[1] It is observable that the Council of Chalcedon, when raising Constantinople to the dignity of a patriarchate, on account of its being the seat of government, expressly stated that the new jurisdiction was not for the sake of adding anything to that see, but for that of maintaining order in the dioceses placed under its rule, during vacancies by death, when clergy and laity were without a leader. [Ep. ad Leon., Labbe's Concil. iv. 837.]

The Patriarchal system of jurisdiction leaves the elder system untouched, therefore, so far as the authority by which a bishop is sent to exercise his office within his diocese is concerned; that authority being still given by the collective act of all the consecrating bishops.

[4.] The Papal system of jurisdiction. The modern theory of Roman theologians is that all spiritual authority whatever flows from the fountain of the See of Rome, the Pope being universal bishop, and other bishops having no true jurisdiction unless they receive it mediately or immediately from him. Great as the pretensions of the Roman bishops have been, almost from primitive times, this theory was never heard of before the twelfth century, and is a mere invention of Italian theologians, whose interest it has always been to exaggerate the importance of the See of Rome, and who have resorted to this and equally discreditable fictions for the purpose of doing so. However strongly such a theory may be maintained in the present day, or whatever strong language may be found in support of it in Roman writers of the last few centuries, it is utterly condemned by the fact that not a trace of such a principle is to be found for more than a thousand years. And especially, as regards the Church of England, it may be observed that during the whole of that thousand years, only one bishop, Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury [A.D. 668], was consecrated by a pope, that particular consecration being also the result of entirely accidental circumstances.[2]

The only historical support for any such theory of jurisdiction as that maintained by Ultramontane divines, is the fact that archbishops were presented with the pall (an ornamental vestment still figuring in the armorial bearings of English archbishops) by the Pope. The voluntary acceptance of this honorary decoration was gradually turned into a compulsory one, and the Roman theory became that it conferred authority from the Pope, and that if it was withheld, then the alleged archbishop (however duly consecrated) had no jurisdiction. But ecclesiastical history shews that this was one of those gradual encroachments which culminated in the extravagant claims of the Hildebrandine period, and that the reception of the pall was for many ages merely regarded as a brotherly recognition given by the see which was always held in high respect, and from which such a recognition would always be considered a mark of honour.

There is no true historical ground whatever for the papal system of jurisdiction: and, although it is of course one that the collective episcopate of any other church can accept, and act upon, if it should seem expedient to do so, there is abundant reason why it should be rejected, if such rejection should be thought expedient and right, as is the case with the Episcopate of the Church of England.

[2] It may be noticed that the succession of the English Episcopate is chiefly derived from Archbishop Berthwald [A.D. 693-731], that of Theodore having almost, if not quite, died out within his own lifetime.

III. Jurisdiction of English Bishops. The archiepiscopal system has been in use in the Church of England at least since the time of St. Augustine [A.D. 595-606]; but it is probable there were metropolitan bishops in the more ancient episcopate, even if they had not the title that was assumed by him for the See of Canterbury. Advantage was taken of disputes about elections, and consequent appeals to Rome, to introduce the papal system, the first occasion on which the Pope gave any actual confirmation to an election, being in the case of Richard, successor to St. Thomas in the See of Canterbury, A.D. 1174.

The manner in which he interfered with the jurisdiction of English bishops during the next three centuries is matter of history; as is also the final rejection of papal jurisdiction by the Church of England in A.D. 1534. During the last three hundred and thirty-six years (with the exception of Queen Mary's reign), the ancient system of jurisdiction alone has been in force, that of which the substantial part has been here called "sub-Apostolic," and with the supplementary addition of the provincial, or "archiepiscopal system." During the reign of Henry VIII. and Edward VI., letters patent were issued by the Crown, confirming the inherent jurisdiction of the bishops: but these "commissions," as they have sometimes been called, were dropped as an unnecessary surplusage when the papal system had been thoroughly eradicated, and none have been issued for the last three hundred and twenty years.

The actual jurisdiction of English bishops is therefore defined by their consecration to the sees to which they have been elected and confirmed; and in the case of translations, the election, confirmation, and enthronization are a formal transference of jurisdiction from one diocese to another. From the mission thus given to bishops, is derived that given to priests by institution; and, in a lesser degree, by license to a curacy. [Diocese. Parish. Cure of Souls.]

JUSTIFICATION. Two senses have been assigned to this word, both of which are sanctioned by the usage of Holy Scripture. First, to declare righteous by acquitting or absolving in a legal sense from the charge of sin, which is called imputative or forensic justification. This use of the word is found in Rom. iii. 22-25, iv. 3, 6, 8; Phil. iii. 9. Secondly, to pronounce a man righteous as designating his real state or condition, when so made by the gifts of grace, which is termed inherent righteousness. The following passages clearly prove this sense: Luke xviii. 14; 1 Cor. iv. 4; Rev. xxii. 11; being declarative of a real, though imperfect righteousness in the persons justified. It is frequently used in the same sense in the Old Testament [LXX.] Psa. cv. 31 (ἐλογίσθη εἰς δικαιοσύνην); Dan. xii. 3; Ezek. xviii. 9.[1]

[1] Grotius, in his prologue to the Epistle to the Romans [Commentary on the New Testament], proves that such is frequently the scriptural meaning of the word, and shows that Rabbinical writers generally understand it in the same sense. See also Bellarmine, De Justificatione, lib. ii. c. 3.

The proper meaning of the word λογίζομαι, to impute, used by St. Paul, is to reckon, or put something to the account of another. Christ's atoning merits are thus in a certain sense placed to our account, and become, as it were, our own: we are debtors to God's justice: the debt is paid by our Lord, and thus we are acquitted from the charge or obligation. "Through this man," says St. Paul, "is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins: and by Him all who believe are justified from all things, by which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses" [Acts xiii. 38, 39].

But the dispute respecting the proper meaning of δικαίω in Scripture, whether forensic, or as declaring and founded on a real fact or truth, becomes, on looking at its general teaching, a mere logomachy, since we are expressly told that God will not "justify the wicked" [Exod. xxiii. 7], and that "he that doeth righteousness is righteous, even as He is righteous" [1 John iii. 7], "not the hearers of the law," says St. Paul, "shall be justified before God, but the doers of the law shall be justified" [Rom. ii. 13].[2]

In illustrating this doctrine, we have [1] to inquire into the conditions of justification, [2] the instrumental cause, [3] the means by which we continue in a justified state and attain eternal life: and a few remarks will be added on the apparently contradictory teaching of St. Paul and St. James on the subject.

[1.] The Apostle St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Romans [iii. 4], dwells at length on the fallen and lost condition of mankind before the coming of Christ, and shews the impossibility of justification by the law of nature or of Moses. He says: "We have before proved both Jews and

[2] Knox, in his Remarks on Justification [Letter to D. Parkin, Esq.; Remains, vol. i. p. 256], shews that the Fathers, even according to the admission of Milner, the Calvinistic historian, held the doctrine of inherent righteousness. They generally, says Milner, from the first century to the Reformation, confounded justification with sanctification. Faber, in reply to the Remarks of Knox, wrote a work entitled The Primitive Doctrine of Justification [1837], in defence of the forensic view—that God first, through faith, acquits us from guilt, or declares us righteous, and afterwards makes us such. He attempts to prove that both Knox and Milner have mistaken or misrepresented the teaching of the Fathers, who really, he says, from the Apostolic age, held the doctrine of forensic and imputative justification. Faber—who quotes numerous extracts from the Fathers for the first five centuries, laying especial stress on the testimony of the Apostolic age—fails to prove his theory, as Dr. Newman shews from an examination of a passage which Faber quotes as very important and conclusive from St. Clement's Epistle to the Corinthians, which he misunderstood, and mistranslated. Nor, as Dr Newman says, are his subsequent quotations more satisfactory [Lectures on Justification, app. p. 434, &c.]

The teaching of the Fathers on the subject is given by Bishop Bull, in his defence of his Treatise on Justification. He quotes passages from St. Irenæus, Origen, St. Cyprian, St. Hilary, St. Basil, Tertullian, St. Ambrose, St. Chrysostom, St. Augustine. His quotations generally may be considered as shewing that when the Fathers speak of faith, or faith only, justifying, they speak of it in a complex sense, or in union with good works (repentance and love). Also in some extracts given, the connection of faith with baptism is implied, for "faith," as St. Basil says, "is perfected by baptism, and baptism is founded on faith" [Apol. pro Harmonia, sect. iv.].

Justification

Gentiles that they are all under sin, . . . that every mouth may be stopped, and the whole world may become guilty before God." He then reveals the Gospel mode of justification: "But now the righteousness (or justification) of God without the law is manifested, being witnessed by the law and the prophets, even the righteousness of God which is by faith in Jesus Christ unto and upon all them that believe."

Faith in Jesus Christ is thus the preparation for, and condition of, justification: "believe on the Lord Jesus Christ," says the same Apostle, "and thou shalt be saved." Faith is here set before us as the foundation of all Gospel righteousness; we must, ere we can become members of Christ's Church, rely upon His word and teaching, and thus faith is necessarily the first step to the kingdom of God: he that cometh unto God must believe "that He is, and that He is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him." Whatever might be the prejudices of education, or of a corrupt state of heart and life, which prevented the Jew or heathen from embracing the Christian religion, it was only through faith they could be overcome; and such faith then, besides a mere intellectual assent, must also have been a persuasion of heart which enabled him to submit unreservedly to the teaching and requirements of the Gospel—the obedience of faith. Faith thus implied a preparation of heart, the most difficult though indispensable condition ere the sinner could come to Christ. The healing by our Lord of bodily disease typified the healing of the soul. "Believe ye that I am able to do this?—according to your faith be it unto you" [Matt. ix. 28, 29]. And St. Paul, looking on the cripple at Lystra, saw that he had "faith to be healed" [Acts xiv. 9].

Hence we find that, although justification is always represented as a free gift, not to be purchased by man's deservings, yet that faith is the indispensable condition for our receiving it; it would be impossible to imagine how this divine gift could otherwise be bestowed or received. It was faith only which could open a sinner's eyes to perceive his need of the blessings of redemption, which could enable him to feel his fallen and lost condition by nature, and realize the greatness of a Saviour's love; and could also teach him the need of a change of heart and life, his only means of shewing forth gratitude for the mercies of redemption, and his love to Him Who had thus loved him and given Himself for his salvation. Hence repentance is also brought before us as a condition of justification. St. John the Baptist said, "Repent ye, for the Kingdom of Heaven is at hand" [Matt. iii. 2]. Our Lord preached, "Repent ye, and believe the Gospel" [Mark i. 15]. His disciples also "preached that men should repent" [Mark vi. 12]. Before His Ascension, He commanded that "repentance and remission of sins should be preached in His Name among all nations" [Luke xxiv. 47]. "Repent," says St. Peter to the Jews, on the day of Pentecost, "and be baptized in the Name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins" [Acts ii. 38]. Thus repentance is mentioned as one of the conditions of justification, sometimes alone, though elsewhere joined with faith. Without repentance, no less than without faith, men were unfit to receive the Gospel gift of grace; and as regards those who were notorious sinners, as the Jews after the Crucifixion of our Lord, the duty of repentance is prominently urged. The mission of the Baptist was especially to preach this doctrine, to warn a sinful generation of God's terrible judgments—the axe laid to the root of the tree, and the unquenchable fire. The sinner was fighting against God; he must, therefore, lay down the arms of rebellion ere the offer of pardon and mercy could possibly be made or accepted. Repentance, like faith, was thus an indispensable preliminary to the pardon of sin and reconciliation with God. Nay, further, the two conditions may be said to interpenetrate and depend on each other. Hence we sometimes read of repentance, and sometimes of faith, "only," as the condition of justification. This is partly to be explained, as said before, by a reference to individual cases, that is, when either faith or repentance is especially required; but besides, the two conditions never are nor can be wholly separated. The sinner believing in Jesus Christ—in His atonement for sin and His promises of pardon to the penitent—has a motive most powerful and all-availing to repentance, which leads him to contrition for past sins as displeasing to God and injurious to his own soul. How can he indeed repent unless faith shews him the heinousness of sin in the sight of God, and assures him of His willingness to pardon it? The inseparability of the two conditions is also implied in the absolute and unreserved promise of salvation either to one or the other: "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved" [Acts xvi. 31]; whilst elsewhere we read, "God hath granted to the Gentiles repentance unto life" [Acts xi. 18], as if repentance were the only condition for the attainment of salvation. Faith and repentance are not to be viewed singly and separately, and as not really connected with each other, but in a greater or less degree are always united together as the conditions of justification.

II. The instrumental cause of justification is now to be considered. Justification is always spoken of in the New Testament in connexion with the gift of the Holy Spirit in baptism and our adoption into the family of God; sin is pardoned in the laver of baptism, and a new and regenerate nature given by the operation and infused gifts of the Holy Spirit; we are not only declared righteous forensically, or absolved from the charge of guilt through the atoning Blood, but are sanctified or made righteous by the infused gifts of grace. Hence justification is often viewed in connexion with the conditions of faith and repentance, and the baptismal gift of the Holy Spirit. Thus St. Paul speaks of the Gentiles receiving the promise of the Spirit through faith [Gal. ii. 3]. "Because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of His Son into your hearts" [Gal. iv. 6]. "Ye are justified in the Name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God" [1 Cor. vi. 11]. "In whom, after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise" [Ephes. i. 13]. "Arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins" [Acts xxii. 16]. "According to His merey He saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and the renewing of the Holy Ghost; that being justified by His graee, we should be made heirs aeeording to the hope of eternal life" [Tit. iii. 5-7]. "Ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus, for as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ" [Gal. iii. 24-27]. Thus Christians are washed, justified, and sanctified in the laver of baptism [1 Cor. vi. 11]; are "the workmanship of God created in Christ Jesus unto good works" [Ephes. ii. 10]; "dead unto sin," "free from sin," "alive unto God" [Rom. vi.]; "transformed by the renewing of their mind" [Rom. xii. 2]. "As by one man's disobedienee," says St. Paul, "many were made sinners, so by the obedienee of One shall many be made righteous" [Rom. v. 19]. Here, as Bellarmine argues,[1] the antithesis of the Apostle between Adam's sin and Christ's righteousness obviously implies, that as we really, and not by a mere figure, sinned in and through Adam, so we beeome really, through the gift and possession of holiness, righteous through Christ; the real righteousness of the baptized Christian corresponds with his real sinfulness in Adam.

From the passages quoted it is clear the gift of justifieation in baptism is not merely intrinsie, or the imputed righteousness of another, but the real bestowment of righteousness through the gifts of grace. Being engrafted into Christ, we are made new creatures in Him [2 Cor. v. 17; Gal. vi. 15]. Thus, when God justifies, He sanetifies; the two gifts are inseparable and coincident. We were by nature enemies to God, in baptism we became sons—not assuredly without an inward or moral change—God sending forth the Spirit of His Son into our hearts. The gift of regeneration thus necessarily implies our sanetification or renewal unto holiness.

III. The next inquiry is, by what means we eontinue in a state of justifieation. The reply is, by faith and good works. "The just," says St. Paul, "shall live by faith" [Heb. x. 38]; "the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God" [Gal. ii. 20]; "that Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith" [Ephes. iii. 17]; and he speaks to the Thessalonians of God "fulfilling the work of faith with power" [2 Thess. i. 11]. But we must earefully notiee what is often meant in Seripture, and especially in St. Paul's writings, by faith. The word properly or originally means belief, or an intellectual assent to the truths of the Gospel—a sense found in Scripture: thus the devils believe and tremble, and Simon Magus, hearing the preaching of Philip, believed. But the word is used in a widely different sense, when faith is spoken of as justifying or preserving us in a state of justifieation. Its true and primary meaning of an assent of the understanding is not lost, but transformed into a loving and eonfiding affection of the heart: we believe as before, but we now also love and trust in our Redeemer. [Faith.] "With the heart," says St. Paul, "man believeth unto righteousness:" the work of faith, he teaches, is to realize the indwelling presence of our Lord; hence we love and rely upon Him, look to Him for the supply of every want, and strive to please and obey Him, and by this blessed union and eommunion are transformed as it were into His very likeness. "I live not," says the Apostle, —as if personal identity could no longer be recognised—"but Christ liveth in me." This is the faith whieh preserves us in a state of aeceptanee with God—a realizing the privileges of our regenerate state—"dwelling in Christ and Christ in us." It is that faith, as the Apostle says, whieh "worketh by love" [Gal. v. 22]; is quiekened and made fruit-bearing by love. Belief and love are thus intimately and indissolubly united in justifying faith, and mutually strengthen and increase eaeh other. The Apostle speaks to the Ephesians of Christ dwelling in their hearts by faith [Ephes. iii. 17], and then, as if the words were interchangeable, or at least intimately eonnected—one suggesting and bringing before him the other—he adds, "that ye, being rooted and grounded in love, may be able to eomprehend with all saints," &e. Thus faith is viewed by St. Paul as living or fruit-bearing. St. John also says, that "whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is born of God; and he that loveth Him that begat"—believing and loving, being inseparable—"loveth him also that is begotten of Him."

But the Scriptures also expressly declare that good works are required as a condition for our continuanee in a state of justifieation and the attainment of eternal life. Good works are neeessarily the fruits of a true and living faith, but lest we should deeeive ourselves by a mere notional or imaginary faith, they are expressly stated to be indispensable to our justifieation and salvation. Our Lord's deelaration is most emphatic: "Every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down and east into the fire" [Matt. vii. 19]. The man who heareth His sayings and doeth them is eompared to one who built his house upon a rock, against which the floods and storms beat in vain: but he who heareth his sayings and doeth them not, is eompared to a man who, without a foundation, built his house on the sand, which was overthrown, and great was the fall thereof [Matt. vii. 24-27]. And from His aeeount of the Day of Judgment, we know that they who have done certain good works—eited in illustration of Christian duties generally—will go into life everlasting; and they who have left them undone, will be cast into everlasting fire [Matt. xxv. 31-46]. "If a man loves Me," He says, "he will keep My words: he that loveth Me not keepeth not My sayings." "Herein is My Father glorified that ye bear mueh fruit, so shall ye be My disciples" [John xiv. xv.]. St. Paul also declares that to them who, by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory, honour and immortality, God will render eternal life; and that not the hearers of the law are just before God, but the doers of the law shall be justified [Rom. ii. 7, 13]. "Circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing, but keeping the commandments of God" [1 Cor. vii. 19]. "Be not deceived, God is not mocked, for whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap" [Gal. vi. 7]. Justification by works, either as preserving us in a state of acceptance with God, or as the title to an eternal reward, has been supposed to imply, in an unscriptural sense, the meritorious acts of good works, as if the faithful Christian had thus a strict claim or title to eternal happiness; but this inference is a mistaken one. The Christian is only entitled to future happiness on account of God's promises; for we know that He is faithful Who hath promised. The term "merit" applied to good works is unobjectionable if rightly understood, and is often used by the Fathers:[1] we are rewarded according to the merit of good works, that is as they deserve. They can only be done, let us remember, through grace and faith in Christ; and God accounts the fruits of His gifts of grace as being our own merit or deserving. Thus justification by works, whilst assuring us of the absolute necessity of a holy and obedient life for our acceptance before God, neither teaches us to rely upon them in disparagement of His grace, nor, strictly speaking, as claiming a reward from God.[2]

[1] "Quomodo multæ mansiones apud Patrem, nisi pro varietate meritorum" [Tertull. advers. Gnosticos Scorpiacum, c. vi.]. "Credimus quidem posse apud Judicem plurimum martyrum merita et opera justorum" [St. Cyprian, de Lapsis]. "Misericordia et gratia convertit hominem . . . ut justificetur impius, hoc est ex impio fiat justus, et incipiat habere meritum bonum quod Dominus coronabit quando judicabitur mundus" [St. Augustine, Epist. 204, Valentino].

[2] The formal cause of justification, that which constitutes or makes it what it is, has been a subject of dispute: whether we are justified through Christ's merits imputed to us, or through the believer's own imperfect righteousness. Strictly speaking, the formal cause cannot be man's righteousness as being defective and imperfect, and thus needing pardon, and which can only be meritorious in any sense through God's power and gift, and through the atonement and righteousness of Christ. The believer's righteousness indeed is real and inherent, but cannot, for the reason given, considered per se, be the cause of justification. The formal cause is twofold: our Lord's merits and the Christian's imperfect works or obedience. There has been, as Holy Scripture teaches, a mysterious transference of the sins of the guilty to the Innocent One, typified by the scape-goat, upon which the sins of the Israelites were laid, and also as expressly stated by Isaiah, "the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all: He hath borne our sins in His own body on the tree: by His stripes we were healed" [Isa. liii.; 1 Pet. ii. 24]. The teaching of Scripture on this subject we cannot fully understand in all its bearings, nor must we attempt, by our own comment or inferences, to represent it as being clearer or more definite than it really is: as it must also be received in connection with, or explained in accordance with, other declarations of the Word of God with which it is in intimate union. Hence must be rejected the Calvinistic theory of imputed righteousness, apparently sanctioned by passages referred to, but really setting aside the fundamental teaching of Scripture [IMPUTED RIGHTEOUSNESS]. Our sins have been laid on Christ, and it is only through His stripes that we were healed; but this is not the whole teaching of Scripture on the subject: certain conditions are required on our part ere the gift of pardon can be obtained, and even forgiveness, though granted through the atoning Blood, may afterwards be cancelled or finally withheld, as in the case of the unforgiving debtor [Matt. xviii. 34]. But, whilst protesting against a modern perversion of scriptural teaching, it is allowed that this mysterious truth of our Lord's bearing our sins on the Cross, affords to the faithful Christian an assured ground of comfort and confidence. Even saints, when looking at God's infinite holiness and the imperfection and worthlessness of their best services, have felt that the only assured source of hope and comfort is the precious blood-shedding on the Cross. Thus Hooker, after saying that he had served God in his youth and after life, adds: "If Thou, O Lord, be extreme to mark what I have done amiss, who can abide it—for I plead, not my righteousness, but the forgiveness of mine unrighteousness, for His merits who died to purchase pardon for penitent sinners."

But attention must also be called to another view of the subject before us, which sets aside the teaching of Scripture that faith and repentance are required as the conditions of justification in baptism. According to this theory, faith at all times, and per se, is the only condition of justification. Thus a baptized person falling into sin, can always, by an act of faith, apprehend or appropriate to himself the righteousness of the Redeemer, and is hereby justified before God. This theory, probably invented by Luther, is thus set forth in his Commentary on the Galatians. He speaks of Christ "upon whose shoulders lie all the evils and miseries of mankind, the law, sin, death, the devil, and hell; and all these do die in Him, for by His death He hath killed them. But we must receive this benefit of Christ with a sure faith. For like as neither the Law nor any other work is offered unto us but Christ alone, so nothing is required of us but faith alone, whereby we apprehend Christ, and believe that our sins and our death are condemned and abolished in the sin and death of Christ." He then censures the "blind sophisters" who say that faith justifieth not except it do the works of charity (fides formata charitate). "To be brief, all the enemies which before did torment and oppress me, Christ Jesus hath brought to nought, 'hath spoiled them and made a show of them openly, triumphing over them' [Col. ii. 15]. By this we may plainly see that there is nothing here for us to do, only it belongeth to us to hear that these things have been wrought and done in us in this wise, and by faith to apprehend the same; and this is the true formed and furnished faith indeed."[3] Luther's theory may be thus stated in a few words: that there is an apprehensive power in faith which enables us to realize and appropriate to ourselves Christ's all-atoning merits—that when we feel the guilt of sin, we can triumphantly look to Christ crucified, Who by His Cross has taken it away. Thus by believing that our sins were pardoned, being borne in our stead by Christ, we become really, and can know and feel ourselves to be justified.

Perhaps a more unscriptural theory has seldom been devised: this is clear from the inference obviously to be derived from it, that it wholly sets aside the duty of repentance. If a sinner, by faith, can thus know and feel himself justified, it follows that repentance is unnecessary—we really may "continue in sin," and "grace will abound." Besides, the theory before us is destitute of all scriptural proof: the Christian fallen into sin, is not told to apprehend Christ's righteousness for its pardon; nor do we there find any similar or synonymous expression. St. Peter says to Simon Magus, the first of whom we read as falling from, or unfaithful to, baptismal grace, "Repent, if haply the thought of thine heart may be forgiven thee" [Acts viii. 22]: St. Paul fears that the Corinthians, who had committed gross sins, had not repented of their wickedness [2 Cor. xii. 21]; and in the same Epistle speaks of "godly sorrow working repentance unto salvation not to be repented of" [2 Cor. vii. 10].

As regards this subject, we must carefully bear in mind the essential difference between the unregenerate state and that of baptized Christians. Throughout the Apostolic Epistles, the Christian state and its obligations are clearly designated by various, though accordant, phrases. The members of the Church, that is the baptized, had been, St. Paul teaches, justified "by faith," by "Christ's Blood" "reconciled" to Him, and "had received the atonement" [Rom. v. 1, 9-11]; "their old man was crucified with Him;" they "were saved by grace through faith" [Eph. ii. 8]; had been "enlightened, and tasted of the heavenly gift," and "received the knowledge of the truth" [Heb. vi. 4, x. 26]. Such is the usual phraseology of the Epistles addressed to all the baptized, clearly implying that they had received the grace of regeneration, and also the duties and obligations of their new and Christian state; and it must be remembered that Christians (i.e., the baptized), are now in the same position as those to whom the Epistles were addressed, and to them only the Apostle's exhortations are appropriate, or have any reference whatever. To view St Paul's teaching, when referring to the unregenerate few, or heathen, promising free and entire pardon through the all-atoning Blood, as if it were applicable to baptized Christians, is not only obviously unallowable, but has been the especial cause of Lutheran error in faith.

Nor is the need of repentance only, but that also of holiness or Christian obedience, is really set aside by this theory; since it represents justification as taking place before the works of faith are, or can be performed. We are said to be justified independently of them. Thus the inference is unavoidable, that good works are not indispensable to a state of justification or acceptance with God. On the contrary, it may be asserted, that man is never justified by the mere act of faith, even when preparatory to, and the condition of, holy baptism, since even before regeneration, repentance must accompany faith, and also, in some degree, love. Thus justification by a mere act of faith is impossible. After baptism, we are justified by faith and works, by a righteousness, that is, which is really our own and inherent in us, though wrought out by God's grace. The doctrine of justification by inherent righteousness, held by Bellarmine and Bishop Bull,[1] in opposing the theory before us, shews the absolute necessity of a life of Christian obedience: that we must abound in the fruits of righteousness to the praise and glory of God, ere we can now be in a state of acceptance with Him, or be fit for the happiness of His eternal kingdom.

A few remarks may be added on the apparent contradiction between the teaching of St. Paul and St. James on justification. St. Paul says that we are justified by faith without works [Rom. iv. 5], or the deeds of the law [Rom. iii. 28], and St. James, that we are not justified by faith only [James ii. 24]. Various theories have been proposed to reconcile the seeming discordance between the teaching of the Apostles: such as, that St. James speaks of justification before men, and St. Paul of justification before God; but this is irreconcilable with the manifest teaching of St. James. He and St. Paul both quote the same example of Abraham, and also speak of his justification before God; and both cite the same passage from Genesis, that faith was imputed to him for righteousness [xv. 6]. No doubt, if we consider faith according to the Lutheran or Solifidian sense, the Apostles do contradict each other, but viewing the word in its true sense, their teaching can easily be reconciled. St. Paul says that Abraham was justified by faith, by a fruit-bearing faith; and St. James, that he was not justified by a faith which was dead or without fruits. St. James does not deny that Abraham was justified by faith, though he says, "not by faith only;" nor does St. Paul deny that he was justified by works, since works are really comprised as necessarily accompanying, or produced from it, in St. Paul's meaning of faith. St. Paul, indeed, does not mention Abraham's works, as the subject did not then come before him: he was arguing in proof of the excellency of faith, which he shews had been witnessed by the Law and the Prophets—"the righteousness which is by faith of Jesus Christ." But St. James, with another object in view, does especially mention Abraham's works, and tells us that faith wrought with his works, and that by works was faith made perfect [iii. 32]—in other words, that his faith was fruitful, and thus justifying; was what the "blind sophisters," in Luther's phrase, called "formed faith" (fides formata charitate). No wonder the Reformer termed the Epistle of St. James "straminea Epistola"—an epistle of straw! As was observed, St. James had not the same object in view as St. Paul: his epistle was written after that of St. Paul, and there can be no doubt it was intended to oppose Solifidian errors which had arisen in consequence of, or endeavoured to gain a support from, the teaching of St. Paul.[2] He selects the instance of Abraham, which St. Paul had quoted,

[2] See Bishop Bull's Harmonia Apostolica, in which the apparent discordance of the teaching of St. Paul and St. James is examined and explained. Dr Cowe says: "That the Apostle (St. Paul) by justification by faith meant no more than either we are justified in an evangelical way, or more particularly by faith intended a practical belief, including evangelical obedience; and sceing, on the other hand, St. James, in affirming 'that we are justified by and guards his readers against a misapprehension of St. Paul's meaning. Hence also it is clear, as Bishop Bull and others have remarked,[2] that the works, and not by faith only'; by works means no more than evangelical obedience, in opposition to a naked and an empty faith; these two, so far from quarrelling, mutually embrace each other, and both, in the main, pursue the same design; and, indeed, if any derangement seem between them, it is most reasonable that St. Paul should be expounded by St. James, not ouly because his proportions are so express and positive, and not justly liable to ambiguity, but because he wrote some competent time after the other; and consequently as he perfectly understood his meaning, so he was capable to countermine those ill principles which some men had built upon St. Paul's assertions. For it is evident from several passages in St. Paul's Epistles that even then many began to mistake his doctrine, and from his assertions about justification by faith, and not by works, to infer propositious that might serve the purpose of a bad life [see Rom. iii. 8, vi. 1] . . . Against these men it is beyond all question plain that St. James levels his Epistle to batter down obscure language, or reasonings of St. Paul on this subject, should be interpreted by the plainer and more distinct teaching of St. James.

the growing doctrines of libertinism and profaneness; to shew the insufficiency of a naked faith, and an empty profession of religion, that it is not enough to recommend us to the Divine acceptance, and to justify us in the sight of heaven, barely to believe the Gospel, unless we really obey and practise it; that a faith destitute of this evangelical obedience is fruitless and unprofitable to salvation; that it is by these works that faith must appear to be vital and sincere." After quoting the examples of Rahab aud Abraham, as a proof that "faith is not of itself sufficient to justify us unless a proportionable obedience be joined to it," he concludes: "His meaning (St. James'), in short, being nothing else than that good works, or evangelical obedience, is, according to the divine appointment, the condition of the Gospel covenant, without which it is in vain for any to hope for that pardon which Christ hath purchased, and the favour of God, which is nccessary for eternal life." [Life of St. Paul, secs. 15, 16.]

K

KEYS, POWER OF THE. This is a symbolical form of expression used by our Lord respecting Himself, and also when promising His commission to the Apostles for the exercise of authority in the Church.

[1.] Our Lord says of Himself, "I am He that liveth and was dead: and behold I am alive for evermore, Amen: and have the keys of hades and of death" [Rev. i. 18]. And again, also, in sending the message to the Church of Philadelphia, He speaks of Himself as "He that hath the key of David, He that openeth, and no man shutteth; and shutteth, and no man openeth" [ibid. iii. 7; cf. Isa. xxii. 22]. A similar use of the expression is also found with regard to an angel descending from heaven with a delegated authority, who is said to have "the key of the bottomless pit, and a great chain in his hand" [ibid. xx. 1]. In these cases "the keys" are plainly symbolical of supreme power and authority. The first and last quotations refer to the power of our Lord, and of one sent as His deputy, over the bodies of those in the grave, the souls of those in hades, and the evil one in Gehenna. The second quotation is explained in the subsequent words, "I have set before thee an open door, and no man can shut it" [ibid. iii. 8], which are spoken to a Church respecting its probation, and imply that the way of salvation is opened, and is still kept open by the mercy of Him "that is holy, . . . that is true, . . . and that hath the key of David."

[2.] It is in a sense analogous to that immediately preceding that our Lord uses the same form of expression in the Gospels. On St. Peter's confession of our Lord's Supremacy and Divinity in the words, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God," Jesus replied with the memorable saying, "Thou art Peter; and upon this rock I will build My Church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven" [Matt. xvi. 18, 19; cf. xviii. 18; and John xx. 23]. In this case our Lord uses several figures which have each their distinct place in His words: and there is no good reason for making the figure of "the keys," and that of "binding and loosing" identical, as is mostly done by those interpreters who refer, one as well as the other, to the absolving power of the Christian ministry. While "binding and loosing" undoubtedly bear that sense, "the keys" seem rather to refer to the general ministry and government of the Church, in the same manner as when our Lord uses the expression with reference to Himself in the message to the Philadelphian Church. Such is the sense in which Hooker interprets the words. "Our Lord and Saviour, in the sixteenth of St. Matthew's Gospel, giveth His Apostles regiment in general over God's Church. For they that have the keys of the kingdom of heaven are thereby signified to be stewards of the house of God, under whom they guide, command, judge, and correct His family. . . . Their office herein consisteth of sundry functions, some belonging to doctrine, some to discipline, all contained in the name of keys" [Hooker's Ecc. Polit. vi. 4].

Roman divines maintain that the power of the keys was given to St. Peter alone, and not as the representative of the apostolate in general. If the passage in which the words respecting the keys are included had stood by itself this might have seemed reasonable; but "the power of binding and loosing" is also given in the same form of expression, "thou" shalt bind, "thou" shalt loose. When these latter words are repeated, however, they are used in the plural form, "Whatsoever ye shall bind . . . and whatsoever ye shall loose" [Matt. xviii. 18]; and it is most reasonable to assume that the plural form has a similar application to the former words, though it is not expressed. Some interpreters, however, consider that the promise was fulfilled to St. Peter individually, when he was, first of all the Apostles, privileged "to open the door of faith to the Gentiles" [Acts xiv. 27] by the baptism of Cornelius and his household; as he had opened the door to the Jews by his preaching at Pentecost.

KISS OF PEACE. [Osculum Pacis.; φίλημα εἰρήνης; signaculum orationis (Tertullian); and sometimes Pax.] A ritual usage symbolical of Christian love.

[I.] A ceremony connected with the celebration of the Holy Eucharist, and clearly of Apostolic origin. In 1 Thess. v. 26 (probably the first written of the Epistles of St. Paul), we find the command, "Greet all the brethren with an holy kiss" (ἐν φιλήματι ἁγίῳ). This command is repeated in 1 Cor. xvi. 20; 2 Cor. xiii. 12; Rom. xvi. 16; and by the Apostle St. Peter, who, in

1 Pet. v. 14, uses the expression, φίλημα ἀγάπης. As the early Christians were accustomed to "come together to break bread" [Acts xx. 7], so at this greatest service was given the kiss of peace as a symbol and pledge of unity among the "partakers of that One Bread" [1 Cor. x. 17]. It was a sign that they were "reconciled to their brother, before they offered the gift" at the altar[1] [St. Matt. v. 23, 24].

One of the earliest references to the custom is in St. Justin Martyr [Apol. i.]. "When prayers are ended," he says, "we salute one another with a kiss (ἀλλήλους φιλήματι ἀσπαζόμεθα); then bread, and a cup of (mingled) wine and water, is brought to the president of the brethren," &c. So also the Apostolic Constitutions [ii. 57] enjoin: "Let the men salute one another, and the women salute one another, with the kiss in the Lord."[2]

The position of the kiss of peace in the Liturgy varied in East and West. In the East it was before the oblation, as St. Chrysostom testifies (μέλλοντος τοῦ δῶρου προσφέρεσθαι) [De Comp. Cordis. I. iii.; Bened. 1718, vol. i. p. 127]. In the Liturgy of St. James it follows the Creed, in that of St. Mark it precedes it.

In the West it follows the act of consecration [Aug. Hom. lxxxiii. de Diversis, also Cont. Lit. Petil. ii. c. 23], whence probably Tertullian's name for it of "signaculum orationis," or "seal of prayer;" "osculum pacis quod est signaculum orationis," &c. [De Orat. c. xiv.] Tertullian condemns the refusal of the kiss upon private fast-days, and especially because, "whatever reason might be given for it, that reason could not override the observance of the command by which they were bidden to conceal their fasts." And the abstaining from the kiss, as he shews, at once revealed that they were fasting. On public and solemn fasts the kiss was authoritatively omitted, and especially on Good Friday, in remembrance of the kiss of the traitor.

One of the best examples of the rite is in the Mozarabic Liturgy [Neale, Essays, p. 155].

"Priest. As ye stand, give the peace.

"℟. Peace I leave you; My peace I give unto you; not as the world giveth, give I unto you.

"℣. A new commandment give I unto you, that ye love one another.

"℟. Peace I leave, &c.

"℣. Glory and honour be to the Father, &c.

"℟. Peace I leave," &c.

While this is sung, the Priest says: "Receive the kiss of peace and love, that ye may be fit for the holy mysteries of God." The people then gave the kiss.

In the Liturgy of Sarum (according to the general use of the West), the kiss of peace followed the prayer of consecration, coming after the triple repetition of the "Agnus Dei," and the commixture of the elements. The rubric is, "Diaconus a dextris sacerdotis ab eo pacem recipiat et subdiacono porrigat. Deinde ad gradum chori ipse diaconus pacem portet rectoribus chori: et ipsi pacem choro portent, uterque suæ parti, incipiens a majoribus," &c. The "pax" here referred to was a small tablet, often of silver, kissed first by the celebrant, and then by the deacon and people, this practice gradually superseding the primitive custom [Archæol. Journal. 1845, ii. 144]. In the rites of Sarum and Bangor, and in these only, there was also a kiss of peace, almost at the beginning of the office. After saying the "Confiteor," "Misereatur," and Absolution, the celebrant kissed the deacon and subdeacon with the words, "Habete osculum pacis et dilectionis ut apti sitis sacrosancto altari ad perficiendum officia divina." It was continued for a time in the Reformed Church of England by the Injunctions of A.D. 1548.

[II.] The kiss of peace was also one of the ceremonies which followed baptism. The neophyte, whether adult or infant, was received with this token of love on being admitted into the fellowship of the Church, a custom which is mentioned by St. Cyprian, St. Augustine, St. Chrysostom, and others.

KNEELING. The ordinary posture of the body at prayer. It has not only plain scriptural authority, but may be said to have its origin in the natural feelings of a reverent heart. When we approach "the majesty of the Great King," reason itself tells us that our position should be a humble one, that as suppliants we may be heard and answered. "O come let us worship," says the Psalmist, "and fall down, and kneel before the Lord our Maker. For He is the Lord our God, and we are the people of His pasture and the sheep of His hand" [Psa. xcv. 6]. At the dedication of the Temple Solomon "kneeled down upon His knees before all the congregation of Israel" [2 Chron. vi. 13]. At its re-building Ezra "fell upon his knees" [Ezra ix. 5]. Daniel "kneeled upon his knees three times a day" [Dan. vi. 10]. Our Blessed Lord Himself, in His agony, "kneeled down and prayed" [Luke xxii. 41]. The first martyr, St. Stephen [Acts vii. 60], St. Peter [Acts ix. 40], and St. Paul [Acts xxi. 5], also knelt in prayer.

In harmony with these examples, we find kneeling to have been, in early Christian times, "the most common and ordinary posture of devotion." Eusebius mentions how St. James, Bishop of Jerusalem, "was wont to go into the Temple alone, and there pray with such constancy upon his knees, making intercession for the sins of the people, that his knees were grown hard

[1] An illustration of its use will be found in the beautiful "Prayer of the Kiss of Peace" of the Coptic St. Basil (a modification of the Liturgy of St. Mark), as given by Neale [Introd. Hist. East. Chur., 455]. ". . . fill, O Lord, according to thy good pleasure, our hearts with thy peace, and cleanse us from all guilt and hatred, and deceit, and ill, and all mortal recollection of injuries. Make us worthy, O Lord, of saluting each other with a holy kiss, and of so partaking of it, that Thou mayest not repel us in judgment from Thy immortal and celestial gift. Through," &c.

[2] So also in the Liturgy of St. Clement (which closely follows the Constitutions), "Let the clergy kiss the bishop; and of the laity, the men the men, and the women the women" [Neale's transl. p. 76]. And the same injunction is found in the 19th Canon of the Council of Laodicæa; and the custom is also noticed by St. Cyril of Jerusalem in his Catechetical Lectures.

and callous as those of camels" [Ecc. Hist. ii. 23]. Other illustrations of the practice are extant in the Shepherd of Hermas, St. Clement, the passion of St. Ignatius, and St. Cyprian, and they might be multiplied in great number.

We must notice, however, that there were exceptions to this, which was the ordinary posture of devotion. On each Lord's day, and during the fifty days between Easter and Pentecost inclusive, prayer was offered standing, in memory of our Lord's Resurrection. "Die Dominica jejunium nefas ducimus, vel geniculis adorare. Eadem immunitate a die Paschæ in Pentecosten usque gaudemus" [Tertull. de Coron. Milit. iii.]. The custom is also mentioned by St. Irenæus, who derives it from apostolic authority. And the twentieth canon of the Council of Nicæa, in order to bring about uniformity of practice, orders that, during the season above-mentioned, and on the Lord's day, "prayers be offered to God standing." From this rule only penitents were excepted, and they "etiam diebus remissionis genua flectant" [Conc. Carth. iv. c. lxxxii.].

The eighteenth Canon of A.D. 1604 directs all to "reverently kneel upon their knees when the general confession, litany, and other prayers are read, . . . testifying by these outward ceremonies and gestures their inward humility."

KYRIE ELEËSON. Κύριε ἐλέησον—"Lord have mercy." A scriptural supplication of most frequent occurrence in the services of the Church; which, among some other liturgical formulæ, retained its Greek shape even in the Latin rite.

Its most frequent use is in the opening portions of the ancient liturgies. In that of St. Mark, we find three long prayers, each preceded by the threefold repetition of the Kyrie. In that of St. Chrysostom, the deacon offers ten petitions, and each is followed by the answering Kyrie of the choir. In the Apostolic Constitutions [lib. viii. c. 6], when the deacon bids the catechumens to pray, then all the faithful add for them this supplication. The deacon then says the prayer, and it is ordered "for each of those whom he addresses, let the people, and, before all, the children, say, 'Lord have mercy.'" [Neale's Prim. Lit. p. 88.]

In the West the Kyrie Eleëson and Christe Eleëson[1] were known as the lesser litany, and formed a part of the "Preces Feriales" of the Salisbury Portiforium, as they do now of our daily offices of prayer. "This," as Freeman observes [Princ. of Div. Serv. i. 363], "is to the prayer what the Gloria Patri is to the praise of the whole office; a prayer setting forth the tone and fixing the object of all the rest, and being addressed to the Holy Trinity. It was triple, as with us, at its first occurrence in the old Eastern offices; in our own it was threefold before the Lord's Prayer at Lauds, though ninefold at Prime."

To that prayer, it may be added, it is an almost universal introduction, being so used in our daily offices, in the litany, in the offices for matrimony, churching, visitation of sick, and burial of the dead, and in the commination office.

As it is used after the decalogue, at the beginning of the communion office, it, to some extent, represents the Litany or Ectene of the Eastern Liturgies.[2] In the Sarum rite, after the Introibo there followed the Kyrie Eleëson, Christe Eleëson, Kyrie Eleëson, and then the Pater Noster and Ave Maria. These were said in the vestry whilst the celebrant and his assistants were preparing for the office, the Officium or Introit commencing the more public portion of the Liturgy. In the Prayer Book of 1549 the Kyrie occupied a similar position, but following instead of preceding the Introit.

[1] The suffrage Christe Eleëson is not used in the East. "De hac voce" (i.e. Kyrie Eleëson), says Martene, "notanda sunt maxime. Kyrie Eleëson autem nos neque diximus neque dicimus sicut a Græcis dicitur: quia in Græcis simul omnes dicunt, apud nos autem a clericis dicitur, a populo respondetur: et totidem vicibus etiam Christe Eleëson dicitur, quod apud Græcos nullo modo dicitur" [De Antiq. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. c. iv. art. 3].

[2] On "double festivals" it was sung in an expanded form. For examples of this see Maskell's Anc. Liturg. p. 23. Two are given in Blunt's Ann. Book of Com. Prayer, p. 167, from a missal of 1514.

L

LABARUM. The name applied to the banner or military standard of the Roman Emperors from the time of Constantine. Sozomen [Hist. Ecc. i. 4] calls it λάβωρον; Prudentius and other Latin writers, Labărum. Its etymology is very obscure; and various guesses about it may be seen in Gretser [De Cruce, lib. ii.], Ducange, &c. The earliest form of standard is said to have been a bundle of straw on the top of a spear or pole, to which succeeded such devices as the eagle, the wolf, &c. The cavalry standard (vexillum) was a square piece of cloth attached to a cross-bar, and perhaps surmounted by, or itself bearing, some device. From the minute description of Eusebius, who writes from personal inspection, we learn that the Labarum of Constantine was a gilt staff, with a crown of gold and jewels on the top; that on the crown or within it was the monogram  , and that beneath it was attached a transverse bar, so as to form with the staff the sign of the Cross. From this bar hung a square banner-cloth of royal purple, richly adorned with gold and gems, and terminating in a fringe. Immediately below this there were attached to the staff busts of Constantine and his sons [Vit. Const. i. 26]. Socrates mentions this splendid banner as being preserved in the royal palace in his time [lib. i. cap. i.]. Prudentius [lib. i. Contr. Symmach.] refers to the name of Christ as being inscribed on the cloth itself, and it is so represented on coins, which shew various forms of the monogram. There can be no doubt that the standard itself assumed various forms. The origin of the Labarum is to be referred to the vision and dream of Constantine, as related by Eusebius and other ecclesiastical writers. The story is, that as he was marching against Rome, A.D. 312, and feeling doubtful as to what course he should pursue, having often experienced too the powerlessness of the heathen gods to help in time of need, he betook himself to the God of the Christians; and having implored from Him some token for good, he and his soldiers saw, shortly after noon, a luminous cross in the sky bearing the inscription, EN TOYTΩ NIKA. Christ appeared to him in his sleep the same night, and shewing him again the sign he had seen in the sky, directed him to make a standard after the same pattern, and use it in battle as a defence against his enemies. Constantine at once obeyed, and sending for skilled workmen, had the Labarum made as above described. Eusebius states that he received the story from Constantine himself, who confirmed it with an oath, but he does not mention the place where the event occurred, nor does he appear to speak of it as a well-known matter of fact. It is strange that the account, if true, should rest solely on the credit of Constantine, and it may after all be a mythical mode of describing how the Emperor determined to support Christianity, and accordingly adopted the Standard of the Cross, which, when carried in battle, was defended by fifty youths appointed for the purpose. Julian the Apostate abolished the Christian Labarum and made use of heathen symbols instead.

It is perhaps worth noticing here that three crosses are the device upon the national flag of Great Britain and Ireland.

LAITY. This is one of the terms by which the body of Christian people has been constantly distinguished from those who are called to any office of the ministry as Christian clergy: and is equivalent to the other Scriptural names, "Faithful," "Saints," and "Idiotæ." The word is derived from λαὸς, plebs, the adjective form of which, λαϊκὸς, is found represented in the Latin laicus, and the English "lay." Λαὸς itself is used throughout the Septuagint as the equivalent of the Hebrew word עַם, Am.

The old Testament use of this word, in the sense of Jews who were not either priests or Levites, may be abundantly illustrated. Thus the priest is to receive a due from the laity that come to offer sacrifice [Deut. xviii. 3]: the "ministers of the house" [οἱ λειτουργοῦντες], in Ezekiel's vision of the new temple, are to boil the sacrifices of the laity [Ezek. xlvi. 24]. In time of joy, as when Asaph and his brethren had finished the psalm given to them by David, "all the laity said Amen, and praised the Lord" [1 Chron. xvi. 36]. In days of penitence, as when the law was to be restored by King Josiah, the priests, and the prophets, and the laity, small and great, went up with Josiah to the renewal of the covenant [2 Kings xxiii. 2, 3]: or as when there was unreasonable mourning on a holy day, at Ezra's similar restoration of the law, "the Levites stilled all the laity" and bade them feast and be joyful [Neh. viii. 11]. So also Isaiah recognised the distinction in the words, "As with the laity, so with the priest" [Isa. xxiv. 2]; and Hosea, when he wrote, "And there shall be, like laity, like priest" [Hos. iv. 9].

In the New Testament the same verbal form of distinction between the Jewish priests and the Jewish laity is found, as, e.g., when it is said that while the Apostles "spake to the laity, the priests . . . came upon them" [Acts iv. 1]: but the distinctive New Testament names for the Christian laity are FAITHFUL, SAINTS, and IDIOTÆ or unlearned, as will be seen under those words respectively. The term itself is, however, found in use for the Christian laity before the close of the Apostolic age; for when St. Clement of Rome, the friend of St. Paul, writes to the Corinthians respecting the order of the Church, after saying that the bishops, priests, and deacons each had their respective positions and duties, he adds, ὁ λαϊκὸς ἄνθρωπος τοῖς λαϊκοῖς προστάγμασιν δέδεται, "the layman is bound by the laws which belong to laymen" [Clem. Rom. ad Corinth. i. 40]. A little later, St. Cyprian uses the words "clerus" and "plebs" as designating the two bodies which constitute the Christian community [Cypr. Ep. lx.]; Tertullian condemns the heretics who confuse the different offices of the clergy, and allow even the laity to minister as if they were priests [Tertull. de Præscript. xli.]; and the Apostolic Canons speak of the clergy and the laity as a familiar distinction [Canon. Apost. lxiv. lxv.]. The same designation of the laity as the non-clerical part of the Christian body is very frequently found, indeed, in the two early Fathers quoted, and in all others, the above quotations being given only as illustrations of a form of speech which was as common in their day as it is in our own. [LAY CO-OPERATION. LAY PRIESTHOOD.]

LAMBETH ARTICLES. Nine "theses" or "propositions" arranged at a private conclave of Calvinistic divines held at Lambeth Palace in November 1595, and intended (under the sanction of Archbishop Whitgift) as a means of quieting theological discussions which were then disturbing the peace of Cambridge University. Archbishop Whitgift and Bishop Fletcher were the only members of the Episcopal body who had anything to do with these "articles;" they were not brought before Convocation, they were not accepted by the University for which they were intended, nor by any other public body, and as soon as they became known beyond Lambeth Palace and Cambridge, they were suppressed by the Archbishop himself at the command of the Crown. The temporary sanction of an archbishop gave, however, a fictitious importance to these nine propositions, so that in after years it was the custom of the Calvinistic party to speak of them as if they had at one time been an authorized formulary of the Church of England, and as if they still possessed a quasi-authority which entitled them to regard. On this account, and because they shew in a small compass what are the leading tenets of Calvinism, some notice of them is here necessary.

The Cambridge controversy out of which the Lambeth Articles arose may be stated in a few words. During the greater part of the reign of Queen Elizabeth the University had been in the hands of ultra-Calvinist Divines, who were so tenacious of their peculiar tenets respecting Election and Predestination, that they actually obtained authority from Archbishop Whitgift for making an inquisitorial search in all private studies for books and papers supporting opposite opinions [Strype's Life of Whitgift, 438]. When the reaction came, as come it always must in any such cases of tyranny, the Calvinistic leaders, headed by Dr. Whitaker, the Regius Professor of Divinity, made a fierce and ungenerous attack upon Dr. Baron, the Margaret Professor of Divinity, for maintaining that God created man for eternal life, that Christ died for all men, and that any who fail to be finally saved fail through their own sin, and not from being predestined for eternal damnation by an eternal decree of their Maker and Redeemer. Baron was driven from his professorship, but his opinions spread among the younger Cambridge men; and an appeal was made to Whitgift by both parties in the case of a fellow of Caius, named Barrett, who had defended those opinions from the University pulpit. After much correspondence between the Archbishop and the University, a conference between them was determined upon, and several Calvinistic heads of houses accompanied Dr. Whitaker and Dr. Tyndal, Dean of Ely, to Lambeth for the purpose of consultation with Whitgift.

Here they were met by Dr. Vaughan, afterwards Bishop of Bangor, and Dr. Fletcher, recently translated to the See of London; and after a few days, certain propositions offered by Whitaker were modified into the form in which they have been subsequently known as the Lambeth Articles. The following is an English version of them:—

I. God has, from eternity, predestined some persons unto life, and some persons He has reprobated unto death.

II. The moving or efficient cause of predestination to life is not the prevision of faith, or perseverance, or good works, or of anything which exists in the persons predestinated, but the sole will of God's good pleasure.

III. The number of the predestinate is predetermined and certain, which number it is not possible either to increase or diminish.

IV. They who are not predestined to salvation will, by necessity, be damned on account of their sins.

V. True, living, and justifying faith, and the sanctifying Spirit of God, is not quenched, is not extirpated, does not vanish away in the elect, either finally or completely.

VI. A truly faithful man, that is one, endued with justifying faith, is certain, by the full assurance (plerophoria) of faith, concerning the remission of his sins and his eternal salvation through Christ.

VII. Saving grace, by which they may be saved if they will, is not imparted, nor communicated, nor granted unto all men universally.

VIII. No man is able to come to Christ, unless it be given him, and unless the Father has drawn him. And all men are not drawn by the Father that they may come to the Son.

IX. It is not placed within the will or power of every man to be saved.[1]

These Articles were revived at the Hampton Court Conference [A.D. 1604], when the Puritans pressed for their incorporation into the text of the Articles of Religion. This proposal was, happily, not carried into effect. They were again revived by them, however, in Ireland, and were incorporated with the Irish Articles of A.D. 1615, which remained in force until A.D. 1635, when the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England were adopted by the Church of Ireland.

LAPSED. Those Christians who had not strength to encounter persecution; who complied in some form or other with the demands of the heathen magistrates to take part in idol-worship; "they which for a while believed, but in time of temptation fell away." As the persecutions ceased, the greater part of those who had lapsed would seek reconciliation with the Church. In the first ages, such penitents were upon their confession readmitted by imposition of hands. Confessors, who had suffered in such times of trouble, had the privilege of issuing letters of peace [LIBELLI PACIS] to the lapsed, which facilitated their early reception to communion. But such penitents were ineligible for holy orders, and if already ordained they were deposed, not being allowed to resume their clerical functions, but suffered only to remain in lay communion. By degrees these letters of peace were given too freely; and as the number of the lapsed became very large in the more severe persecutions, it was found necessary to insist that their readmission should not be made too easy. In the middle of the third century, a famous dispute arose on this question. Although of universal interest, the controversy was carried on chiefly at Carthage and Rome. Decius [A.D. 249 or 250] had ordered all Christians to sacrifice to idols. Cyprian was at the time bishop of Carthage, and had withdrawn from the city while the persecution was at its height. In his absence, one of his presbyters, Novatus, irregularly admitted many of the lapsed, and opposed the instructions of his bishop to restore to full communion (for the present) only those who were "in extremis." On Cyprian's return, he convened a council, and it was decided that the less guilty should be at once admitted, if penitent, and that those who had fallen further from the faith should go through a prescribed course of penance. The authors of the late schism were all, moreover, excommunicated. At Rome, at the same time, was a presbyter, Novatian, who contended for extreme rigour towards the lapsed, and refused to restore them to communion on any terms. A council at Rome confirmed the decision of that at Carthage. Upon this Novatian founded a schismatical communion, known as the Puritans (καθαροί), whose main principle was this, the refusal to restore the lapsed to communion.

There were, of course, different degrees of guilt among the lapsed, and the circumstances of each case were taken into account when considering the amount of penance required before restoration to full communion. They were distinguished by the following names: [1] The Libellatici held a testimonial from the magistrates, saying they were not Christians, or that they had complied with the edict by sacrificing. Corrupt magistrates often gave these certificates to facts not true; and their purpose was probably answered if they could make out large lists of Libellatici, as attesting the triumph of heathenism over Christianity. [2] The Sacrificati had actually sacrificed; that is, had taken part in the idol-worship, or partaken of meat offered to idols. [3] The Thurificati had offered incense on the altar of some idol. [4] The Idolatri, or Blasphemati, had formally denied Christ. There were also [5] the Mittentes, those who procured a deputy to offer sacrifice for them. And in later times, apparently first in the persecution of Diocletian [c. A.D. 300], occurs a new class, [6] Traditores, who had surrendered the Church property, or the sacred writings.

Peter, Bishop of Alexandria [A.D. 306], drew up some canons for his own diocese, still extant, regulating the conditions for readmission of the lapsed. And the 60th canon of the Concilium Agathense [A.D. 506] treats also De Lapsis. It prescribes a penance of two years, with fasting every third day. [NOVATIANISM.]

LAST JUDGMENT. [SECOND ADVENT.]

LATITUDINARIANISM. A school of thought in the Church of England, the principles of which are protested against in the Eighteenth Article of Religion, an article exceptionally guarded by an anathema,—"They also are to be held accursed that presume to say, That every man shall be saved by the law or sect which he professeth, so that he be diligent to frame his life according to that law and the light of Nature. For Holy Scripture doth set out unto us only the Name of Jesus Christ, whereby men must be saved."[2] This article is somewhat loosely worded, but by comparison of the language used with the use of similar language in the New Testament, it will be plainly seen to amount to a statement

[1] The original Latin of these articles is given in Cardwell's Documentary Annals, ii. 30, and in Hardwick's History of the Articles of Religion, App. v.

[2] It will not be out of place to give here also the propositions on this subject denounced as erroneous by Pope Pius IX.:—"Indifferentism; Latitudinarianism—Every man is free to embrace and profess that religion which, guided by the light of reason, he shall consider true. Men may, in the observance of any religion whatever, find the way of eternal salvation, and arrive at eternal salvation. Good hope at least is to be entertained of the eternal salvation of all those who are not at all in the true Church of Christ. Protestantism is nothing more than another form of the same true Christian religion, in which form it is given to please God equally as in the Catholic Church." [Authorized translation. In Appendix to Acta Synodi Diœcescos Suthwarcensis, p. 166.]

that salvation is only to be obtained within the boundaries of the Church. Thus, Holy Scripture shews that—

The Name of Christ is set forth, . .	John iii. 36, xiv. 6; 1 Tim. ii. 5, 6; Acts iv. 12; 1 John v. 12.
for salvation in and through the Church, and that . .	Mark xvi. 15, 16; Acts ii. 37, 38, 47; Col. i. 18; Ephes. v. 23.
therefore, without the Church is no salvation . . .	Mark xvi. 16; John iii. 18, 19; Luke x. 16; John xii. 48.

The ultimate principle of Latitudinarianism is the negation of all objective truth in matters of religion: the practical expression of this principle being found in some form of belief and practice which esteems creeds as formularies based on insufficient evidence; ecclesiastical organizations as mere human institutions; and salvation as dependent on morals, subject to the voice of conscience.

But Latitudinarianism has most frequently stopped short of these definite propositions, and rested in a theory or practice of religion which has made its chief object the adoption of a form of Churchmanship whose chief characteristic is that it cannot be defined with clearness or certainty. Such Latitudinarianism may be in theory as well as in practice, or in practice only. In the former case those who profess it hold, in terms which no one would dispute, that the truth revealed by Christ must be believed, and that heresy perils man's salvation, but they evade the force of these propositions by a narrow definition of the "truth revealed by Christ." Such truth is not held to be conterminous with the Creed: some articles of the Creed are only private opinions of men, and heresy is accordingly only the denial of those articles which they allow to have been clearly revealed. In the latter case, although there is no open repudiation of the Creed as the expression of revealed truth, there is in practice a neglect of the connection between sound doctrine and a good life, an undervaluing of the necessity of strict dogmatic theology, a too exclusive insisting on the ethical side of Christianity, in short, a want of zeal in contending for the faith.

It will be found that while Latitudinarianism admits a high strain of teaching regarding the working of God's Spirit on the soul, the effects of that teaching are weakened, and the doctrines of spiritual religion imperfectly presented by the comparative neglect of the holy Sacraments. The immediate influence of the Holy Spirit on the individual soul is the principal theme: and little attention is paid to the indwelling of the Spirit in the Church, to the membership of the Christian in Christ's Mystical Body, to the earthly mysteries or means of appliance with which the Church is divinely furnished for imparting the virtue of heavenly things to all her members. [See Mill's Sermons on the Nature of Christianity, ser. ii.] The reasonableness of Christianity, and the motives supplied by Christianity, are put forward rather than its true spiritual powers.

This school or party in the Church of England may be dated from Chillingworth and Hales of Eton: the latter, indeed, may be taken as a type of the earlier Latitudinarian party. Brought up in Calvinism, he was converted to Arminianism by attending the Synod of Dort, and fairly represents those who emancipated themselves from Calvinism by the help of Grotius. His tract on schism recommends that outward union which is founded on suppression of the truth. He writes: "Why may I not go, if occasion require, to Arian churches, so there be no Arianism expressed in their liturgy; and, were liturgies and public forms of service so framed, as that they admitted not of private and particular fancies, but contained only such things as in which all Christians do agree, schisms on opinion were utterly vanished." Arianism and the Nicene faith are to be left out of the liturgy as particular fancies, in order that all Christians may agree.

If we add to Hales' theology, first, the greater depth of thought arising from an assiduous and affectionate study of Plato and the Neo-Platonists; secondly, the greater depth of spiritual religion (in one department at least) which is gained when the mind so roused is thrown again upon Christian doctrine, as containing the satisfaction and complement of Platonism; and, thirdly, the element of a subdued mysticism which such a course of study engenders, then we have the somewhat later school, the Cambridge Latitude-men, or Platonists. They were Arminians, but not trained in a Church school, with a large addition of Greek philosophy. Their greater vigour and earnestness prevented their Latitudinarianism reaching so far as that of Hales. The chief men of this school were Cudworth, Henry More, John Smith, Worthington, Bishop Wilkins (though he did little in theology), and Theophilus Gale. Their teaching runs thus: The end which all parts of the Christian mystery point at, is the advancement and triumph of the divine life; the animal life, and a middle life, whose root is reason, being from the powers of the natural man; the divine life, which is the light and purification of the eye of the mind, being from an obediential faith in God: the branches of the divine life are humility, charity, purity. The Gospel is a mighty engine for this purpose; its powers are the Passion, Resurrection, Ascension of our Lord, and future judgment. These furnish proofs, supply motives, give pledges; and the assistance of the Holy Spirit is given: but there appears to be a flinching from "the power of Christ's resurrection and the fellowship of His sufferings."

"When reason is raised by the mighty force of the Divine Spirit into a converse with God, it is turned into sense: that which before was faith becomes vision. We shall then converse with God τῷ νῷ, whereas before we conversed with Him only τῇ διανοίᾳ, with our discursive faculty, as the Platonists were wont to distinguish. Before we laid hold on Him only λόγῳ ἀποδεικτικῷ, with a struggling, agonistical, and contentious reason, hotly combating with difficulties and sharp contests of diverse opinions, and labouring in itself in its deductions of one thing from another; we shall then fasten our minds upon Him λόγῳ ἀποφαντικῷ, with such a serene understanding, γαλήνῃ νοερᾷ, such an intellectual calmness and serenity, as will present us with a blissful, steady, and invariable sight of Him." [John Smith, Discourses, edit. 1821, p. 19.]

Enough has been said to shew the position of these distinguished men in English Church history. The power of Calvinistic Puritanism was broken partly by the revival of Church teaching in the line of Hooker, and partly by foreign Arminianism, or Christianity according to Grotius. But Grotianism could not hold its ground between Church teaching on the one hand, and the remaining Calvinism on the other hand; and the position of the Arminians was strengthened by an alliance with Platonism. The school thus formed has doubtless been of use in the Church. Both Roman law and Greek philosophy enter into the presentation of the Gospel to the world; and in forming the general mind and tone of thought of English Churchmen, the teaching of More and Smith has contributed no unimportant element.

Professor Maurice observed that this school is more properly Cartesian than Platonist, being far more busy about the soul than about its objects, and therefore in their ethical system sliding into the Aristotelian doctrine respecting the distinction between the absolute and the practical, and teaching how to form habits rather than to rest in principles. [Moral and Metaph. Philosophy, Encyc. Metrop. ii. p. 656. See Stewart's Essay on Metaph. Philosophy, pp. 58, 61, notes, and note O, p. 246.] Malebranche leads from Descartes to the Idealists, Arthur Collier, and Norris of Bemerton, with whom as a distinct body the school may be said to close.

LATRIA. By common consent this word is restricted to the service and worship due to Almighty God, and to Him alone.

The distinction between Dulia and Latria is of ancient use in the Church, and it is futile to argue against it from etymological considerations, for in language there is always going on a desynonymizing process; and the Church is at liberty to define the terms it uses. Augustine writes: "Sed ea servitus, quæ debetur hominibus, secundum quam præcipit Apostolus servos dominis suis subditos esse debere, alio nomine Græce nuncupari solet; λατρεία vero secundum consuetudinem, qua locuti sunt qui nobis divina eloquia, aut semper, aut tam frequenter ut pæne semper, ea dicitur servitus quæ pertinet ad colendum Deum" [De Civitate Dei, x. cap. i.]. Daillé allows that in the fourth century the Fathers of the Church recognised this distinction.

In the theology of the Romish Church this distinction is clearly drawn out. St. Thomas Aquinas teaches: "Dulia per quam homini similitudinem dominii participanti cultum exhibemus alia virtus est quam latria, per quam Deo verum et plenarium dominium obtinenti, cultum et honorem deferimus." [Secunda sec. quæst. ciii. art. iii.] In accordance with which Latria is not divisible into several species, since God, its only object, is One. Dulia, "communiter sumpta," is so divisible, although, "stricte accepta," it is the reverence of a servant to his lord.

It is not infrequent with English controversialists to make light of this distinction, to urge that Hyperdulia cannot but pass insensibly into Latria. If it were said, however, that it is difficult to distinguish between Dulia and Hyperdulia, that the former passes insensibly into the latter, the assertion would be more just and more reasonable. For the further extension of the word Dulia, by which it includes the reverence due to the highest created beings, as well as the reverence due to man, is only an extension of degree: whereas, between Latria and Dulia, even in its highest form, there is an essential difference in kind. As the object of worship, so the worship. The distance between God and the highest created being is infinite, and the worship due to God differs in kind from the reverence due from one creature to any other creature whatsoever. In this latter, in Dulia, the mind does not rest on the object, but passes beyond it to the One Source of the communicated greatness which is reverenced. In the former that One Source is directly the object of worship: there the mind rests. This ultimate reliance, this faithful resting on the object, appears to be the essence of Latria.

Expressions and forms of reverence, then, are not to be interpreted as implying this highest worship, unless there be in the offerer a distinct and conscious assignation to the object of his worship of the incommunicable attributes of God. Without this it is to be supposed that the difference between the Creator and the creature is present to his mind; and his language, which is necessarily for the most part, if not always, language common to the two forms of worship, is to be interpreted by the nature of the object to which it is addressed.

The principal application of these observations will be found under the title MARIOLATRY.

LAVIPEDIUM. The ceremonial washing of the feet. At one time it was very generally practised before baptism, but this custom was not long retained. By some the ceremony was rejected lest it should seem to belong to the Sacrament.[1] It was forbidden by the Spanish and Romish Churches, and formally interdicted at the Council of Eliberis [A.D. 305]. At Milan it was always practised, and St. Ambrose defends their retention of the rite, although the Church of Rome, "cui typum in omnibus sequimur et formam," had discontinued it.[2] In connection with Maundy Thursday the usage has, in many churches, been continued to this day. In imitation of our Saviour's washing His disciples' feet, those of the highest rank, sovereigns, cardinals, bishops, or abbots, used to wash the feet of the poor. The Church of England now considers the command to refer to the love and humility expressed by the act, and not to the act itself. Nor is this a new interpretation. Durandus says that of all the commands of God this is the only one that is not to be taken literally.[1] And St. Augustine, while urging the desirability of the practice, admits that it was not universally acknowledged as of obligation; they who are truly humble obey the command in their hearts, if not with their hands.[2]

Several ancient offices for the ceremony are extant. In all the main idea was the same. One of the Church of England in the tenth century has this rubric: "Procedit Dominus episcopus cum omni alacritate . . . . . ad locum ubi mandatum perficere vult." The prayer after the gospel was this:—"Deus, cujus cœnam sacratissimam veneramur, ut ea digni inveniamur, munda nos quæsumus a sordibus peccatorum, qui ad insinuandum humilitatis nobis exemplum, pedes tuorum dignatus es hodie lavare discipulorum. Qui cum Patre et Spiritu Sancto vivis."[3] The girding with a towel was always part of the function. So in the office for Pedilavium in the Roman Missal[4] is this direction: "Superior . . . præcingitur linteo, et sic præcinctus, . . . accedit ad lotionem pedum et per ordinem dispositis iis, qui lavandi sunt, clericis pelvim et aquam ministrantibus." The antiphon seems always to have been "Mandatum novum do vobis ut diligatis invicem." Perhaps the most imposing ceremony connected with this usage was at the great Benedictine house at Mont Casini, where [c. A.D. 1015] some monks from Jerusalem had brought an alleged fragment of the towel which our Lord Himself used. A miracle is recorded to have attested its authenticity.[5] A beautiful casket was presented by a noble Englishman, and every year at Maundy, "singulis annis ipso die Cœnæ Dominicæ ad mandatum," it was brought forth and placed in the midst; two lights were lit before it, and it was incensed during the whole Maundy by an acolyte, and, finally, kissed by the whole house. In the Cluniac houses the numbers who presented themselves for the Lavipedium were so great as to render it impossible for the abbot by himself to perform the ceremony.

It appears that those whose rank imposed this duty upon them would discharge it wherever they happened to be, and would not of necessity keep their Maundy at their chief official post. Thus Queen Elizabeth [A.D. 1572] performed the office at Greenwich, where she washed the feet of thirty-nine poor people, the number corresponding to her own age. And Cardinal Wolsey [A.D. 1528] kept his Easter at Peterborough,[6] and on the Thursday "he kept his Maundy, washing and kissing the feet of fifty-nine poor people, and having dried them, he gave to every one of them 12d., and three ells of canvass for a shirt; he gave also to each of them a pair of shoes and a portion of red herrings." The last English sovereign who conformed to the practice was James II. But the lord high almoners continued it until 1731 at least, perhaps later; and the minor parts of the office which they used are still retained, and are in use on Maundy Thursday at Whitehall,[7] the almoner and his assistants being still girt with linen towels during the service.

LAW, CANON. This term, in its widest acceptation, is co-extensive with Ecclesiastical Law, properly so called, that is, with the self-ordained rule of government of any church, whether the same originate in any single ecclesiastical authority ("Decretals," &c.), or in the resolutions of an ecclesiastical assembly ("Canons"). In this wide sense, and with reference to the Anglican Church, the subject has been dealt with elsewhere. [LAW, ECCLESIASTICAL]. But the term Canon Law is also applied by way of pre-eminence to a particular kind of Canon Law, viz., the body of those ecclesiastical enactments which, in the various ways to be hereafter pointed out, have been successively promulgated by authority in the Roman Church. This Canon Law consists essentially of three parts:—[1] The canons and constitutions of councils, or enactments made by the general body of the Church duly assembled; [2] Decrees, or judicial utterances of an ecclesiastical authority, promulgated by such authority of his own mere motion; and [3] Decretals, or judicial replies of similar authorities to cases submitted to them by members of the Church. The recognised digest of the Canon Law, the Corpus Juris Canonici, is (nominally, at least, and partially) divided according to this principle.

In the very earliest ages of the Church, questions of doctrine and discipline may be supposed to have been settled orally, when they arose, by the Fathers; at least, no authentic written memorials of such legislation are in existence. The earliest collection of written canons, the germ of the system of Canon Law, appeared some time during the third century, under the name of the Apostolic Canons. Its authorship has remained in doubt, though some writers attribute it to Clement of Rome.[8] One point, however, appears to be clear—that the collection is certainly not of Apostolic, or even sub-Apostolic antiquity. There is internal evidence that some, at least, of these canons were not known or accepted in the time of Origen.[1] And no mention of them is found in any writer of the first three centuries. The Greeks recognised eighty-five of these enactments as of canonical authority, the Latins fifty.[2] After the accession of Constantine, and when general councils of the Church began to be held, collections of their ordinances began to be formed both in the Eastern and Western Churches, increasing, of course, in size as time advanced. Amongst the Greeks there were four collections in existence by the end of the ninth century, which were considered of principal authority. [1.] A collection of the year 385, shortly after the Council of Constantinople, which is attributed to Stephen of Ephesus, and which received confirmation at the Council of Chalcedon. [2.] A collection of the year 451, attributed by some authors to Stephen of Ephesus, instead of the former.[3] [3.] A collection which received canonical sanction at the Council in Trullo [A.D. 692]. [4.] The great recension and collection made by Photius, Patriarch of Constantinople. Those of the Latin Church were three in number: [1.] A collection of the year 460, attributed by some to St. Leo. [2.] The Dionysian collection—collection of Dionysius Exiguus [A.D. 496], perhaps the most important of the Western collections. [3.] The Spanish, or Isidorian [Collectio Hispalensis], a collection made by Isidore, Bishop of Seville. It was on this collection that the celebrated body of false decretals was engrafted. [DECRETALS, FALSE.] These three collections constituted the materials from which Gratian, a Benedictine monk of Chieusi in Tuscany, compiled his first work, the Concordia Discordantium Canonum, which led him ultimately to the completion of that great codification of the then existing Canon Law which forms the Decretum, the larger portion of the Corpus Juris Canonici. This digest is divided into three parts, upon a principle of division somewhat similar to that adopted by Justinian in the Institutes. The first part deals mainly with the rights and duties of ecclesiastical persons, and is divided into one hundred and one heads, called "distinctions," under each of which are contained several canons. The second part of the Decretum contains thirty-six "causes," so called as being statements of particular cases, upon each of which Gratian raises and disposes of several questions. The causes are accordingly subdivided into "quæstiones," and these again into "canons." The third part is entitled De Consecratione. It is divided into five "distinctions," and is devoted exclusively to ceremonial matters. The compilation received pontifical sanction from Eugenius III. [A.D. 1151], and became the one authoritative statute-book of the Church up to that date.

The second and smaller portion of the Corpus Juris Canonici is the Decretals. This portion was added under Gregory IX. [A.D. 1230] by Raymond de Pennafort, a Spanish Dominican, who was selected by the Pope for this task; and it comprised all the additions to the Canon Law that had been made during the eighty years which had succeeded the publication of the Decretum. The materials at his disposal were contained in five collections of different dates, which alone, amongst numerous others, had obtained any authority. They were: [1.] The collection of Bernard de Circa, Bishop of Faenza [A.D. 1190], called the Breviarium Extravagantium. [2.] The collection of John de Salles of Volaterra [A.D. 1202], which was itself compiled from a collection made by the two canonists, Gilbertus and Alanus.[4] [3.] The collection of Peter of Beneventum [A.D. 1210], a recension of an earlier collection known as the Collectio Romana, the work of Bernard of Compostella. [4.] A collection of unknown authorship, published shortly after the fourth Lateran Council in A.D. 1215. [5.] The collection of Tancred of Bologna [A.D. 1216-1227], containing, in particular, the additions made to the Canon Law by the rescripts of Honorius III. Each of these collections contained respectively these additions made to the Canon Law which had been made since the publication of the last preceding one; and from a collection of all these was compiled that portion of the Canon Law known as the Decretals. It consists of five books, each of which is divided with reference to its subject-matter into titles and chapters. The first and second books are devoted to definitions of the position and functions of ecclesiastical persons of all grades, and to an exposition of the various forms of procedure in the spiritual courts. The third book treats chiefly of the temporal rights of the clergy, such as are involved in the ideas connected with the words benefices, tithes, and patronage. The fourth deals principally with the subject of marriage and its canonical restrictions. The fifth treats of ecclesiastical crimes and their canonical punishments and censures. Gregory IX. confirmed the Decretals in due course, and at the same time forbade any attempt to frame any other digest for the future without the permission of the Holy See. Before the conclusion of the thirteenth century, the constitution and rescripts of the succeeding popes had reached a considerable number, and about the year A.D. 1299 Boniface VIII. added what is called the Sixth Book of Decretals, a compilation which was the united work of William of Mandagotto, Bishop of Embrun, Beranger Feldoni, Bishop of Beziers, and Richard de Sienna, Vice-chancellor of the Roman Church. This, although nominally one book, is itself divided into five books, and these again are subdivided, like the earlier books of the Decretals, into titles and chapters. It contains, besides the rescripts of the various Popes from Gregory IX. to Boniface

In the nature of Decretals, and generally classed among them, though not bearing the same name, are the Clementine Constitutions, published by Clement V. A.D. 1317; the twenty constitutions known as the Extravagantes of John XXII.; and the six books of Papal Constitutions, from A.D. 1261 to A.D. 1283, known as the Extravagantes Communes. These complete the Corpus Juris Canonici, a work which was first authoritatively published in its present form under Gregory XIII. at the latter end of the sixteenth century.

LAW, ECCLESIASTICAL. English Ecclesiastical Law is a body of jurisprudence in which the traces of four distinct legal systems are discernible. These four systems are:

I. Civil Law.
II. Canon Law, which with reference to the present subject is subdivided into [1] Foreign, and [2] Domestic Canon Law.
III. The English Common Law.
IV. The English Statute Law.

The formative influence exercised by each of these several factors is, as will appear, by no means equal in amount, the first playing considerably the least important part in the formation of English ecclesiastical jurisprudence. Of the others, the canon law, and, in particular, that branch of it which has been distinguished as domestic canon law, represents the groundwork of our ecclesiastical law, properly so called; while the common law has operated as a factor, both by the incorporation of its own maxims and principles in the general body of the ecclesiastical law, and by the restrictive authority which it has exercised over the gradual growth of the other branches of the system. And, lastly, statute law has contributed its share, by giving legislative sanction to such of the rules and enactments of ecclesiastical law as may have been (or, by change of circumstances, may have become) of doubtful authority; and, in later times, by supplying the Reformed Church with State support for its formularies, and by otherwise confirming or modifying its rights.

I. Civil Law is the name which has been given, by way of pre-eminence, to the municipal code of the Romans. The form under which it has been handed down to modern times has been impressed upon it by the juridical skill of the later days of the Roman Empire; but, considered with reference to its contents rather than its arrangement, it represents the collective jurisprudence of Rome almost from its earliest days to its decline. Among its most ancient sources are the laws of the Twelve Tables. Subsequently to this famous and important code, there followed a long period (the "middle jurisprudence" of Justinian) during which the chief additions made to the law (other than occasional isolated legislative enactments) consisted of the Responsa Prudentûm, or answers of the Roman jurisconsults to legal questions put to them; which answers, like those of modern times, were really, under the form of interpretations of old law, promulgations of new. To these succeeded, under the Empire, the imperial constitutions and rescripts. The first codification of this great body of jurisprudence appeared in the Gregorian Code, the work of a jurist, Gregorius (whose exact date is uncertain), and embracing the period from Hadrian to Diocletian. This again was followed, under the Constantines, by the Hermogenian Code, which, in particular, contained the constitutions of Claudius, Aurelius, Probus, Caius, Diocletian and Maximian. The third code is known as the Theodosian Code, and was compiled by Theodosius the Younger. The fourth and final code was completed under the superintendence of Justinian, and is known as the Justinian Code. To this was added by that Emperor a Digest or Pandect, compiled by his direction from the Responsa Prudentûm of his own time; the Institutes, an elementary treatise on the Roman law; and the Novels, consisting of those new rescripts and constitutions which formed Justinian's own contribution to imperial jurisprudence.

The impress left by this famous system upon the civil laws of all European countries has been deep; and, by means of the influence exercised by it upon the Roman canon law, it has contributed indirectly to the formation of European, and, in so far as this latter is derived from any foreign source, of English ecclesiastical law. But of its direct influence the English ecclesiastical law shews traces in two only of its branches, and, of these, one at least can hardly be said to be otherwise than accidentally a subject of ecclesiastical jurisdiction. The civil law is supposed to have been first introduced into England during the subjection of the island to the Roman rule, and it is said that several of its great jurists, Papinian, Ulpian, and others presided here as judges. It is, however disputed,[1] whether and, if at all, to what extent, the Romans imposed their laws and procedure on the conquered Britons; but, amongst the Saxons, at least after their conversion, there is evidence of a tendency to adopt Roman forms and precedents in the administration of law.[2] Still, as in these times the ecclesiastical was not distinguished from the lay tribunals, it cannot be said that the contributions made by the civil to the English law were for the benefit, in particular, of the ecclesiastical branch of the latter. But from that period after the Norman conquest when these two tribunals were finally separated, and the singular mixed court[3] of the Anglo-Saxons abolished, must be dated the establishment of ecclesiastical courts, regulating their procedure by the imperial forms, and administering at least one branch of their jurisdiction, the testamentary branch, by the maxims and legal principles of the civil law.

II. The second factor in English ecclesiastical jurisprudence is the Canon Law; and it is this alone, as has been said, which merits, in strict speech, the title of ecclesiastical law, since it alone is the embodiment of those rules which the Church has adopted herself and of her own free will. It may be classed most conveniently under two heads, foreign and domestic. The former includes under it all those rules of our law which have been adopted from that vast system of jurisprudence known as the Roman canon law. This system is composed principally of legislative enactments of three distinct classes. [1] The canons of councils; [2] the decrees of the Popes and Fathers, or, in other words, the constitutions made proprio motu from time to time by the Roman Pontiffs, and the early Fathers of the Church, and which obtained the force of the law; and [3] the decretals and the canonical replies made to questions put at various times by Christians to the head of the Catholic Church. The first authoritative compilation of the Decrees was made under Eugenius III. by Gratian, a Bolognese monk, A.D. 1151. The Decretals were digested and edited (and the work of Gratian revised and re-edited) by Raymond de Pennafort, under direction of Gregory IX., A.D. 1235; and finally, the whole body of the canon law was edited by papal authority under Gregory XIII. This work[1] is entitled the Corpus Juris Canonici, and the bulk of it consists of the Decretum of Gratian and the Decretals of Gregory IX., the remainder being made up by a book of Decretals of Bonifac VIII. (known as the Sixth Decretals), the Clementine Constitutions (constitutions of Clement V.), and the two other books known as the Extravagantes of John XXII. and the Extravagantes Communes. [CANON LAW.]

To whatever extent this body of law may have been accepted in other Catholic countries, in England its adoption was by no means unrestricted and unreserved; and, on more than one occasion, attempts to introduce its provisions into England were successfully resisted, on the ground that those provisions were contrary to the common law of the land. Thus, for instance, it was the attempt of the English bishops to introduce into England the canon of Alexander III. for the legitimation of children born before marriage, that elicited from the barons the famous answer,[2] "Nolumus leges Angliæ mutari;" and it was instantly rejected as being contrary to the common law. Subject however to these restrictions, many of the rules of the Roman canon law have been incorporated with ours, and the English courts have in recent times decided cases on no other authority than that of a canon of the fourth Lateran Council,[3] accepted and recognised by English ecclesiastical law.

The domestic branch of our Canon Law is much the more important factor of the two, considered with reference to the amount of the contribution which it has made. It consists of [1] the legatine and [2] the provincial constitutions. The former are the constitutions framed by the councils of the English Church, held under the presidency of a papal legate; the latter are those promulgated by the Church, assembled in provincial synod under the primate of one of the provinces. Except in regard of their respective extent (the provincial constitutions binding the province only, and the legatine the whole Church), there was considered to be no difference in authority between these two classes, and English canonists have accordingly recorded or digested the enactments of both alike in one continuous chronological series.

The following is a list of the more important councils, provincial and legatine, compiled from the records of Spelman, Wilkins, and others.

[1.] A council held at Oxford, A.D. 1222 [Concilium Oxoniense. Spel. Conc. ii. 181; Wilk. Conc. Mag. Brit. et Hib. i. 585], under Stephen Langton, Archbishop of Canterbury. Its deliberations resulted in fifty canons (arranged by Lindewood on the principle adopted by Gratian in digesting the Decretum). It contains some important provisions as to simony and the status of beneficed clerks. [2.] A legatine council held under Otho, legate a latere of Gregory IX., at St. Paul's Cathedral, A.D. 1237 [Spel. Conc. ii. 218; Wilk. i. 647]. It is entitled in these authors, "Concilium Pan-Anglicum," and is described as being held "præsidente domino Othone . . . assidentibus sibi Archiepiseopis S. Edmundo Cant. et Waltero Eborae. necnon aliis Angliæ Episeopis." It promulgated thirty-one canons upon various subjects, the last eight being devoted to the regulation of the precedence in the ecclesiastical courts. [3.] A council held at Lambeth under Bonifac, Archbishop of Canterbury, A.D. 1261. [Spel. Conc. ii. 305; Wilk. i. 746.] Twenty-one canons were passed by this council, some of which have a very important bearing on the amenability of the clergy to their own and the civil tribunals. [4.] A legatine council held in St. Paul's [A.D. 1268], by Othobon, legate a latere of Clement IV. [Wilk. ii. 1; Spel. Conc. ii. 263, where, however, the date is misplaced by twenty years.[4]] It is entitled in Lindewood, "Concilium Anglicanum eum a domino Othone . . . celebratum præsentibus Bonifacio Cantuar. et Waltero Eborac. Archiepiseopis, Episeopis, Abbatibus, Prioribus, Decanis, Archidiaeonis, cum aliis Dignitatibus Ecclesiastieis." Its constitutions are fifty-three in number, many of them confirmatory of those of Otho. They are extremely comprehensive, and deal with many points

[4] Spelman assigns it to the year A.D. 1248, a date which, as Wilkins points out [ii. 1, n. a.], is falsified by its very title, which recites Othobon's commission as legate of Clement IV., who did not succeed to the papal chair till A.D. 1268.

connected both with the spiritual and temporal rights of the clergy. [5.] A council held at Reading under John Peccham, Archbishop of Canterbury, A.D. 1279 [Spel. Conc. ii. 320; Wilk. ii. 33]. In its proceedings, which are recorded under five titles, repeated allusion is made to the constitutions of Othobon, and there is a reference to the enactment of the foreign canon law above alluded to, the canon of the fourth Lateran Council on the subject of the accordance of benefices, and which appears to be treated as already adopted into the English law. [6.] A council held at Lambeth under the same John Peccham, A.D. 1280 (entitled in Spelman, "Constitutiones Dom. Joann. Peccham editæ in concilio Lambethensi"). [Spel. Conc. ii. 328; Wilk. ii. 55.] It promulgated twenty-seven canons (according to Wilkins' division thirty) on various questions bearing both on ritual and ceremonial duties, and on the general morality of the clergy. [7.] A council held at St. Paul's, A.D. 1309[1] by Robert de Winchelsey, Archbishop of Canterbury [Spel. Conc. ii. 458; Wilk. ii. 304]. The proceedings in this council are described at considerable length in Wilkins. His record of the proceedings commences with the bull of Clement V. summoning the council, and the mandate of the Archbishop. Then follow the "gravamina cleri in Concilio Prov. Cant. proposita;" the "gravamina in Parliamento Lond. proposita et in hoc Concilio repetita," with the answers of the king thereto; the "gravamina antiqua in hoc concilio repetita," also accompanied by the royal answers; the "gravamina prius non proposita;" the bull of Clement V. "de gravaminibus;" and lastly, the report of the Archbishop to the Pope. [8.] A council held at Oxford,[2] A.D. 1322, by Walter Reynolds, Archbishop of Canterbury [Wilk. ii. 512; Spel. Conc. ii. 497]. It consists of nine titles (of ten, according to Spelman's division), relating chiefly to canonical questions. [9.] A council held at St. Paul's, A.D. 1328, by Simon Mepham, Archbishop of Canterbury. It promulgated nine canons. [10.] A council held at London by John Stratford, Archbishop of Canterbury, A.D. 1342. [Spel. Conc. ii. 572; Wilk. ii. 696.] Godolphin [Rep. Can. 591] is apparently in doubt as to the date. Twelve canons appear as having been framed by the synod, and are followed (in Spelman and Wilkins) by seventeen others of a different date, but with the same heading—apparently a continuation of the proceedings of the same council on a different day. [11.] A council held by Simon Islip at Lambeth, A.D. 1362. [Spel. Conc. ii. 612; Wilk. iii. 50.] This produced merely a single constitution, "de presbyteris." [12.] A council held by Simon Sudbury, Archbishop of Canterbury, A.D. 1378. [Spel. Conc. iii. 626; Wilk. iii. 135.] A single constitution, "de salariis presbyterorum." [13.] A council held at Bedford,[3] A.D. 1408, under Thomas Arundel, Archbishop of Canterbury, which framed thirteen canons. [14.] A council held at St. Paul's by Henry Chicheley, Archbishop of Canterbury, A.D. 1416. [Wilk. iii. 377; Spel. Conc. ii. 669.] It produced two constitutions, "de approbatione testamentorum" and "contra hæreticos."

Godolphin [Rep. Can. 591] also extracts two others from Spelman and Lindewood as being important. They are entitled in the former work Constitutiones Ricardi and Constitutiones Edmundi. They are without doubt the Constitutions of Richard Wetherhed, A. D. 1229 [Spel. Conc. ii. 191], and those of St. Edmund Rich, A. D. 1234, [Spel. Conc. 190, 191]. Those of the latter were forty-one in number.

Such are the sources from which the larger portion of English Canon Law is derived. The labours of Lindewood, who was a Dean of the Arches for the Province of Canterbury in the reign of Henry VI., have digested and codified these canons, and under the form in which they are arranged by this learned canonist they are consulted at the present day. No authoritative digest of them has ever been issued, the attempt which was made under Henry VIII., and which produced the Reformatio Legum Ecclesiasticarum, having proved abortive, as that work never received legislative sanction. What is the nature and extent of the authority exercised by English Canon Law will be discussed presently.

III. The direct formative influence exercised by the English Common Law commenced at a very early date. As the humanizing work of the Church progressed, and the laity were drawn to the spiritual body by a closer tie, it was inevitable that a mutual interweaving of rights and duties should follow, and by consequence, that the peculiar laws of the one body should affect and modify those of the other. The endowment of the Church from the temporalities of the laity naturally subjected her pro tanto to the operation of temporal laws, and thus the principles and maxims which are recognised by the common law in dealing with proprietary rights became part and parcel of ecclesiastical law. The relations of the patron to the clerk and to the bishop are adjusted upon common law principles, and their mutual rights are recognised and enforcable in the common law courts. Another and no less important, if less direct, influence exercised by the common law is in the control which it has always maintained over the growth of the canon law, instances of which have been above quoted. It is only subject to the sanction of the common law that portions of the foreign canon law have become incorporated in English ecclesiastical law, and when so introduced, have possessed authority in right of their adoption,[4] and not of their original parentage.

[1] Misdated A.D. 1305 by Godolphin [Godolph. Rep. Can. 591], who has apparently confounded a constitution of this archbishop, containing a form of oath of obedience to be administered to the rectors and vicars of his province, with the Lambeth Constitutions of A.D. 1309.

[2] Thus Wilkins, following Lindewood. Spelman places it at Lambeth under Simon Mepham, and transfers the date to A.D. 1328, the year after that archbishop was consecrated. Godolphin [Rep. Can. 591] follows.

[3] According to Lindewood [Prov. p. 64]. At St. Paul's according to Spelman and Wilkins.

[4] That is, of their adoption by the Church, according to

IV. But whatever may formerly have been the origin of binding force in those portions of the ecclesiastical law which are founded on the canon law, their authority rests now upon a different basis, that of Statute Law. The Statute 25 Hen. VIII. c. 19. sec. 7, gives express sanction to all the then received canons, constitutions, &c. which are not contrary to the general laws of the realm. This enactment, and the recognition given in 25 Hen. VIII. cap. 21. sec. 1, to the adopted rules of the foreign canon law, gave legislative sanction to the whole of this branch of law ecclesiastical. Whether, subsequent to the Reformation, the Church still had legislative power vested in her, and could bind all her members, lay and clerical, by her constitutions, if sanctioned by the Crown, was for some time a doubtful point. But it was finally settled in a great case of the last century [Middleton v. Crofts, per Lord Hardwicke, in 2 Atkyn's Reports, 650] that she had not; that her constitutions after royal confirmation bound the spiritual body, as between members of that body, but not the laity, unless sanctioned by Act of Parliament.

It is from the period of the Reformation that the statutory branch of ecclesiastical law began to assume the prominent position which it at present occupies. The Church of England having finally separated herself from Rome, and the Royal supremacy being established, it was thought necessary, to the more complete union of Church and State, to give formal legislative sanction to the doctrine and offices of the former. In the reign of Edward VI. a body of articles was compiled and published, which was the foundation of the Thirty-nine subsequently framed [A.D. 1562], and invested with Parliamentary authority [A.D. 1570].[1] The liturgy and ceremonies of the Church, as set forth in the various Prayer Books which were at different periods compiled, were, in each case, made part of the statute law of the kingdom, and enjoined upon the clergy by express enactments. The last of these, the 13 & 14 Car. II. c. 4, is the Act of Uniformity, which authorizes the Prayer Book now in use; and from the Reformation down to the present day a vast number of ecclesiastical statutes have been passed from time to time, defining and modifying the rights and duties of the clergy.

To sum up the results: the component factors of English ecclesiastical law, as at present constituted, are reduced from four to three, that is to say: [1.] such of the rules of the civil law as from ancient times have been incorporated in our ecclesiastical system. Since, however, testamentary and matrimonial laws have ceased to be, properly speaking, a branch of ecclesiastical jurisprudence, the importance of this factor is considerably diminished, though, as above stated, it still manifests its presence in the form of procedure adopted in the spiritual courts. [2.] The common law, as in many instances the sole regulation of the mutual rights of the clergy and laity in respect of Church temporalities. [3.] The statute law, which has absorbed into itself so much of the canon law, as at the passing of 25 Hen. VIII. c. 19, "being already made," was not "contrariant or repugnant" to the common law of the realm. This legalizes all canon law previous to the Reformation, subject no doubt (in the case of all canons, &c., which have not already stood this test) to the decision of one of the superior common law courts on the question of the consonance of any particular enactment with the common law.

Lastly, taking the term law ecclesiastical in its most restricted sense, as regulating the internal government of the Church and the inter se rights and duties of the clergy, there must be added those constitutions and canons of a later date than the Act of Henry VIII., which, although not confirmed by the Legislature, have received the Royal sanction.[2]

LAW, MORAL. [ANTINOMIANISM. LAW OF CHRIST. MORALITY, NATURAL.]

LAW OF CHRIST. The law of God, at first unwritten [Rom. ii. 15], then revealed imperfectly and embodied in a covenant of works [Deut. xxix. 21], reached its full development in the law of Christ, which consists of the revelations of the moral law interpreted by His word and illustrated by His life.

This law is not presented to us, as a digested code or complete collection of rules, though its rules are often definite and minute, but as a system of principles, with occasional examples of their working. This is in accordance with the character of Christian obedience, which is the working of a renewed nature. Laws to an unwilling servant must be rigidly definite and exhaustive. Every opportunity of escape is seized. Laws to a willing servant need not be so precise. Something may be left to be supplied by his willingness. But when the servant becomes a son and friend, when he is made partaker of the very nature of the lawgiver, a system of principles is in accordance with his altered position. While prohibitory laws then are absolute, laws of injunction admit of different degrees of obedience. There is a necessary degree of obedience, but between that degree and the perfection of obedience there are many stages. If thou wilt be perfect, said our Lord, sell all that thou hast and give to the poor. Zacchæus' lower standard, "Behold, Lord, the half of my goods I give to the poor," was yet more than accepted; and such a standard one view, that of Vaughan, C. J. [Hill v. Good, Vaugh. 327], who lays down that a lawful canon law (i.e. any law adopted or framed by the Church herself, and not contrary to common law) is as binding as an Act of Parliament. Sir Matthew Hale, on the other hand, in ascribing the authority of canon law [to either statutory recognition or] to immemorial usage, seems to look to the common law as not merely sanctioning but originating that authority [Hale, History of the Com. Law, i. sec. 27.]

[1] 13 Eliz. c. 12.

[2] In Bishop Watson's case, where the authority of the Canons of 1603 is upheld, doubt is thrown upon those of 1640. The court said: "Ecclesiastical persons are subject to the canons; those of 1640 have been questioned, but no doubt was ever made of those of 1603." [Bishop of St. David's v. Lucy, 1 Salkeld Rep. 134.]

was heroical compared with many a standard which, we cannot doubt, is accepted; in subordination always to the principle, "He that soweth little shall reap little."

Rules for the interpretation of the Christian law may be seen in Taylor's Ductor Dubitantium, book ii. c. 3. From them Heber selects as maxims most generally applicable the following: [1.] That all acts of virtue are to be preferred before the instruments of it, and that which exercises it before that which signifies it. [2.] The difference between positive and negative laws, that namely when anything is commanded, the means of doing it are left to our choice; but when anything is forbidden, "all those things also, by which we come to that sin, are understood to be forbidden by the same law." [Taylor's Works, Heber's ed. Life of Taylor, vol. i. p. celxxx.] An excellent practical rule is that in cases of doubt we take the side of self-denial.

Bacon [Advancement of Learning, bk. ii.] commends "much the deducing of the law of God to cases of conscience," for that he takes "indeed to be a breaking and not exhibiting whole of the bread of life." The disuse of the confessional in the English Church has caused a great paucity of such books in our theology. Sanderson's lectures De Conscientiâ may be named. But, as Bacon continues, that which quickeneth both the doctrines of faith and manners, is the elevation and consent of the heart. "There is no other positive measure of a Christian duty, but that which can have no measure itself, and that is love. He that loves will think everything too little: and he that thinks so, will endeavour to do more, and to do it better. We are for the present children of God by adoption, sealed with His Spirit, renewed by regeneration, justified by His grace, and invited forward by most glorious promises greater than we can understand. Now he that considers this state of things, and hopes for that state of blessings, will proceed in duty and love towards the perfections of God, never giving over till he partake of the purities of God and His utmost glories." [Taylor's Works, vol. xiii. pp. 228, 229.]

Where there is no rule given, an example is instead of a rule. The rules and principles of Christ's law are so many, that the perfect example of Christ is rather for encouragement of our obedience. In the imitation of Christ there needs only to be noted the caution, that what He did in consequence of His extraordinary mission is not imitable by us.

It remains only to add that, as the law of Christ is a law of life, the old ceremonial law is replaced by a law of lifegiving sacraments and sacramental ordinances; and that on the other hand, as the law and the promise meet in Christ, so the threats of the law are swallowed up in the revelations of the Gospel. For not only by Moses, but by apostles is it declared that our God is a consuming fire.

LAY BAPTISM. Our Lord before His ascension gave commission and authority to His Apostles to baptize in the name of the Holy Trinity [Matt. xxviii. 18-20]. The same right must belong to the bishops as their successors, and to the priesthood, whom they ordain to preach the Gospel and administer the Sacraments: all other baptisms are manifestly irregular, and were not contemplated or provided for in the original institution of the sacrament. But when, bearing in mind our Lord's express declaration of the necessity of baptism for salvation [John iii. 5], we also remember that cases would occur of sudden sickness and death in which baptism by a bishop or inferior minister would be impossible, it must follow either that permission to baptize must sometimes be given to laymen, or the grace of the sacrament be withheld. During the first two centuries lay baptism probably prevailed to some extent in the Church, though the subject is not alluded to in the writings of the Fathers. Tertullian, who lived at the close of the second century, is the first writer who mentions the usage which was then permitted. He says that the right of baptism belongs to "the chief priest, which is the bishop; then the presbyters and deacons, yet not without the authority of the bishops, for the honour of the Church, which being preserved, peace is preserved. Otherwise laymen have also the right, for that which is equally received may be equally given, unless the name disciples denotes at once bishops or priests or deacons. The Word of God ought not to be hidden from any: wherefore also baptism, which is equally derived from God, may be administered by all" [Tertul. De Baptismo, xvii., Oxf. transl.]. Tertullian then says that laymen should not baptize without the sanction of the bishop, nor unless in case of necessity. He afterwards forbids baptism by women, from the statement of St. Paul [1 Cor. xiv. 35].

About the middle of the third century the question of lay baptism, i.e. of baptism by laymen who were in communion with the Church, and which was authorized by the Church, was a subject of controversy between St. Cyprian and St. Stephen, Bishop of Rome [A.D. 255]. St. Cyprian denied the validity of the baptism of schismatic or heretical priests, and of course of laymen in communion with them; St. Stephen affirmed that the only essentials for valid baptism were the right Matter (i.e. water), and the true Form (in the Name of the Father, &c.), and thus that there was valid baptism amongst hereties and schismatics.

The various opinions on this subject held in the early Church are thus stated by Dr. Pusey: "There were three views in the early Church; first, that of the early African Church and of Asia Minor, in the time of Firmilian, which rejected all baptisms out of the Church, schismatical as well as heretical; second, that of the Greek Church generally, stated fully by St. Basil, which accepted schismatical but rejected heretical baptism; third, that first mentioned by Stephen, Bishop of Rome, who accepted all baptism, even of hereties, which had been given in the name of the Trinity. The second continues to be the rule of the Greek, the third, with some modifications, of the Latin Church. (In both it was presupposed that the minister had at one time received the commission to baptize; the case of schismatical baptism as it is now found amongst us not occurring.)"[1]

There were two objections against admitting the general validity of lay baptism by heretics or schismatics. As regards the first, it was argued that a person could not give that which he did not himself possess; being deprived of Divine grace by his exclusion from the Church, or by heretical corruption of the faith, he could not give to others the grace which he had lost, one who was himself dead could not impart spiritual life or grace to another: a specious argument which, as we shall presently find, is examined by St. Augustine, and proved to be inconclusive. But the other objection which, if valid, would exclude schismatical and heretical baptisms and is especially urged in the Apostolical Constitutions as opposed to baptism by women,[2] would in reality set aside lay baptism altogether. According to this theory, baptism is supposed to be a part of the priestly office, and therefore could not under any circumstances be exercised by a layman: should he attempt it, he would incur the guilt of Korah and his company. But deacons, and not laymen only, would thus be excluded from the office of baptizing, contrary to the universal permission of the early Church, since a deacon can no more exercise the functions of priesthood than a layman. On the contrary, baptism ought properly to be regarded as a part of the ministerial, but not of the priestly office; and hence in case of emergency may be validly exercised by laymen, just as they are allowed amongst ourselves to read the Scriptures in Church. But a layman cannot under any circumstances whatever celebrate the Holy Eucharist, and even were a bishop to give permission the celebration would still be unauthorized and invalid: the sacrificial character of the Holy Eucharist rendering lay-celebration utterly and per se impossible. This will shew the essential difference between the administration of baptism and the Eucharistic oblation, and may serve to remove an objection which we sometimes hear at the present day, that by admitting lay baptism we are virtually and implicitly sanctioning the right of laymen to discharge a part of the sacerdotal office, and thus in effect setting aside the essential difference between a layman and a priest.

The subject of lay baptism has been most fully examined by St. Augustine, and his teaching demands especial attention, as it has been universally received by, and is now the law of, the Catholic Church. St. Augustine says that by Apostolic tradition the validity of the baptisms of heretics and schismatics was admitted,[3] the tradition being confirmed by a general council[4] (of Arles or Nice), but that when administered in jest or mockery he cannot determine whether or not they are valid.[5] His chief argument is, that the minister of baptism is not of the essence of the sacrament, but that in all cases Christ is the Baptizer—"He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost"[6] [Matt. iii. 11]; and he argues that if schismatics separated from the unity of the Church cannot baptize because they have lost the grace of God, neither for the same reason could heretics or wicked men who are living in Catholic communion (though the validity of their baptism is not questioned) who have also themselves lost Divine grace.[7] But grace given by heretical or schismatical baptism, out of the Church, does not, St. Augustine says, profit the receiver until he return to the unity of the Body. The important truth so often stated by St. Augustine, that Christ is the Baptizer, implies the sanction not only of lay baptism in episcopal communities, heretical or schismatical, as Jacobites or Nestorians, but also of baptisms by Dissenters in modern times. Such baptisms are by no means authorized by the usage of the Primitive Church. Baptism in early times, whether lay or clerical, was always administered under the sanction or authority of the bishop. In schismatic or heretical communities, as of Novatians or Arians, there were bishops duly consecrated, the clergy were priests, and lay baptism had always episcopal licence. But on the other hand, amongst Dissenters of modern times, the sacra-

[1] Note in translation of Tertullian, p. 281. Dr. Pusey says that it continues to be the rule of the Greek Church to reject heretical and to accept schismatical baptism. Such is not, however, the usage of the Russian Church. "But the seventh canon of the second Œcumenical Council forbids to rebaptize even the Arians themselves, and the Macedonians or Pneumatomachi, with other heretics named in the same canon, and orders that they shall only be made to renounce and anathematize both their own and all other heresies, and so be received by unction with the holy chrism" [Duty of Parish Priests, c. iii. Blackmore's transl.].

[2] Lib. iii. c. 9.

[3] "Saluberrimam consuetudinem tenebat Ecclesia in ipsis quoque schismaticis et hæreticis corrigere quod pravum est, non iterare quod datum est; sanare quod vulneratum est, non curare quod sanum est. Quam consuetudinem credo ex apostolica traditione venientem" [De Baptismo, lib. ii. c. 7].

[4] "Nec aliquid inde temere affirmandum est sinè auctoritate tanti concilii quantum tantæ rei sufficit . . . hoc enim jam in ipsa totius orbis unitate discussum consideratum perfectum atque firmatum est" [Cont. Epist. Parmeniani, lib. ii. c. 13].

[5] "Ubi . . . totum ludicre et mimice et joculariter ageretur utrum approbandus est baptismus qui daretur divinum judicium per alicujus revelationis oraculum concordi oratione et impensis supplici devotione gemitibus implorandum esse censerem" [De Baptismo, lib. ii. c. 53].

[6] "Baptisma quippe illud aliquid est et magnum aliquid est propter Illum de quo dictum est Hic est qui baptisat. Sed ne putares illud quod magnum est tibi aliquid prodesse posse si non fueris in unitate; super baptisatum columba descendit, tanquam dicens, si baptismum habes esto in columba ne non tibi prosit quod habes. Veni ergo ad columbam (scil. Ecclesiam) dicimus, non ut incipias habere quod non habebas, sed ut prodesse tibi incipiat quod habebas. Foris enim habebas baptismum ad perniciem, intus si habueris, incipit prodesse ad salutem" [Tractat. in Joannis Evangel. vi. sec. 14].

[7] Thus on comparing the baptism of a heretic and that of a wicked priest in communion with the Church, he says, "Cur in illo baptismus et evangelica verba improbantur, in isto autem approbantur: cum ab illis columbæ (Ecclesiæ) membris, uterque inveniatur alienus? An quia ille foris litigator est ne intromittatur; iste vero intus callidus assentator, ne foras projiciatur?" [De Baptismo, lib. iv, c. 5. See also In Joannis Evangel. tract v. vi.]

ment is administered in direct opposition to the authority of the bishop and by teachers who reject episcopal government, and though mere laymen, usurp the functions of the sacred ministry. Such baptism cannot at least plead in its support primitive usage or precedent. The important truth that Christ is the Baptizer alone enables us to accept such baptisms as valid, and also all other baptisms, whoever may be the administrator, where there is the right Matter and Form. This is clearly laid down by the canon law: A priest is the ordinary minister of baptism; the baptism of women is forbidden except in the case of necessity; but even the baptism of a Jew or Pagan must not be reiterated [Decret. pars iii. de Consecratione: de Baptismi Sacramento, xix. xx. xxiii.]. And we must remember that the canon law, which in the Middle Ages was the law of the Western Church, including the Church of England, has remained no less so since the Reformation, except where contrary to the common or statute law or the royal prerogative. [LAW, ECCLESIASTICAL.]

The legatine and provincial constitutions, made under the sanction of Cardinals Otho and Othobon, the Pope's legates, and by many archbishops of Canterbury, are given in Lyndewood's Provinciale [A.D. 1679]. The usage in case of necessity of lay baptism (men and women) is strictly enjoined: priests are commanded to teach their parishioners the right Form of baptism; and Archbishop Peccham censures certain foolish priests (stolidi sacerdotes) who profaned by reiterating the sacrament after lay baptism [Lyndewood, de Baptismo et ejus effectu, lib. iii. tit. xxiv.] (sic baptizatos parvulos, non sinè sacramenti injuria rebaptizant, quod ne cætero fiat firmiter inhibemus).

The validity of lay baptism during the present century has been twice decided by the ecclesiastical courts of the English Church—in the Court of Arches in the case of Kemp v. Wickes [A.D. 1809], and in that of Martin v. Escott in the Arches Court and before the Judicial Committee [A.D. 1841].

LAY CO-OPERATION. From the earliest age of the Church of Christ there has been a constant recognition of the important position occupied by the laity in carrying out the purposes for which it was established. It was to them that the Apostles looked for the funds by which they were to be maintained, while engaged about a ministry which precluded them from earning their living: just as our Lord Himself had accepted the services of those who "ministered to Him of their substance" [Luke viii. 3; 2 Cor. viii. 4; Phil. ii. 25, iv. 10-18]. To the laity, both men and women, the Primitive Church looked for personal service in many works of love, within the walls of the church and without; such co-operation with the work of the ministry as rendering assistance at baptisms, maintaining order among those who came to church, visiting the sick, distributing alms, attending on martyrs, teaching the rudiments of Christianity to the heathen who offered themselves as catechumens, and reading the Holy Scriptures in public. Some of these offices were included among the MINOR ORDERS at a later age of the Church, and those who exercised them received a special benediction from the bishop; but the work associated with them was layman's work, and required no actual ordination to bestow either the gifts or the authority requisite for its performance.

When monastic institutions were established, they at once occupied a large portion of this field of Christian labour; and as they increased largely in number, so they went on absorbing into their own organizations most of the works of love and mercy in which laymen and women could co-operate with the clergy; mingling a life of prayer and self-discipline with a life of active benevolence, the lay monks and the nuns being always the principal agents of the Church, except the clergy, in its ministrations to the poor, the afflicted, the sick, and the dead.

Later still, the great orders of Friars, the Dominicans and Franciscans, formed a further development of lay co-operation. These orders engaged largely in what recent times have called the "home mission" work of the Church, attracting large numbers by their preaching who were but little or not at all drawn within the ordinary influences of the parochial clergy, and doing much good work in their early days, notwithstanding their subsequent degeneracy when they became little more than political agents of the Pope.

The abrupt and impolitic mode in which the English monasteries were abolished, deprived the Church suddenly of this vast system of lay co-operation; and for a long time afterwards there was scarcely any attempt whatever made to organize any substitute for it. Puritanism confused the idea of the κλῆρος and the λαὸς; and, if the phrase "co-operation of the laity" had been known to it, the theory of such co-operation, as well as the practice, would have been resolved into a substitution of the laity for the clergy, by setting the former to do those works, chiefly or solely, which especially belong to the office of the latter. In the end of the seventeenth century, societies were organized for the "reformation of manners," and out of them was developed the modern system of societies for co-operation with the clergy in their work, such as that for promoting Christian Knowledge [A.D. 1698]; that for the Propagation of the Gospel [A.D. 1701]; the Church Missionary Society for spreading Christianity in Africa and the East [A.D. 1799]; the National Society for Promoting the Education of the Poor [A.D. 1811]; the Church Building Society [A.D. 1818]; those for increasing the number of the Clergy, the Bible Society [A.D. 1804], and other kindred institutions. In these organizations, the object is chiefly to promote each branch of Church work by means of money subscriptions, not by personal service. Practically, a large proportion of their funds is subscribed by the clergy: yet, until quite recent times, no other method had been provided, since the dissolution of the monasteries, by which anything in the shape of a substitute for their work was attempted.

Within the last quarter of a century, the English laity have been awakened to a keener sense of their duties, and the call for systems of lay co-operation has been very general. The long reign of Puritanism has had its effect in obscuring the subject, and such co-operation has been sought in modes that are inconsistent with the principles of the Church; as, for example, by the introduction of lay representatives into synods of the clergy, and by giving unordained laymen a part in those duties which are specially assigned to priests and deacons. But the establishment of sisterhoods has been a great step in the right direction, and notwithstanding several failures to establish similar communities in which lay-men could work for the Church in a similar manner, there is a probability that good practical societies of the kind will eventually be founded, and that personal lay co-operation with the clergy in the good works of the Church will become organized on something of its ancient and primitive footing.

It is hardly necessary to add that the laity exercise very great influence in the Church, at least in England. They have much to do with ecclesiastical legislation, and also with the practical administration of ecclesiastical laws, and of the endowments by which the clergy are maintained. They also have great control as political ministers and private patrons over the appointments of the bishops and parochial clergy. And lastly, there are from twenty-five thousand to thirty thousand laymen officially engaged as churchwardens in the numerous parishes into which the country is divided.

LAY PRIESTHOOD. This term is used to designate the office of the laity in Divine worship: and is founded on scriptural authority. St. Peter, writing to Christians in general, says, "Ye also, as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house, an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices to God by Jesus Christ" [1 Pet. ii. 5]: telling them, again, "ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a peculiar people" [ibid. 9]. St. John also, in the Apocalypse, writes, that He Who "loved us, and washed us from our sins in His own, blood hath made us kings and priests unto God and His Father" [Rev. i. 6]: and in the same book, it is said of those who have "part in the first resurrection," that "they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with Him a thousand years" [ibid. xx. 6].

Thus, although from the earliest age of the Church, there has always been a distinct line of demarcation between those who are ordained to holy orders, and those who are not [Clergy. Laity], all Christians have been considered to take their part in the sacerdotal work of the Church. So Tertullian says, quoting Rev. i. 6, "Are not the laity priests" [Tertul. de Castit. 7], and St. Jerome, on the same words, "The priesthood of the laity, that is, Baptism" [Jerome, Dial. cum Lucif.].

This sacerdotal function of the Christian laity is a consequence of the anointing which they receive from God the Holy Ghost in Baptism and Confirmation, which, when St. Jerome wrote, were both administered at the same time, so that he only names the former. Confirmation has, at all times, been administered with ceremonies analogous to those used in Ordination, viz., the laying on of hands, unction, and invocation of the Holy Spirit: and it is not unreasonable to consider that these ceremonies have arisen either by Divine institution of Him Whose revelation speaks of all Christians as priests, or by an instinct of the Church, inspired by the indwelling of the Holy Ghost, directed towards the same truth, and looking upon Confirmation as a kind of lesser Ordination.

So regarded, the Confirmation of his Baptism qualifies every Christian for the duties of that universal ministry by which all take their part in the solemn work of Divine worship. The holy Eucharist is offered at the altar by the priest ordained for that purpose, and the lay priest co-operates with him by saying Amen at the giving of thanks [1 Cor. xiv. 16, ἐπὶ τῇ σῇ εὐχαριστίᾳ], by adoring "with angels and archangels, and all the company of heaven" the Majesty of their present Lord, and by being "built up a spiritual house, an holy priesthood," through feeding on the sacrifice so offered. A similar co-operation of the laity in sacerdotal work is that of taking a part in the offering of praise and prayer, in the one by joining throughout with the voice, in the other by occasional response, and the echo of a continually recurring Amen. There is, in fact, no part of Divine Worship in which the ordinary Christian has not some share: and the Christian who takes the very lowest room in the Church of God, if he exercises this duty and privilege of his lay priesthood by consciously joining in the sacrificial work of the Church, is engaging in a far higher work than any to which he could attain by using the office of a preacher, which alone some look upon as the distinctive function of a priesthood.

LENT. [Quadragesima; Τεσσαρακοστή; Μεγάλη Νηστεία.] A word akin to the German Lenz, and identical with the Dutch and Flemish Lente, the season of spring. Hence the name for the great spring fast of the Church.

The observance of a fast before Easter is of very early origin, but a considerable period elapsed before the time of its commencement and the period of its duration were settled by authority. There is a passage in the letter of St. Irenæus to St. Victor, in which he speaks of difference of opinion, not only about the time of Easter, but about the manner of fasting, "some fasting one day, others two, others more" [Euseb. Ecc. Hist. v. c. 24]; but the reading is there doubtful, in some copies seeming to mention a fast of forty days, in others of forty hours only. Such a fast as the latter does seem to have been kept at first, in memory of the time between our Lord's Death and Resurrection [Tertul. De Jejun. ii.].

The historian Socrates enumerates various differences in the observance of Lent. "The Romans," he says, "fast three weeks before Easter, the Sabbath and Lord's Day excepted. The Illyrians, and all Greece, and the Alexandrians fast six weeks, and call it the Quadragesimal fast. Others begin their fast seven weeks before Easter, only fasting, however, fifteen days by intervals; but they also call this the Quadragesimal fast." He then enumerates differences in the manner of abstinence, and after this says: "Since no one can shew any written rule about this, it is plain that the Apostles left the matter free to each one's judgment and choice, that no one should do the good thing through fear or of necessity" [Socrates, Ecc. Hist. v. 22].

In many churches Lent lasted for about thirty-six days, "a tithe of the year," i.e. six weeks, minus the Sundays [St. Greg. Hom. xvi. in Evangelia]. In the East, the Saturdays or Sabbaths were also withdrawn from the number of fasting days. Origen [Hom. x. in Levit.] speaks of forty days before Easter being set apart for fasting; and at the Council of Nicæa this period was taken for granted. The addition of Ash-Wednesday and the three days following to the beginning of Lent was made by authority, probably that of St. Gregory the Great, in the sixth century.

Another notable point of difference was in the time of the commencement of the Lenten fast. Some began at Septuagesima, some at Sexagesima, others at Quinquagesima. Some churches omitted Sundays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, some Sundays and Saturdays, some Sundays only. St. Gregory's rule, however, seems to have been widely accepted in the West, but the Eastern Μεγάλη Νηστεία begins on the Monday after Quinquagesima.

The rule of fasting for Lent varied greatly also. It was usual to abstain from food altogether until evensong, change of diet not being accounted sufficient. St. Ambrose exhorts men "Differ aliquantulum, non longe finis est diei" [Serm. viii. in Psalm cxviii.]. St. Chrysostom and St. Basil afford evidence to the same effect.

The food, when taken, was to be of the simplest and least delicate kind, animal food and wine being prohibited. St. Chrysostom [Hom. iv. on Stat.] speaks of those who for two days abstained from food, and of others who refused not only wine and oil, but every dish, and throughout Lent partook of bread and water only. The Eastern Church at the present day still observes a most strict rule of fasting. Wine and oil are allowed on Saturdays and Sundays, but even these days are only partially free from the restrictions of Lent. The discipline of Holy Week is exceedingly rigorous.

During Lent corporeal punishments were forbidden by the laws of Theodosius the Great, "Nulla supplicia sint corporis quibus (diebus) absolutio exspectatur animarum" [Cod. Theod. ix. tit. xxxv. leg. v.]. Public games, and the celebration of birthdays and marriages, were also interdicted [Conc. Laodic. li. lii.]. It was the special time for preparing catechumens for Baptism, and most of St. Cyril's Catechetical Lectures were delivered during Lent. St. Chrysostom's celebrated Homilies on the Statues were preached during this season. Daily instruction formed a part of the service, and Holy Communion was celebrated at least every Sabbath and every Lord's Day. The last week, the Holy or Great Week, was kept with still greater strictness and solemnity.

There is no doubt that the observance of a fast of forty days derives much authority from Holy Scripture. As St. Jerome says: "Moses and Elias, by their fast of forty days, were filled with the converse of God, and our Lord Himself fasted the same number of days in solitude that He might leave us the solemn days of fasting" [In Esaiam, clviii.]. St. Leo speaks of the forty days as being ordained "a sanctis Apostolis per doctrinam Spiritus Sancti" [Serm. ix. de Quadrages.]; and similar expressions occur in St. Basil, St. Cyril of Alexandria, St. Jerome, and others. The truth is, the Church ever loved with reverence to trace the example of her Lord, and to follow Him in His Humiliation as well as in His Triumph. As His Passion preceded His glorious Resurrection, so a time of penitential sorrow would naturally be fixed before the Easter season of rejoicing.

There was peculiar force, too, in the observance of Lent for catechumens and penitents. The former would prepare themselves by great strictness and diligence for "the washing of regeneration;" the latter, for the recovery of the Divine favour which they had lost.

LESSONS. The use of lessons or lections of Scripture in Divine service has been commanded by the Church from the very beginning: "Quas (i.e. Scripturas) ab ipso Christianæ religionis ortu in publicis conventibus Ecclesia legi voluit" [Martene, De Ant. Eccl. Rit. iv. 5, 1]. They also formed a part of the service of the Jewish synagogue [Luke iv. 17; Acts xiii. 15]. We find St. Paul, in the first written of his Epistles, solemnly "charging" his disciples "by the Lord, that the epistle be read unto all the holy brethren" [1 Thess. v. 27]; and in his Epistle to the Colossians [iv. 16] he says, "When this epistle is read among you, cause that it be read also in the Church of the Laodiceans: and that ye likewise read the Epistle from Laodicea," i.e. most probably the Epistle to the Ephesians.

The practice of the early Church may be plainly inferred from these passages, and they are abundantly confirmed by later writers. St. Justin Martyr, in his account of Christian worship on the Lord's Day [circa A.D. 140], speaks of "the memoirs of the Apostles or the writings of the Prophets being read as long as the time permits" [Justin M. Apol. i. 67]. The Apostolic Constitutions mention lessons as being taken out of the books of Moses, Joshua, Judges, Kings, Chronicles, Job, Solomon, the sixteen prophets, &c. After two lessons from these books had been read, psalms were sung, and then followed a lesson from the Acts or Epistles, and one from the Gospels [Const. Apostol. ii. 57, 59]. St. Basil, St. Chrysostom, and St. Augustine, with many others, give similar testimony.

In process of time, particular lessons were appointed for certain seasons of the ecclesiastical year. The Acts of the Apostles were read between Easter and Pentecost [Aug. Tract. vi. in Joan.]; the miracles there recorded being the great demonstration of our Lord's Resurrection [Chrysos. Hom. lxiii., Cur in Pentecoste acta legantur]. St. Augustine speaks of the history of the Passion as being, of course, read on Good Friday, and that of the Resurrection at Easter. The Apocalypse was to be read between Easter and Pentecost [Conc. Tolet. IV. c. xvii.], and Genesis in Lent [Chrysost. Hom. vii. ad Pop. Antioch et xxxiii. in Genes., &c.]. A Gallican lectionary more than a thousand years old mentions the use of the Acts and the Apocalypse during the great Forty Days [Mabillon, De Liturg. Gallic. lib. ii. pp. 137-140]. St. Ambrose speaks of the reading of Job and Jonah in Holy Week [Epist. xxxiii. ad Marcellin.]. Several interesting coincidences between the modern English lectionary and the customs of ancient times, are given by Palmer: e.g. the use of Isaiah during Advent, which is prescribed by the Ordo Romanus. "After Pentecost the books of Samuel and Kings are read; and still later the books of Job, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes, while Tobit and Judith are read nearer to Advent. The same order may be observed in the forms of the Church described by Rupertus Tuitensis [A.D. 1100] and in the Ordo Romanus" [Palmer's Orig. Liturg. i. 254].

Lessons were usually read in Church by the readers [READERS], and, before this order was instituted, probably by deacons. The reader in very ancient times began with the salutation, "Pax vobis" [Cyprian, Epist. xxxiii. al. xxxviii. ad Cler. Carth.], but the third Council of Carthage [A.D. 397] directed that this should be discontinued by the readers and confined to the deacons or superior orders. St. Augustine mentions that this salutation was in his time given by the bishop, and that then the lessons followed [De Civit. Dei, xxii. 8]. Some salutation of the kind always preceded the reading of Scripture. St. Chrysostom mentions other customs also. "The deacon," he says, "stands up and cries with a loud voice, 'Let us give attention' (Πρόσχωμεν), and this he says several times . . . and before he begins to read he also cries aloud, 'Thus saith the Lord' (Τάδε λέγει Κύριος)." [Hom. xix. in Act. Apost.]

The number of lessons varied at different times and places. St. Augustine wished to have a lesson out of each Gospel on Good Friday, but gave up the practice as the people were disturbed by it [Serm. cxliii. de Temp.]. Maximus Taurinensis mentions that the lessons on the Feast of the Epiphany were out of Isaiah, St. Matthew, and St. John [Aug. Hom. iv. in Epiphan.]. In the West there was a common classification of festivals into those "of three" or "of nine lections." These lections however, it is hardly necessary to say, were not whole chapters, but short selections, usually from different parts of Scripture, with "responds" or short anthems sung after each. On Saints' days they were taken from ecclesiastical writings other than Scripture, for the purpose of giving the life of the saint or explaining the Gospel for the day. Psalms were used with the lections from very early times, the practice being mentioned in a canon of the Council of Laodicæa [circa A.D. 367], which orders the psalmody to be mingled with reading [διὰ μέσου καθ' ἕκαστον ψαλμὸν γίνεσθαι ἀνάγνωσιν [Mansi, ii. 568]. Mabillon gives an account [Curs. Gall. 399] of a service held at Lyons [A.D. 499], at which there was "a lesson from Moses, then Psalms sung, then a lesson from the prophets, then Psalms again, then a Gospel."

In addition to the lives of saints, lessons were read out of the Homilies of the Fathers and the Acts of the Martyrs. Eusebius mentions the Shepherd of Hermas [iii. c. 3] and the First Epistle of St. Clement to the Corinthians [c. 16]; St. Athanasius names a work called Διδαχὴ Αποστόλων [Epist. ad Ruffin.]; and St. Jerome the Homilies of St. Ephraem the Syrian [de Scriptor. cxv.], all as read in the church. And, of course, the apocryphal or deutero-canonical books were used for this purpose [Hieron. Præfat. in Lib. Salomonis; Athan. Epist. Heortastic. et Synops. Scriptur.; the Lectionarium Gallicanum in Mabillon, de Lit. Gallic. &c.].

Freeman traces an interesting connection between the festival lection system of the West and the "odes" of the Eastern offices. These odes, he points out, were called leetions by the Greek monks of the order of St. Basil near Rome [Princ. Div. Serv. i. 125]. The Church of Lyons, he shews, soon adopted a scheme of lections after the Ephesine or Laodicæan model, and from combining this with the Eastern ode scheme would result the Roman and English use. "Hence descended to the English Church of the present day, her still compound, though no longer involved, system of psalms, lessons, and responsive canticles, woven together into one complex act of praise and meditation; an act that meditates still as it praises, and, as it meditates, adores" [ibid. i. 129].

In the Reformed Breviary of Cardinal Quignonez [A.D. 1536], lessons about the length of our Epistles and Gospels were appointed—one from the Old, and another from the New Testament for common use, and a third, generally from the Fathers, for festivals. Our system of lessons was in part established in the Prayer Book of 1549, added to in 1559, and settled in its present form in 1661.

Lessons in the Baptismal and Burial Offices have also ancient authority. In the Sacramentaries of St. Gelasius and St. Gregory, we find eight lections in the former office, and in the COMES of St. Jerome there are nine lections for use at the latter.

LIBELLATICI. A name given in the Primitive Church to those Christians who escaped martyrdom by signing documents declaring themselves not to be Christians, and ready to sacrifice as heathens; or by fraudulently obtaining certificates that they had formally apostatized, when they had not done so. The first kind of Libellatici were looked upon as formal apostates [Lapsed], and if they desired to return to the Church, had to go through several years of penance and probationary discipline, as if they had been actual Sacrificati. The second kind procured their certificates without personal denial of Christ, either by bribing the magistrate to give them without such a formal apostasy on their part, or by obtaining a heathen to personate them: an evasive practice which was severely censured, but not visited with the same degree of penance as in the other case [Cypr. de Lapsis, 14, Epp. xxx. 3; lv. al. li. 10]. The Libellatici are referred to by Pliny in his well-known letter to the Emperor Trajan [Plinii Epp. x. 97], where he speaks of those who confessed that they had formerly been Christians, but had renounced their faith, and whose names he had written down in a book.

LIBELLI PACIS. These were letters written by the martyrs and confessors of the early Church to the bishops, asking that certain persons excluded from communion on account of apostasy, or for other reasons, might be readmitted to the peace of the Church by restoration to the company of the faithful. One of them is preserved among the correspondence of St. Cyprian, having been sent to him by the martyr Lucian, and is as follows: "All the confessors to Cyprian the bishop, greeting. Know that to all concerning whom the account of what they have done since the commission of their sin has been satisfactory to you we have granted peace; and we desire that this letter be made known by you to the other bishops. We bid you to have peace with the holy martyrs. Written by Lucian, one of the clergy, the exorcist and the reader being present" [Cypr. Ep. xxiii. al. xvi.]. The tone of this letter shews that the martyrs were beginning to order rather than to request the restoration of penitents: and several of Cyprian's epistles are written on the subject, protesting against the scandal that was being brought upon the Church by a too free use of this privilege, and by its unwise interference with penitential discipline. The "Libelli Pacis" were sometimes called by the name of "Indulgences."

LIFE. The origin and character of the power by which "we live, and move, and have our being" cannot be elucidated by the most persevering researches of physiologists. Such researches lead to positive conclusions as to the composition of organic substances by the combination of certain elements, but lead to no conclusion whatever as to the mode in which organic substances are vivified. It is proved that air and water are essential to life; that heat, light, and electricity are forces intimately associated with it; that certain functions, such as respiration, are indispensable conditions of life, and that there is, probably, a "nervous fluid," or force, distinct from all these, which has a still more intimate association with the vital power or principle. But it cannot be said of any one of these that it is the original source of vitality in a living organism; nor does physical science offer any other satisfactory and logical explanation as to what that source is.

On the other hand, there are theological reasons for supposing that the origin of life is to be traced directly to the Person of God, and that the mode of communicating it to inferior beings is by a miraculous act of a creative character.

There is, for example, a distinct and unqualified assertion respecting the Word in St. John's Gospel, that "in Him was Life" [John i. 4]; and this assertion is so far from being limited to what is called by analogy "spiritual life," that it seems to be made with primary reference to that self-existence which is the distinctive property of Deity. That the Word is the Source of life to man is also suggested by our Lord's words, "The Father hath life in Himself," and "so hath He given to the Son to have life in Himself" [John v. 26]; "the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God: and they that hear shall live" [John v. 25]; "I am the Resurrection and the Life" [John xi. 25]; as well as by the manner in which He communicated life on three recorded and many unrecorded occasions to bodies in which it had ceased to exist [Matt. ix. 18; Luke vii. 11; John xi. 44; Matt. xi. 5; Luke vii. 22], and by the manner in which He associates future life at the resurrection with the communication of the "Bread of life," which He declares to be Himself [John vi. 51, 57, 58].

The evidence of Holy Scripture all tends in the same direction. The opening page of man's history seems to shew that the first communication of life was made by some direct emanation from the Person of the Creator, the "breath of God," by which the inanimate body became a living man, as life and light were brought to the world by the Spirit of God moving on the face of the waters. A primeval tradition of this truth may be represented by the words of Job (which perhaps preceded the Mosaic record), "the breath of the Almighty hath given me life" [Job xxxiii. 4], for certainly it is not a thought that would come unprompted to the mind. Perhaps, too, such a mystery of our physical life is told us in the saying of Moses, afterwards endorsed by our Lord, that "man doth not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth man live" [Deut. viii. 3; Matt. iv. 4]. And thus there may be the most literal truth in the words by which St. Paul endeavoured to elevate the philosophic Athenians from nature-worship to a knowledge of the supernatural, when he said to them, "He is not far from every one of us, for in Him we live, and move, and have our being" [Acts xvii. 27, 28]. Equally literal may be the words of Ezekiel respecting the vivification of the dry bones [Ezek. xxxvii. 5-14], or those of the Psalmist, when he sang, "Thy Word hath quickened me" [Ps. cxix. 50], and "with Thee is the fountain of life" [Ps. xxxvi. 9].

It may be further observed that life is always associated in Holy Scripture with the highest idea of sacredness, whether as it regards the All-holy Fountain of life Himself, or the life of mankind. The most exalted Name of God which is revealed to us, is that one which contains the idea of perpetual existence; and this name is not seldom applied to the Word, in a more or less direct manner, in the New Testament. The most sacred of all oaths, too, is when the Ever-living One swears by Himself—"As I live, saith the Lord." Considering the origin of life to be this sacred Fountain then, it is no wonder that the stream which flows thence down to this lower world of nature should be accounted sacred, whether it flow in man or in other beings. Hence among the earliest laws given to the human race we find the strongest expressions used on this point. When permission is given to Noah and his posterity to eat of "every moving thing that liveth," a restriction of the licence is added by the words, "but flesh with the life thereof, which is the blood thereof, shall ye not eat" [Gen. ix. 4], a command illustrated by the subsequent law given to the Israelites, in which it is said that blood "is the life of all flesh," &c. [BLOOD], and later still by the Apostolic injunction to the Gentile Christians, who were to be set free from all Jewish ceremonies, that they must yet observe this patriarchal precept of abstinence from blood as an article of food. And if sacred in the lower animals, still more so in man, "for in the image of God made He man" [Gen. ix. 5, 6].

Thus it would seem that Holy Scripture always enjoins respect for life in all creatures, but especially for human life, as being something more than a gift of God which may be dealt with under the laws of that supremacy which He has assigned to mankind. It seems to be regarded not only as a gift, but as the gift of that which has its origin and home in the Person of the true, essential, and ever-abiding Life Himself. As time is born out of eternity, and space out of infinity, and yet we cannot truly say that either is a part of that which has no measure and is indivisible, so the life of all living creatures is born out of the life of their Creator, and yet we are unable to define the exact relation which exists between their life and His life. The life of every living being is the life of the Supreme Source of being, yet no creature is God. The drop of life flows from the Fountain of life, and yet the Fountain is not less full: it reascends thither when "the spirit returns to God Who gave it," and yet there is no increase in the life eternal and immeasurable, through its reabsorption.

It is this great truth, expressed in Holy Scripture by such words as those of St. John, "In Him was life;" or of St. Paul, "In Him we live, and move, and have our being;" or of our Lord Himself, "I am the Life," of which the enduring dream of Pantheism is a distorted shadow. That God is everything, and everything is God, is but a perverted representation of the fact that in every living creature the principle of life is divine; that our very "physical" life itself is a standing proof that God "is not far from every one of us," and that the highest blessing of which we are capable is to be made "partakers of the Divine Nature." The ineradicable belief that God is everywhere has lain deep down in the instincts of mankind in all ages. The modern American Indian instinctively recognises the presence of Deity in the skies, the streams, the forest, the prairie, with which he is familiar, and which command his awe, just as the old Scandinavians beheld Deity in the powers of Nature, and the civilized heathen in the woods and the waters. Wherever man lives or has lived, he has always carried with him a conviction that God was present to him; and so the phenomena of universal nature have often been mistaken for Him, that is, the manifestations of His power for the manifestations of His Person. Yet all have failed to reach up to the Gospel idea of God in Nature; the idea that it is His life by which the whole of the animated world is vivified; and all have failed to see that the highest presence of God in Nature is the presence of that life in ourselves which links us on to the highest Existence of the Universe, and forms the mysterious bond between our visible and invisible being, our present and our future existence.

The question, What is life? is to be met then, by an acceptance of the scriptural theology that God is the original Fountain of Life, that it is communicated to mankind (and probably to all other living beings) by a direct creative act, and that thus the life of all living creatures is the life which exists primarily in the Self-existent. The "aggregation of functions," "co-ordination of actions," or "series of changes," which are sometimes spoken of as life, are in reality only manifestations of its presence; and no definition of it that has ever been given so completely satisfies the requirements of history, logic, and physical science, as that which is to be deduced from the direct and indirect statements of Holy Scripture.

LIGHT. From the earliest ages there has always been an association between the idea of the Divine Presence and that of visible light; and this association has influenced the customs of Divine Worship. If this association had been merely a matter of poetical imagery, it would have needed no notice in this place; but the fact that it has had its influence on Divine worship, necessarily brings it within the range of theological study, and, still more, the fact that it is countenanced by the language of Holy Scripture.

I. LIGHT AND THE DIVINE PRESENCE. As early as the time of Abraham, the manifestation of God's Presence is spoken of as having been made by a visible light. On the night when the great Abrahamic covenant was established, we read that "when the sun went down, and it was dark, behold, a smoking furnace, and a burning lamp that passed between those pieces" of the animals which he had "divided in the midst, and laid each piece one against another," for the sacrifice [Gen. xv. 17, 10]. This mode of making a covenant is referred to in Jeremiah, where those who made it are said to have "cut the calf in twain, and passed between the parts thereof" [Jer. xxxiv. 18]. The meaning of the "smoking furnace" and the "burning lamp" passing between those pieces, is plainly, therefore, that God, in confirming His covenant with the father of the faithful, thus manifested His Presence by the visible sign of a bright light. The same outward sign of the Divine Presence was given on an occasion of scarcely less importance, when God appeared to Moses in the bush that shone with the bright effulgence of fire, and yet was not consumed [Exod. iii. 2]. And when, shortly afterwards, the Lord would impress the whole nation of Israel with a vivid conviction of His Presence among them for guidance and protection, under circumstances in which human guidance and protection would be almost valueless, it is the same sign by which He manifests that Presence: "The Lord went before them by day in a pillar of a cloud[1] to lead them in the way; and by night in a pillar of fire to give them light" [Exod. xiii. 21].

There seems no doubt, moreover, that the Shechinah, which was the special manifestation of the Divine Presence in the Holy of Holies, was a bright light, for it was visible though in a totally darkened chamber. Thus, although it is said that God "dwelleth in the thick darkness," and the Shechinah is called "a cloud" [Lev. xvi. 3], yet it is said at the dedication of the Tabernacle that "Moses was not able to enter into the tent of the congregation because the cloud abode thereon and the glory of the Lord filled the Tabernacle" [Exod. xl. 35]; and likewise at the dedication of the Temple that "the priests could not stand to minister because of the cloud; for the glory of the Lord had filled the house of the Lord" [1 Kings viii. 11]. So also physical splendour of illumination manifested the presence of God at Sinai, when "the Lord descended upon it in fire" [Exod. xix. 18]; and when "the light of the glory of the Lord was like devouring fire on the top of the mount in the eyes of the children of Israel" [Exod. xxiv. 15-17]. To suppose that this appearance was the result of a volcanic fire would be gratuitous, as this is the only authority for the appearance at all; and such a supposition is disproved by the fact that as the bush was unconsumed at Horeb, so Moses passed into the midst of this luminous glory, remained there many days, and returned uninjured.

Such luminous manifestations were by no means confined to the Mosaic period. When Ezekiel was rapt up to heaven, he saw the same kind of appearance which Moses had seen, "a great cloud, and a fire infolding itself, and a brightness about it" [Ezek. i. 4]; when Isaiah beheld the Lord sitting upon His throne "the House was filled with smoke," which Vitringa interprets as "a thick cloud," the symbol of the Divine Presence [Isa. vi. 4]; when Habakkuk saw the vision of God "coming from Teman, His brightness was as the light . . . burning coals went forth at His feet" [Hab. iii. 4, 5; cf. Psa. xviii. 12]; and when Ezekiel again beheld "the glory of the Lord God of Israel coming from the way of the East . . . the earth shined with His glory" [Ezek. xliii. 2]. Thus the Jew was taught by God Himself to think of Him in such terms as David used when he sang "Thou coverest Thyself with light as with a garment." It was not in a spiritual sense only that the words, "The Lord is my light and my salvation," or "In Thy light shall we see light," contained a truth; but in a sense also which we may venture to call literal, since God so manifested His glory that men could actually behold the light of it.

Much more might be said on these luminous manifestations of the Divine presence, but the instances given will shew that the unphilosophical mind of the Jew had from the earliest days been familiar with this association of ideas. It might also be shewn that the more philosophical phases of heathen mythology recognised the same principle, or fact; nearly all such mythology being traceable to a form of light-worship on which nature-worship had been engrafted, and of which the very ancient system of the Ephesian Artemis was the principal type. What has been said, however, is enough to illustrate that strong association between light and the Person of our Lord, which is brought out in the New Testament, one principal object of which appears to be the mystical enunciation of His Divinity in a manner with which the whole world had long been familiar. When St. Paul wrote to the Hebrews that Christ was "the brightness [ἀπαύγασμα] of the glory" of that God who had "spoken to the fathers by the prophets" [Heb. i. 1, 2], he was using language familiar to them; and when St. John wrote to the world at large, after Judaism had passed away, "This then is the message which we have heard of Him, and declare unto you, that God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all" [1 John i. 5], he also was speaking a truth that would commend itself to all as one lying at the bottom of their religion, whatever it might be. At the same time they would be speaking out of their personal experience, for the one had seen the "bright light" of his Divine Saviour's presence on the road to Damascus, and the other had seen "the excellent glory" at the Transfiguration. They would also be giving to the world the very truth which the Lord Jesus Himself had proclaimed at the beginning and the end of His ministry, "I am the light of the world" [Luke iv. 16; Matt. iv. 16; John viii. 12, xii. 35, 36]. The Jews had learned that Jehovah is light; the heathen had been familiar with the same belief; and now Christ drew all the dispersed rays of truth into a focus, and directed it upon His own Person as that by which the full glory of the Divine Presence was brought down to dwell among men, Φῶς ἐκ Φωτὸς. So began that climax of all God's manifestations among men, which will be finally and in all its fulness attained when the City of God will have no need of the sun, neither of the moon to shine in it, but the glory of God will lighten it, and the Lamb will be "the light thereof" [Rev. xxi. 23].

[1] Those who have become familiar with the appearance of the flames coming out from the tops of iron or glass furnaces, will not stumble at the cloudy appearance by day of that which was a pillar of fire by night. The more volatile part of the incandescent gas which ascends from these furnaces is visible in the day time only by its tremulous motion, although it is opaque like a cloud, and not transparent like pure air. But at night the same burning gas illuminates the country round with its glare.

II. The Ritual use of Light.—That such distinct revelations of Divine glory by a visible light should find their correlative in the usages of Divine worship was only natural. But the usages of the Jewish dispensation originated in a still higher source than natural feeling and reverent reasoning, being directly ordained by God Himself: and in these usages there was a distinct recognition of artificial light as a liturgical or ritual symbol.

For such a purpose God ordained—in the midst, let it be remembered, of that fulness of Divine glory on the top of the mount which had so dazzled the eyes of the Israelites—that a seven-branched candlestick of gold should be made, to be continually burning [Exod. xxv. 31-40, xxxvii. 17-24]. There is an elaborateness about these directions, which seems to place the candlestick in even a more important position than other vessels of the sanctuary; and this elaborateness extends to the very oil which was to be burned in the seven bowls of it [Exod. xxxvii. 20; Lev. xxiv. 1-4], as if nothing could be left to the taste, judgment, or inclination of man, even of a man like Moses. The candlestick was also to be set up very near to the true Shechinah; in the Holy Place, on the north side of the Altar of Incense, and just before the vail which separated the place of the priests' daily ministration from the Holy of Holies. The seven flames of this lamp were to be continually burning, and this injunction concerning the perpetuity of the light seems to have been so strictly kept, even during the wanderings of the Desert, and the disastrous times of the later Judges, that its extinction marked an epoch in the history of Israel; so that one of their historians records of a certain event that it occurred "ere the lamp of God went out in the temple of the Lord" [1 Sam. iii. 3]. Perhaps its perpetuity was of all the more importance because it had been originally lighted, both in the tabernacle and the temple, at the supernatural flame which God sent down from above to consume the sacrifices at both dedications, which flame alone was the source of all the fire that was used for sacrificial purposes up to the time of the Babylonish captivity. It is not necessary to more than mention the fact that, long after this seven-branched candlestick had been carried in triumphal procession at Rome, its image was reproduced in the vision of the Apocalypse, where Christ speaks of Himself again in association with light as "He that holdeth the seven stars in His right hand, who walketh in the midst of the seven golden candlesticks" [Rev. ii. 1].

Some learned ritualists believe that there is evidence in the apocalyptic references to "candlesticks" and "light," as also in the "many lights" of the "upper chamber" at Troas [Acts xx. 8], to shew that usages like those of the Mosaic dispensation were continued from the first in the Christian Church. However this be, it is certain that in the fourth century artificial light was habitually used in churches, during the daytime, for a symbolical purpose, as if its use were an ancient custom, as well as in greater abundance than mere necessity required at night as a token of Christian gladness. One of the sacred poems of St. Paulinus, Bishop of Nola [A.D. 353-431], speaking of the great numbers of wax lights which burned about the altars, making the night more splendid than the day, adds that the light of the day itself was made more glorious by the same means:—

> "Nocte dieque micant. Sic nox splendore diei
> Fulget: et ipsa dies cœlesti illustris honore
> Plus micat innumeris lucem geminata lucernis."
> [Paulin. Nat. iii. S. Felicis.]

The practice was, in fact, made a subject of ridicule by Vigilantius [A.D. 376], who was answered by St. Jerome in words which shew that a definite meaning was associated with it. "Throughout the churches of the East when the Gospel is read candles are lighted, although the sun be shining, not for the purpose of driving away darkness, but as an outward sign of gladness . . . that under the type of an artificial illumination that light may be symbolized of which we read in the Psalter, 'Thy Word, O Lord, is a lantern unto my feet, and a light unto my paths'" [Jerome, Epist. adv. Vigilant. iii.]. The same explanation is given by St. Isidore [A.D. 595] in his work on the ritual of the Church [Isidor. Origin. vii. 12], as also by Amalarius [A.D. 810] and Rabanus Maurus [A.D. 822].

Baptismal Lights. Artificial light was used in the Primitive Church during the administration of Holy Baptism. The Sacramentaries of Gelasius [A.D. 492] and St. Gregory [A.D. 590] direct that on Easter Eve, at the eighth hour, or two o'clock in the afternoon, the ceremonies of the baptismal office shall begin with the lighting of two tapers, which are to be held at each horn of the altar by readers, during the reading of the appointed eight lessons from Holy Scripture. The taper-bearers then preceded the procession of the clergy to the font; and when the bishop blessed the water, he held one of the tapers in it as part of the rite. From other writers we learn that every day during Easter-Week, until Dominica in Albis, the newly-baptized walked in procession to the Church with a burning taper in front of them. At the same early period, a lighted taper, significant of the burning lamps of the wise virgins [Greg. Naz. Orat. xl. de Bapt.], was placed in the hand of every person at the time of their baptism. All these usages are clearly associated with the idea of Illumination by the grace of God, given through the presence of the "Light that lighteth every man" in the ministration of the Holy Spirit.

Gospel Lights. The early use of these has been already indicated in the quotation given from St. Jerome. Their subsequent use is shewn by the general testimony of all writers on the ceremonies of the Church from that time downwards. St. Isidore [A.D. 595] says that those who are called acolytes by the Greeks are called "ceroferarii" by the Latins, because they carry tapers when the Gospel is read, or the Sacrifice offered [Isid. Etymolog. vi.]. They are mentioned also by Alcuin, Amalarius, Rabanus Maurus, and Micrologus, authors dating from the eighth to the eleventh century. Le Brun considers that the custom was derived from the Jews, who had a lamp perpetually burning before the book of the Law in their synagogues [i. 70].

Festival Lights. It seems also to have been the practice of the Primitive Church to burn many tapers around the tombs of martyrs on their festivals, as a sign of gladness for their triumph and their entrance into the light of Christ's presence. This practice is mentioned by Gregory Nazianzen [Orat. xxxix. xlii.], but was forbidden, so far as cemeteries were concerned, by the thirty-fourth canon of the Council of Elvira, held about A.D. 325. It still continued, however, to be the practice to burn such lights within the walls of churches, not only around the graves of martyrs, but of all for whom the provision was made, on their "obits," i.e. the anniversaries of their deaths.

The Feast of the Purification was honoured with lights to such an extent as to be thence called Candlemas: every one, says Alcuin in the eighth century, bearing a taper in their hand when they went into church, and the practice being noticed by St. Bernard in the twelfth century.

The Queen of Festivals was illuminated by the Paschal candle, which was set up on Maundy-Thursday, and left standing until the Wednesday after Ascension-day. A minute description of that used in Durham Cathedral is given by a writer of the Reformation age, from which it appears to have been an enormous taper placed on a structure reaching nearly to the roof, and surrounded near the floor by many other lights. [Davies' Rites of Durham, p. 14, ed. 1767.]

Funeral Lights are also mentioned by St. Gregory Nazianzen, tapers being then carried in procession [Orat. iv. x.]; and also by St. Jerome [Ep. xxvii.], St. Chrysostom [Homil. in Heb. iv.], and the historian Theodoret [v. 36]. This practice of burning tapers around the dead has come down to our own times, though only brought conspicuously into notice at the "lying-in-state" of persons of rank.

Eucharistic Lights. The use of lights at the celebration of the Holy Eucharist has come down from the Primitive Church, hardly any ritual custom associated with the blessed Sacrament having more historical evidence for its support. They are mentioned by all the writers who have been previously quoted as speaking of the use of lights at the reading of the Gospel, and by many others who do not mention that custom; and their use appears to have been universal throughout the Church from the time of the Apostles until the attacks made on all Christian ceremonies by the fanatics of the sixteenth century.

Some special injunctions respecting the use of Eucharistic lights in the Church of England may be given as a local example of the universal custom, but they form only a small part of the evidence that might be adduced to shew that the English custom was like that observed in the other Churches of the world.

King Edgar's Canons, in the latter half of the tenth century, contain the injunction, "Let there be lights always burning in the church when Mass is singing" [Thorpe's Laws and Instit. ii. 253]. A Canon of Ælfric, Archbishop of Canterbury, a few years later [A.D. 990] illustrates the preceding one of Edgar by describing the acolyte as "one who bears the candle or taper in God's ministries, when the Gospel is read, or when the Housel is hallowed at the altar . . . . with that light to announce bliss, in honour of Christ, who is the One Light" [ibid. 347]. After the Conquest [A.D. 1085] St. Osmund wrote the Consuetudinary or Custom-book of his Sarum Use. In this he orders the treasurer of the Cathedral to provide four candles on all Sundays for use at Mass, two of which are to be placed "insuper altari," and the other two "in gradu coram altari." By the Council of Oxford, held for the province of Canterbury [A.D. 1222], it is ordered that at the time when Masses are solemnly celebrated, two candles, "vel ad minus una cum lampade," shall be burning at the altar [Wilkins, Concil. i. 595]. A constitution of Bridport, Bishop of Salisbury [A.D. 1236], shews that the custom extended to all parochial churches, the parishioners being required to provide "wax candles in the chancel, and also sufficient lights throughout the whole year at mattins, vespers, and the Mass." The Synod of Exeter [A.D. 1287] has a canon ordering that two candles shall always be burned out of reverence for the Sacrament, and in case one should be accidentally extinguished [ibid. ii. 132]. A constitution of Archbishop Reynolds [A.D. 1322] enjoins, "Let two candles, or one at the least, be lighted at the High Mass" [ibid. i. 714]: and the gloss of the mediæval canonist Lindewood is "the candles so burning signify Christ Himself Who is the Brightness of the Eternal Light" [Lindewood, 236; cf. Heb. i. 3]. Lastly, at the Reformation, when many ceremonies were abolished, the Eucharistic lights were retained by some Injunctions issued under the authority of the Crown A.D. 1547, which ordered that the clergy "shall suffer from henceforth no torches, nor candles, tapers, or images of wax, to be set afore any image or picture, but only two lights upon the high altar, before the Sacrament, which, for the signification that Christ is the very true Light of the world, they shall suffer to remain still" [Cardw. Docum. Ann. i. 7]. Up to the time of the Great Rebellion the custom was still continued in the royal chapels, the cathedrals, and some churches, and is often spoken of by the Puritan writers with their usual bitter hostility to ceremonies. But this one, like many other ancient and primitive customs, failed to be generally revived at the Restoration, and its revival in recent times caused much astonishment among those who were unacquainted with the old habits of the Church of of England.

The manner in which the Eucharistic lights were used, and the number of them, has varied in different ages. In the Primitive Church they seem to have been placed in considerable numbers near to or around the altar. An ancient history of York Cathedral [A.D. 787], printed by Mabillon, speaks of "three great vases" hung on high for the altar-lights. The Consuetudinary of Sarum orders two candles to be placed above the altar, and two on the steps in front of it. Durandus speaks of two candlesticks placed at the horns of the altar. Bouquillet, in his Traité Historique de la Liturgie Sacrée, says of candles and flowers, that though they were used abundantly in ancient churches, they were placed anywhere but on the altar during the first twelve centuries: the former being generally carried by acolytes, and placed upon the ground near the altar [Pugin's Glossary, 44]. The ancient custom of the Church of England until about the fifteenth century was to place thus the candlesticks and lights which had been carried by acolytes in the procession to the altar; and in the greater churches, such as St. Alban's [Walcott's Sacred Archæol. 97] or Durham [Davies's Rites of Durham], to have a taper burning in a silver basin hung above the celebrant's head during the time of the celebration. "Before the high altar," writes Davies, "within the quire above mentioned, were three silver basins hanging in chains of silver. . . . These silver basins had latten basins within them, having pricks for serges, or great waxen candles to stand on; the latten basins being to receive the drops of the three candles, which burned day and night, in token that the house was always watching to God. There was also another silver basin, hanging in silver chains before the Sacrament of the aforesaid high altar, but nearer to the said altar than the others, hanging almost over the priest's back: which was only lighted in time of Mass, and that ended, extinguished." Elsewhere the custom was established of placing a lighted taper on either side of the altar crucifix, but this, with all other image lights, was forbidden at the Reformation, standard lights "before the Sacrament" being continued, by the Injunctions previously quoted.[1]

It may be said, in conclusion, that natural feeling, the general traditions of the world, the special history of the only true religion of its ancient days, prophetic language, and ritual custom, all taught those who lived before Christ that God is Light. Our Lord and His Apostles drew the rays of this belief into a focus upon His Person, and the idea of Christ as "the Light of the world" has ever since been vividly kept in mind by the teaching of the New Testament, the words of the Nicene Creed, and the ritual customs of the Church.

To unscientific ages, there seemed nothing strange in this association of Light and the Divine Presence: an age of advanced knowledge, which has become familiar with the properties of light, may consider such an association to be only a piece of sacred imagery, and may even feel a reverent dread of unreality on the one hand, or of materialism on the other, if it should be much dwelt upon. Yet, after all, the revelation of God Himself is a security against both these dangers. The Christian world would lose a great treasure if it were to lose the mystical teaching of Holy Scripture on the subject; and even the ritual usage of light is a very significant bond of external union between the modern Church, that of Primitive ages, and the dispensation of Sinai.

LIMBUS. This term is used in the later theology of the Western Church, to designate the abode, in the state intermediate between death and the judgment, of those who lived before the coming of Christ, and of infants since Christ's coming who die unbaptized.

It is very commonly said that the doctrine of a Limbus is one of the rash and unwarranted speculations of the Schoolmen. The Schoolmen no doubt enunciated the doctrine with more precision than had been previously done, inasmuch as they had before them for comparison and suggestion all the teaching of the Fathers: but the doctrine itself is, and was, no novelty. Barrow [Ser. xxviii. On the Creed], dismissing the doctrine as one of the conceits which he cannot well be at the pains to consider, yet finds in Justin Martyr "that Christ went to deliver the souls of the just and prophets from the wicked powers, into whose power they had fallen" [Dialogue with Trypho. c. 105].

Irenæus quotes again and again as from the Scripture the remarkable words, "The Holy Lord remembered His dead Israel who slept in the land of sepulture: and He descended to them to make known to them His salvation, that they might be saved." See particularly where, speaking of the disciples sleeping in Gethsemane, he writes, "Coming to them the second time, he aroused them and made them stand up, in token that His Passion is the arousing of His sleeping disciples, on whose account He also descended into the lower parts of the earth, to behold with His eyes the state of those who were resting from their labours,[2] in reference to whom He did also declare to the disciples: 'Many prophets and righteous men have desired to see and hear what ye do see and hear'" [Irenæus, Hæres. iv. 22; see also v. 31].

In fragment xxviii. [vol. ii. p. 171, Ante-Nic. Lib.] the miracle of the iron floating "is a sign that souls should be borne aloft (ἀναγωγῆς ψυχῶν) through the instrumentality of wood, upon which He suffered, Who can lead those souls aloft that follow His ascension. This event is also an indication of the fact, that when the holy soul of Christ descended [to Hades] many souls ascended and were seen in their bodies." The ἀναγωγη ψυχῶν appears to be nothing else than the medieval Extractio Animarum; and the miracle, Matt. xxvii. 52, is considered to be symbolical of, or a part of, the Harrowing of Hell. The miracle is so treated by Clemens Alexandrinus, who, when he had said, "the Lord descended to Hades for no other end but to preach the Gospel," adds, "Further, the Gospel says that many bodies of those that slept arose—plainly as having been translated to a better state. There took place, then, a universal movement and translation through the economy of the Saviour" [Clem. Alex. Strom. vi. 6]. Tertullian writes, "Christus descendit in inferiora terrarum, ut illic Patriarchas et Prophetas compotes sui faceret:" and presently afterwards, "in Paradiso, quo jam tunc et Patriarchæ et Prophetæ, appendices Dominicæ resurrectionis, ab inferis migraverint" [Tertul. De Anima, p. 353, edit. Rigalt]. Jerome writes, "Christus ad fornacem descendit Inferni, in quo clausæ justorum animæ tenebantur. Postquam eo descendit Inferorum claustra perfodit, diripuit, vastavit, spoliavit, vinctas inde animas liberando" [Jerom. In Ecclesiast.]. Athanasius writes of Christ's descent into Hades, to break the bonds of souls there detained [Athanas. Contr. Apollin. i. 13, 14; ii. 15, 16]. Augustine places the abode of the souls of the Fathers "locis quidem a tormentis impiorum remotissimis, sed apud Inferos, donec eos inde sanguis Christi et ad ea loca descensus eruerit" [Aug. De Civit. Dei, xx. 15].

[1] When the use of Eucharistic lights was symbolically revived by the "lumina cæca" of the Restoration period, the candles were placed upon the altar as these crucifix lights had been placed, probably under the impression that the latter were the old Eucharistic lights.

[2] This translation is that adopted in Clark's Ante-Nicene Library, from Harvey's interpretation of the obscure Latin text, "id quod erat inoperatum conditionis." The obscurity of these words does not extend to the general doctrine of Irenæus.

The Schoolmen divided into five classes the souls who are waiting for the last judgment:—[1.] The Fathers of the old Church, who received, through the Incarnation of our Lord, an access of spiritual glory or felicity, announced to them and conferred upon them by our Lord's descent into Hades. With them are the faithful who are freed from Purgatory, and the martyrs whose souls are in the Apocalypse represented as beneath the altar. These are awaiting the glory of the resurrection, and their entrance into heaven—the place of their waiting being called Paradise. [2.] Those who lived before our Lord's Incarnation, but did not merit this access of felicity, and remain in the same state as before our Lord's descent into Hades. Their abode is Limbus Patrum. [3.] Infants who die unbaptized, who are in the Limbus Infantium, which is often identified with the Limbus Patrum [St. Thomas Aquinas, Sum. Theol. Suppl. ad Partem III. quæst. lxix. 5, 6, 7, 8]. [4.] The baptized whose imperfections require and whose degree of faith allows a salutary and remedial pain which shall purge away defilement and fit them for the kingdom of heaven. These are in Purgatory. [5.] Those without hope: who are in Infernum, an anticipation of Hell, the final place of torment.

Of this scheme the errors as regards Purgatory do not invalidate the part which relates to the ancient Fathers and the unbaptized. The latter may be held independently of the former. There appears to be little novelty in the doctrine: only the term Limbus is new, and yet it is not known by whom that term was introduced. It is not found in the Master of the Sentences, but is used by his commentators. It seems to point to imagery such as that of Dante, who represents Limbus as the outer zone of hell [Milman's Latin Christianity, bk. xiv. c. 2]. The popular teaching in England on the subject may be seen in the Extractio Animarum of the Townly mysteries, which may be referred to the time of Henry VI. or Edward IV. The doctrine of our earlier reformers is given in the magnificent interpretation of the fifth article of the Creed in "The Institution of a Christian Man." "Our Saviour Jesus Christ at His entry into hell first conquered and oppressed both the devil and hell, and also death itself . . . afterward He spoiled hell, and delivered and brought with Him from thence all the souls of those righteous and good men which from the fall of Adam died in the favour of God, and in the faith and belief of this our Saviour, which was then to come." Of such interpretation of the article of our Saviour's descent into hell the doctrine of a Limbus is a part, or perhaps a corollary.

It is much to be regretted that one cannot now venture to use the word "Limbo," perfectly unobjectionable as it is in itself. The profane songs of ignorant Puritans, the use of the word in the coarse satire of Milton, the foul ribaldries of Bayle [see his article "Patin"] have made the word a scandal. Archbishop Trench has noticed the inconveniences arising from the ambiguities of the words by which we name the abodes of the intermediate state: and to them may be added the inconvenience that we have no word we dare use for the "Locus in quo SS. Patrum ac piorum animæ ante Christi mortem consistebant, ubi etiam infantium qui absque baptismo moriuntur consistere animas aiunt."

LITANY. [Λιτανέια.] This word, which has the general meaning of prayer or entreaty, was particularly restricted to its present sense of solemn public intercessions at a very early date.

The litanies of the universal Church are divided by Neale [Essays on Liturg. &c., p. 73] into three classes, viz.: [1] The Roman (or Western) Litany; [2] the Greek Ectene; and [3] the Ambrosian and Mozarabic Preces. Of these three classes the second doubtless contains the norm of all litanies. We find in the Apostolic Constitutions [viii. 6] a specimen of this class, probably of the fourth century. The deacon bids prayer and names the subject of each petition, and at the end of each suffrage the people reply "Lord have mercy." A corresponding ectene finds its place in nearly every office of the Eastern Church.

Akin to this is the third class, viz., the Mozarabic and Ambrosian Preces. On the first five Sundays in Lent the Mozarabic Liturgy has metrical ectenæ—the first three addressed to our Lord, the last two put into His mouth. To these the people respond "Placare et miserere," "Quia peccavimus tibi," "Miserere, Pater juste, et omnibus indulgentiam da"—"Tu, Pater Sancte, miserere, et libera me," &c. The Ambrosian Liturgy has two sets of Preces, one for the first, third, and fifth, the other for the second and fourth Sundays in Lent, which have the responses "Lord have mercy," &c. These Preces are a plain link between the litanies of East and West, and like to them is the "Litania missalis in codice Fuldensi" given by Bingham [Antiq. i. sec. 2].

One of the earliest instances of the use of litanies in the West is in the churches of Gaul. It was their special custom to invoke God's mercy by processional supplications [Sidon. Apollin. v. 14]. These, in a time of extraordinary calamity, were reordained with special solemnity by Mamertus, Bishop of Vienne [A.D. 467], and henceforth were the distinguishing ceremony of Rogation-tide. [ROGATIONS.] It was with part of the Rogation service of the Church of Lyons that St. Augustine and his band of missionaries entered Canterbury [A.D. 597], singing a litany "consona voce" [Bede, Eccl. Hist. i. c. 25].

St. Gregory the Great instituted the "litania major" [Mansi, xii. 400] for St. Mark's day [A.D. 590], which was also called "litania septiformis," the clergy and laity going in procession, divided into seven classes. St. Gregory, in speaking of it, names the litany of the clergy, that of laymen, that of monks, of virgins, of married women, of widows, and of the poor and children. This litany of St. Mark was adopted in England by the Council of Cloveshoe [A.D. 747].

About this century invocations of saints began to appear in the litanies; the earlier mention of them in prayer having been general, and the words only asking that the saints might pray for us. In process of time, the number of invocations became considerable, Martene quoting one litany in which ninety-four occurred. The litany of the Anglo-Saxon Church had a long series in the ninth century, and one given by Muratori names one hundred and two saints. Litanies were usually chanted in procession and with great solemnity. The laws of Justinian mention the crosses used on these occasions [Novels, cxxiii. 32]. These processions were one of the means employed by St. Chrysostom in contending with the Arians of Constantinople, and silver crosses were furnished for them by the Empress Eudoxia [Socrates, Eccl. Hist. vi. 8]. The Council of Mayence [A.D. 813] ordered that "all should go barefoot and in sackcloth in the procession of the great litany of three days."[1]

The English Litany was known to the people generally for some centuries before the Reformation through the authorized Primers. It was set forth in a revised form [A.D. 1544], when the invocations of saints were restricted to three clauses, viz. :—One to the Blessed Virgin, another to the angels and blessed spirits, and a third to the "patriarchs, prophets, apostles, martyrs, virgins, and all the blessed company of heaven." When the litany was inserted in the Prayer Book, these clauses were omitted. In the first edition of the Prayer Book [A.D. 1549], it was ordered to be said or sung on Wednesdays and Fridays, to which days Sunday was added in the year 1552.

[1] For old English ceremonies in connection with the Litany, see Blunt's Annot. Bk. of Com. Pr., p. 47.

The Litany consists of five parts :—[1] invocations; [2] deprecations; [3] obsecrations; [4] intercessions; and [5] the versicles and prayers. The old litanies always began with the "Kyrie Eleëson," and the invocations of saints followed those of the Holy Trinity.

It must ever be remembered that in its origin the litany was a distinctly "Eucharistic feature;" a series of intercessions closely associated with the Eucharistic Sacrifice. So we find it in the East, and so it was originally in the West also: one most notable feature being the pleading of the work of Christ in behalf of His Church. In a Syriac form given by Renaudot, there is a most beautiful early instance of this. Taking the paten and cup into his right and left hand, the priest commemorates [1] the annunciation; [2] the nativity; [3] the baptism; [4] the passion; [5] the lifting up on the cross; [6] the life-giving death; [7] the burial; [8] the resurrection; and [9] the session. Then follows the remembrance of the departed, and then supplication for all, both living and departed, ending with three Kyries and the Lord's Prayer. This beautiful Eucharistic intercession St. Ephraem the Syrian "rendered into a very solemn hymn" [Freeman's Princ. Div. Serv. ii. p. 325].

Such an Eucharistic use of the litany is the best explanation of its customary use on Sundays, for which its extremely penitential character might otherwise appear unsuitable. In this light it is a faithful carrying out of the command of the Apostle, "I exhort therefore, that supplications, prayers, intercessions, and Eucharists (εὐχαριστίας) be offered for all men" [1 Tim. ii. 1].

LITERAL INTERPRETATION in Scripture as in other books, results from the ordinary use and force of the words. It gives the sense which the words proximately signify according to the writer's intention. This may be either the proper or the metaphorical meaning. As every text of Scripture has a literal sense—a sense which constantly conveys the highest truths (e.g., "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God"), the literal sense must include the metaphorical which, frequently, can alone have been intended :—e.g. St. Matt. iii. 12; xvi. 6: "Whose fan is in His hand;" "Beware of the leaven of the Pharisees;" &c. When any literal sense of Scripture is denied, the metaphorical is referred to the mystical. It is from the literal sense only that the theologian should derive arguments in proof or vindication of the great dogmas of the Faith.

LITERÆ FORMATÆ. This was a general title in the ancient Church for several kinds of commendatory epistles. The origin of the name is obscure, some considering that it signifies formal letters only, others that formatæ is synonymous with sigillatæ, the term lex formata being used in the Theodosian Code for a law certified by a particular kind of seal.

Some documents of the kind appear to have been used in apostolic times, Apollos receiving such from the Church of Ephesus when going thence to Achaia [Acts xviii. 27], and St. Paul referring to them as if they were well known among Christians in 2 Cor. iii. 1.

In the post-Apostolic Church these literæ formatæ were issued by the bishops for three purposes. [1.] First were the epistolæ commendatoriæ, by which the clergy and others were commended to the Christian fellowship of churches in countries where they might be travelling. [2.] Secondly were the epistolæ communicatoriæ, certificates of communion, called also pacificæ, ecclesiasticæ, and canonicæ, which were given to all as a token that they were admitted by the Holy Communion to the peace and fellowship of the Church. [3.] Thirdly were the epistolæ dimissoriæ (also called pacificæ), which were given to the clergy on leaving one diocese for another as certificates that they left in peace with their bishop. [Du Cange; Du Pin, De Antiq. Eccl. Disciplina; Bingham.] The literæ formatæ are not to be confounded with the Libelli Pacis.

LITURGY [λειτουργία]. The Form, Order, or Office, for the celebration and administration of Eucharistic sacrifice and sacrament.

The word was adopted from classical Greek by the Alexandrian translators of the Old Testament, as the equivalent of the Hebrew עֲבוֹדָה, Abodah, which was commonly used to signify the divine service rendered to God in the Tabernacle and the Temple by the Priests and Levites. [Numb. vii. 5, viii. 22, xviii. 6; 1 Chron. ix. 13, xxviii. 13; 2 Chron, viii. 14, xxxv. 16.] With a similar reference to the Jewish service it was also used by St. Luke and St. Paul in the New Testament [Luke i. 23; Heb. ix. 21]; the latter applying it likewise to the "more excellent ministry" of our Lord Himself [Heb. viii. 6].

While the Temple was standing, that is, until the death of all the Apostles except St. John, the only distinctive "ministry" among Jewish or proselyte Christians was that of the Eucharist; and it was the same probably among Gentile Christians also. As might be expected, therefore, the New Testament contains some illustrations of the transitional use of words derived from λειτουργέω which associate them with the distinctive usage of the word "liturgy" in later times. Thus St. Paul associates the term with sacrifice; "If I be offered ἐπὶ τῇ θυσίᾳ καὶ λειτουργίᾳ of your faith [Philip. ii. 17]; and, "that I should be the λειτουργὸν of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles, ἱερουργοῦντα the Gospel of God, that ἡ προσφορὰ [Eng. marg. sacrifice] of the Gentiles might be acceptable, being sanctified by the Holy Ghost" [Rom. xv. 16]. The Greek terms here used are all (Dr. Burton remarks) borrowed from the service of the Temple; and they were all in recognised association with the Eucharist among the earliest of those writers who came after the Apostles. [Eucharist. Mass.] It seems also as if the transitional use of the word had been carried a step further when St. Luke wrote that the Apostles were liturgizing [λειτουργούντων] to the Lord with fasting, when they ordained St. Paul and St. Barnabas to their ministry [Acts xiii. 2]. Suicer, indeed, rejects any Eucharistic sense here, but Erasmus, with less respect for the Vulgate, renders the words "cum illi Domino sacrificarent."

Among the Greek Fathers the terms "Mystical Liturgy," and "Holy Liturgy," are often used for the ministration of the Eucharist; and ἡ θεία λειτουργία is spoken of in the Apostolical Constitutions [Const. App. viii. 6], as if "The Divine Liturgy" was the received title of the service in the beginning of the fourth century in the Eastern Churches, as it is at the present day. Our English term "Divine Service" was also used for the Eucharistic service much more distinctively in former days than it has been in recent times.

Having thus glanced at the etymology of the term by which they are distinguished, we may pass on to the more important subject of the history and structure of the formularies used for the celebration of the Holy Eucharist.

I. Origin of the Liturgy. The circumstances under which the Holy Eucharist was instituted make it absolutely certain that the Apostles celebrated it from the first with a considerable amount of ritual preciseness, and the same circumstances make it probable that they also used, from the beginning, some liturgical form. For the command, "This do," involves, to say the least, the imitation of our Lord's acts in taking bread in His hands, breaking it, and distributing it, as also an analogous ceremony with the Cup. But our Lord also used words, for, first, He "blessed" [Matt. xxvi. 26; Mark xiv. 22] the bread, or "gave thanks" [Luke xxii. 19; 1 Cor. xi. 23], before distributing it; secondly, He said, "Take, eat, This is My Body," when giving it to them; thirdly, when He took the Cup He also "gave thanks;" and fourthly, at the distribution of its contents He used words of a similar character to those used in distributing the Bread. After seeing our Lord's acts, hearing His words, and receiving His command, "This do," the Apostles could not have gone to work "anyhow," as the saying is, according to the impulse of the moment, in "breaking bread" after our Lord's Ascension, and there is not the slightest historical or logical reason for supposing that they did. The Lord's acts and words were a new Passover ritual to men who had been familiar with the old Passover ritual from their earliest childhood; and His emphatic association of them with the startling, novel, and most memorable phrase, "The New Testament," or rather "the New Covenant" (διαθήκη), would give an additional sacredness to them in the eyes of men long used to think of the "Old Covenant," made between God and their fathers. But, in fact, it seems to be unnecessary to prove that the Apostles used some set form of liturgy in celebrating the Memorial of their Lord. The fact that they celebrated it embraces also the proof that they used some form,—that, for example, they "brake the Bread" and "gave thanks" as Christ had directed them to do;—and this form was in itself a Liturgy.

As, therefore, the germ of the "Old Testament" Passover ritual originated with God, and was scrupulously incorporated into their Passover customs by the Jews, so the germ of "New Testament" Eucharistic ritual originated also with God the Son, and was incorporated with equal care into their Eucharistic customs by the Apostles and first Christians. All research into the history of liturgies must consequently start from the Divine words of Institution, and they form, in fact, the central core around which all subsequent prayers, praises, and ritual customs gathered, and out of which these may be said to have grown. But as the Holy Ghost was sent into the Church to guide it into all truth, His Presence caused a continual development and evolution of truth during at least the whole of the Apostolic age. The Apostles were not restricted to a bare repetition of their Master's words in teaching His Church, neither were they restricted to His words and acts without any addition or development in the celebration of the Eucharist. Christ settled the principles on which His Church was to be founded in the instructions which he gave to the Apostles: but the details of the structure were left to them and their successors to develope, under the guidance of human prudence and of the Holy Spirit. Thus arose that gathering of prayers, praises, and ritual customs around the original words of Institution which has been already referred to,—some in the Apostolic age, others at a later date,—and the history of these is the history of the Liturgies.

II. Traces of the Apostolic Liturgy. The earliest ritual writer extant, St. Proclus, Patriarch of Constantinople [A.D. 434], states that the Apostles arranged a liturgy before they separated to go to their respective fields of labour [Bona, Rer. Lit. I. v. 3]. They were very likely to have done so, as they were very likely to have settled a form of Creed, so that all of them might do their work with some kind of uniformity. St. Chrysostom indicates some such tradition when he says, "Consider what the Apostles did when they partook of that holy Supper? Did they not betake themselves to prayers and hymns?" [Homil. ad Corinth. xxvii. 7]. St. Gregory says indeed that the Apostles used the Lord's Prayer only in consecrating the holy oblation [Ep. lxiii.], but of course he does not mean that they omitted to use our Lord's words of Institution, and therefore his words cannot be taken in their strictest sense. Cardinal Bona reconciles the apparent contradiction by suggesting that the Apostles used a short form, containing only the essential part of the liturgy, when the time was short (through danger or other circumstances), and a longer form when the time permitted them to do so. "We admit, without hesitation," says Guéranger, "that the construction of the liturgy by the Apostles, like all else which is great, was a progressive work: that the assemblage of rites connected with the holy Sacrifice and Sacrament was not complete from the day of Pentecost. But was not the New Testament itself formed step by step? Did not fifty years elapse between the publication respectively of St. Matthew's and St. John's Gospels? It is granted also that, since the necessary work of Christian instruction would naturally engross the greater part of the time which the Apostles passed in the different churches, the period devoted to the Liturgy would often be curtailed; as was the case at Troas, where the breaking of the Bread, that is to say, the celebration of the Eucharist, was delayed till midnight, in consequence of the length of the Apostle's preaching, which he resumed after the solemnization of the Mysteries, and continued till daybreak. But from the moment that the Christian faith took root in any city, and the Apostles were able to establish a bishop, priests, and deacons, the external forms received enlargement, and Divine service became, of necessity, more solemn. Accordingly, St. Paul, in the First Epistle to the Corinthians, represents that recent Church as already in possession of the Eucharistic Mysteries; yet he does not consider himself to have fulfilled all his duties in this particular till he repeats his visit, and arranges all which relates to holy things in a more perfect form, and with a greater degree of canonical exactness. Such is the construction which the holy doctors have constantly put upon the words which conclude the passage of this Epistle, in which he speaks of the Eucharist; "The rest will I set in order when I come." St. Jerome, in his succinct commentary on this passage, explains it, "cætera de ipsius Mysterii Sacramento." St. Augustine unfolds this sentiment more fully in the letter to Januarius: "These words," he says, "give us to understand that in the same way as he had, in the course of this Epistle, made allusion to the usages of the Church Catholic 'on the matter and essence of the Sacrament,' he afterwards himself instituted (at Corinth) those rites, the universality of which is unaffected by any difference of manners." [Guéranger's Institutions Liturgiques, i. 31.] A similar inference is also to be drawn from the words with which St. Paul introduces the words of Institution: "For I have received of the Lord that which also I delivered unto you" [1 Cor. xi. 23]. That central portion of the liturgy was communicated to him by Divine revelation at some early period of his ministry, and he had "delivered" it to the Churches which he had founded among those customs of which he had just written, "Now I praise you, brethren, that ye . . . keep the ordinances (τὰς παραδόσεις) as I delivered them to you" [ibid. 2]; and of which he wrote elsewhere, "Therefore, brethren, stand fast, and hold the traditions which ye have been taught, whether by word, or our epistle" [2 Thess. ii. 15].

The liturgy thus indicated by St. Paul may be traced out into some detail from his writings. [1.] First, the Act of Consecration is shewn to have included Fraction of the Bread and Benediction of the Wine: "The Cup of blessing which we bless . . . the Bread which we break" [1 Cor. x. 16]: and it cannot reasonably be doubted that the Benediction extended to the bread as well as to the wine. [2.] The ceremony of consecration appears also to have been associated with exhortation: "Upon the first day of the week when the disciples came together to break bread, Paul preached unto them" [Acts xx. 7]. [3.] The Apostle's expression, "We have an altar whereof they have no right to eat which serve the tabernacle" [Heb. xiii. 10], seems to indicate that special tables were already in use for the consecration of that whereof only Christians had a "right to eat" [ALTAR]; and the manner in which the Apostle opposes "the Lord's Table" to "the tables of devils" or the heathen altar, points towards the same conclusion. [4.] The "many lights" in "the upper chamber" at Troas [Acts xx. 7; cf. i. 13, ii. 2; Luke xxii. 12] are not unreasonably supposed to have been placed there partly as a sign of gladness [LIGHT], some being added, for the liturgical object, to those which were used for giving necessary light. [5.] The "supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks" [1 Tim. ii. 1] are associated by early Christian writers with the liturgy used by the Apostles. "I advise," says St. Augustine, commenting on this passage, "that, in these words, we understand, with the whole or nearly the whole Church, by supplications, those which we use in the celebration of the Sacrament, before the benediction of what is on the Lord's Table; by prayers, those in the benediction and sanctification, and breaking for distribution, the whole of which act of supplication is, in almost every church, concluded by the Lord's Prayer; by intercessions, or as our manuscripts have it, entreaties, (postulationes), those used in blessing the people. For then it is, that the priests, in their character of advocates, present their clients to the supernal clemency. Finally, when all is over, and the so great Sacrament has been participated, the whole is concluded by "giving of thanks" [Aug. Ep. lix. ad Paulin. qu. 5]. [6.] The "Kiss of Peace" to which St. Paul so often refers was spoken of by Origen as being also associated with the liturgy, "the brethren giving one another the kiss when the prayer is brought to an end" [Origen on Rom. xvi. 16]: and such an association is known to have existed in the earliest times of the Church. [KISS OF PEACE.] [7.] Lastly, the Eucharistic "Amen" with which the LAITY assent to the act of Consecration is distinctly referred to by the Apostle when condemning the use of languages not vernacular in Divine service: "When thou shalt bless with the Spirit, how shall he that occupieth the room of the unlearned say Amen at thy giving of thanks" [ἐπὶ τῇ σῇ εὐχαριστίᾳ], that is, "at thy celebration of the Eucharist" [1 Cor. xiv. 15]. It may also be added that there is reason to think passages from the Old Testament were read as part of the liturgy even during those twenty or thirty years which passed before the Epistles and Gospels had yet come from the pens of the Apostles and Evangelists.[1]

Further, there are many passages and expressions in the writings of the Apostles which are singularly like corresponding language in some of the primitive liturgies. At first thought, it would seem manifest that the liturgies had quoted these passages word for word, or in substance, from the Apostolic writings, but research and criticism have led liturgical students to an exactly opposite conclusion, namely, that the Apostolic writers quoted from the liturgy which they were constantly using, and had been using, perhaps, for many years before they wrote these epistles. Such passages, for example, as 1 Cor. ii. 9; xv. 45; Eph. v. 14; 1 Tim. i. 15; 2 Tim. ii. 11-13, are quoted by St. Paul with the prefix "As it is written," or "This is a faithful saying," and yet they are not to be found in the Old Testament. Bishop Lowth supposes the first of these to be quoted from an apocryphal book, as he says it is impossible for "temperate criticism" to consider it as a quotation from Isaiah. Yet the very words are found in the Liturgy of St. James, and in St. Clement's first Epistle, and a portion of them in the Acts of St. Polycarp. A great many more passages are to be found in the Epistles, which have a similar appearance of being quoted from the original form of the primitive liturgies which are still extant; and it is not unlikely that scientific criticism such as has been applied to the text of Holy Scripture might restore a considerable portion of the Apostolic liturgy.[2]

Much light might also be thrown on the Eucharistic ritual of the first and second centuries by a careful examination, for that purpose, of the book of the Revelation [RITUAL] and the writings of the Fathers; comparing them with the liturgies that have been handed down to us in a later form.

III. LOCAL DEVELOPMENTS OF THE APOSTOLIC LITURGY. It has been already observed that the liturgical system of the Church was not at once and for ever settled in the first age; but that, general principles being established (as, for instance, in the use of the words of Institution), the particular details were developed progressively under the influence of personal and local circumstances, overruled by the constant guidance of the Holy Spirit. Thus, when the original Apostolic liturgy came to be carried into all parts of the world, it would doubtless receive many modifications; and characteristic variations would arise, even while an equally characteristic radical uniformity would be maintained.

1. Causes of Variations in the Liturgy. Three principal causes for such variations may be noticed. [a.] There were twelve Apostles at their work in various parts of the world, each having supreme authority within his own sphere of jurisdiction,

[1] Justin Martyr shortly describes (but for the heathen, and therefore, with much reserve) the form of celebrating the Holy Eucharist in his time [A.D. 140], and it will be observed that the reading of Holy Scripture is specially mentioned:—"Upon the day called Sunday we have an assembly of all who live in the towns or in the country, who meet in an appointed place; and the records of the Apostles, or the writings of the Apostles, are read, according as the time will permit. When the reader has ended, then the Bishop [ὁ προεστὼς] admonishes and exhorts us in a discourse that we should imitate such good examples. After that we all stand up and pray, and, as we said before, when that prayer is ended bread is offered, and wine and water. Then the Bishop also, according to the authority given him [ὅση δύναμις αὐτῷ], sends up [ἀνα-πέμπει, cf. missa est] prayers and thanksgivings; and the people end the prayer with him, saying, Amen. After which, distribution is made of the consecrated elements, which are also sent by the hands of the deacons to those who are absent." [Justin Mart. Apol. lxvii.]

[2] For what has already been done the reader is referred to two dissertations by Dr. Neale and the Rev. Gerald Moultrie printed in Neale's Essays on Liturgiology, pp. 410-414.

each under the influence of the same Divine inspiration, and each having his own human individuality to influence him also. It is scarcely possible that some diversity of devotional usage should not have occurred under these circumstances; and such diversities could not fail to make their permanent marks of difference in the customs of the several churches which looked up to them respectively as their founders. Accordingly, as there were those who said, "I am of Paul, I of Apollos, I of Cephas," there would be, and that without any schismatical spirit, those who would prefer to be guided by the customs given to them by St. John, or any particular Apostle associated with their country, as was the case with the British Christians in their controversy with the Roman clergy. Hence would arise such distinctions as the Liturgy of St. James, that of St. Peter, that of St. Mark, and perhaps others not known to us. [b.] Again, it was a recognised principle at a very early period after the Apostolic age, that each bishop had authority (within the limits of orthodox faith) to settle the ritual of his diocese, and although few are likely to have composed original liturgies, and a majority would be content with those in use without seeking any change whatever, yet the system must have been one that opened the door to great variation, much greater, perhaps, than can now be traced. [c.] Thirdly, when the Church began to spread in the midst of the hostile heathen, it was found necessary to exercise a reverent and prudent reserve in making public, among those of whom so large a proportion were revilers and persecutors, the more sacred mysteries of the new religion [Disciplina Arcani]. At first this was not so necessary, for Tertullian says: "Examine our sacred books which we do not keep in hiding, and which many accidents put into the hands of those who are not of us" [Tertul. Apol. xxxi.]. But very shortly it became a crime to let these books pass into heathen hands [Traditores], and the necessity for such strict privacy and reverence as regards the Eucharist was probably the reason why liturgies were said at one time from memory rather than from books; and why no primitive MSS. of Liturgies are known to exist. These three causes, but chiefly the two latter, produced so great a variety of liturgies or of liturgical customs, that a general reaction took place towards the end of the fifth and in the sixth century; and councils interfered with their canons enjoining greater uniformity [Bingham's Antiq. xiii. 5, ii.]; the general tendency of such legislation being to restrict the liberty of individual bishops, and to enforce one order of Divine service on all the dioceses of a province. This movement was especially observable in Spain and France, but the Sacramentaries of St. Leo [A.D. 451], Gelasius [A.D. 492], and St. Gregory [A.D. 590], are indications that the movement was general throughout the West, and that the great variety of local forms was passing away by absorption of their best parts into a few principal liturgies. This reaction did not so much affect the East, for there variety had arisen almost entirely among the Nestorian and the Eutychian or Jacobite sects, the orthodox Church adhering to the Liturgy of St. James, as modified by St. Basil and St. Chrysostom.

IV. The Four Parent Liturgies. Whatever varieties there may have been, however, in the details of the Office for celebrating the Holy Eucharist, it seems clearly established that four principal forms of liturgy are traceable to the early ages of the Church, and that from these have originated all the Eucharistic offices at present in use throughout the world. These appear to have been composed in the first instance for the Churches of Palestine, Alexandria, Rome, and Ephesus; and they bear the names, respectively, of St. James, St. Mark, St. Peter, and St. John; the last, or Liturgy of Ephesus, being also associated with the name of St. Paul. The history of each of these may be given separately, so far as space will allow.

1. The Liturgy of St. James, or of Jerusalem, appears to be, in its present form, a more or less interpolated version of a liturgy originally composed for the patriarchate of Antioch (which comprised the Churches of Palestine and Mesopotamia), and, not improbably, by the Apostle whose name the extant version bears, and who was, in very early ages, said to have composed a liturgy. No Greek MS. of it is known which dates further back than the tenth century [Asseman, Cod. Liturg. v. 68]; but an almost identical liturgy in Syriac, also bearing the name of St. James, is used by the Monophysites, who now possess the dioceses comprising the patriarchate of Antioch: and, as it is certain that they would not have adopted it from the orthodox at any time since communion with them was broken off at the Council of Chalcedon [A.D. 451], the identity of the Greek and the Syriac versions marks a date not later than the fifth century. But the existing form of the Liturgy of St. James is plainly quoted by writers of an earlier date than the Council of Chalcedon. Among these are St. Jerome, who lived in Palestine in the end of the fourth century, St. Chrysostom, who about the same time was a priest at Antioch, the historian Theodoret [A.D. 393-457], who was bishop of Cyrus, in the patriarchate of Antioch, and St. Cyril, Bishop of Jerusalem, and one of the successors of St. James in that see, about the middle of the fourth century. The latter delivered two of his catechetical lectures upon the subject of the Eucharist, and describes the service with great minuteness, as if he were describing it from the liturgy now extant as that of St. James. Still earlier than this there occurs in the eighth book of the Apostolical Constitutions a detailed description of the manner in which the Eucharist was celebrated in the third century, in which the prayers are given at length, and the whole so much in the form of a liturgy, that it has usually gone by the name of the Liturgy of St. Clement. But it is evidently the author's account of the Liturgy of St. James, and a large portion can be identified with it in its existing form. Justin Martyr's short account of the liturgy (given in a note in a previous page) may be referred to the same source, and with all the more probability, since he was a native of Samaria, which was within the patriarchate of Antioch. And thus the Liturgy of St. James can be traced back for nearly a thousand years in an existing MS., and by satisfactory evidence of another kind through the intervening ages to a date only a century removed from the Apostolic age itself. This liturgy is used in its Syriac form by the Monophysites; but in its Greek form it is used only once a year, on the festival of St. James, by the orthodox Church of Jerusalem. During the depression of the orthodox under the rule of the Mahometans (by whom the Monophysites were protected) they were drawn into close association with the patriarchate of Constantinople; and thus they gradually adopted the Liturgy of Chrysostom, like the rest of the Eastern Churches. St. Chrysostom's Liturgy was, however, formed on that of St. Basil, and St. Basil's on that of St. James. Of St. Basil's Liturgy there is a copy in the Barberini Library at Rome, which Montfaucon considered to have been written about the end of the seventh century. In the Council held at Constantinople [A.D. 691] the 227 Eastern bishops assembled speak of it in their twenty-seventh Canon as "The mystical Liturgy of Basil, Archbishop of Cæsarea, whose glory has pervaded the whole world;" St. Gregory Nazianzen, mentions it as his composition [Greg. Naz. Orat. xx.], and it is referred to as composed for the monasteries which he had established by St. Basil himself [Basil, Ep. 207], who claims for it that it is in accordance with the forms used throughout the Church. The Liturgy bearing the name of St. Chrysostom has been used in the patriarchate of Constantinople from time immemorial, but nothing certain is known as to its origin except that it is based on that of St. Basil. It has long been the authorized liturgy of the Oriental and the Russian Churches, and thus represents in a still very ancient form the original Apostolic Liturgy of St. James. A fine edition of the Liturgy of St. James was printed in quarto, at London, in 1744, with St. Cyril's account of it, the Clementine Liturgy, and part of the Liturgies of St. Mark, St. Chrysostom, and St. Basil, in parallel columns.

2. The Liturgy of St. Mark. This was anciently used in Greek, in the patriarchate of Alexandria, and is found in a MS. of the tenth century in that language [Asseman. Cod. Liturg. vii.]. It is also extant in Coptic, and in modified forms which go by the names of St. Basil, St. Gregory Nazianzen, and St. Cyril of Alexandria, and which are those now used by the Christians of Egypt. Palmer quotes from an Alexandrian patriarch of the twelfth century a question which he asked of Theodore Balsamon, Patriarch of Antioch; "Whether the liturgies read in the parts of Alexandria and Jerusalem, and said to have been written by James the brother of the Lord, and by Mark, are to be received or not by the Holy Catholic Church?" [Palmer, Orig. Liturg. i. 87]. He also refers to a writer of the seventh or eighth century who speaks of St. Jerome as affirming that "St. Mark chanted the course which is now called the 'Irish course,' and after him Gregory Nazianzen, whom Jerome affirms to be his master. St. Basil, brother of the same St. Gregory, Anthony, Paul, Macarius or John, and Malchus chanted according to the order of the Fathers" [Spelman, Concil. i. 177]. The Liturgy of St. Mark has a distinctive character which would account for its being named as originally different from that of St. James; and as it is only to be traced in African forms there seems a probability that the tradition of its origin is correct. Even Bunsen assigns to its extant form in Greek as early a date as the second century [Bunsen, Analect. ante-Nicæn. iii. 106]; while Palmer considers that the main order and substance of it may have been as old as the Apostolic age, and derived originally from the Evangelist whose name it bears.

3. The Liturgy of St. Peter. The Roman Liturgy is made up, like the English, of a variable part, consisting of collects, &c.; and an unchangeable part, consisting of the canon. The framework of the former, and some of the collects, &c., are of very high antiquity, but many additions have been made in the form of services for various occasions and for new festivals. The canon, or unvarying portion, is, however, of primitive date, and has probably seen little change since its form was first settled. Many MSS. of the Roman Canon exist in the libraries of Europe, dating from the ninth and tenth century downwards; and these all agree as to the substance of the text, the only variations arising from the presence of a saint's name, or a short prayer, in the later copies, which do not appear in the earlier ones. The same agreement is found also in the text used by the early liturgical commentators; and it may be considered as critically determined that the "Canon of the Mass" in the existing Roman Liturgy is identical with that extant in the time of St. Gregory [A.D. 590]. From his time it may be traced back, in a rather more condensed form (by means of a MS. discovered by Thomasius in the Royal Library of Sweden, and attributed to the sixth century), to the time of Gelasius [A.D. 492]; and by a still older MS. to that of St. Leo [A.D. 451] and the Council of Chalcedon. Thus the oldest MS. of the Latin Liturgy is of nearly the same date as the oldest MSS. of the Holy Bible. It has been attributed to St. Peter chiefly on the authority of an Epistle written by Innocent I. (who was Bishop of Rome from A.D. 402 to A.D. 417) to Decentius, Bishop of Eugubium. In this letter he writes:—"Si instituta ecclesiastica, ut sunt a beatis apostolis tradita, integra vellent servare Domini sacerdotes, nulla diversitas, nulla varietas in ipsis ordinibus et consecrationibus haberetur—quis enim nesciat, aut non advertat, id quod a principe apostolorum Petro Romanæ Ecclesiæ traditum est . . . ?" [Labbe, Concil. ii. 1245.] Cardinal Bona remarks on a similar passage from St. Isidore's writings, "Hoc de re et substantia, non de verborum tenore et cæremoniis intelligendum est" [Rer. Liturg. I. vii. 5], a remark which may be extended to the case of other primitive liturgies as well as to that of Rome. From the Liturgy of St. Peter, in its primitive form, was derived the Ambrosian Liturgy used in the Diocese of Milan. In its later form (that which it took after the time of St. Gregory), it exercised some influence also over the Liturgies of Spain, France, and England. But the Roman Liturgy was never used by the Church of England; and even the Romanist sect which separated from the Church of England after the Reformation resisted its introduction until the beginning of the last century, when it was forced upon it by Jesuit priests, whose vows bound them to use no other.

4. The Liturgy of St. John, St. Paul, or of Ephesus. This primitive Liturgy is not now extant in its original form, but fragments of it are incorporated in the Gallican,—that which was used in France from Apostolic times until the introduction of the Roman Liturgy by Charlemagne, and from which the Liturgies of Spain and England were derived. It appears to have been used in the patriarchate of Ephesus until the fourth century, when that of St. James, as modified by St. Basil, was substituted for it by the 19th Canon of the Council of Laodicæa [A.D. 320]. At a much earlier date, however, missionaries had gone forth from the "metropolis of Asia" to evangelize, or to carry on the evangelization of, Western Europe. "Trophimus, the Ephesian," first Bishop of Arles, was probably planted there by St. Paul; Pothinus of the same Asiatic city [born about A.D. 80], was Bishop of Lyons in the reign of Marcus Aurelius, when he suffered martyrdom; and Irenæus, another Asiatic and a disciple of Polycarp, was his successor for the last quarter of the second century. How close an association was kept up between the Churches of France and those of Asia Minor is shewn by the Epistle of the Church of Lyons to the latter respecting the martyrdoms which had occurred in the latter, and which was written in A.D. 177. Such an association as this between the two Churches would lead to the inference that the daughter founded in the West received her liturgy as well as her origin from her Eastern mother. But we are not left to inference, for a writer of either the seventh or the eight century shews what was then the received tradition on the subject; writing that "John, the Evangelist, first chanted the Gallican course, then afterwards the blessed Polycarp, disciple of St. John; then afterwards, thirdly, Irenæus, who was Bishop of Lyons in Gaul, chanted the same course in Gaul" [Spelman, Concil. i. 176]. This primitive liturgy was partly supplanted in France by the Roman in the time of Pepin, and was superseded by the latter altogether in the reign of Charlemagne. But MSS. of it remain, of which some are earlier than the eighth century [Forbes and Neale's Gallican Liturgies, pref.], and the Mozarabic is also known to be a very early form of it. From these it is not unlikely that critical study may be able to restore, in a great measure, the original Ephesian Liturgy, and so give us the primitive text from which those of France, Spain, and England were developed.[1]

"The early connexion between the Church of France and the Church of England was so close, that there can be no reasonable doubt of the same liturgy having been originally used in both countries. When St. Augustine came to England in A.D. 596, expecting to find it an altogether heathen land, he discovered that there was an ancient and regularly organized Church, and that its usages were different in many particulars from those of any European Church with which he had been previously acquainted. By the advice of St. Gregory he introduced some changes into the liturgy which he found in use; the changes coming, not directly from the Roman Sacramentary of St. Gregory, but 'from a sister rite, formed in the south of France by the joint action, probably, of St. Leo and Cassian, about two hundred years before [A.D. 420]; having a common basis, indeed, with the Roman Office, but strongly tinctured with Gallican characteristics derived long ago from the East, and probably enriched, at the time, by fresh importations of Oriental usages' [Freeman's Princ. Div. Serv. II. ii. 405]. Thus the Liturgy of the Church of England after St. Augustine's time became a modified form of the more ancient Gallican, which itself was originally the Liturgy of the Church of Ephesus, owing its germ to St. Paul or St. John. The English Church of St. Augustine's day, and long after, distinctly averred that its customs were derived from the latter Apostle; but in many particulars the work of St. John and St. Paul appears to have traversed the same ground, as it certainly did in the Church of Ephesus, and probably did in the Church of England.

"The liturgy thus derived from the ancient Gallican, and the more recent version of it which had been introduced by Cassian, was again revised by St. Osmund, Bishop of Salisbury, in A.D. 1085; and it was the same liturgy which also formed the basis of the other slightly varying Offices that were used in different dioceses of England, and have come down to us by the names of these dioceses. The Salisbury Liturgy eventually supplanted all the others which were used by the Church of England, and became the principal basis of the vernacular Liturgy which has now been used for more than three hundred years in all the churches of the Anglican communion" [Blunt's Annot. Book of Com. Prayer, 147].

This latter now exists in three forms, that of the Church of England (used also in Ireland and the Colonies), that of the Scottish Church, and that of the Church in the United States of America. But these three varieties differ little from each other, and are all derived from the ancient Latin Liturgy of the Anglican rite through the "Order of Communion" of A.D. 1547, and the Prayer Book of A.D. 1548-52.

IV. THE STRUCTURE OF LITURGIES. The variations of detail which are found in the parent liturgies of the Christian world are all engrafted on a structural arrangement which they possess in common, much as four buildings might differ in the style and form of their decorations, and yet agree in their plans and elevation, in the position of their several chambers, and in the number of their principal columns.

1.] There is invariably a division of the liturgy into three portions, the office of the Prothesis, the Pro-Anaphora, and the Anaphora, the latter being the "Canon" of the Western Church, and the office of the Prothesis being a preparatory part of the service corresponding to the "Præparatio" of the Western Liturgy, and not used at the altar itself.

In the Pro-Anaphora, the central features are two, viz.: [1] the reading of Holy Scripture, and [2] the recitation of the Creed. In the Anaphora they are four, viz.: [1] The Triumphal Hymn, or TRISAGION; [2] The formula of Consecration; [3] The Lord's Prayer; and [4] The Communion. These four great acts of Praise, Benediction, Intercession and Communion, gather around our Lord's words of Institution and His pattern prayer, which form, in reality, the integral germ of the Christian liturgies. They are also associated with other prayers, intercessions, and thanksgivings, by which each is expanded and developed, the whole blending into a comprehensive service by means of which the worship of the Church ascends on the wings of the Eucharistic sacrifice, and her strength descends in Eucharistic grace.

The order in which these several portions of the Liturgy are combined in the four ancient parent forms is shown by the following table:—

2.] There is also, in the seeond plaee, a substantial agreement among all the four great parent Liturgies as to the formula of Conseeration, shewing that the early Chureh eonstantly maintained certain principles in respect to this essential part of the Eueharistic rite, whatever verbal variations were introduced. This identity of form does, in reality, extend to other portions of the rite, but as it is most eonspieuous in the forms of Conseeration, it is here shewn by printing them in parallel columns, but a similar eomparison of the rest of the Anaphora would occupy more spaee than ean be given to it in this work.

		Be present Jesus, thou good Priest, in the midst of us as thou wast in the midst of Thy disciples, sanctify this oblation, that we may receive it at the hand of Thy Holy Angel, O Holy Lord and eternal Redeemer.	Therefore, O Lord, we beseech Thee graciously to accept this oblation of our bounden service and of Thy whole family: dispose our days in Thy peace, and command us to be delivered from eternal damnation, and to be numbered in the congregation of Thine elect, through Christ our Lord. Which oblation do Thou, O God, we beseech Thee, vouchsafe to render in all respects, blessed, approved, effectual, reasonable, and acceptable, that it may be made unto us the Body and Blood of Thy most beloved Son, our Lord Jesus Christ,

Likewise after supper He took the cup, and mixed it with wine and water, and looking up to heaven, and presenting it to Thee, His God and Father, He gave thanks, sanctified and blessed it, He filled it with the Holy Ghost, and gave it to His disciples, saying, Drink ye all of this; This is My blood of the New Testament, which is shed for you and for many for the remission of sins. We sinners offer to Thee, O Lord, this tremendous and unbloody sacrifice, beseeching Thee not to deal with us after our sins, nor reward us according to our iniquities, but according to Thy clemency and ineffable love towards mankind, overlook and blot out the handwriting that is against us Thy servants, and grant us Thine heavenly and eternal rewards, such as eye hath not seen nor ear heard, nor have entered into the heart of man, even such as Thou hast prepared for them that love Thee, and reject not this people for me and my sins, O Lord, ("thrice") for this people and Thy Church, make this supplication before Thee.	We, O Lord, have set before Thee Thine own out of Thine own gifts. And we pray and beseech Thee, O Thou lover of mankind,	Sanctify, O eternal Almighty God, by Thy mercy, those things which have been ordained by Thee. Vouchsafe freely to receive what we offer, and mercifully to bestow upon us that in which we may rejoice. Upon which vouchsafe to look with a propitious and serene countenance, and accept them as Thou wast pleased graciously to accept the gifts of Thy righteous servant Abel, the sacrifice of our patriarch Abraham, and the holy sacrifice, the immaculate host, which Thy high-priest Melchizedek offered to Thee. We humbly beseech Thee, O Almighty God, command these things to be carried by the hands of Thy holy angels unto Thy high altar in the presence of Thy divine majesty, that as many of us as by this participation of the altar, shall receive the most sacred body and blood of Thy Son, may be replenished with all heavenly benediction and grace, through the same Christ our Lord. Amen
Have mercy upon us, God the Almighty; have mercy upon us, O God our Saviour; have mercy upon us, O God, after Thy great mercy, and send down upon these Gifts which are here before Thee, Thy most Holy Spirit;	send down from Thy holy heaven, the habitation of Thy dwelling, from Thine infinite bosom, the Paraclete, the Spirit of Truth, the Holy One, the Lord and Giver of Life;	God of Abraham, God of Isaac, God of Jacob, God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, do thou, propitious and favourable, from Thy heavens, receive in kindest love this our sacrifice; May there descend, O Lord, even the Lord and Giver of Life, who with Thee, O God the Father, and with Thine Only-begotten Son, liveth and reigneth a consubstantial and co-eternal Person;		the plenitude of Thy majesty, divinity, love, virtue, blessing and glory upon this bread and upon this cup: and may we have a legitimate Eucharist in the transformation of the Body and Blood of the Lord, that whosoever of us, and how often soever we taste this bread and this cup, we may receive the memorial of faith, the sincerity of love, the tranquil hope of resurrection, and eternal immortality. Send down, O Lord, this Thy most Holy Spirit upon us, and upon these Thy Holy Gifts here set before Thee;	who spake in the law, in the prophets, in the apostles, who is everywhere, and fills all things, sanctifying whom He pleases, not ministerially but according to His own will, simple in nature, but various in operation, the fountain of all divine graces, consubstantial with Thee, proceeding from Thee and sitting with Thee, on the throne of His kingdom, together with Thy Son, our Lord, our God, and Saviour Jesus Christ. 3.] Another point in which the four parent Liturgies of the Church uniformly agree, is in the well-defined sacrificial character of their language. This is sufficiently illustrated by the preceding comparative view of the forms of consecration, and in the article EUCHARIST.

4.] The intercessory character of the primitive liturgies is also a very conspicuous feature common to them all. The Holy Eucharist is uniformly set forth, and used, in them as a sacrifice offered up to God for the benefit of all classes of Christians, living and departed. "Then," says St. Cyril of Jerusalem, "after the spiritual sacrifice is perfected, the bloodless service upon that sacrifice of propitiation, we entreat God for the common peace of the Church; for the tranquillity of the world; for kings; for soldiers and allies; for the sick; for the afflicted; and, in a word, for all who stand in need of succour we all supplicate and offer this sacrifice. Then we commemorate also those who have fallen asleep before us, first, Patriarchs, Prophets, Apostles, Martyrs, that at their prayers and intervention God would receive our petition. Afterward also on behalf of the holy Fathers and Bishops who have fallen asleep before us; and in a word, of all who in past years have fallen asleep among us, believing that it will be a very great advantage to the souls for whom the supplication is put up, while that holy and most awful sacrifice is presented" [Catech. Lect. xxiii. 9, 10]. St. Cyril was speaking thus in Jerusalem, where the liturgy used was that of St. James, and in that liturgy we find a noble intercession exactly answering to the description there given [Neale's Transl. p. 52; Blunt's Annot. Book of Common Prayer, p. 156]. A similar intercession is to be found in the other liturgies, and it is evident that its use was one of the first principles of the Primitive Church.

VI. THE LITERATURE OF LITURGIES is very extensive, and only the more important portions of it can be here mentioned. A more complete account may be found in Zaccaria's Bibliotheca Ritualis, and Guéranger's Institutions Liturgiques.

In addition to what may be collected from the writings of the Fathers, as, for instance, of St. Cyril of Jerusalem, there are also several very ancient works written expressly as expositions of the liturgy and the other offices of the Church. As early as the middle of the fifth century, a work of this kind was written by St. PROCLUS, Patriarch of Constantinople [A.D. 434], entitled in Latin De Traditionibus Missæ Diviæ, and also extant in Greek in Collect. Liturg., Paris, 1560. St. ISIDORE [Hispalensis] wrote two books De Divinis sive Ecclesiasticis Officiis, about A.D. 610, which contain seventy chapters on nearly every subject connected with Divine service; and these are additionally valuable as St. Isidore is reputed to have been the author of the Mozarabic Liturgy. ALCUIN [A.D. 780] is called the author of the work De Divinis Officiis, sive Expositio Romani Ordinis, generally known by his name, but it belongs to an age two centuries later. AMALARIUS Symphosius of Metz [A.D. 820] wrote a book with the title De Divinis sive Ecclesiasticis Officiis, which is sometimes assigned by mistake to his namesake Amalarius Fortunatus, Bishop of Treves, who was author of a tract De ratione Rituum S. Baptismatis. The first named work is very valuable. So also is that of WALAFRID STRABO [A.D. 842], De Officiis Divinis, sive de exordiis et incrementis rerum Ecclesiasticarum, which was the chief liturgical authority during the Middle Ages. Next to this may be named the anonymous work known as MICROLOGUS, written about A.D. 1080-1100, and entitled De Ecclesiasticis observationibus, seu De Missa rite celebranda. Whether "Micrologus" is an assumed name of the author, or a real one, or merely a title of the book, is unknown; but the work contains valuable illustrations of the subject which are not to be found elsewhere. John BELETH, rector of the Theological School in the University of Paris [A.D. 1162], wrote a Rationale Divinorum Officiorum: but this was only one of many similar short expositions of Divine service which appeared in the Middle Ages. They most of them gave way to DURANDUS [A.D. 1286], who gathered up the most valuable part of preceding works of the kind into his Rationale Divinorum Officiorum, in eight books, which was printed as early as A.D. 1459, and has gone through a great number of editions.

Nearly all the liturgical works extant from the fifth to the eleventh century were gathered into one volume by HITTORPIUS [A.D. 1568], and the collection is entitled De Divinis Catholicæ Ecclesiæ Officiis. Shortly after which PAMELIUS wrote a valuable work, which was originally [A.D. 1571] printed under the title Liturgicon Latinum, but some time after his death [A.D. 1609], was reissued with a new title-page as Missale Sanctorum Patrum Latinorum. It contains the Gregorian and Ambrosian Liturgies, the Comes of St. Jerome, the Gregorian Antiphonary, and many other liturgical relics of primitive ages. Two more important works than any of the preceding appeared in the latter half of the seventeenth century. The first was GAVANTI'S Thesaurus Sacrorum rituum: seu Commentaria in rubricas Missalis et Breviarii Romani [A.D. 1646]. The second was Cardinal BONA'S noble work De Rebus Liturgicis, or Rerum Liturgicarum, libri duo [A.D. 1671]. This latter, like the preceding, has gone through several editions, of which the best is that of SALA [A.D. 1747], with annotations, in three folio volumes. An even greater work followed in the next generation, MARTÈNE, De Antiquis Ecclesiæ ritibus [A.D. 1736], which is a great storehouse of liturgical erudition. To these great works may be added LE BRUN'S Explication des prières et cérémonies de la Messe [A.D. 1726], and PICART'S Ceremonies and Religious Customs of all Nations, in seven folio volumes [A.D. 1733]. In modern times, the most valuable works on the general subject of liturgics have been PALMER'S Origines Liturgicæ [A.D. 1832]; GUÉRANGER'S Institutions Liturgiques [A.D. 1840-51] and FREEMAN'S Principles of Divine Service [A.D. 1863].

Græcorum [A.D. 1647, best. ed. 1730]; RENAUDOT'S Liturgiarum Orientalium Collectio [A.D. 1716]; MURATORI'S Liturgia Romana Vetus [A.D. 1748], for the Leonine, Gelasian, and Gregorian Sacramentaries, and several ancient Missals. MABILLON'S De Liturgia Gallicana, &c. [A.D. 1685]; BRETT'S Collection of the principal Liturgies used in the Christian Church [A.D. 1720]; the great treasury of all, ASSEMANNI Codex Liturgicus Ecclesiæ universæ, in twelve volumes [A.D. 1746]. DANIEL'S Codex Liturgicus, a modern German work, is also one of great learning and usefulness; while NEALE'S Translations of the Primitive Liturgies is a book that brings them within the reach of English readers.

Of works specially illustrating the liturgy and other offices of the Church of England, the following may be noticed. MASKELL'S Ancient Liturgy of the Church of England, and Monumenta Ritualia Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ [A.D. 1846]; FORBES' Missale ad Usum insign. et præclar. Eccl. Sarum. [A.D. 1861]; CARDWELL'S Two Liturgies of Edward VI. [A.D. 1838]; and History of Conferences connected with the Book of Common Prayer [A.D. 1849]; MERBECKE'S Common Prayer Noted [A.D. 1550]; WALTON'S Reprint of the Prayer Book of 1549; KEELING'S Liturgiæ Britannicæ [A.D. 1842]; STEPHENS' Edition of the Sealed Book of Common Prayer [A.D. 1849-54]; PROCTER'S History and Rationale of the Prayer Book [A.D. 1857]; BLUNT'S Annotated Book of Common Prayer [A.D. 1866], which gives the originals of all parts of the Prayer Book, as far as they have been discovered, side by side with the modern text, shewing its association with the ancient offices.

LOGOS. [WORD, THE.]

LOLLARDS. The followers of Wickliffe in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Respecting the origin of the name, there are different opinions—some deriving it from the Latin "lolium," a kind of tare, in allusion to the parable of the tares sown among the wheat,[1] a derivation probably invented by the monks or clergy of the time; others (recognising its more probably German origin) connecting it with one Walter Lolhardus, who was burned for heresy at Cologne [A.D. 1332], about whom it is uncertain, [1] if Lolhardus was his name at all; and [2] whether it was a surname or an epithet (as if Walter the Lollard). The best authorities, however, trace it to the German lollen, "to sing in an undertone," so that lollhard meant originally a singer, or "one given to singing;" just as beghard meant a beggar, or "one given to praying;" and was early applied in Germany to certain orders of lay people who assisted at funerals and performed other religious offices, which custom leading to extravagance and disorder, the name came to be used in an unfavourable sense to signify those who, under a solemn and religious profession, concealed a turbulent and mischievous character, with which meaning it passed towards the close of the fourteenth century into England, and became the designation of Wickliffe's followers.

[1] See Bulls of Gregory XI. [A.D. 1377], and Netter of Walden's Fasciculus Zizaniorum.

Of Wickliffe's personal history it is not necessary to speak, but it is important to understand the true character of his teaching, the popular estimate of which will be much qualified by a fair examination. For although a better acquaintance with Scripture and antiquity will reverse the judgment of heresy pronounced against some of his opinions, there are others which must, by an impartial judgment, be pronounced erroneous in their nature and extremely mischievous in their tendency.

As a specimen of Wickliffe's alleged teaching, we give the articles laid to his charge in the trial at Blackfriars, before Archbishop Courtenay, A.D. 1377-82. [Wilkins' Concil. iii. 157; Lewis's Life, Records, No. 31.]

1. That the substance of material bread and wine remains, after consecration, in the Sacrament of the Altar.

2. That the accidents do not remain without a subject after consecration in the same Sacrament.

3. That Christ is not in the Sacrament of the Altar identically, verily, and really in His proper corporeal person.

4. That a bishop or priest, if he be in mortal sin, does not ordain, consecrate, nor baptize.

5. That if a man be duly contrite, all exterior confession is superfluous or useless to him.

6. That there is no foundation in the Gospel for Christ's ordaining the mass.

7. That God ought to obey the Devil.

8. That if the pope be a reprobate and a wicked man, and by consequence a member of the Devil, he has no power over Christ's faithful ones granted to him by any one, unless perchance by Cæsar.

9. That after Urban VI. no one is to be received for pope, but that we are to live after the manner of the Greeks under our own laws.

10. That no prelate ought to excommunicate any one, unless he first know he is excommunicated by God.

11. That he who thus excommunicates is thenceforth an heretic or excommunicated person.

12. That a prelate who excommunicates a clerk who has appealed to the king and council of the kingdom, is by that act a traitor to God, the king, and kingdom.

13. That they who leave off to preach, or to hear the Word of God or Gospel preached, because they are excommunicated by men, are excommunicates, and in the day of judgment shall be accounted traitors towards God.

14. That it is contrary to Holy Scripture that ecclesiastical men should have temporal possessions.

15. That it is lawful for any deacon or presbyter to preach the Word of God, without the authority of the apostolic see, or of a Catholic bishop, or any other.

16. That a civil lord is no lord, a bishop no bishop, a prelate no prelate, whilst he is in mortal sin.

17. That temporal lords may, at their pleasure, take away temporal goods from a church habitually delinquent, or that the people may, at their pleasure, correct delinquent lords.

18. That tithes are pure alms, and that the parishioners are able to detain them because of the wickedness of their curates, and bestow them on others at their pleasure.

19. That special prayers applied to a particular person by prelates or the religious, are no more profitable to that same person than general prayers are "cæteris paribus."

20. That any one by entering any private religion whatsoever, is thereby rendered the more incapable and unfit for observing the commands of God.

21. That holy men instituting any private religions, whether of those endowed with possessions or of the mendicants, sinned in so doing.

22. That the religious living in private religions are not of the Christian religion.

23. That begging friars are bound to get their living by the labour of their hands, and not by begging.

24. That friars who beg after their sermons are, on that account, simoniaes, and those who confer alms on them are excommunicated, as well the givers as receivers.

Now of these the first three, concerning the Eucharist, do not really contradict the doctrine of the real presence,[1] but only the mediæval development of it, introduced by Paschasius Radbertus in the ninth century; their effect, however, on the masses in that day would be tantamount to a denial of any supernatural character in the Sacrament.

Art. 4 strikes at the root of all sacramental efficacy, and was contradicted, in more recent times, by the Twenty-sixth Article of Religion, being, at least, as mischievous as the doctrine of Intention itself. Art. 5 goes, at least, beyond the truth, for though outward confession may be unnecessary where there is true contrition, it may yet benefit the penitent. Art. 6, if applied to the Eucharist generally, is false; if specially applied to the "sacrifices of masses," as in the Thirty-first Article of Religion, it must be taken with the same limitation as that article, since the soundest Anglicans have acknowledged that there is a commemorative sacrifice. Art. 7 is absurd. Articles 8, 10, 11, and 12 partake of the error of the fourth, and are subversive of all Church discipline, and 13 still more so. Art. 14 is against all Church endowments, and is inconsistent with the conduct of Wickliffe himself, who held the mastership of Baliol College, Oxford, the rectory of Lutterworth, and was also employed by Richard II. as a foreign ambassador. Art. 15 denies the authority of episcopal jurisdiction against all ancient precedents. Articles 16 and 17 are not only fatal to ecclesiastical discipline, but also to civil government, rendering, as they do, the subject a judge whether the authority is to be obeyed or not. Art. 18 is completely opposed to the scriptural view of tithes, as the portion of our substance owing to God and given for the maintenance of His Church, the worthiness of the person who receives it having nothing to do with the obligation. Art. 19, though probably directed against some prevalent abuse, is wrong in principle, as it denies the efficacy of special intercession which Scripture sanctions and enjoins [Gen. xviii. 23; Acts xii. 5; James v. 16]. The remaining four propositions refer to the monastic profession as exercised by the friars. No doubt the corruptions then existing in the whole monastic system called loudly for reform, and naturally excited the indignation of a man who, whatever his errors, was unquestionably honest and sincere; but it cannot be denied that the terms of his censure, as contained in the above, are extravagant and untrue.

Such was the teaching initiated by Wickliffe, and assiduously promulgated by his followers. And whereas he himself, when the occasion rendered it necessary, condescended to explain his statements, and so may have deprived some of them of their mischievous character, it is plain that his followers—as is the case in all such movements—carried them out to their fullest extent, and acted on them in their widest meaning. Thus while he himself appears only as a religious reformer and a censor of the moral abuses of the time, the Lollards, though at first known only as heretics, became, in the beginning of the next century [A.D. 1400], a turbulent political faction, so that those of them who suffered the extreme and horrible penalty of the law were hanged as state criminals and burned as heretics.

Wickliffe died A.D. 1384. On his last examination at Oxford [A.D. 1382], he had been allowed to retire to his living at Lutterworth, and there pass unmolested the last two years of his life. Meanwhile the tares he had sown began to spring up with vigorous growth. Already [A.D. 1377], when he was summoned to answer for his opinions before Archbishop Courtenay in London, the spread of the sect may be gathered from the statement of Walsingham, that nearly all the Londoners were Lollards. Soon after the termination of that inquiry, which, by frequent adjournment, was prolonged to A.D. 1382, the House of Lords, at the instigation of the Archbishop, and with the consent of the Crown, though without the concurrence of the Commons, passed an Act [Anno 5, Richard II.] for the repression of heresy—remarkable as the first measure of the kind which appears in our Statute-book. The sheriffs are directed to make search for all strange teachers and cause them to be arrested and imprisoned. Two years after [A.D. 1386], in a debate on a motion for supply, the [1] Compare on this point the answer of Sir John Oldcastle, the most thorough and turbulent of all Lollards. In his examination before Archbishop Arundel at St. Paul's, with respect to the Sacrament of the Eucharist, he answered and said, "That as Christ dwelling here on earth had in Him Godhead and Manhood, yet the Godhead was veiled and invisible under the Manhood, which was open and visible in Him, so in the Sacrament of the Altar there is the very body and very bread—bread, namely, which we do see, and the body of Christ veiled under the same which we do not see." This is the very illustration which the ancient Fathers used, and which was so commonly received as the true view of the Eucharist, that it was in its turn adduced to illustrate the union of the two Natures in Christ.

Commons boldly suggested the appropriation for State purposes of the revenues of the Church—a proposal which called forth a vehement protest from the Archbishop, and a dignified reply from the King that he would preserve the Church in as good state as he found it.

Two years later [A.D. 1388], the spread of Lollardism was so considerable as thoroughly to alarm the Parliament, and an address was presented from both Houses to the King complaining of it, and warning him of the dangers that would accrue if effective measures were not taken. The King, in consequence, addressed letters to the archbishops and their suffragans, calling on them to act with greater vigour, and appointed two commissioners to peruse the Lollards' books and make inquiry for those who abetted false doctrine. Imprisonment was still the only penalty for those convicted, nor does it appear that any one in England was, as yet, put to death for his religion. It was no doubt in consequence of this mandate that in the following year [A.D. 1389] Roger Dexter and his wife, Nicolas Taylor, and others, were summoned for heresy before the Archbishop's Visitation Court at Leicester; and on their non-appearance were excommunicated, and the town laid under an interdict until they surrendered. Several of the parties in consequence abjured their opinions, and after a solemn public penance, were reconciled to the Church. We next hear of the Lollards A.D. 1395. In that year letters of accusation against the clergy in general were affixed to the doors of St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey—some in the form of Latin verses and very vehement in their language. That this was the act of the Lollards there seems no doubt, nor that they were abetted in it by certain members of the House of Commons, Sir Richard Stury, Sir Lewis de Clifford, Sir Thomas Latimer, Sir John Montague, &c. Whereupon the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, and others, as messengers from the whole clergy, passed over into Ireland, where the King then was, and entreated him to return and help the Church, now incredibly afflicted with Lollards, who threatened to take away all possessions of the Church and destroy all canonical sanctions. The King returning, called the above-named knights before him, and sharply rebuked and threatened them.

In the same year there was also a petition presented by the Lollards to Parliament, deprecating any harsh measures, and giving a statement of their peculiar opinions. These are nearly coincident with those of Wickliffe, but in some respects an advance upon them, condemning, in addition, —the celibacy, the priesthood, and nearly all outward ministrations of the clergy; also war, the punishment of death, and the trades of goldsmiths and sword-cutters.

The next epoch in the history of Lollardism, as of religion generally, is that notable one, when, in the first year of Henry IV., the Statute "De hæretico comburendo" became part of the law. Up to this time the worst punishment which could be inflicted on the holders of heretical opinions was, on the part of the Church, excommunication, on that of the State, imprisonment. The introduction of the punishment of death in the terrible form already in use in other countries, marks a strong opinion on the part of legislature of the dangerous character, and of the wide prevalence of the obnoxious tenets, as well as an acknowledgment of the inefficacy of all existing machinery to restrain them.

The measure now framed was not the act of the clergy alone, but of the three estates of the realm. It originated in a petition of the Commons, such being the form in which the mind of that House was in those days generally expressed; and having obtained the consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, received the assent of the Crown. By it the civil authorities were empowered to inflict the extreme punishment of death by burning upon offenders convicted of heresy, and handed over to them by the ecclesiastical courts. Under this Statute in the following year, one William Sawtre, Priest of St. Osyth's, a church then existing beside St. Paul's, suffered. He had been formerly in the diocese of Norwich, and had professed himself a Lollard; but being summoned before the Bishop's court had recanted, was set at liberty, and came to London. His recantation weighing upon his conscience, he reavowed his former opinions, and on his apprehension was foolish enough to deny that he had already been an offender. The falsehood of this being detected, and a relapsed heretic being held especially obnoxious to the law, it was resolved to make an example of him; and the unhappy man suffered in Smithfield, March 1401. The second victim known to have perished at the stake was John, or Thomas Badby, tailor or smith, who, on the 1st March 1410, was, after an examination by Archbishop Arundel, conveyed to Smithfield and there burned. The king's eldest son being present, offered him pardon if he would recant, both before and after the fire was kindled, and again during his suffering, but in vain.

Judging, however, by existing records, the instances of those who suffered the extreme penalty for Lollardism, in this or the following reign, do not appear to have been numerous, and must have been in very small proportion to the number of its professors. Indeed, there seems to have been, on the part both of the bishops and clergy, considerable unwillingness to proceed to extreme measures against them—an unwillingness very inconsistent with the general habits of the time in the administration of justice, and much in advance of the times as to humanity. Other regulations however were introduced about the same time, which mark the desire of the authorities of the Church to restrain the obnoxious teaching. Such were the constitutions drawn up by Convocation under Archbishop Arundel in January 1409, in which the clergy were warned, under penalty of being regarded as abettors of heresy, against permitting unlicensed persons to preach in their churches or churchyards, a restraint which pressed equally on the friars, who had hitherto exercised the right without impediment. But the most prominent trial of the time for Lollardism was that of Sir John Oldcastle, commonly called Lord Cobham, of great reputation as a soldier, and said to have been an intimate friend of the Prince of Wales. He appears to have been a man of strong religious feeling, who early imbibed the tenets of Wickliffe, and in whom they were carried to the farthest extent of religious fanaticism and political turbulence. [See Hook's Lives, vol. iv. p. 511; Holinshed, Henry V.] At first a loyal partisan of the House of Lancaster, he was led by ambition or religious zeal to place himself at the head of the Lollards. He procured learned clerks from Oxford, and paid them large stipends to propagate his principles. He dispersed preachers and emissaries wherever his territorial possessions, or those of his wife, gave him weight and influence, and protected them by his armed retainers. He caused notices to be affixed to the doors of the London churches affirming that the Lollards were an hundred thousand strong, and ready to rise against all who did not favour their views. Cited to appear before Archbishop Arundel, he at first absented himself, and was judged contumacious. Afterwards, having been apprehended, he declared himself willing to rehearse and defend his opinions. These being submitted to a court of divines, were declared heretical, and Oldcastle was in consequence excommunicated, and condemned to imprisonment in the Tower. But whether from Court favour, or from fear of dealing severely with a man of so much popularity, as he had been throughout the trial treated with great courtesy and leniency, so at its close he was spared the punishment to which he had made himself liable, and probably by connivance of the authorities, allowed to escape. How he used his liberty is well known. Henry V. had not been nine months on his father's throne, when the alarm reached him, while keeping his Christmas at Eltham, seven miles from London, that Lord Cobham, issuing from the mountain fastnesses of Wales, was marching on London at the head of twenty-five thousand men, with the object of overthrowing the Government, burning and pillaging the churches, and establishing a regency under himself. The movement was defeated by the heroic promptness of the king, who marched at midnight, with the few friends and retainers he was able to collect, to Fickers' fields, the appointed place of rendezvous, and there arresting many Lollards who were awaiting the arrival of their chief, crushed at its outset what might otherwise have proved a serious affair. Those who were taken, many of them men of respectable condition, suffered, as was natural, the punishment of death. Oldcastle himself again escaped, and it was not until some time afterwards [A.D. 1417] that, being engaged in other treasonable attempts, he was arrested, and sentenced to the complex doom of being hanged and burned at the same time. From this period Lollardism mostly preserved the same character of a political rather than merely a religious movement, and was obnoxious more to the civil than to the ecclesiastical power. That the bishops were on the whole inclined to deal leniently with it is curiously evidenced by the existence of the "Lollard" towers attached to some episcopal palaces; the true origin of which is that the bishops, unwilling to subject the heretics brought before them to the extreme punishment, did not hand them over to the civil power, but imprisoned them within their own domains, the prisoners being maintained at their expense.

Lollardism has generally been reputed the beginning of the Reformation. It should rather be regarded as a type of that movement, in its entirety embodying, if some of its better, so certainly its worst features. Wickliffe may have possessed the learning, honesty, and zeal of the earliest and best Reformers, but the movement he inaugurated soon presented the worst and wildest excesses of the Puritans; teaching us that religious reform is prone to run into extremes, and, unless guided and restrained by sobriety and reverence, is apt to produce even greater evils than those it is designed to remedy.

LORD. Lord, the proper translation of Adonai, but used also ordinarily in place of Jehovah. Theologically, its usage in the Creeds is that which is to be inquired into. There is [1] the Lordship attributed, as in the Athanasian Creed, to the three Persons of the Holy Trinity; [2] the Lordship proper to Jesus Christ.

[1.] The indwelling of the Father in the Son and in the Holy Spirit, and the consequent attribution to them of the Name Jehovah is elsewhere treated of. [CIRCUMINCESSION.] From that indwelling, and with that Name is the supremacy of dominion which is expressed in the title Lord. Thus in the Athanasian Creed are enumerated the attributes which are derived to the Son and Holy Spirit as being wholly one in substance with the Father, viz., that They are Uncreate, Incomprehensible, Eternal, Almighty. These, the chief attributes of Godhead, are summed up in the title God, from which follows the Lordship next attributed.

The Father, the First Cause of all, is Lord; the Son is Lord, the Holy Ghost Lord, for in them dwelleth the Father's fulness: the Son is Lord as Creator; the Holy Ghost Lord, for He at the beginning moved upon the face of the waters.

[2.] Under the same title is included the Kingship of the Incarnate Son. The kingdom of Messiah was promised [Dan. ii. 44; vii. 13, 14], which is the Church of Christ, as shewn by the Parables of the Kingdom, having its throne in Heaven, whose origin is from Heaven, which is administered by the power of Heaven: a spiritual kingdom reigning over the souls of men, set up against the kingdom of this world, when the world by sin had become the kingdom of Satan.

To Christ as the Son of Man was the kingdom given, partially while He was upon earth, the right of judgment [John v. 27], the power of forgiveness [Matt. ix. 2, 6], power over the old dispensation [Matt. xii. 6, 8]; fully after the resurrection and ascension [Rom. xiv. 9; Phil. ii. 8-11; Eph. i. 20-22].

Accordingly it was St. Peter's high argument that Jesus who was crucified was Lord and Christ: and the proof was the Resurrection. It is to be noticed that the Resurrection of our Lord is connected in Scripture with His Sonship, as if the Resurrection were a second birth. See Acts xiii. 33; Heb. i. 6, "when He bringeth the second time the first begotten into the world." The Resurrection of Christ then is that which in Him our Head corresponds to the new birth, the regeneration of man. And they who are children of the Resurrection are members of His kingdom.

Of Christ's kingdom, lastly, it is said, that at the end, He shall give up the kingdom to the Father, that God may be all in all.

LORD'S DAY. [SUNDAY.]

LORD'S PRAYER, THE. This Divine formula was twice given to His disciples by our Blessed Lord; first, at the beginning of His ministry, in the Sermon on the Mount [Mat. vi. 9-12]; and a second time about a month before His Crucifixion[1] [Luke xi. 2-4]. On the first occasion, our Lord was teaching a great multitude the general precepts and principles by which His new development of Truth and Holiness was characterized; and when, in the course of this exposition, He had come to the subject of prayer, this formula was given by Him as an example of the true manner in which prayer ought to be offered, in contradistinction to the erroneous manner in which "hypocrites" and "heathen" were accustomed to pray. Having, therefore, said to each of His hearers, "Thou shalt not be as the hypocrites, ... use not vain repetitions as the heathen do, . . . be ye not like unto them," He adds "After this manner, therefore, pray ye" [Matt. vi. 5-9]. On the second occasion, our Lord was not speaking to the multitude, but to a small circle of His disciples (perhaps to the Apostles only), who were with Him at a time when He had retired to pray, in one of the "proseuchæ," probably, near Bethany. The holy example of His prayer worked upon the hearts of those who beheld it, and "when He ceased, one of His disciples said unto Him, Lord teach us to pray, as John also taught His disciples." It was in reply to this request that the Lord repeated the words of the prayer which He had given to the multitudes at the Mount of the Beatitudes, "And He said unto them, When ye pray, say, Our Father."

On the first of these occasions, the Lord's Prayer seems to have been set forth as a typical example of the form in which prayer ought to be made; on the second occasion, the typical example was enforced as an absolute form, the "after this manner pray ye" being exchanged for "when ye pray, say." Mede and other learned writers have supposed that the request made to our Lord referred to some authoritative and distinctive form of prayer, which John the Baptist had taught his disciples according to a custom of the Jewish doctors.[2] No disciple of Christ could be so ignorant of Jewish habits as not to know how to pray, for the prayers of many were made publicly, as those of the Pharisee and the Publican in the Temple, or even ostentatiously, as those of the hypocrites, in the synagogues and at the corners of the streets. What the request embodied, therefore, seems to have been a desire that the disciples might have some special form of prayer given to them which should be specially adapted to the new circumstances in which they were placed by their discipleship:[3] a Christian rule of prayer which should set forth, or at least be in analogy with, the Christian rule of faith.

There is no contradiction, however, between the two sayings with which our Lord introduces His prayer on these two occasions. For the οὕτως of St. Matt. vi. 9 not only does not exclude the force of an absolute injunction as to form, but is even used for it in a similar case in the LXX., where the form of Benediction given by God to Moses is prefaced with the words Οὕτως εὐλογήσετε τοὺς υἱοὺς Ἰσραλὴ λέγοντες αὐτοῖς [Num. vi. 23], although there cannot be the least doubt it was to be used without any variation of the words. It is nevertheless possible that our Lord's first direction had not been understood by the disciples in this absolute sense, and that when asking for a dogmatic form of prayer, they did so under the impression that what had been previously given was only a typical form. If this were the case, the force of our Lord's second injunction of it is much strengthened, and the value of its condensed language still further shewn.[4]

Grotius, Lightfoot, and some German critics of later date, have tried to prove that the Lord's Prayer was founded on prayers which had been previously in use among the Jews. Thus a cento of expressions something similar to those of the prayer itself is culled from various portions of the Talmud and other Hebrew books, and by a treatment of "free handling" they are brought into a form which partially resembles it. But this kind of proof has no weight whatever with a really critical mind, especially when it is remembered that the Gospels are of more ancient date than can

[1] According to Greswell, the Sermon on the Mount was spoken on September 17th, A.D. 27; the discourse in which the Lord's Prayer is again enjoined, on some day between February 24th and March 10th, A.D. 30, the Crucifixion being on April 5th, A.D. 30.

[2] "The whole work of the Forerunner passed over unto the Lord. Therefore, after what form of words John taught to pray is not extant, because earthly things have given place to heavenly." [Tertull. de Orat. i.]

[3] "Our Lord . . . has determined for us, the disciples of the New Testament, a new form of prayer; for in this particular also it was needful that new wine should be laid up in new skins, and a new breadth be sewn to a new garment." [Ibid.]

[4] The verbal variations between the forms given by St. Matthew and St. Luke have led some critics, following Origen, to suppose that they give two separate though similar prayers. These variations are, leaving out the Doxology, as follows:—

St. Matthew vi. 11, 12.	St. Luke xi. 3, 4.
	τὸν ἄρτον ἡμῶν τον ἐπιουσιόν
δὸς ἡμῖν σήμερον·	δίδου ἡμῖν τὸ καθ' ἡμέραν· καὶ ἄφες ἡμῖν
τὰ ὀφειλήματα ἡμῶν, ὡς	τὰς ἁμαρτίας ἡμῶν, καὶ ἡμεῖς ἀφίεμεν	καὶ γὰρ αὐτοὶ ἀφίεμεν
τοῖς ὀφειλέταις ἡμῶν.	παντὶ ὀφείλοντι ἡμῖν.

The words given by St. Matthew have been those universally adopted in liturgical use, but the English "trespasses" happily combines the sense of ὀφειλήματα and ἁμαρτίας.

be certainly assigned to any of the Hebrew sources from which this cento is drawn. "After Lightfoot, Schoettgen, Wetstein, Drusius, Vitringa, Witsius, and Gurenhusius have laid under requisition every conceivable parallel passage, even from much later Jewish prayer-books, the result of their learning and industry shews that the first two petitions alone of the Lord's Prayer contain what, after all, amounts to no more than allusions to well-known Old Testament or Messianic ideas and expressions. Besides, it is quite possible that the Jews may have borrowed even these from the Lord's Prayer" [Lange on St. Matthew]. If authentic parallels could be traced here and there they might be considered valuable as shewing that the principles of Christianity were in reality contained in the old Revelation, and that Christ came to fulfil, not to destroy, the ancient Truth, wherever that truth could be found. But nothing less than the juxtaposition of such expressions, and their articulation into the form of a connected prayer, would be really sufficient evidence that our Lord borrowed from them the words or ideas contained in His own formula.

Although the Lord's Prayer is not again mentioned directly in the New Testament, it was plainly referred to by our Lord on the eve of His sufferings, when He said to the disciples, "And when ye stand praying, forgive if ye have aught against any: that your Father also which is in Heaven may forgive you your trespasses" [Mark xi. 25]. It seems also to have been in the mind of St. Paul when he writes, that we "have received the spirit of adoption whereby we cry, Abba, Father" [Rom. viii. 15; Gal. iv. 6], as also in that of St. Peter, when he spoke of "calling on the Father" [1 Peter i. 17], and traces of its familiar opening are to be observed in other places where "adoption" is spoken of. St. Jerome [Adv. Pelag. iii. 3] and St. Gregory [Epp. vii. lxiii.] say that the Apostles used it in the consecration of the Holy Eucharist, and there can be little doubt, from the manner in which it was freely used in the Primitive Church of the following centuries, that they had also enjoined its use on all occasions of Divine service, and taught Christians to say it in their private prayers. Certain it is, that among the earliest of Christian writings after the Apostolic age, there are two special Commentaries upon this Divine Prayer, one by Tertullian, and the other by St. Cyprian, both of them written within about a century and a half after the death of St. John. No more recent commentator has excelled St. Cyprian in the beauty and depth of the exposition which he gave to the Church; and the manner in which he writes about the subject of his Commentary shews that the Lord's Prayer was as familiarly known to Christians of the third century as it is to those of modern times.

The liturgical use of the Lord's Prayer is frequently mentioned in the writings of the Fathers, and it forms a conspicuous part of the ancient liturgies. This use of it seems even to have been known to the heathen, for in his "Philopatris," Lucian, in the second century, speaks of the Christian prayer which begins ἀπὸ τοῦ Πατρὸς.

But perhaps he had heard it used at Baptism, when the custom was for each person to stand and say it immediately after ascending from the water [Apost. Const. vii. 44]. St. Cyril of Jerusalem speaks of it as being used in the Eucharistic Office immediately after the prayer of oblation [Catech. Myst. v.], the same position being noticed by St. Augustine [Hom. lxxxiii. de Divers.], who also speaks of it being used daily before the altar of God, and heard by the faithful [Hom. lviii.]. St. Optatus likewise mentions its liturgical use even by the Donatists [lib. ii. iii.], as does St. Ambrose [de Sacram. vi. ad fin.]. The Fathers of the East and West thus witness to the universal use of the Lord's Prayer in the celebration of the Eucharist, and the Clementine is the only one of all the ancient liturgies in which it is not found. It is always associated with the act of Consecration, the Eastern Liturgies of St. James, St. Mark, and St. Chrysostom, together with the Roman, using it before the Fraction of the Host, while the Ambrosian and Mozarabic use it after, though not, as in our modern English Liturgy, after the Communion. It is always, also, preceded by a prayer for grace and purity to use its words aright. That in the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom is, "Make us worthy, O Lord, with boldness and without condemnation, to dare to call upon Thee our God and Father Which art in Heaven, and to say:" but in other liturgies this prayer is longer, while in the Mozarabic and Gallican it varies according to the season, like the proper prefaces of the Sanctus.[1] In addition to this prefatory prayer there is also a supplementary one called the Embolismus, which is described under that word. Thus the Lord's Prayer of the Liturgy was treated with a very high degree of reverence; a reverence which is still observed in our English Offices by the use of the Lesser Litany—"Let us pray. Lord, have mercy upon us. Christ, have mercy upon us. Lord, have mercy upon us"—nearly every time that it is said in Divine service. It became a part, moreover, not only of the Eucharistic Office, but of every public service; and when some Spanish priests had introduced a custom of saying it only on Sunday, a special canon was passed by the fourth Council of Toledo [A.D. 633], declaring that it must be said in every public or private office which they used [Conc. Tolet. iv. can. x.]. A similar provision was made by the Synod of Gerona [Conc. Gerund. A.D. 517, can. xi.] and by the ancient rule of St. Benedict, shewing what was the tradition of the Church on the subject.

It may be added, in connection with the reverence shewn towards the Lord's Prayer, that no unbaptized persons were permitted to use it. The Competentes were thoroughly instructed in its meaning by catechetical lectures, like those of St. Cyril and St. Augustine. During the week before Baptism they were required to learn it by heart, and immediately after Baptism they were required to use it for the first time as a prayer, being then qualified as the children of God to say "Our Father" [Aug. Hom. lix. 1]. After that they were enjoined to use it daily [ibid. lviii. 12], as a kind of daily absolution by which their trespasses received daily forgiveness [ibid. lvi. 11, cxxxi. 8; Enchirid. lxxi.; Hom. de temp. cxix.].

[1] This preface to the Lord's Prayer was retained in the original English Liturgy in the form, "As our Saviour Christ hath commanded and taught us, we are bold to say;" but the ancient Embolismus, "Libera nos, quæsumus, Domine, ab omnibus malis, præteritis, præsentibus, et futuris," was dropped out of the service altogether.

LORD'S SUPPER. A term originally belonging to the love-feast which accompanied the celebration of the Holy Eucharist [AGAPÆ], and, from it, used as the liturgical name of Maundy Thursday. Its Latin equivalent, "Cœna Domini," is once used by St. Augustine [Ep. cxviii. 5] in association both with the love-feast and the Eucharist, and once (in a more doubtful way) by St. Jerome in his Commentary on 1 Cor. xi. 20, but it can scarcely be said to have been known as a name for the Eucharist in ancient times.

In early English, whenever this name was used, it was applied either to the Last Supper, or to the marriage supper of the king in the parable. Thus a MS. in the British Museum [Harl. MS. 1701] written about A.D. 1360, is entitled "Medytacions of the Soper of our Lorde Ihū, and also of His passyn," &c., the contents of which are thus indicated:—

> "Foure thynges thou most haue yn thy thoght
> That yn thys soper cryst hath wrought.
> The fyrst ys a bodily feding
> The secunde ys hys dycyples fete washynge
> The threde yn brede hymself takying
> The fourthe a sermon of fayre makyng."

And the Mirror of our Lady [A.D. 1530] says, "There is thre maner of people, whyche as the gospel tellyth, were called to oure Lorde's soper, and came not, for pryde, for worldlynesse, and for fleshelynesse" [Mirror, f. xlii.], the "certain man" being afterwards called "our Lord."

In 1530, the term "Cœna Domini" is used in the Confession of Augsburg, which, and its addoption by Calvin [Inst. iv. 22], points, perhaps, to the origin of its popular use. In the first vernacular "Order of Communion" it was not used; but the first Act of Parliament passed in the reign of Edward VI. [1 Edw. VI. cap. 1, A.D. 1547] speaks of the Sacrament as "commonly called the Sacrament of the Altar, and in Scripture the Supper [1 Cor. xi. 20] and Table of the Lord [1 Cor. x. 21], the communion [1 Cor. x. 16] and partaking of the body and blood of Christ [1 Cor. x. 16, 17]." The title of the Liturgy in the Prayer Book of 1549 is, "The Supper of the Lord, and the Holy Communion, commonly called the Mass;" and in that of 1552 it is, "The Order for the Administration of the Lord's Supper, or Holy Communion."

The novel and inexact use of the term thus engrafted on its ancient use has led to much popular confusion between the actual Cœna Domini at which the Eucharist was instituted and the Eucharist itself [Luke xxii. 20 and 1 Cor. xi. 25]. This confusion has also been increased by familiarity with Leonardo da Vinci's picture of the Last Supper, which was painted for the dining-room of the Dominican Convent of St. Maria delle Grazie at Milan, but which has been frequently associated with the Altar in sculpture and painting, and often spoken of as a representation of the Institution of the Eucharist. The theological result has been a tendency to depress the higher aspects of the Sacrament, and to dwell disproportionately on that which looks towards human love and fellowship.

LORD'S TABLE. A designation of the Christian Altar which looks to its communion aspect, that of a table provided by God in the wilderness, from whence He feeds men with the Bread of Heaven [Ps. lxxviii. 19]. The Scriptural use of the word "table," when associated with the Name of the Lord, refers to the provision which He offers, not to the wooden or other fabric on which it is spread. Thus flesh or food [שְׁאֵר], bread [לֶחֶם], and [בָּשָׂר] meat, are translated by τράπεζα, "table," in the Septuagint, and mensa in the Vulgate [Ps. lxxviii. 19, 20; 1 Sam. xxiii. 26; Dan. i.]; and when the τράπεζα of the Lord is contrasted with the "table of devils" [1 Cor. x. 21], it is with reference also to the food partaken of at the Love-feasts of the Lord, as contrasted with that partaken of at idol-feasts.

By a natural transition, the term has been appropriated to the Altar itself, as well as to the feast provided there; but the name given to the Altar by the Primitive Church was θυσιαστήριον, and it is not called a table by any Christian writer during the first three centuries. The use of the word is very exhaustively discussed by Mede, whose works [pp. 382-392 and p. 860, ed. 1677] may be referred to for further study of the point. [ALTAR.]

LOVE. [VIRTUES, THEOLOGICAL.]

LOVE-FEASTS. [AGAPÆ.]

LUTHERANISM. The doctrinal system framed by Luther and his fellow reformers, and maintained by the community which bears his name. It is contained in the AUGSBURG CONFESSION, a statement of the belief of the Reformers presented to the Emperor Charles V. at a Diet held at that town [A.D. 1530]; the articles of Smalkald, framed by Luther at a meeting of Protestant princes in that place; and a document called "Forma Concordiæ," drawn up[1] by six Lutheran doctors at Berg [A.D. 1574]. The first distinctive feature of Lutheranism, as contrasted with the theology then prevailing, is the sole authority of Scripture. The Word of God was in Luther's eyes supreme, and, what is more specific, the sense of it in his view was so plain and easy (for he rejected all allegorical or metaphorical meanings) as to be within reach of every one acquainted with the original language. Of the ancient creeds little account is made, though both the Nicene and that of the Apostles are referred to in the Augsburg Confession, and one or other is generally recited by the minister in the course of the Divine service.

[1] It was first prepared at Turgau, and reviewed at Berg. Though called a Form of Concord, it had anything but a pacific effect, and was itself a great cause of controversy. It is principally on the subject of the Eucharist.

On the all-important verities of the Trinity in Unity, the Incarnation and Atonement, the Lutheran Confession coincides with the Catholic faith. But the main article of Lutheranism is the doctrine of "justification by faith only."

It is important that the meaning of this should be clearly stated. It is shewn in the article on JUSTIFICATION that the word "justified" has in theology two meanings, [1] to be made righteous, [2] to be accounted righteous. In speaking of man being justified by faith, the word is used by the Reformers in the latter or, as it is called, the "forensic" sense. Again, the words "by (or on account of) faith," are understood to mean, negatively, by no merit of our own, and, positively, by the free grace of God for the merit of Christ, our trust and reliance on which is the condition of our justification.

The doctrine that we are justified by faith, therefore, carefully stated, means no more than that we are accepted with God, not for our own merits, but only of His grace and mercy for the merit of His Son. But it would be a great mistake to suppose that this doctrine, as it is clearly taught in Scripture, was not also believed by the Church, or that Luther was really the discoverer or inventor of it. The earliest of the Christian Fathers [A.D. 100], St. Clement of Rome, in his epistle to the Corinthians, gives a most explicit statement of it. St. Augustine, in the fourth century, is a full expounder of the doctrine of grace; and the dying words of St. Bernard, in the twelfth century —the great monastic saint of the Middle Ages— are quoted with approval by Luther himself, as expressing the renunciation of his own works and entire trust in the merits of Christ.

But though never denied by the Church, it had been no doubt obscured by two principal causes; [1] the subtle disputes and distinctions of the Schoolmen; and [2] the growth and prevalence of practices under sanction of the Church, which, whether really or not, certainly appeared to contradict it, and would have that effect in the popular mind. To the former belong the questions about ATTRITION, CONTRITION, Grace of CONDIGNITY, and Grace of CONGRUITY. To the latter the custom of pilgrimages, penances, and the whole system of INDULGENCES, which, being carried on before his eyes in the grossest form, first aroused Luther's indignation, and led him to discern how much both these corrupt usages, and the disputations which were in those days the main study of the divines. contributed to overlay and obscure the revealed Truth of God.

It was only natural and in accordance with the history of religious belief, that in their grasp of one neglected truth Luther and his followers should be led to overstate, and by dwelling on it too exclusively, at least appear to disparage others. And though the statement of the doctrine of Justification, framed as it is in the guarded language of Melanchthon in the Augsburg Confession, seems little open to exception, it is not to be denied that both Luther and many of his followers have been betrayed into erroneous statements on the subject, and that the popular conception of the doctrine in the Lutheran body has not been favourable to holiness or strictness of life.

Respecting the Sacraments, the Lutheran belief differs little from that of the Catholic Church. It acknowledges the necessity and efficacy of Baptism, as also the competency for it of infants; and anathematizes all Anabaptists, i.e. those who, denying the validity of infant baptism, repeat it on adults.

In the Eucharist, Luther, as is well known, held most strongly the real Presence of the Body and Blood of Christ, though denying Transubstantiation. His belief is generally supposed to be that called CONSUBSTANTIATION; but that of his followers in after times has considerably varied, and the mode of the Divine Presence has been a fruitful subject of controversy, both among the Lutherans themselves and also between them and other Protestant bodies.

On the subject of Orders, Luther's opinion appears to have been modified by necessity. The Divine authority of the Christian ministry he fully acknowledged (and he appears to have recognised the Apostolic origin of the three orders of bishops, priests, and deacons); but as no bishop embraced the views of the German reformer, that order, and with it the Apostolic succession, is lost to the Lutheran body.

In Sweden and Norway, however, where Lutheranism became the established religion A.D. 1527, and in Denmark, where it was established A.D. 1539, the Church is governed by bishops; in the former country, the Archbishop of Upsala being Primate, though whether the so-called bishops possess the Apostolic succession is doubtful. In other countries, the Lutheran congregations are governed by consistories composed of equal numbers of clerical and lay members. There is thus only one order of ministers, and these, in addition to preaching and administration of the Sacraments, appoint others by customs similar to those used among Scotch Presbyterians and English Dissenters, namely, laying on of hands and exhortation.

As regards Ritual, Luther, while claiming for himself and his followers liberty of divergence from the established ritual of the Church, regarded it also as a matter admitting of wide diversity of practice in different congregations, and held it comparatively unimportant what measure of the ritual then in use was retained by the Reformed communities. He excepted, indeed, those usages which had become objects of superstition; and yet in his later years he censured his disciple, Carlostadt, for violently ejecting the images from a church, taking the ground that even these were among the things indifferent. The same variety of practice among Lutheran congregations in different towns and countries has existed to this day, though in all, there is somewhat more of ceremonial than among the "Reformed" or Calvinistic congregations. In a church where Lutheran worship is used, the central object is generally the altar, with a crucifix and lighted candles upon it. In the Swedish churches, splendid vestments are worn by the officiating minister; in other countries, a gown only.

Confession, Luther had no intention of abolishing, but acknowledged the advantage of it, and the power of the clergy to absolve. He denied, however, its necessity as an habitual practice, and not being regarded as obligatory, it soon fell into complete disuse.

A peculiar and characteristic feature of the Lutheran system is its dependence on the civil power. This also is a result of the circumstances under which Luther was placed. Abandoned by the hierarchy, he was forced to throw himself on the support of the civil power, and those princes of Germany who favoured the Reformation became the natural protectors of the Protestant congregations. Hence a sort of ecclesiastical supremacy was accorded to the prince of every Protestant state, which, though guaranteeing for the Reformers the free exercise of their religion, left them under considerable restraints, and in danger of finding religion subordinated to political considerations.

The history of Lutheranism from the Reformation till the present time is a somewhat stormy one. Extending, in the time of Luther, over the greater part of Germany, and carried early into the kingdoms of Denmark and Sweden, it has at no time either made any considerable addition or sustained any diminution of its territory. Neither has it been famous for foreign missions; for the Danish mission to the coast of Malabar [A.D. 1706] appears to be the only enterprise of the kind undertaken by the Lutheran body.

In controversies, however, and internal dissensions it is unhappily rife. The Lutheran community appears to have inherited the polemical and uncompromising spirit of its founder; and although during his lifetime its state was one of comparative quiet, when on his death his position was filled by the gentler Melanchthon, the successive controversies which broke forth greatly disturbed the peace of the Reformed Churches. These were chiefly the contest about ADIAPHORA, or things indifferent [A.D. 1548]; the dispute between Georgius Major and Amsdorf on the necessity of good works [A.D. 1552]; and the violent controversy called the Synergistic, i.e. concerning the concurrence of the human will, in which the opinions of Melanchthon were violently attacked by Flacius and defended by Strigelius; the discord excited by the apparently heretical speculations of Osiander [A.D. 1549] concerning the righteousness of Christ. It was as an attempt to allay these dissensions that the document called the Form of Concord was drawn up, though it was itself more fruitful of strife than peace.

In the seventeenth century the chief events concerning the Lutheran body were the attempts at union [1] with the Church of England in the reign of James I. [A.D. 1615], and [2] with the Reformed French Calvinists. The tumults resulting from the project of Calixtus to combine the different Protestant systems [A.D. 1639], which gained the name of SYNCRETISM, and those of the so-called Pietists at Leipsic [A.D. 1689], which, originating in a laudable attempt under Spener to promote a spirit of piety, ended in a good deal of fanaticism and disorder, are also to be noticed.

In more recent times, the Lutheran clergy, abandoning strict adherence to their symbolical books, have allowed themselves a considerable laxity of opinion, but in this again there has lately been a reaction, and many have zealously revived, especially on the subject of the Sacraments, the original teaching of their founder. Some of their divines have made invaluable contributions to modern theology and ecclesiastical history; among whom may be named the Church historians Mosheim, Neander, and Gieseler; the commentators Tholuck, Stier, and Hengstenberg, the very philosophical theologian, as well as commentator, Delitzsch, and the theologian Dorner.

M

MACEDONIANISM. A heresy of the fourth century, which consisted in a denial of the Divine Nature of the Holy Ghost. This error was implied in the previous heresy of Arius [ARIANISM]; for what was denied to the Second Person of the Blessed Trinity could hardly be allowed to the Third: but it did not acquire distinctness till some time after the Nicene Council [A.D. 325], when it appears among the points on which the Semi-Arian party differed from the holders of the orthodox faith. It is then associated with Macedonius, a man of the Arian faction, of venerable aspect, but great violence of temper, who having been by order of the Emperor Constantius forcibly introduced into the See of Constantinople [A.D. 343], and there made himself odious by his cruel persecutions of orthodox Christians, was afterwards, on account of this and of an apparent disrespect to the body of the late Emperor Constantine, through the influence of Acacius and his followers with Constantius, deposed [Socrat. ii. 6, 16, 38]. It is on his deposition that Macedonius appears to have first broached the heresy which bears his name, and hence gained for himself and his followers the name of Pneumatomachi, or adversaries of the Spirit. Under that name they are refuted by St. Athanasius, then in exile, in a letter to Serapion [A.D. 360]. Macedonius was joined in his heresy by other bishops: Eleusius, late of Cyzicum; Eustathius of Sebastia; Marathonius of Nicomedia; Sophronius, late of Pompeiopolis; but they do not seem to have been agreed in any positive opinion concerning the nature of the Holy Ghost—some with Macedonius himself maintaining Him to be a creature, others stopping short of this [Sozom. iv. 27; Socrat. ii. 45], though denying Him to be God; while others taught that the Spirit was created by the Son, and ministered to Him.

The heresy spread chiefly in Thrace, Bithynia, the Hellespont, and the neighbouring provinces, even after the death of Macedonius himself, till it was finally condemned at the great Council held at Constantinople [A.D. 381], which, though it consisted almost entirely of Eastern bishops, has from the universal reception of its decrees been accounted the Second Œcumenical Synod of the Church. On that occasion the Nicene Creed was enlarged by the addition of the clauses, "the Lord, the Giver of Life, Who proceedeth from the Father" [FILIOQUE], "Who with the Father and the Son together is worshipped and glorified, Who spake by the prophets." These statements, as appears from Epiphanius, formed part of a creed already in use in some parts of the Church, and are obviously founded on the following texts:—Matt. xii. 31, 32; Acts v. 3, 4; 1 Cor. iii. 16, vi. 19; 2 Cor. iii. 17. Their acceptance by the Western Church is evidenced by the reply of Damasus, Bishop of Rome, to the letter of the Constantinopolitan Synod, communicating the enlarged creed. "If any one deny that the Holy Ghost is really and truly of the Father, as is the Son, that He is of the Divine Substance, and that He is very God,—that the Holy Ghost is Almighty, Omniscient, and Omnipresent, even as are the Father and the Son," or "say that the Holy Ghost was created or made by the Son," &c., let him be anathema [Theodor. v. 11]. The peculiar error known as Macedonianism has never apparently been revived in the Church. The Personality of the Blessed Spirit was denied by Socinus, as it is also by the modern sect of Unitarians; but His Personality once granted, the language of Scripture concerning Him is too high to admit the supposition that He can be other than Divine.

MAGIC. It being foreign to the purpose of the present work to attempt a history of the art of magic, it is sufficient for the purely theological view of the subject to consider it as professing to call into exercise, at the pleasure of man and by means of an external ceremonial, certain supernatural powers.

I. At the very outset then, and taking the best possible view of magic—supposing, that is, the intention of the magician to be good, and the powers he proposes to evoke altogether beneficent—the art appears to be a presumptuous and unwarrantable attempt to do that which, from the very nature of the case, can be in the power of God alone. To connect supernatural agencies with physical objects, with an external ceremonial, must be God's prerogative; and he who works by any such supposed connection is bound, for his justification, to shew the ordinance and promise of God. Unless he do this, his work, however beneficent in its purpose, is an unwarranted, and therefore a blasphemous, parody of sacraments. In the sacraments God has united the inward with the outward: and their solemnity and dignity shew, on the other hand, the depth of guilt incurred by those who without warrant assert another and similar union. That magic in its best form is a parody of sacraments is seen in this, that they who deny sacramental grace class sacraments with charms and incantations.

Wherever there has been a general practice of magic there has been a recognised distinction between lawful and unlawful magic. Such lawful magic (we are speaking of the laws of a nation to which God's revelation has not come), practised with an allowable or praiseworthy design, points to those wants and necessities in our nature which are met by sacramental grace. And as we cannot conceive any real want in our moral and spiritual nature—any want arising out of the constitution of mind and body which God has imparted to us—unsatisfied by revelation, the existence among heathen nations of lawful magic is a proof that true religion must have its sacraments. Such magic, involving no immorality in its ceremonies, and practised for a good end, we may believe to have been one of the things which God winked at in the time of man's ignorance, to have been forbidden at the entrance of revelation, and to become a blasphemy, if continued either to supplant or to supplement true sacraments. When man is in possession of appointed means of grace, has learned the power of prayer, and received assurance of angelic ministrations, an attempt to call in supernatural agencies in a different way becomes both presumption and distrust.

II. The general corruption of the world made this comparatively innocent form of magic little more than a theory, and gave to the art an entirely different aspect. "Magi" became equivalent to "Venefici" and "Malefici:" and Magici Dii, the powers invoked by magic, came under St. Paul's decision, "that the things which the Gentiles sacrifice they sacrifice to devils, and not to God." The purpose of magic became wicked, and its processes generally involved moral guilt. Theft, murder, lust, entered into the ceremonial which was to effect a compact with the Evil One.

In a history of magic it might be possible to avoid the question whether there has ever been or can be any really successful magic: here the question must be met. The answer which we venture to make to it is this: that there has never been any real subjugation of spiritual powers to the will of man, but that it may have pleased Almighty God to allow an exercise of Satanic agency to enter into the practice of magic (as if in consequence of its processes), for a meet retribution to those who sought to call up such agency, or for the trial through their means of the faith of the elect.

First, This theory may be rested upon the tenor of Scripture narrative and Scripture laws. In considering this, it is by no means asserted that it would be unworthy of the Spirit of God to bring His religion formally into opposition to a system of human imposture. That imposture (if magic were only such) was in itself a grave sin, very widely spread, and most pernicious. The magicians of Egypt, for example, if impostors, were not mere jugglers or conjurors: they were sinful misleaders of the people; and to confront them with true miracles involves in it no unworthy conception of the Deity. But the tenor of Scripture history, of the Mosaic laws, of the teaching of the Prophets, implies the possibility of a real entrance into magic of supernatural agency. In the New Testament, further, the Pythoness and her masters are not indeed properly magicians, but the reality of that spirit of divination at least prepares us to believe that a supernatural power may have been exhibited by Simon Magus, or among those who "used curious arts" at Ephesus. Most strong of all is the proof from the signs and wonders which shall try the elect [Matt. xxiv. 24], the miracles by which Antichrist will deceive mankind [Rev. xiii. 14]. The first preachers of the Gospel being certainly opposed by men who pretended to supernatural power through the arts of magic; these prophecies, asserting the reality of such signs and wonders in time to come, make it probable that there was some reality in the earlier pretensions.

Secondly, The theory in question is in analogy with God's dealings with man in other respects. God takes the worldly wise in their own craftiness, He makes the wicked reap as they have sown; and there is nothing incredible or difficult in the supposition that He may punish the attempt to call in supernatural power, by permitting evil angels to exercise their power, turning such permission to His own high purposes in proving thereby the faith of the elect.

There may be called into operation, perhaps, by the practice of magic, as by the practice of any sin for which men unite, spiritual influences other than the agencies of evil angels. "Who shall dare determine," asked Coleridge, "what spiritual influences may not arise out of the collective evil wills of wicked men?" To such influences Coleridge even gave the name of spirits, with the caution that spirits are not necessarily distinct persons, not necessarily souls or self-consciousnesses; that all minds are spirits, though it does not follow that all spirits are minds [Literary Remains, ii. pp. 211, 212]. But such influences, supposing them to exist, can only operate in and upon the mind: their agency cannot account for the external signs and wonders which Scripture teaches us to look for in the latter days. Such signs and wonders can be referred only to those evil angels who have at times, by God's permission, a certain power over the physical world.

The canons of the Church against magic call for no special notice. They are brought together and classified in Bingham [Orig. Eccl. xvi. 5].

But of great interest and importance is the question, In what way is the natural tendency of man to magical arts and superstitions to be met by the Church? The need of Exorcism before Baptism perhaps ceases in a Christian country, for it appears to have had reference to that larger power of Satan which appears to have prevailed among heathens and Jews, before the times of the Gospel, and which was subdued by degrees as Christianity spread. Mediæval exorcism, going far beyond the authorized practice of the Church, only fostered the superstition whose effects it was designed to remedy, and the history of exorcism is but one degree less sad than the history of magic.

The less hurtful form of magic points to that in man's nature which requires sacraments, and the want is met by true sacraments. So that want in man's nature which gives occasion to amulets and charms, points to, and is met by, a true Church ceremonial. Keble's words are most true and wise on this matter: "All sensible things may have other meanings and uses than we know of; spiritual and heavenly relations, associations, resemblances, apt to assist men in realizing Divine contemplations; the Church (no one can say how far by celestial guidance at first) selected a certain number and order of sensible things; certain actions of the body, such as bowing at the Name of Jesus, and turning to the east in prayer; certain forms of matter, such as the cross and the ring, generally or always significant in themselves and very instructive, one might almost say needful, to children and men of childlike understanding and knowledge; such things as these the Church of God instinctively selected for her ceremonies, and combined them by degrees into an orderly system." These ceremonies are the Christian's amulets and charms; for if, as Keble goes on to represent them, they are a perpetual spiritual sacrifice, they bring, as does every true sacrifice, their proper blessing [Hooker's Works, pref. p. xc.]

Sacraments and ceremonies thus meeting and satisfying the spiritual wants of men, to them, in conjunction with true teaching regarding angelic ministrations, the Church trusts to correct the natural tendency of man to magical arts. When catholic doctrine regarding angels is lost superstition always appears. The enlightened nineteenth century has suffered from folly and superstition in attempts to connect the invisible world with the visible world, more gross and degrading than the rankest belief of our forefathers in witchcraft.

MAMMON. A Syriac and Rabbinical word for riches.[1] In Matt. vi. 24, mammon, or riches, is symbolical of the world, the second of the enemies renounced at Baptism: οὐ τὸ ἀργύριον λέγων φησὶ ψιλῶς οὕτως, ἀλλὰ τὴν ἐκ τοῦ ἀργυρίου εἰς τὰς ποικίλας ἡδονὰς χορηγίαν [Clem. Alex. Strom. VII. c. xii. sec. 71]. It is equivalent to the "lust of the eyes" in 1 John xi. 16; "the illusion" that is "produced in our higher mental nature by outward things seen otherwise than in the light of God" [Mill, Sermons on the Temptation, p. 60]. Whether the order of the three enemies be taken as in the renunciation at Baptism, the devil, the world, the flesh; or as by St. John, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, the pride of life, still the middle place is properly occupied by the world, which the Apostle represents as the seat of all the three. The pomps and vanities of the world naturally hold an intermediate position, as of a mixed nature, between the purely carnal appetite and the purely spiritual sin whose diabolical source is pride [Mill, p. 85].

In Luke xvi. 9, mammon means simply riches, for the righteous may possess and use it rightly. In ver. 3 the service of mammon is covetousness, φιλαργυρία, as Clemens Alexandrinus [Strom. IV. c. vi. sec. 30] interprets, referring to the passage in St. Luke, whereas, in the former passage, he has St. Matthew in mind, as the context shews. Mammon of unrighteousness is rightly interpreted by Schleusner not wealth unrighteously gotten, but wealth in its own nature unjust, as treacherous and playing its owner false. Comp. Prov. xi. 18, "The wicked worketh a deceitful work," turns out a thing which plays him false.

Thus we have the two characters of the service of the world that it is illusory and idolatrous: illusory, because it never realizes to him who actually tastes these objects of desire the hopes of good which the lusting eye conceived in them while distant; idolatrous, because it is the admission of a rival interest into that place in the heart which is reserved for God, and God only. And whatsoever homage is paid in our hearts to the world, as thus described, is paid in reality, and in the Divine esteem, to the hateful sovereign of it, to him whom our Lord and His Apostles so frequently term the ruler and prince of the world [Mill, Sermons on the Temptation, pp. 91, 95, 99].

One of the deepest thinkers of Queen Elizabeth's time gives this good advice:—

> "Mixe not in Funetions God and Earth together;
> The wisdom of the world and His are two;
> One latitude can well agree to neither,
> In each men have their beings as they do:
> The world doth build without, our God within;
> He trafficks Goodness, and she trafficks sin."
> [Lord Brooke, Remains, 1670, p. 201.]

And the same writer describes those who strive to unite the two services:—

> "God and the world they worship still together,
> Draw not their lawes to Him, but His to theirs;
> Untrue to both, so prosperous in neither,
> Amid their own desires still raising feares:
> Unwise, as all distracted powers be,
> Strangers to God, fooles in humanitie."
> [Works, 1633, p. 82.]

But the unrighteous mammon may be righteously used. Almsgiving, its sincerity being attested by fasting, is animated by prayer, becomes one of the angels of intercourse and commerce between God and man, and hereafter receives the faithful into everlasting habitations.

MANICHÆISM. Manes, the originator of this heresy, was born in Persia about the middle of the third century [A.D. 260]. St. Epiphanius says [Adver. Hæres. 46 sive 66] that his name was Cubricus, and that he was the slave of the widow of a certain Terebinthus or Buddas of Babylon, who had inherited books of Oriental philosophy from Scythianas, a Saracen merchant. Cubricus, who afterwards called himself Manes, was in early life ordained to the priesthood, but afterwards expelled from the Church for heresy. He was favourably received by Sapor, King of Persia [A.D. 270], but afterwards was compelled by Varanes [A.D. 271-276], one of his successors, to hold a public discussion with the Magi: he was defeated and put to an ignominious death [A.D. 277] as a teacher of a false religion. His system may be described as a fusing together of Zoroastrianism and Gnosticism with Christianity. He maintained, according to Persian Dualism, that there are two eternal principles of good and evil: that the world, or the matter of which it was composed, was created by the Evil spirit, and that our Lord did not possess a real or material body, or suffer on the Cross. He rejected the Old Testament altogether, and received such portions of the New as accorded with his system. He admitted some of the Apocryphal Gospels, though his own writings were considered by his followers of the highest importance, especially his "Epistola fundamenti," or the foundation of belief. He asserted that he was the Paraclete or Comforter promised by our Lord. His followers were divided into two portions—the hearers (auditores), and the elect (electi). Marriage was allowed to the former class, and they were not required to practise the more difficult rules of the sect, its hidden mysteries being also concealed from them. The elect abstained from flesh, eggs, milk, and wine, shewed the greatest care not to injure the lives of plants or animals, and lived in chastity and celibacy.

[1] It is a mistake to suppose that there was an idol of this name in the East [see Smith's Dict. and Alford, Note on Matt. vi. 24]. Milton's personification in Par. Lost has probably spread this notion in England.

After the death of Manes his opinions spread rapidly throughout Persia, Egypt, and Palestine; being often referred to and refuted by the Fathers, especially by St. Augustine, who in early life belonged to the sect, and by St. Leo. Diocletian issued most severe edicts against them in Africa [A.D. 296] as being a Persian sect, and thus hostile to the Empire. "Nothing," says Milman, "is more curious in Christian history than the vitality of Manichæan opinions" [History of Latin Christianity, ix. 8, ed. 1867]. Though apparently extinct in the Eastern Church they reappeared in the seventh century under the name of PAULICIANS; and in the Western Church in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, Manichæan opinions were held amongst sects called Cathari, Paterini, or Albigenses. [Gibbon's Decline and Fall, &c. c. 54. Maitland's Facts and Documents, 1831. Dict. of SECTS and HERESIES.]

MARANATHA. The Greek form of two Syriac words signifying "The Lord will come." It is found in 1 Cor. xvi. 22, where the expression is used to intensify and make more solemn the denunciation of Anathema against false teachers by remitting them to the judgment of the Lord at His second Coming.

MARCIONITES. An heretical sect who originated about the middle of the second century, and were so called from Marcion, son of the Bishop of Sinope. Professing the celibate life, Marcion seduced one of the virgins of the Church. He was excommunicated by his father, who refused, on his professed repentance, to readmit him to communion. Unable to bear the opprobrium of his immoral conduct, he went to Rome [A.D. 150], associating himself with Cerdo, the Syrian Gnostic; whose opinions generally he held, though with some variations [Epiphan. Contr. Marc. Hær. 22 sive 42]. He taught that there are three eternal principles:[1] the one, the Unnameable and Invisible, whom he called the good God; another who was visible, the Creator of the World and the DEMIURGE or Supreme Ruler, who was the God of the Jews; the third, the Devil, who held an intermediate place between them. The Demiurge, who was an imperfect Being, made, he said, this lower and visible world of matter (ὕλη), which was essentially evil: hence like the Docetic Gnostics he maintained that our Lord had not a real body, since He would thus have connected Himself with matter. His fundamental theory was the irreconcilable contradiction between the Law and the Gospel. He rejected the Old Testament altogether as proceeding from the Demiurge (the God of Judaism and not of the Gospel), and admitted only those portions of the New Testament not, as he supposed, corrupted by Judaism. He received only the Gospel of St. Luke and ten epistles of St. Paul (rejecting the pastoral epistles and that to the Hebrews), with many corrections and mutilations, excluding all the quotations from the Old Testament. He taught three baptisms for sin, and the transmigration of souls, and denied the resurrection of the body. An account of his opinions is given by Tertullian in his five books against Marcion; by Theodoret and St. Epiphanius (as quoted) and St. Irenæus [Adv. Hæres. lib. i. c. 28]. St. Epiphanius says that the sect had spread (in the fourth century) through Italy, Egypt, Palestine, Arabia, Cyprus, Persia, and other countries. It survived other Gnostic sects, and was extinct in the seventh century. [Dict. of SECTS and HERESIES.]

MARIOLATRY. The sin of rendering to the Blessed Virgin Mary that worship [LATRIA] which is due to God alone.

This word (which is only of recent introduction) is properly confined to the strict meaning now given, and ought not to be used, as it sometimes is, for every cultus whatever of the Blessed Virgin, or for a mere excess in that cultus when that excess does not transgress the bounds that separate the reverence which may be lawfully paid to a creature from the proper worship of the Creator.

A consideration of what is essential to Mariolatry will shew that neither the Eastern nor the Western Church is chargeable with this sin, however chargeable both, or large portions of both, may be with an excessive cultus. Some theologians, it is to be feared, have fallen into the sin (regarding which we shall endeavour to state the principles that must guide us in judging of any case produced); and the practice of certain portions of the Church going beyond its theory, has probably resulted in an ignorant, and therefore, it is to be hoped, a pardonable, commission of the sin.

That which constitutes Latria is the faith which recognises in the object of worship the first and original source of goodness and power. St. Peter trusted implicitly to the guidance of the delivering angel, but he recognised in him God's messenger. With such recognition the love and reverence for a celestial being could not pass into Divine worship. By the absence of this recognition must be explained the angel's refusal of worship in Rev. xxii. 9 when compared with the command of the angel in Josh. v. 14, 15, and his acceptance of worship after he had announced himself as captain of the Lord's host. An examination of this principle in detail will point out when cultus passes into Divine worship in the case before us.

[1.] The Blessed Virgin was not merely a physical but also a moral[1] instrument in effecting the Incarnation. [MARY, II. 2.]

[2.] The same sense that she is God's instrument must run through our consideration of her abiding glory in being Theotokos; through any contemplation which we may allow ourselves to entertain of the acknowledgment by the glorified Redeemer of His relationship to His mother. This abiding glory is the consequence of that first act whereby she became a moral instrument of our redemption; its greatness is involved in that act; and it submits to the same limitations.

[3.] These articles of pious belief are perverted when the Blessed Virgin is spoken of as if our redemption depended upon her "fiat," words in which we are in a fallacy led from the subordinate free-will of the creature to a free-will co-ordinate with the will of God. The subordination of a finite free-will to the Divine will, so as to secure the sure effecting of God's purposes on the one hand, and man's responsibility on the other hand, is one of the things too deep for our comprehension. In the opposite case of God's purposes effected by an unholy will St. Paul stops the mouth of the objector [Rom. ix. 19, 20]. But the vessel to honour and the vessel to dishonour both alike remain in their lower sphere, and do but work the purposes of Him who ordereth all things after the counsel of His own will. And it is a fatal fallacy which elevates the action of the holy human will into co-ordination with the Supreme Divine Will.

[4.] It is also a fatal fallacy which elevates that moral instrumentality of the Blessed Virgin into an action meritorious for the redemption of mankind. Such meritoriousness belongs not to any human action whatever. Yet this meritoriousness and the co-ordination of the will of the Blessed Virgin with the Divine Will must both be assumed if the intercession of the Virgin is raised to a rank in its nature above the intercession of other saints.

Every Catholic Christian believes in the intercession of the saints, and he will add, that of no created being can the intercession be so prevalent as is that of the mother of God. It is one thing, however, to pray to the saints to intercede for us, knowing that they are still members of the Church, and quite another thing to pray to the Mediator and to the Holy Spirit to intercede for us, recognising them as Divine Intercessors. For of this latter intercession the ground is that the Son has offered Himself a sacrifice for sin, that the Holy Spirit took part in the Incarnation, Sufferings, and Resurrection of the Son; and the manner is, that the wills of Him who makes and of Him who receives the intercession are co-ordinate, and perfectly one. Now if we exalt the intercession of the Blessed Virgin above that of a creature, we parallel her merits with the merits of Christ, her will with His will, which is one with the Supreme Will.

[5.] These two errors underlie all the teaching by which some writers on the glories of Mary assign to her "a co-operation, all along, in our Lord's own proper work of our redemption." God condescends to call us fellow-workers with Himself, when He employs us as moral instruments; but if a being co-operates in the proper work of the Redeemer, that being must itself be an original source of goodness, and, as such, associated with the Redeemer. The worship then founded upon [3] and [4] reaches beyond the limits of a due cultus, and passes into Latria, or the worship due to God alone.

[6.] In accordance with which are the statements of certain writers, logically in agreement with the worship they advocate, that St. Mary has been assumed into the Trinity, so as to make it a Quaternity, that "Mary is the complement of the Trinity" [Pusey's Eirenicon, ii. 167].

Such being Mariolatry, it must be considered that although, when ignorance can be pleaded, it may be an extenuation of the sin that it sprang originally out of reverence to her who is the mother of our Lord, yet, so far as there is knowledge, it is only an intensification of the sin that it is Mary, daughter of David, who is worshipped. For if we break the first commandment by equalling with God a being whom we declare to be altogether above ourselves, it is less derogatory to His honour than when we equal with Him one who is of ourselves. And the verity of our Lord's human nature requires that she of whom He assumes the substance of His flesh should be of the flesh and blood of which all the children are partakers. In the assumption of His Flesh from the Blessed Virgin, He has assumed that which is common to all. Great as is the glory to her, the highly favoured, there is no abiding union of the Son with her that does not exist also with all the redeemed. This follows from St. Paul's words just referred to, compared with our Lord's words, "whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is my mother." The same conclusion follows also from the well-known Patristic principle that Mary is the second Eve, for, as such, she is the representative of the Church. Now it is not only in the old prophets but in the Apocalypse too, that the Church appears as the mother of Christ. In the old prophets, Isa xxvi.

[1] "Gaudet prudentissima Virgo, et auditis verbis Angeli consensit" [Bonaventura, Med. Vitæ Christi, c. iv.]

18, 19 [cf. Hos. xiii. 13, 14]; Isa. lxvi. 7, 8 [cf. liv. 1]: in the Apocalypse, for the woman who brought forth the man child and was driven into the wilderness must, primarily at least, be the Church. The Church then is Theotokos; and a deification of the Blessed Virgin will surely be found (by the two arguments which we have only indicated) to be a deification of the Church.[1] The sin of Mariolatry then is the paying divine worship to one who confessedly herself needed redemption, who, favoured above all by being the mother of our Lord, yet obtained with Him no more abiding union than is common to the Church which she represents.

No one can endure to think that of the three principal parts of the Church of Christ, the Greek, the Latin, and the Anglican, two (each very much larger than the third) are collectively guilty of Mariolatry. If the Latin Church be guilty, the Greek Church is guilty also. For "it cannot be denied that the orthodox Greek Church does even surpass the Church of Rome in their exaltation of the Blessed Virgin in their devotions" [Williams, in Pusey's Eirenicon, ii. 425].

It is beyond the range of the present article to detail on this point the doctrine and practice of the Greek and Latin Churches. It must suffice to say [1] that the authoritative statement in the Trent Catechism [cap. v. quæst. 8, and cap. vi.] proves that Rome is not chargeable with Mariolatry, while the proportion and character of devotions addressed to the Virgin shew an excess of cultus both in amount and intensity; [2] that the character of the present interpolated Greek service books shews a like excess; [3] that the real danger and difficulty lies in the quasi-authoritative teachings (private yet widely accepted) of Romish theologians, such as are produced in detail in Dr. Pusey's Eirenicon; [4] that of these teachers, those cannot be acquitted of Mariolatry who have adopted the conclusions given above [sec. 6]; [5] that of other teachers, the devotional forms which are in themselves excessive, must be interpreted in accordance with the rest of their teaching, as e.g. Bonaventura's Speculum B. V. with his Meditationes Vitæ Christi. These statements of the nature and essential constituents of Mariolatry may be sufficient to guide the student in the consideration of any individual case proposed to him.

MARRIAGE may be described generally as the union of man and woman for continuation of the human race, for education of children, and for domestic life, and is to be regarded as a natural, a civil, and a religious contract.

I. Marriage as a natural contract is coeval with the human race, being the institution of the Creator Himself, Whose own words explain its nature and obligations, "It is not good that man should be alone, I will make him an help-meet for for him. . . . And the Lord God caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam, and he slept: and He took one of his ribs, and closed up the flesh instead thereof; and the rib which the Lord God had taken from man, made He a woman and brought her unto the man. And Adam said, This is now bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh: she shall be called woman, because she was taken out of man. Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife; and they shall be one flesh" [Gen. ii. 18, 21-24]. And God "blessed them and said unto them, Be fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth" [Gen. i. 28]. From these words the following deductions can be drawn. [1.] That marriage is a union between two persons and two persons only, not between many. [2.] That its character is free and voluntary, being a union of spirits and hearts, as well as of persons. [3.] That it is indissoluble, so that the two contracting parties can no more separate from each other than they can from themselves. [4.] That they have a mutual right over each other's persons. [5.] That the object of marriage is to produce children and to people the earth, parents being bound to nourish, and to do all in their power to preserve their offspring. [6.] That it is on marriage thus undertaken that God originally bestowed His benediction, on which the prosperity of families and the happiness of the human race depends.

All these points have been violated by the following practices, most of which have been not only tolerated by the laws, but defended by the philosophers of antiquity: adultery, polygamy, divorce, exposure and murder of infants, revolt of children against their parents. Some people have imagined a glimmer of the original sanctity of marriage to be seen in the existence of such deities as Hymen or Hymenæus among the Greeks, and Thalassius among the Latins; but to these and other deities the most infamous functions were attributed, and unlimited licentiousness marked the celebration of their festivals.

Marriage then is natural, because its object is to perpetuate the human species. In a Christian's eye (although as interfering with a life of contemplation it cannot be "de præcepto Christiano") it is even meritorious, as enabling persons to fulfil the purpose of God, and to promote the glory of the Redeemer, by peopling heaven with saints, as well as earth with the human race. But St. Paul foretells that in the latter days some should depart from the faith, forbidding to marry [1 Tim. iv. 3], which has been fulfilled by teachers and sects arising, who have held that marriage even in its natural aspect is an abominable thing. Among them may be mentioned the followers of Simon Magus, Carpocrates, Basilides [c. A.D. 125], Saturninus [A.D. 110-134], Cerdon [c. A.D. 150], the disciples of Tatian or Encratites [c. A.D. 180], the Marcionites [c. A.D. 140-176], the Manichæans [A.D. 271], &c. And in the present day in America there is a sect in existence which holds a similar view of the natural sinfulness of marriage, their life as a religious body being perpetuated solely by recruits from the world without.[2]

[1] It belongs to the statement of the true cultus of the Virgin to give the limitations of that cultus; but we may remark, that in this assimilation or quasi-identification of the Church and the Virgin we have a good guide and safeguard of that cultus.

[2] Hepworth Dixon's America. Cf. Sir Thomas Browne' Religio Medici, II. ix.

II. Marriage as a civil contract is so regarded because the laws which settle the rights of husband and wife, father and son, the laws of succession to property, and many other points directly or indirectly connected with marriage, are left to the State, with this limitation, that any regulations which violate the objects for which marriage was instituted, and which come in conflict with the revealed will of God, should be considered ipso facto null and void. The civil power has shown a strong tendency to extend its province beyond these limits, and to encroach upon the religious aspect of Holy Matrimony. In England by 6th and 7th William IV., purely civil alliances before a registrar have been declared legal, which must be interpreted to mean that those who marry will undergo no disabilities political or civil, that their children will not be held to be illegitimate, that they themselves will be regarded, in the eye of the law, as man and wife; but a union unaccompanied by the sanction of religion can lay no claim to legality in a higher and spiritual sense. It has sometimes been argued, in opposition to this view, that among the Jews, under the old dispensation, marriage was a civil ceremony only; yet, although there is no distinctly religious marriage ceremony to be found in the Levitical code, those are hasty who infer thence that marriage was therefore a purely civil contract. And even if it was, we should be no more justified in arguing that it ought to be so now, than we should be right in drawing an inference in favour of polygamy or divorce among Christians, from their being permitted in a transient and bygone dispensation. But what gave the Jewish marriage a quasi-religious character, was the paternal or patriarchial blessing that accompanied it. When Rebekah consented to become Isaac's wife, her father and brother blessed her, saying, "Thou art our sister, be thou the mother of thousands of millions, and let thy seed possess the gate of those which hate them" [Gen. xxiv. 60], and the angel Raphael reminds Tobit, that the blessings and miseries attendant on marriage are in the hand of God [Tob. vi. 17]. Should the civil aspect of matrimony ever come to be regarded as the chief one, and the religious sanction be entirely abolished, the dissolution of morality and domestic ties which would be liable to ensue, would be such as are thus depicted :—

"I used to shudder whenever I heard the question of marriage discussed from a philosophical point of view. What different ways of seeing things! what variety of systems! what passions are set in play! We are told that the civil legislation is to provide for it: but is not this legislation in the hands of men, whose ideas, views, and principles, are constantly changing and contradicting themselves. Look only at the accessories of marriage when left to a civil legislation. Study the variations, contradictions, and abuses, which have been introduced into various nations at different periods, you will then know what the peace of families and of society will have to rely upon if human legislators are to be the absolute masters. It is then very fortunate, that on this important point we have a divine law superior to the enactments of men. Let us be careful not to place it in jeopardy by giving it any sanction but that of religion. But there are many who argue and pretend that the law is detestable; be it so: there is an equally large number who uphold it as being full of wisdom, and who could not be brought to change. This then is the confirmation of what I stated, namely, that society is divided on this point, according to the preponderance of views in different places. This preponderance would be liable to change from the various causes which render civil legislation unstable, and this great object, which for the peace and happiness of society, requires uniformity and constancy, would be liable to perpetual disputes. Religion has then rendered the greatest service to the human race, by imposing on marriage a law, to which the contradictions of men are obliged to submit, and this is not the only advantage which they draw from a fundamental code of morals which they are not permitted to alter." [1]

III. Marriage as a religious contract has been so regarded from the earliest days of Christianity, being itself an institution of a spiritual as well as of a natural kind. For it is the union not only of two natural persons, but of two responsible and spiritual beings, and its purpose and effect is the production of other beings who will, similarly with themselves, have a spiritual existence and be inheritors of eternal life; for as the visible Church on earth is replenished by the baptized children of Christian parents, and as from the visible will be selected the invisible Church of the redeemed, so human marriage is instrumental in adding to the family of God. In Holy Scripture, furthermore, marriage is spoken of as typical of the union between Christ and His Church [Eph. v. 31, 32], and from the first marriage between Adam and Eve, at which God Himself officiated, to the last marriage which shall hereafter take place, the heavenly union between Christ and His redeemed, the marriage of the Lamb and His Wife, it is always alluded to as the most sacred and indissoluble of ties. The following quotations are adduced in support of the statement that from the earliest times the religious character of the matrimonial alliance has been recognised.

Ignatius, writing to Polycarp early in the second century, says, "It becomes those that marry and are given in marriage to take upon them this yoke with the consent or direction of the bishop, that their marriage may be according to the will of God and not their own lusts." [2] Tertullian [A.D. 160-220] writes, "How shall I sufficiently set forth the happiness of that marriage which the Church brings about by her procurement, and the Oblation confirms, and the angels report when done, and the Father ratifies?" [3] St. Ambrose [A.D. 374-397], says, "As marriage must be sanctified by the priest's sanction and blessing, how can that be called a marriage where there is no agreement of faith?" [Ambr. Ep. xix.] In the 13th canon of the fourth Council of Carthage [A.D. 398], it is ordered that the bride and bridegroom be presented by their parents and friends to a priest for benediction; and to prove the existence of a similar view of marriage later on and in our own country, we can refer to the laws of King Edmund [A.D. 946] respecting espousals, among which occurs the following: "The priest shall be at the marriage, and shall celebrate the union according to custom, with God's blessing, and with solemnity." It will be seen by the foregoing references how completely at variance with the spirit of early Christianity is the modern system of marriage by civil contract alone. In England, marriages contracted before a civil registrar without any ceremony of religion whatever are sanctioned and legalized, while in the United States marriages may be solemnized by Justices of the Peace in any place and at any hour, notice of the intention and the names of the contracting parties having been previously deposited with the town-clerk, or some other civil official.

IV. Marriage as a Sacrament It is not, however, only as a religious contract, but also as a sacrament, that marriage is regarded by the Church of Christ; the English Church numbering it among the five lesser Sacraments, which are necessary for the particular states of life to which they refer, though not necessary for persons in general. This view of marriage is based by the Schoolmen on the expression employed by St. Paul when writing to the Ephesians [v. 32], τὸ μυστήριον τοῦτο μέγα ἐστὶν, or as it runs in the Vulgate, "Sacramentum hoc magnum est." Thus viewed, the external part or sign, the "pars sensibilis" is the expression of mutual consent, involving as is necessary in all sacramental ordinances, a real present intention; and the inward part or gift is the grace which unites the hearts, or according to another view, the grace to resist concupiscence, sometimes entirely, judging by St. Thomas Aquinas' remark, that carnal intercourse is not a necessary part of marriage, because there was none in Paradise. The following more general considerations are also urged from Scripture in favour of the sacramental theory. The union between husband and wife is spoken of as analogous to the union between Christ and the Church. The husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the Head of the Church, therefore as the Church is subject unto Christ, so let the wives be to their own husbands in everything [Eph. v. 23, 24]. Now, if this figure has any meaning it must be this, that the external signs of alliance between bride and bridegroom signify that there should henceforth exist between them a union as holy, as close, and as indissoluble as that between Christ and the Church, a union which could not be maintained without a special gift from God. That such a gift exists is made evident by St. Paul, who says, while drawing a comparison between marriage and celibacy, "Every man hath his proper gift of God, one after this manner, and another after that" [1 Cor. vii. 7], and what would the gift be which is alluded to in the case of married persons, but the grace which unites their hearts and enables them to be fitting emblems of Christ and the Church? Again, the presence of our Lord at the marriage in Cana of Galilee [John ii. 1-11] is sometimes referred to as having elevated that ceremony into the dignity of a sacrament. Basing, then, its doctrine on such passages of Scripture, and confirming it by corroborative extracts from early Christian writings, the Church has ever leaned to the sacramental theory of Holy Matrimony.[1]

Considerable difference of opinion has existed as to what is the essential part of matrimony as a sacrament. The most general opinion is that the essential part, as well as the efficient cause, is the consent of the two parties, which must be expressed in words as the "pars sensibilis" of the Sacrament [Thom. Aq.], and must imply a real present and not future consent. Others would make the words of the priest the essential element whereby the marriage union is created, "Ego vos in matrimonium conjungo," &c.: in the English office, "Those whom God hath joined together, let no man put asunder;" followed by the declaration of completed union, "I pronounce that they be man and wife together, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." If the previous consent had made the two persons man and wife, these words on the priest's lips would seem to be, strictly speaking, superfluous.

From primitive times it has been the custom to acquaint the Church beforehand with an intended marriage, which is evident from the passages above quoted. The object was to prevent unlawful marriages, not that the Church claimed any absolute power to grant or refuse leave to marry, but that in case a person was about to marry a Jew, or a heathen, or a heretic, or one within the forbidden degrees of consanguinity, &c., the marriage might be prevented, or at least not obtain the sanction of the Church.

The earliest allusion to the necessity of such notice in England is contained in the 11th canon of the Synod of Westminster [A.D. 1200], which enacts that no marriage shall be contracted without banns thrice published in Church. [Johnson's Canons, ii. 91.] The existing law of the Church of England is expressed in the 62d canon: "No minister, upon pain of suspension, 'per triennium ipso facto,' shall celebrate matrimony between any persons, without a faculty or license granted by some of the persons in these our constitutions expressed, except the banns of matrimony have been first published three several Sundays or Holy-days in the time of Divine Service in the parish churches and chapels where the said parties dwell, according to the Book of Common Prayer." The only substitute for banns recognised by the Church is an ordinary or special license. The power of granting the former has belonged to English bishops from a very early date, being confirmed to them by 25 Henry VIII. 21. The right to grant special licenses, which are free from all restrictions as to time or place, was originally a privilege of the Archbishop of Canterbury, as "legatus natus" of the Pope, and the power to grant them was continued and confirmed to the then archbishop and his successors by the Marriage Act of 1836.

V. Marriage ceremonies. Among the ceremonies associated with marriage, it is necessary to distinguish between those of the espousals and those of the marriage itself. The two are united in the service as it exists in the Prayer Book, but the espousals, represented there by the opening portion of the service, and concluding with the words of consent, "I will," were originally an entirely distinct service. It was a formal religious recognition of what is now termed an engagement, and took place sometimes months, sometimes years before the marriage itself; the violation of the promise then given (inasmuch as a promise of body is more important than any promise of money) being visited by severe penalties both civil and ecclesiastical. The exceptions were if one party embraced a religious life, or actually married another, for then the second party was free. Otherwise the civil law ordered that "if a man who had espoused a woman should afterwards refuse to marry her upon any frivolous pretence, that he did not like her morals or her pedigree, or any other such trifling objection, the woman might retain whatever gifts he had made her on espousal, and recover of him whatever more he had promised her upon the same score, though it was yet actually remaining in his own possession;" and on the other hand, "If the woman who was espoused at full age," that is, "when she was over twelve years of age, refused to make good her contract, or her parents or her guardians would not permit her to do so, or if a widow who was of age to make her own espousal contract afterwards fled from it, then they were not only to forfeit all their espousal gifts, but also to be amerced quadruple for their falseness and breach of contract."[1] The penalties imposed by the ecclesiastical law were of corresponding severity. The Council of Eliberis [A.D. 305] ordered that if any parents broke the faith of espousals they should for their crime be kept back three years from the Communion, and if either the man or the woman who were espoused were guilty of the same crime, they should undergo the same punishment.[2] The Council of Trullo [A.D. 692] decided that it was adultery for a man to marry a woman who was betrothed to another during the lifetime of him who had espoused her.[3]

And as this preliminary contract was held to possess a true binding nature, the ceremonies surrounding espousals were of a varied and impressive character. They were:—

1. The verbal expression of free consent.
2. Presentation of gifts, "arræ" or "sponsalia."
3. Giving and receiving a ring.
4. A kiss.
5. Joining of hands.
6. Settling a dowry in writing.[4]

At an indefinite period after the formal espousal followed its ratification in the formality of the marriage service itself. The previous quotations from Ignatius of Antioch and Tertullian testify not only to its religious character in the primitive Church, but also to the nature of the chief ceremonies which attended it. They were:—

1. The sacerdotal benediction. As this cannot be pronounced by a deacon, it has been inferred that matrimony should be solemnized by the priest alone, in accordance with pre-Reformation custom, and with the implied direction of the rubrics in the Book of Common Prayer. Although the point has not been finally decided in any court of law, Chief Justice Tyndal declared such to be his opinion, and that of his brother judges, in giving evidence before the House of Lords on July 7, 1843.

2. The oblation of the Holy Eucharist. This practice, which invariably accompanied marriage in the first few centuries, appears to have fallen gradually into neglect, for Charles the Great enacted a law in the West [A.D. 780] that marriage should be celebrated in no other way but by prayers and oblations and sacerdotal blessing,[5] and by a similar enactment [c. A.D. 900] Leo Sapiens revived the same practice for the Eastern Empire.[6] At the Reformation the old custom was still retained by the rubric which ran thus, "The new married persons the same day as their marriage must receive the Holy Communion;" but these words were omitted [A.D. 1661] to suit the prejudices of the Puritans, and the present rubric was substituted, "It is convenient that the new married persons should receive the Holy Communion at the time of their marriage, or at the first opportunity after their marriage."

Among the lesser ceremonies surrounding matrimony are found a repetition of the kiss and joining of hands which had previously taken place at the espousals; the veiling of the bride;[7] the crowning of the newly married couple with garlands, which Chrysostom explains as emblematical of their victory over all unlawful pleasure;[8] and the conduct of the bride to and from church with pomp and music, which the same author condemns as inconsistent with the modesty of a Christian maiden and the simplicity of Christian matrimony.[9]

VI. Impediments to Marriage are of a twofold character. Firstly, there exist certain conventional restrictions as to days and hours on which the celebration of marriage is forbidden by the ecclesiastical laws.

> "Ecclesiæ vetitum, necnon tempus feriatum > Impediunt fieri, permittunt juncta teneri."

The restrictions as to days, though not enforced by any post-Reformation canon, are of early date. The most ancient is found in the fifty-seventh canon of the Council of Laodicæa [A.D. 365], which forbids the celebration of marriage during Lent. A doubtful canon of the Council of Lerida [A.D. 524] is quoted,[1] forbidding their solemnization not only in Lent but also from the beginning of Advent to Epiphany, and during the three weeks preceding the Festival of St. John the Baptist. The Council of Selingstadt enacted by its third canon [A.D. 1022] that no marriage should take place from Advent to the sixth day after Epiphany, nor between Septuagesima and the Octave of Easter, nor in the fourteen days before the Festival of St. John the Baptist, nor upon fast days, nor upon the vigils of solemn feasts. The nineteenth Canon of the Council of Ravenna [A.D. 1311] is to the same effect. And so also is the existing forty-ninth Canon of the Church of Ireland [A.D. 1632]. The Sarum missal, which, among the variations found among the mediæval councils on this subject, should guide the practice of the English Church, mentions the following as the prohibited seasons: from Advent Sunday until the Octave of Epiphany; from Septuagesima until the Octave of Easter; from Rogation Sunday until six days after Pentecost.[2] An entry to this effect has been found in several almanacs of the last century, and in some post-Reformation registers. The custom is also mentioned in a charge of Archbishop Sharpe, delivered A.D. 1750.[3]

Restrictions exist, however, not only as to the season in which, but also as to the hours of the day within which the marriage-service may be legally solemnized. The following is the law of the Church of England on the subject, contained in the sixty-second canon.

"... Neither shall any minister upon the like pain (three years' suspension) join any persons so licensed in marriage at any unseasonable times, but only between the hours of eight and twelve in the forenoon. ..." The origin of the limitation is obscure; it was probably either [1] the desire to ensure publicity, or [2] the invariable association with matrimony of the Holy Eucharist, which might only be received fasting.

Secondly, there is a class of impediments not of a temporary, but of a permanent character, held by the Church to interfere with the essential validity of matrimony. Several of them, however, are now obsolete, others are doubtful, others retain the ecclesiastical but lack the civil sanction. They are summed up by St. Thomas Aquinas in the following lines:—

"Error, conditio, votum, cognatio, crimen
Cultus disparitas, vis, ordo, ligamen, honestas
Si sis affinis, si forte coire nequibis,
Hæc socianda vetant connubia, facta retractant."

The last two lines also run thus—

"Amens, affinis, si clandestinus, et impos, Si mulier sit rapta, loco nec reddita tuto."

Error. This is threefold; as to the person, fortune, or quality of one of the parties to the marriage, but only the first would render the contract null and void; as involving the absence of consent.

Conditio, e.g. nonage; it being not lawful for minors to marry without the consent of their parents or guardians. Slavery: the Theodosian code forbade freemen to marry slaves.[4] There is a canon of St. Basil prohibiting slaves from marrying without the consent of their masters.[5] Several other points may be quoted from the old Roman law, such as the regulation by which a widow was forbidden to marry within twelve months after her husband's death, and a guardian to marry his ward during her minority.[6]

Votum. A solemn vow of celibacy or chastity.

Cognatio. Consanguinity; not only certain blood-relationships, but also spiritual affinities falling under this head.

Crimen. Adultery,[7] pandary, and homicide, where one of the accomplices has taken the life of the husband or wife to whom he or she was united in order to marry again.

Cultus disparitas. Marriage between a Christian and an infidel or heathen, was unanimously denounced by the early Fathers,[8] who based their view mainly on two texts from St. Paul's Epistles [1 Cor. vii. 39], "only in the Lord," and [2 Cor. vi. 14] "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers." Marriages between Catholics and heretics are forbidden by several canons of the Roman Church as a breach of ecclesiastical discipline rather than as null and void.

Vis. Marriage contracted under the pressure of fear or violence, the consent of both parties being in that case at the most verbally not really obtained.

Ordo. The compulsory celibacy of the priesthood in the Roman Church is thus laid down by the Council of Trent: "Si quis dixerit clericos in sacris ordinibus constitutos, vel regulares castitatem solemniter professos posse matrimonium contrahere, contractumque validum esse, non obstante lege ecclesiastica vel voto, anathema sit."[9]

In octava die tamen Epiphaniæ licite possunt nuptiæ celebrari quia non invenitur prohibitum, quamvis in Octavis Paschæ hoc facere non liceat. Similiter in Dominica proxima post festum Pentecostes licite celebrantur nuptiæ, quia dies Pentecostes octavam diem non habet." See also the Sarum Missal.

Ligamen. A previous marriage. This is equivalent to a prohibition of polygamy.

Honestas. Previous espousals, or a previous marriage which has not been consummated.

Amens. Because an insane person is incapable of giving consent.

Clandestinus. Without the knowledge and sanction of the Church, which the first Christians were constantly exhorted to obtain.[1] The Council of Trent has the following enactment on the subject: "Qui aliter quam præsente parocho, vel alio sacerdote de ipsius licentia, et duobus vel tribus testibus, matrimonium contrahere attentabunt, eos sancta synodus ad sic contrahendum omnino reddit inhabiles, et hujusmodi contractus irritos et nullos esse discernit, prout eos præsenti decreto irritos facit."[2]

Impos. Because the procreation of children, one of the main objects of marriage, is defeated.

Rapta. It has been held that under certain circumstances a man could not marry a woman whom he has taken or enticed clandestinely from her home.

The number and variety of these impediments prove how high a dignity the Church has ascribed to marriage, and with what care she has from time to time fenced it round with every possible safeguard. [Divorce. Degrees, Forbidden.]

MARTYROLOGY. The name of the book containing the acts and passions of martyrs, as read during Divine Service, from a very early age of the Church. The historian Sozomen speaks of them in such a manner as to shew that each diocese had a martyrology of its own, particularly remarking that Gaza and Constantia in Palestine, each had ἰδίαι πανηγύρεις μαρτύρων although so close to each other [Sozom. Eccl. Hist. v. 3]. The martyrology was, in fact, an expanded form of the Diptych, but it kept more closely, perhaps, to the record of local martyrs in the first ages.

The acts and passions of the martyrs thus recorded were read in the churches to which they had belonged on their respective "natalitia" or anniversary days, the forty-seventh canon of the third Council of Carthage [A.D. 397] distinctly sanctioning the practice in the words, "Liceat etiam legi passiones martyrum, cum anniversarii dies eorum celebrantur," after setting forth the canonical books of Holy Scripture. The practice is also often referred to by St. Augustine and others of the Fathers.

The earliest general martyrology is attributed to Eusebius, but this is not extant, though it was re-written by St. Jerome. One was written by the Venerable Bede, about A.D. 730, others by Florus of Lyons [A.D. 830], Waldenbertus, a monk of Treves [A.D. 844], Rabanus Maurus [A.D. 845], Ado, Archbishop of Vienne [A.D. 858], and Notker of St. Gall [A.D. 894]. But the great martyrology of the Western Church is that of Usuard, a French monk [A.D. 875], which was written at the command of Charles the Bald. This was compiled from the previous works of Florus, Bede, and St. Jerome, and is still the standard Roman martyrology. It was first printed in A.D. 1486, but has often since been reprinted, and is annexed to the great Acta Sanctorum of the Bollandists.

An English martyrology was much in use before the Reformation, under the name of the Golden Legend. It was among the earliest of printed books in the fifteenth century, and was used for "Saints' days" homilies, in addition to the lives of the Saints read in the Breviary offices.

The "Menologion" of the Eastern Church answers to the Martyrology of the Western, but the "Menaion" is a book of a different character, containing the offices for Saints' days as well as the Acts of the Saints. The foundation of all the Greek menologia is that compiled in A.D. 886, by direction of the Emperor Basil. [Cave, Histor. Lit. ii. Dissert. ii.; Leo Allat. De lib. Eccl. Græcor.]

MARTYRS. A name given in early ages to those who suffered in the cause of Christianity, and by dying in its defence afforded the strongest testimony in proof of their belief in Jesus Christ and the truth of His religion. The suffering of martyrs was an especial cause of the propagation of Christianity,[3] so that it was a proverbial saying in the early Church, that the blood of the martyrs was the seed of the Church.[4] Great honour was paid to them, for by their sufferings they were most intimately conformed to the example of their Lord. He suffered for them, and they shared His Passion by suffering for His name; and overcame by His indwelling presence and support the power of the enemy. The highest rewards in the heavenly kingdom, the Church believed, were bestowed upon martyrs.[5] They did not, when earthly trials and sufferings were past, join the other faithful in the Intermediate State, but were immediately admitted to Heaven.[6] The prayers of the Church were not offered for them as for others, but the welfare of the Church was commended to their intercessions.[7] Churches, or rather oratories or memorials, were built, in which their relics were deposited, and St. Augustine[8] and other Fathers relate many wonderful miracles wrought by them.

Faustus the Manichæan accused the Church of worshipping martyrs just as Pagans worshipped their gods. St. Augustine, disclaiming the practice, denies that martyrs were ever honoured with λατρεία, or the worship which is due to God only; they were honoured, he says, as holy men upon earth, but God only was worshipped with sacrifice. Pagans, he says, were idolaters by offering sacrifice to false gods, and such also would be Christians did they offer sacrifice to any but the true God. Martyrs were named when the Eucharistic sacrifice was offered, but it was not offered to them, but to God.[1] Also, for the same reason, Christians did not build temples or churches to the martyrs, but memorials [memoriæ], sacrifice not being offered to them, but only to God.[2] In another work he gives reasons why miracles were especially wrought at the memoriæ of the martyrs.[3]

Vigilantius reviled as idolatrous the honour paid to martyrs by burning lights in their "Memorials," and reverencing their relics, pulvis vilissimus as he calls them. St. Jerome, in replying to the charge, not only says that such usages have the sanction of the whole Church, but appeals, in their defence, to the undoubted fact, that miracles had been wrought by their relics or intercessions.[4] That the honour paid to martyrs in some cases exceeded rightful limits, cannot be questioned, and the Fathers, as St. Augustine, speak of the excess and riot with which their "birthdays" [natalitia] were sometimes celebrated—the martyrs, he says, are not honoured by your riotous feasting, "they hate your flagons and frying-pans."[5] Allowing that much excess and superstition prevailed, we feel no sympathy whatever with the uncatholic theories or rather calumnies of Vigilantius or Faustus the Manichæan. God was undoubtedly pleased, unless we reject all primitive testimony, to work many wonderful miracles in honour of the martyrs, and also that the faithful might be stimulated to imitate their virtues. The martyrs, it must be remembered, hold an especial place or position in the Primitive Church, which in latter ages we can only faintly and imperfectly understand or realize: nor ought we to feel surprise at the miracles which the Fathers generally relate, or at the enthusiasm with which the martyrs were honoured. Let us look at the service rendered by martyrs in proof of Christianity, trying to put ourselves in the position of those who not only witnessed but participated in the terrible conflict which was then waged between God and the powers of darkness. The martyrs were in the forefront of the battle; had they given way amidst their terrible sufferings, the cause of Christianity, humanly speaking, might have been finally lost. Had martyrs apostatized under torture, the heathen generally would have despised the new religion; but when they beheld the most cruel torments patiently endured—torments which apparently could only have been borne by supernatural or superhuman strength, then they confessed they saw before them as it were the divinity of the Christian faith. Thus to the constancy of martyrs we owe the early propagation of Christianity, and, perhaps, its present existence in the world. Only by bearing these facts, now so inadequately realized, in mind, can we duly estimate the honour paid to martyrs, and the enthusiastic love of their fellow-believers in the early Church.

Martyrdom, according to the primary import of the word, was the suffering and death of Christians in heathen persecutions in defence of the truth of the Gospel. But when heathen persecution ceased, and Christians, divided into rival communities, persecuted and put to death each other, then the word assumed a new meaning. The martyr no longer suffered in defence of Christianity in its conflict with heathenism, but in defence, perhaps, of his own peculiar opinions or errors. Thus in the Primitive Church the Donatists were put to death by the civil power, and their fellow schismatics claimed for them the name and privileges of martyrs. St. Augustine denies that the claim was a rightful one, and lays down the important truth that the cause for which the martyr suffers, and not the mere penalty of death, constitutes the only claim to the title.[6] Neither the schismatic nor the heretic

St. Gregory Nazianzen, in his fourth oration against Julian, says, that in the oratories of the martyrs, and by their relics and intercession, demons were expelled, diseases cured, and future events predicted [tom. i. p. 590, Migne]. St. Basil in his oration on the forty martyrs, speaks of their relics as a tower of strength, and of the miracles wrought by their intercession [tom. ii. p. 217, Gaume]. And St. Gregory Nyssen, in his oration on the forty martyrs, calls them θεοῦ δορυφόροι καὶ πάρεδροι [tom. iii. 786, Migne].

Attenderunt enim Dominum dicentem, non Beati qui persecutionem patiuntur; sed Beati qui persecutionem patiuntur propter justitiam [Matt. v. 10]. Elige causam et non cura pœnam. can be a true martyr. The death of a schismatic, separated like the Donatist from the communion of the Church, is merely "desperationis exitus;" and as St. Cyprian had said,[1] such martyrs can only hope to receive the penalty of the traitor and not the reward of glory.

During the Middle Ages many of the sect of the Albigenses, who were Manichæans,[2] and at the period of the Reformation, Anabaptists and others, endured in defence of their errors the sufferings of death with courage and constancy; hence their followers claimed for them the title of martyrs, and supposed that the truth of their opinions had been divinely sanctioned. But, according to primitive teaching, the title of martyrs did not belong to such sufferers at all: neither should we be deceived by the almost superhuman endurance sometimes exhibited; mere enthusiasm, obstinacy, or desperation, often furnishing terrible courage and support. We can hardly doubt that at the present day many Mahometans and Hindoos would endure in defence of their creed the torments of death with what would be ordinarily deemed supernatural endurance. Besides, it would be monstrous to suppose that God would afford supernatural strength to endure suffering, (thus apparently sanctioning their opinion) to martyrs whose beliefs are essentially opposed to each other; and still less to others, as the Manichæans, whose teaching is fundamentally opposed to the Christian Revelation. Let it not be thought that such reasoning is inconsistent, because it admits the courage and constancy of the martyrs in heathen persecutions as a proof of the truth of Christianity, and yet refuses to receive the same evidence in attestation of the truth of the Manichæan or Anabaptist creeds. Christianity did not exclusively owe its propagation in early ages to the constancy and endurance of martyrs, but to martyrdom endured in defence of the holy and heavenly doctrines of the Gospel, and attested by the pure and holy lives of the sufferers themselves. Martyrdom proved and confirmed the reality of the heavenly life which Christians lived upon earth. Their chastity, meekness, patience, love of their persecutors, and enemies, was a greater miracle in contrast with the prevailing wickedness of heathenism, than even the supernatural courage by which their faith was attested.

Should any be disposed to assign greater weight or importance to the constancy of modern martyrs than the firm persuasion which it exhibits of their own belief of their opinions, let them read the history of later deaths for religious opinion. They will find that Catholic and Protestant have died with equal constancy in defence of their creed. Calvinists, Anabaptists, and many other sectarians can shew the same testimony in confirmation of their opinions. Such testimony, in favour of such diverse and contradictory beliefs, is not to be regarded in the same light as the "witness" of martyrdom.

MARY. The relation of the Blessed Virgin Mary to the Saviour of the world, God and Man, gives to her a conspicuous position in theology; and her name has been the rallying point of controversies which have involved some of the essential truths of Christianity as well as its devotional life. In the present article it will be the object to shew, in as condensed a manner as possible, what this relation is in itself, and what are the consequences which follow from it: the personal history of the Blessed Virgin being first reviewed as it comes to us in actual historical record, and in probable historical tradition.

I. Personal History of the Blessed Virgin Mary. This begins in Holy Scripture with the abrupt announcement of her name, her espousal to Joseph, and her place of abode at the time of the Incarnation. "The angel Gabriel was sent from God unto a city of Galilee, named Nazareth, to a Virgin espoused to a man whose name was Joseph, of the house of David; and the Virgin's name was Mary"[3] [Luke i. 26, 27]. The common tradition of the Church is that she was the only child of parents named Joachim and Anna, names which are known in the Old Testament form as Jehoiachim[4] and Hannah. This tradition is first found in the apocryphal Gospel of St. James, the "Protevangelium," which was probably written (according to Tischendorf) in the middle of the second century. Their names are also given by Epiphanius [Hær. lxxviii.], who wrote in the latter half of the fourth century [A.D. 374], and by St. John Damascene [De Orthod. fid. xv.]. Early paintings of St. Anna, with her name attached, occur in the Catacombs, and a church was dedicated to her as the mother of the Blessed Virgin, by the Emperor Justinian [A.D. 550]. That Mary was of the lineage of David is shewn by the words of the angel Gabriel in announcing to her the Conception of her Holy Child, "The Lord God shall give unto Him the throne of His father David" [Luke i. 32].

There was also an injunction of Moses to the effect that every daughter of Israel possessing any inheritance [cf. Luke i. 56; ὑπέστρεψεν εἰς τὸν οἶκον αὐτῆς] in any tribe of Israel, should "be wife unto one of the family of the tribe of her father" [Numb. xxxvi. 8]; and although this may not have been universally observed, it is not unlikely that the genealogy of Joseph is given with reference to its observance in the case of the [1] Epist. ad Cornel. lx. sec. 3. De Unitate, sec. 14.

[2] Milman, speaking of Manichæans put to death at Cologne in the twelfth century, says, "The calmness of the heretics in the fire, amazed, almost appalled their judges" [Latin Christianity, vol. v. p. 403, 1867].

[3] The Blessed Virgin's name is almost invariably spelt in the Hebrew form Μαριάμ in MSS. of the Gospels, the names of the other "Maries" being always spelt Μαρία, without the final letter. This seems to identify it with the name "Miriam," which is Μαριάμ in the LXX.

[4] The evident association between the names Jehoiachim, Jachim [Matt. i. 11, marg.], Eliachim [cf. 1 Kings xxiii. 34], and Heli [Luke iii. 23], has led many to infer that St. Luke gives the genealogy of the Blessed Virgin, and not of her husband Joseph. She is also spoken of as the daughter of Heli in the Talmud.

Virgin Mary. That she also had an association with the tribe of Levi is shewn by the fact that she was cousin to Elizabeth, "who was of the daughters of Aaron" [Luke i. 5]. Perhaps such an association was ordained that our Lord should be connected, at least, with the sacerdotal tribe, as well as belonging to the royal tribe of Judah.[1] [Aug. de Consens. Evang. ii. 2, 3, 4.]

The "Protevangelium" above referred to, the apocryphal Gospel of St. Matthew (or that of "the Infancy of Mary and Jesus"), and that of the "Nativity of Mary," contain a detailed story of the Blessed Virgin's early life. As it is told in the "Nativity of Mary," it has been incorporated into the "Golden Legend," and so far the additions to the Scriptural history are probably authentic tradition. The leading facts thus handed down are that "the blessed and glorious Mary ever Virgin" was of the family of David, her father Joachim's family belonging to Nazareth, and that of her mother Anna to Bethlehem. Mary was born at Nazareth (after her parents had lived twenty years without children), and as they had vowed to dedicate any offspring God should give them to His service, Mary was brought up in the Temple (after the example of Samuel) from three years of age. When she had completed the marriageable age of fourteen years, at which time, according to custom, she should have returned home for espousal and marriage, the high priest was warned in a vision to choose a husband for Mary according to a certain sign which was given, and Joseph, an aged man of the house and family of David, was the husband thus chosen from among many. Mary being then espoused to Joseph returned to Nazareth, while Joseph went home to Bethlehem to set his house in order for the marriage. The subsequent events associated with the marriage are narrated as they are given in Holy Scripture. [Cowper's Apocr. Gosp., pp. 84-98.]

It was at Nazareth, some time between the espousal and the marriage, that Mary was visited by the angel Gabriel with the annunciation that she should become the virgin mother of the Son of God: "The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee; therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God . . . for with God nothing is impossible" [Luke i. 35, 37]. At the same time that the angel made this wonderful announcement, he also declared to her that her aged cousin Elizabeth, the wife of Zacharias the priest, had been six months with child, and this evident miracle was at once so associated with that which was taking place in herself, that Mary "went into the hill country with haste into a city of Juda" to visit her cousin. The unborn offspring of Elizabeth at once gave token of his future mission as the herald of the unborn Christ; the Holy Ghost inspired Elizabeth to welcome Mary with the same joy as the Mother of the Lord; and the same Holy Ghost inspired Mary also to make a complete submission of her mind by the hymn "Magnificat," as she had previously made the complete submission of her will by the words, "Behold the handmaid of the Lord: be it unto me according to Thy word" [Luke i. 38-55].

Mary abode with her cousin for about three months, returning "to her home" shortly before the birth of St. John the Baptist. It was probably about this time that her marriage with Joseph took place, as it is evident that the miraculous nature of her conception was not known beyond a narrow circle, and that she had been long enough the wife of Joseph for those who were ignorant of it to suppose that Jesus was born of their marriage. [INCARNATION, sec. ii.]

After the birth of our Lord, there is little in Holy Scripture (or, indeed, in any traditions that are worthy of attention) that individualizes the Blessed Virgin, the narrative of her life being absorbed into that of her Divine Son. The very condensed record of the Annunciation gives us, indeed, a vivid impression of her holiness, devotion, humility, and faith: a holiness and devotion in act and will which made her a fitting tabernacle for the Incarnate God to abide in during the nine months that His Human Nature was passing through its earliest stage of existence; a humility which excluded all unworthy elation at the unparalleled dignity to which she was exalted; a faith which could believe in the possibility with God of what seemed so utterly impossible, according to human experience. It is consistent with these slight but significant indications of her great saintliness, that although she understood not her Holy Child's words, "Wist ye not that I must be about My Father's business," yet she "kept all these sayings"—this and others not recorded—"in her heart" [Luke ii. 49, 51], even as she had "cast in her mind" the annunciation made by Gabriel, and had "kept all" the "things" that were told by the shepherds, and "pondered them in her heart." Who can estimate the holiness produced in such a mother from hanging upon the words of such a Son!

During the ministry of our Lord, the Blessed Virgin is only four times mentioned. At the opening of that ministry, He seems to have revealed to her that His subjection to human parentage was at an end. Her faith told her that it was possible for Him to work a miracle, and she seems to have implied a request that He would do so, when she said to him at the marriage feast, "They have no wine." Our Lord's reply, "Woman, what have I to do with thee? Mine hour is not yet come," appears to disclaim from henceforth all influence of human authority over the action of His Divine Nature.[2] And, as if to make immediate amends for her unconscious error, she gave that direction to the servants which sounds like a typical lesson of obedience to His will,

[1] It is, however, to be remembered that Aaron and Eleazar, who were both of the tribe of Levi, took wives out of the tribe of Judah [Exod. vi. 23, 25], and that there may have been exceptions as to the rule in the case of others: so that it is possible Elizabeth may have been of the tribe of Judah, though called "of the daughters of Aaron," on account of her marriage to Zacharias.

[2] Irenæus supposes that the Blessed Virgin prematurely desired "participare compendii poculo," to receive the Cup of the Holy Eucharist. [Iren. Adv. Hær. iii. 7.]

"Whatsoever He saith unto you, do it" [John ii. 3-5].

A second time the veil is half drawn aside from the hidden life of the Blessed Virgin, when a message was brought to Christ in the midst of a large assemblage that she and His "brethren" stood without desiring to speak to Him [Matt. xii. 47]: when He calls, not hers, but their thoughts upward from earthly relationship to that of the Communion of Saints, stretching forth His hand toward His disciples and saying, "Behold My mother and My brethren! For whosoever shall do the will of My Father which is in Heaven, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother."

The next and last occasion on which the Blessed Virgin is mentioned in the Gospel, is when she stood by the Cross of Jesus [John xix. 25]. At that time the prophecy of Simeon, "Yea, a sword shall pierce through thine own heart also," seems to have been fulfilled as the "Mater Dolorosa" gazed on her Son, "stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted." Yet there may have been a more piercing sorrow conveyed in the loving words that, with all their love, conveyed a sense of renunciation to her, "Woman, behold thy son;" and to St. John, "Behold thy mother;" a second and final, "Wist ye not that I must be about My Father's business." Henceforth Scripture tells us nothing respecting the Blessed Virgin, except that she continued with the Apostles at Jerusalem during the interval between the Ascension and Pentecost [Acts i. 14]. The traditions of the Church also leave us almost entirely uninformed as to her subsequent life, Epiphanius representing that she lived and died at Jerusalem, ever in the loving care of the beloved disciple [Epiphan. Hær. lxxviii.]; and an epistle of the Council of Ephesus expressing a belief that she had died in that city, whither she and St. John had been driven by the siege of Jerusalem [Labbe. Concil. iii. 574.] Beyond such uncertain memories of the Blessed Virgin, we have no clear view of her from the time when Holy Scripture ceases to name her. Her part in the work of the Incarnation had been long ended; and, faith being satisfied, curiosity has no entrance into the cloud which veils her from our sight. [Perpetual Virginity. Assumption.]

II. The Blessed Virgin's position in the Economy of the Incarnation. We come now to consider what are the theological conclusions to be drawn from the history of our Lord's mother.

1. There is one fact which underlies and pervades the whole of this subject, and that is the fact of the unparalleled personal relationship which God was pleased to establish between the blessed Virgin and Himself. The daughter of humble parents, herself a simple village maiden, who was thought a fitting match for a working carpenter, she became the mother of the Saviour of men, the mother of Him who, in the first moment of His Incarnation in her womb, combined the Divine Nature with the Human Nature in His Person. [Theotokos.] Never were words more full of meaning than those of the angel, "Hail! thou that art highly favoured," for no grace or favour that God ever has bestowed on any human creature could approach to this. He blessed the patriarch Abraham with a very peculiar and high privilege when He made him the direct progenitor of the Messiah, and said to him, "In thy seed shall all the earth be blessed." The long line of Old Testament saints and servants of God, from Moses to John the Baptist, were highly favoured in being made instruments of His will, and in being appointed to herald His Advent. But there was a vast difference between the favour of being thus brought near to God as a prophet, or a distant progenitor of Christ, or a saint, and that of being brought into such nearness as is implied by maternal union. The full reality of such an union between the Second Person of the Eternal Trinity and a merely human person is so astonishing that the mind cannot fully take in either the surpassing condescension of the Son on the one hand, or the surpassing honour of the mother on the other hand. As the greatness of Divine condescension could reach no further than the Incarnation, so the greatness of human exaltation could reach no further, in the person of one only human, than to be made the instrument and vehicle of that Incarnation. This personal union between the holy mother and the Divine Child has, therefore, elevated the former to a relation with God, which sets her apart from saints who have become saints by the ordinary action of His grace; and as apart from them, so above them, for no human person having been ever so honoured by God as the Blessed Virgin Mary, none can ever be so worthy of estimation and honour with God's servants. It is no exaggeration to say, that by becoming the physical instrument of the Incarnation of God, the Blessed Virgin became the nearest of all created beings to the Divine Person; nearer than saints who glorify Him by their lives, nearer than martyrs who glorify Him by their deaths, nearer than angels who minister the dictates of His will.

2. It is to be remembered also that the Blessed Virgin was not only the physical but the moral instrument of the Incarnation. She was not the mere creature of fate, destined without any will of her own to be the mother of our Redeemer. That she had a free will like all other human beings is a consequence which follows from the fact that she was human, but it is also suggested (to say the least) by the narrative of her interview with the holy angel. It cannot be doubted, therefore, that she had the power to set her will in opposition to the will of God, as all other human beings have, and that she might have desired not to become the mother of Jesus. It is impossible to say how much or how little it cost her to say, "Behold the handmaid of the Lord: be it unto me according to Thy word" [Luke i. 38]. There is no trace of her passing through any great temptation, such as that by which her Divine Son was tempted to give up the work of redemption. Yet there cannot be a doubt that the Annunciation was a trial of her faith and a trial of her obedienee in no slight degree. Her faith was tried by the predietion of a supernatural event far more astounding and incredible than that before whieh the faith of Sarah [Gen. xviii. 12-15] and of Zacharias [Luke i. 20] broke down, yet it survived the trial; and it was with referenee to this that the Holy Ghost inspired Elizabeth to say, "Blessed is she that believed: for there shall be a performanee of those things which were told her from the Lord" [Luke i. 45]. Her obedienee also was tried by a consideration sueh as must have arisen in her mind, as in the mind of any holy maiden, that what was predieted would certainly, when it came to pass, bring upon her a terrible shame and reproach from her affianced husband and from all around her; for it was not revealed to her that God had provided her marriage to Joseph as the means by whieh this shame was to be avoided. In this trial also she gained the vietory, and the perfeet submission of her will is indicated by the terse words, "Be it unto me aeeording to Thy word." Thus she gave herself up entirely to God, believing that what would be impossible in the eourse of nature would be possible with Him by His supernatural power to overrule the course of nature, and voluntarily submitting to be placed in a position with reference to all around her which must seem one of degradation, shame, and sorrow.

It eannot for a moment be supposed that if the Blessed Virgin had failed to overeome in this trial of her faith and obedienee, then the Inearnation would not have taken plaee, any more than one can dare to think that there could possibly have been a failure in the eourse of redemption through the temptation of our Lord. Yet, on the other hand, it cannot be doubted that the submission of her faith and will was morally instrumental in making her fit to become the vehicle from whieh our Lord took His manhood, and that she herself thus became a moral as well as a physieal instrument in the Incarnation. Henee the aneient doetrine of the Chureh, represented by the words of Irenæus, written about a hundred years after her death: "As Eve was led astray by the word of an angel, so that she fled from God when she had transgressed His word; so did the Virgin Mary, by an angelie communieation reeeive the glad tidings that she should bear God (ut portaret Deum), being obedient to His word. And if the former disobeyed God, yet was the latter persuaded to be obedient to God, in order that the Virgin Mary might become the 'advoeata' of the virgin Eve.[1] And thus, as the human raee fell into bondage to death by means of a virgin, so is it rescued by a virgin, virginal disobedience having been balanced in the opposite scale by virginal obedience. For in the same way the sin of the first created man reeeives amendment by the eorreetion of the First-Begotten, and the eunning of the serpent is eonquered by the harmlessness of the dove, those bonds being unloosed by whieh we had been fast bound in death" [Iren. Adv. Hæres. v. 19].

3. The question now arises, Whether the extraordinary sanetity of the Blessed Virgin, or her peeuliar relationship to God as the moral and physieal instrument of the Inearnation, have established her in any special relation towards mankind beyond that of a Saint whose memory is to be had in the very highest honour that may be given to a human person.

Holy Scripture gives us no definite guidanee on this subjeet. The Blessed Virgin is hardly mentioned in the Gospel, as has been already shewn, after the ehildhood of our Lord had ended; and when she is mentioned at all, it is in sueh a subdued manner as might be expeeted in a narrative where the One Divine figure admits of no rival. In the Epistles there is no traee whatever of any reference to her beyond sueh as is to be found in the words, "God sent forth His Son, made of a woman" [Gal. iv. 4]. In the Apoealypse there is the vision of the great wonder in heaven, a woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a erown of twelve stars" [Rev. xii. 1]. In the later ages of the Chureh this wondrous appearanee has been often taken for granted as that of the Blessed Virgin Mary, and she is represented under this form in pietures which are intended to set forth the idea of her present position. It is diffieult altogether to put aside the belief that there is some assoeiation between this vision and the person of the Mother of God, yet the ideas conveyed by the words, "she being with ehild, eried, travailing in birth, and pained to be delivered," are very ineonsistent with the Catholie opinion respecting the parturition of the Blessed Virgin. So also the idea of her having fled into the wilderness "where she hath a place prepared of God, that they should feed her there a thousand two hundred and threescore days, . . . where she is nourished for a time, and times, and half a time, from the face of the serpent," is equally inconsistent with any opinion that there has ever been in the Chureh as to the condition of the Blessed Virgin after her death. All the Fathers, indeed, interpret this vision primarily of the Chureh, and some few who assign it partly to the mother of our Lord, do so only with reserve and in a highly mystieal sense. Notwithstanding, therefore, the popular pietorial interpretation of "the woman elothed with the sun, having the moon under her feet, and the twelve stars around her head," it is impossible to take this vision as any evidence whatever respecting the present condition of the Blessed Virgin, or her relation to Divine and to human persons.

Among the earliest Christian writers there is little said about the mother of God, until towards the time when the Nestorian controversy was to bring out more elearly the doetrine of the Theotokos. Yet among the writings of Methodius, who was martyred while Bishop of Tyre [A.D. 312], there is a sermon on the Hypapante (or the Festival of the meeting of Simeon and Anna, known in the West as the Purification), in whieh he gives to her some of those titles of honour whieh have beeome so familiar to later ages. "Blessed art thou, all-blessed, and to be desired of all. Blessed of the Lord is thy name, full of Divine grace, and grateful exceedingly to God, mother of God, thou that givest light to the faithful. Thou art the circumscription, so to speak, of Him Who cannot be circumscribed; the root [Isa. xl. 1] of the most beautiful flower; the mother of the Creator; the nurse of the Nourisher; the circumference of Him Who embraces all things; the upholder of Him [Heb. i. 3] Who upholds all things by His word; the gate through which God appears in the flesh [Ezek. xliv. 2]; the tongs of that cleansing coal [Isa. vi. 6]; the bosom in small of that bosom which is all-containing; the fleece of wool [Judg. vi. 37], the mystery of which cannot be solved; the well of Bethlehem [2 Sam. xxiii. 17], that reservoir of life which David longed for, out of which the draught of immortality gushed forth; the mercy-seat [Exod. xxxv. 17], from which God, in human form, was made known unto men; the spotless robe of Him Who clothes Himself with light as with a garment [Psa. civ. 2]. Thou hast lent to God, Who stands in need of nothing, that flesh which He had not, in order that the Omnipotent might become that which it was His good pleasure to be. What is more splendid than this? What than this is more sublime? He who fills earth and heaven [Jer. xxiii. 24], Whose are all things, has become in need of thee, for thou hast lent to God that flesh which He had not. Thou hast clad the Mighty One with that beauteous panoply of the body by which it has become possible for Him to be seen by mine eyes. And I, in order that I might freely approach to behold Him, have received that by which all the fiery darts of the wicked shall be quenched [Eph. vi. 16]. Hail! hail! thou to whom the great creditor of all is a debtor. We are all debtors to God, but to thee He is Himself indebted. For He who said, 'Honour thy father and thy mother' [Exod. xx. 12], will have most assuredly, as Himself willing to be tested by such proofs, kept inviolate that grace, and His own decree towards her who ministered to Him that nativity to which He voluntarily stooped, and will have glorified with a divine honour her whom He, as being without a father, even as she was without a husband, Himself has written down as mother. Even so must these things be. For the hymns which we offer to thee, O thou most holy and admirable habitation of God, are no merely useless and ornamental words. Nor, again, is thy spiritual laudation mere secular trifling, or the shoutings of a false flattery, (O thou who of God art praised; thou who to God gavest suck; who by nativity givest unto mortals their beginning of being,) but they are of clear and evident truth. But the time would fail us, ages and succeeding generations, too, to render unto thee thy fitting salutation as the mother of the King Eternal [1 Tim. i. 17], even as somewhere the illustrious Prophet says, teaching us how incomprehensible thou art [Baruch iii. 24, 25], how great is the house of God, and how large is the place of His possession! Great, and hath none end, high and unmeasurable. For verily, verily, this prophetic oracle, and most true saying, is concerning thy majesty; for thou alone hast been thought worthy to share with God the things of God; who hast alone borne in the flesh Him, Who of God the Father was the Eternally and Only Begotten. So do they truly believe who hold fast to the pure faith" [Methodius, Homil. in. Purificat.; Clarke's transl.].

This impassioned burst of eloquence is a specimen of the strongest language which is used by the Fathers in speaking of the Blessed Virgin; as for example by St. Cyril of Alexandria. More than twenty epithets and titles are given to her in this passage, but all of them begin and end in the idea of the Theotokos, that is of the relation established by her maternity between herself and God. When it is even said that she gives light to the faithful, or that by nativity she gives to mortals their beginning of being, it is plain that these expressions refer to her giving birth to the Author of our spiritual being, and to her bringing the "Light of Light" into the world; and that the benefits which she has been the means of transmitting to the faithful are those arising from the one great benefit which she brought to them when she became the mother of mankind's Saviour. So it is with all such laudations of the Blessed Virgin that were uttered or written by the old Fathers. "She was 'the mother of Life,' because she was the Mother of Him Who is our Life; she was 'the gate of Paradise,' because she bore Him Who restored us to our lost Paradise; 'the gate of Heaven,' because He, born of her, 'opened the Kingdom of Heaven to all believers;' she was 'the all-undefiled mother of Holiness,' because 'the Holy One, born of her, was called the Son of God;' the 'light-clad mother of Light,' because He Who indwelt her, and was born of her, was 'the true Light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world'" [Pusey's Eirenic. ii. 27]. It may be confidently asserted that there are no statements respecting the Blessed Virgin, no epithets or titles in any of the Fathers down to the time of St. Bernard, which are not of this character, magnifying her because of her maternal relation to Christ, and setting her before Christians as an object for their love and veneration, because she had been, in the long distant age of Christ's Conception and Birth, the instrumental means by which their Saviour had come to accomplish the work of salvation.

[4.] In much more recent times than those of the Fathers a school of Roman Catholic theologians has arisen which has attributed to the Blessed Virgin a kind of mediatorial position between Christ and mankind, and even a kind of authority over her Divine Son by reason of her maternal relation to Him. This theory has been developed in still more recent times into the idea that Christ, the one Mediator between God and man, can only be effectively approached through the intervention of His mother, and that through her all grace and pardon proceed from Him to men. Thus she is looked upon not only as the vehicle of salvation in past time, when she gave her substance for the Incarnation of the Saviour, but also as being so at present, and for all time, by a present relationship which is altogether different from, although it has arisen out of, that act of maternity. This is a purely speculative induction (unsupported by Holy Scripture or the teaching of the Fathers), from two premisses, the one, that the Blessed Virgin, like all other saints, is an intercessor with God for His people; the other, that she is still, as from the first moment of the Incarnation, truly Theotokos, the mother of Him Who is God. Both these premisses are sound, but the induction from them that the Blessed Virgin mediates between Christ and mankind is utterly unwarranted. It is, logically, a false induction; theologically, it is in direct opposition to the first principle of Christianity that a Mediator is one who unites Divine nature and Human nature in one Person; and, lastly, it is dogmatically forbidden by express words of Holy Scripture, "There is one God, and One Mediator between God and men, the Man Christ Jesus" [1 Tim. ii. 5]. The growth of an extravagant system of devotions founded on this false induction has been so rapid, and involves so grave a departure from sound Catholic worship of Christ as our only Fountain of mercy and grace, that it has become very necessary for theologians to reconsider the grounds on which honour is to be given to the Blessed Virgin above all other saints, what are the limits beyond which that honour cannot be carried without attributing to her a Divine nature that she does not possess, and what are the true logical conclusions which can be drawn as to her present relation towards God and man. MASS. The ancient English form of Missa, the Latin name for the sacrifice and sacrament of the Holy Eucharist. "Missa" is a word of great antiquity in its present sense, though its derivation is much disputed. It is found as early as the fourth century in a letter of St. Ambrose to his sister Marcellina, "Ego mansi in munere, Missam facere cœpi, dum offero, raptum cognovi," &c. [Ambros. Ep. xxxiii.]. It is also found in one of the epistles of St. Gregory [Gregor. Ep. iv. 34], and in the Penitential of St. Theodore [Pœnitent. ii.]. The following are the three principal derivations given for the word.

[1.] From the Anglo-Saxon mæſſe, a feast, in which sense the word is of more ancient date than the Institution of the Eucharist. It seems probable that the ancient word is embodied in such names as Christ*mas*, Michael*mas*, Martin*mas*, but it is very doubtful whether the suffix as thus used has any reference at all to the Holy Eucharist: and it is much more probable that the coincidence of the Anglo-Saxon mæſſe, a feast, with Mass and Missa, the Holy Eucharist, is purely accidental.

[2.] From the Hebrew מַטָּה, Missah, which signifies an oblation, as in Deut. xvi. 10. This derivation would tend to shew an association between the original idea of the Eucharist and the oblations of the Jewish ritual, but it is extremely unprobable that the Hebrew word should have found its way into every language of Europe and yet be entirely absent from the liturgical vocabulary of the Oriental churches.

[3.] From the "Ite, missa est" of the ancient Liturgies of the West, which was equivalent to the Ἐν εἰρήνῃ Χριστοῦ πορευθῶμεν, "Let us depart in peace," of the Greek Liturgies. But the words "Ite, missa est," have two senses given to them by ancient writers. Thus in Micrologus it is said, "In festivis diebus Ite missa est dicitur, quia tunc generalis conventus celebrari solet, qui per hujusmodi denuntiationem licentiam discendi accipere solet" [Microlog. xlvi.]. St. Thomas Aquinas, on the other hand, explains the phrase as meaning that the sacrifice of the Eucharist has been sent up to God by the administration of angels [Thom. Aq. iii. qu. 83, art. iv.]. Both these meanings are combined in a very ancient Exposition of the Mass, printed by Hittorpius: "Tunc demum a Diacono dicitur Ite, missa est, id est, Ite cum pace in domos vestras, quia transmissa est pro vobis oratio ad Dominum; et per angelos, qui nuncii dicuntur, allata est in Divinæ conspectum Majestatis" [Expos. Miss. ex vetust. cod. in Hittorp. 587].

The proper technical sense of the word "mass" may therefore be taken to be "offering" or "oblation;" and this is, in fact, a very ancient name for the Holy Eucharist. In the first vernacular Liturgy of the Church of England [A.D. 1549], the name was retained in the title, which ran, "The Supper of the Lord, and the Holy Communion, commonly called the Mass." It was dropped in the revised Book of 1552, and has not been much used in the Church of England in more recent times. [Liturgy. Eucharist. Real Presence. Transubstantiation.]

MATERIALISM. A system of philosophy founded on the theory that the results which theologians and metaphysicians in general attribute to the operations of soul and spirit, are results of the operation of matter. The brain is supposed to be the organ of thought and will, in the same sense in which the muscles are the organs of motion; and man's intellectual superiority to animals is owing only to superior formation of the brain and superior habits of education. "Soul" being, therefore, only a name for corporeal matter in the act of thinking and willing, it is absurd to speak of its immortality in any other sense than that in which we speak of matter as indestructible. Disorganization of the corporeal matter which thinks and wills, is its resolution into some other form of matter which is not capable of thinking and willing, and hence the death of the brain is the death of the soul. The logical morale of such a system is given by St. Paul in the typical form "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die;" "let us enjoy life while it lasts;" the ethics of Materialism being necessarily Epicurean, and contained in the one question, "What are the particular means by which each individual person can most enjoy life?"

The Materialism of modern times, although associated with that against which Tertullian, Origen, and others of the Fathers contended, and with the still more ancient theories respecting the eternity of matter, may be said to have been founded by the Deistical school of the last century, whose principles were developed to their full extent by Diderot, Holbach and their coadjutors in the notorious Système de la Nature, which was published in London under the pseudonym of the then deceased Mirabaud, Secretary of the Academy, in the year 1770. The fundamental hypothesis of this book is that matter and motion are the sum of all existing things; motion being resolved into attraction and repulsion, the combinations and oppositions of which mould matter into form, and also produce the results attributed to will and mind, according to eternal and unchangeable laws. Man is matter so moulded, and his brain evolves will and thought by means of the forces of attraction and repulsion which act upon its material substance. Theism is merely a chimerical theory which the fear and wonder of man have invented to explain phenomena that he could not understand: and a fully educated man, that is a Materialist, must necessarily be an Atheist. The only law is necessity.

Materialism thus deals with subjects which involve the whole course of Christian Theology, the allegations of which it denies from beginning to end; but the principal features of it are considered under separate articles in various pages of this Dictionary. The nature of matter and its relations to the Creator will be found under MATTER and CREATION: under SOUL and SPIRIT will be found a refutation of the theory that they have no existence separate from material substance: its atheistic principles are dealt with under THEISM; and its theory of "necessity" is refuted in FATALISM and FREE-WILL.

But there is an essential weakness in the logic of Materialism which must at once condemn it in toto in the judgment of any independent reasoner. For while matter and motion are said to comprehend all existing things, it can give no account whatever of the origin either of one or the other, and falls back on the puerile argument, that since they exist now and within the range of all human experience they must have existed always. Until Materialism can give some rational account of an original impetus out of which motion arose, and of a primal cause for the existence of matter, all its reasonings are simply illogical and worthless.

MATRIMONY, HOLY. [MARRIAGE.]

MATTER. The metaphysical history of this term, like that of most others, begins with Aristotle: its theological significance may be said to begin with the first two verses of Genesis.

And of the two questions in which the account to be given of this philosophic term comes into relation with religious subjects, one, the more familiar to ancient thought, these verses decisively answer. To the modern question, also, they are by no means irrelevant.

These questions may be thus stated; taking the one more recently started first, as the more fundamental; though its solution is less necessary in reality than in appearance to that of the other.

I. Does matter really exist? If so, how? On this point there are three principal theories; the popular one, recognising the objective existence of matter, but embarrassed by considerable difficulties in explaining what the existing thing is: the Idealism of Berkeley, recognising (what may, for distinction, be called) its real subjective existence: and the Idealism of the Sensationalist school, which doubts or denies its real existence, as distinct from its properties, or the groups of phenomena belonging to it.

II. How does matter come to exist? Is it self-existent or self-originating, i.e. either existing eternally, or if not eternally, yet existing from no cause external to itself? Or is all matter, in the first instance as well as in its modifications, the work of a mind?

A third question might be mentioned, subordinate to the last, or at least connected with it in much ancient speculation:

III. Has Matter ever existed abstracted from those conditions of concrete form in which we meet with it?

It is not of course intended here to discuss those metaphysical problems as such. The second is the only one, of which a particular solution is directly important to religion: but the others have a certain theological interest, and this it will be necessary to point out.

I. Popular language, in spite of Berkeley's own appeal to popular opinion, must be admitted to be framed on the hypothesis that matter exists in itself, independently of any mind perceiving it: and theologians have in general been content to accept popular language on the point, so that the language of theologians represents the popular opinion. But as Berkeley's system does not, when understood, contradict any of the ordinary facts of experience, so the language of theologians, like that of other non-Berkeleyans, does not become meaningless in consequence of the system being accepted. For a system invented or advanced from a theological motive, it affects theology singularly little.

It can hardly be denied, that a belief in the reality of matter, however reality may be defined, is necessary to orthodox Christianity. The narrative of the Creation becomes meaningless, or at least deceptive, if the things created be no more than "permanent possibilities of sensation," things that would be perceived, or rather groups of phenomena that would make impressions, if there were any minds placed ready to observe them, which there are not: and, to tell the truth, even Berkeley's system confuses or obscures the notion of creation. The existence of a material substance means, according to him, that some mind or minds are affected with certain sensations, from a cause external to themselves. Now in this there is nothing to conflict with Christian doctrine: when we say that God created all material substances, we shall mean, on this hypothesis, that He is the sole and ultimate cause of the laws, external to created minds, whereby their consciousness is modified in the various ways which we ascribe to the presence of matter.

So far, then, all is clear. If Berkeley has not yet given any support to the doctrines of religion, he certainly has not assailed them. But when we come to the part of his theory which was to confute Atheism, it is more possible to bring him into collision with that Revelation which he undertakes to defend. Matter, it is said, exists in virtue of being perceived by a mind: e.g. "my inkstand exists," means "my mind has a group of sensations, simultaneous or successive, which I describe as seeing and feeling a glass inkstand, hearing it ring when struck or thrown down, &c., or otherwise as being conscious of the presence of a hard, smooth, round, hollow body, of a heavy, greyish, transparent substance." But if I go out of the room, I believe that my inkstand still exists, though no longer perceived by me. What do I mean by this, on the Idealist hypothesis? We have rejected the answer, "You mean that you believe that, if you went into the room again, you would again experience the same sensations." In the first place, I do mean more than that, though I am unable to prove that anything more than that is true. And further, as has been said above, unless the inkstand exists when not seen, how is it true that the Creator caused the flint, sand, alkali, copper and zinc ore, &c., of which it is made, to exist ages before they were discovered and used, and sustains the manufactured product of His works in being now?

To these objections the Sensationalist has no answer: the Berkeleyan has. "When you say that the inkstand exists in your absence, you mean that when it is not perceived by your mind, it is perceived by some mind or other. Your only notion of existence (except the existence of a mind, a conscious subject) is of existence as the object of consciousness of a mind. If you believe, as you doubtless do, that matter exists absolutely, not only in relation to the finite minds that perceive it, you are bound to admit that there is an infinite mind, which always perceives all matter existent, even what is perceived by no other mind."

Injustice is done to Berkeley by a Sensational philosopher, if he regards the negative part of his system, the denial of an objective substratum to material phenomena, as separate from this, its positive part. Berkeley was a real Idealist, not a mutilated or inconsistent Sensationalist; and any one who denies an objective substratum to matter, but does not recognise its absolute existence as an object[1] of consciousness to a necessarily existing mind, is not taking half Berkeley's system and leaving the other half, but framing a new one, suggested, it may be, by Berkeley's, but essentially different from it. His religious philosophy was not an amiable excrescence on his metaphysical, but an essential correlative to it; and therefore his system has no sceptical tendency. Neither does it seem fair to charge it with a tendency to Pantheism;[2] for God is distinguished adequately, on the one hand, from the created objects, i.e. groups of ideas, which He perceives; on the other, from the created minds which He causes to perceive the same objects. But it seems doubtful whether the system, sublime as is the picture it gives of the Creator's relation to His universe, does not really, by implication, lower our view of His Nature and His dealings with it.

What, on this hypothesis, do we mean when we say that God made the material world? That He caused, and, having begun, continues to cause, created intelligences to receive certain impressions, under certain laws of sequence and co-existence. But more than this. We mean also that God Himself, when He created, began to perceive certain ideas as real. Now this is almost shockingly contradictory to the generally received notion of an eternal present in the Divine mind: and it is hard to see that it does not contradict the doctrines of His eternal foreknowledge and immutability. Doubtless, God began (on this hypothesis) to be conscious of the world at His own mere will, and not, as we do, from an external cause. But His Nature seems lowered, if we confess that by His creating we mean that He caused certain ideas to become present to His Mind, which therefore were not present to it before. We have, in fact, a curious converse of Pantheism. Pantheism (as the term is commonly used) merges the personal God in union with the universe, a universe consisting of matter, or spirit, or both. Here the personality as well as the spirituality of the Eternal is preserved; but instead of His being so merged in the world as to deify it, the world is so merged in Him as to introduce its own finite and mutable qualities into His Nature.

Creation is a mystery on any hypothesis. On any hypothesis, God, at some finite time, came into new relations with things that are not God. He assumed new characters (as those of Creator, Preserver, Ruler, Judge) which He had not before; and we must believe this to be without any change in His Nature, or even in His purpose. Whether this necessary difficulty is aggravated by the above form of stating it; whether the theory of creation in the Divine Mind implies more of a change of nature than that of a creation of things external to it, may be a question. It is one that at least deserves to be stated. If it be admitted that Idealism is not logically opposed to Christianity on this ground, there remain only two slighter objections to it.

Existence has, on this hypothesis, a twofold aspect. Things material exist, absolutely as being perceived by God, relatively as being caused by God to be perceived by His sensitive creatures. Now if, to avoid the objection above stated, it be said that while creation existed eternally in the purpose of God, and that His works were always known to Him, yet it may be said that creation had a beginning in time, when God first made it known to other intelligences than His own. In itself, no doubt, this would be inadequate as an account of creation, however it might be a fair defence against the charge of introducing change into the Divine purpose or thought. And it just stops short of making the world eternal, though it comes dangerously near to it. It may be added that the hypothesis of a subjective creation is not invented on behalf of this system. One of the recognised explanations of the double account of the creation in Genesis is that the former or Elohistic narrative describes the order in which God's purpose was made known to the holy angels, the second that in which it was executed.

[1] The modern metaphysical use of the words "object" and "objective" makes it difficult to use them consistently in discussing Berkeley's philosophy. Here "object" is not used as really a correlative term to "objective."

[2] Mansel's Prolegomena Logica, App. B.

But the reality (in whatever sense) of the material universe is presupposed, not only in the doctrine of the creation, but in that of the Sacraments, insomuch that "Matter" is used as a technical term in relation to them, describing one of their essential requisites. Speaking generally, any hypothesis that allows the reality of matter would be sufficient, and therefore the Idealist, since it does make matter, in an intelligible sense, real. The command to use certain material substances, and the promise of certain spiritual effects to follow on their use, is not evacuated if we describe their use as "taking the known means to occasion, to our own mind and others, including the Divine, certain states of consciousness." But it seems hard to see how the theory can fail to affect the doctrine of the Holy Eucharist. If the presence of a body means the fact that its bodily properties are manifest to all intelligences capable of observing them, then a presence of a body, real but not sensible, becomes self-contradictory. If, however, the point be urged with sufficient boldness, that absolute truth is not "truth relative to all intelligences," but truth relative to the Infinite Intelligence, then it is of course possible to believe, that God regards that as present which man does not recognise as present by the ordinary test of manifesting the properties, in manifesting which bodily presence consists; and this will, by an adherent of the system, be regarded as constituting a real but not sensible presence.

II. Whether matter exists only in virtue of minds to which it bears relation, or whether it exists in itself, the source of its being must be determined. For not even, if it be said that matter is a mode of the mind of a spirit, is it yet proved that matter is not self-caused or eternal: it might be a necessary mode of an eternal Spirit's thought, and so co-eternal with His being. However, the motives that have led to the belief in the eternity of matter have been, in general, such as would involve a belief in its independence. It is conceding either too much or too little, to make matter merely the thought of God, yet a thought which He never was without, and without which He could not have existed. Eternal matter was usually conceived as an antitheistic power, whether active or passive; sometimes so passive, as to be no more than an imperfect medium for the divine operation. It is hardly worth while to frame a system, in which matter should have a subjective eternity; since such a system has never yet been received. It has already been pointed out, however, that such a system is a conceivable corollary of Berkeley's. But, supposing matter to be something external to the Divine Mind which (all Theists will probably admit) knows or contemplates it, what is the relation between the two? Is one the work of the other, or are they both independent?

Strictly speaking, there are three possible answers to this question: viz., that matter is the product of mind, that mind is the product of matter, and that the two are independent. But the second, in this exact form, has probably never been maintained. Matter, being inactive, cannot be conceived as producing, unless it be first personified. Materialism, however, or regarding mind as a mode of matter, is a fair representative of this view. Setting this on one side, we come to the choice between the two other alternatives, that matter is the work of mind, and that it is co-eternal with mind—between Theism and Dualism.

The Jewish and Christian religions are Theistic: most other religions of any claim to depth or speculative value are Dualistic. Attempts to import Dualism into Christianity have been numerous, but it has in every age been so obvious that the hybrid system was inconsistent,—that if Christianity was a coherent system, its authoritative documents denounced Dualism, and its instinctive consciousness rejected it—that it is unnecessary to reopen a question which is practically extinct. All who claim to be, strictly speaking, Theists, would now admit the prerogative of creation to belong to God in the fullest sense. It will be enough here to classify the forms of Dualism which have either been opposed to the Theistic doctrine of Christianity, or which it has been sought to amalgamate with it, as they refer to the subject before us, all of them being separately and fully noticed elsewhere. [DUALISM.]

[1.] The Buddhist Dualism assumes two eternal and impersonal principles, matter and spirit. Finite and (eminently) human nature exists in virtue of the union or collision of the two; they are not only the good and evil, but the positive and negative elements of existence: existence consists in partaking of both, as the Hegelian system makes it consist in the union of Being and Nothing. The victory of the human spirit is to be free from matter, and one with all pure spirit; but since matter as well as spirit is necessary to existence, this pure Being, though not conceived as Nothingness, is indistinguishable from it.

[2.] The Manichæan Dualism (to use the name of its most famous and permanently vital form, for a system not confined to the Manichæan sect, or those affiliated to it) assumes two eternal principles, matter and spirit, of which both are more or less distinctly personified. The strange and grotesque mythology by which the Manichæans (in the stricter sense) accounted for the intermixture of good and evil in the world, may have been meant to be understood allegorically; but this is hardly likely—the allegory is too vivid to have been less than a myth, in the minds of its hearers, if not of its inventors. Two powers which make war on each other, which devour and assimilate from each others' substance, or create and beget from their own, are strangely personal if regarded as abstractions: indeed, the best reason for thinking them so is, that if the Manichæan cosmogony be taken literally, the Eternal Spirit is wonderfully carnal. But because a system is unphilosophical or inconsistent, if understood in the natural way, it does not follow that it ought to be understood otherwise: there being such things as inconsistent systems. It, however, is to be remembered that Manichæanism always maintained an esoteric doctrine, which may have allegorized the known gross one.

[3.] The Platonic Dualism (if one may take a title from a single enunciation of it—it does not appear to have been a consistent or permanent conviction with Plato) assumes an eternal personal Spirit, acting on an eternal impersonal matter. Out of this, He produces all things that are: not deriving them from His own being, lest He should impoverish Himself, yet being in a real sense their author. Matter is conceived as negatively but not positively evil—unable to be made entirely good, even by the entirely good Spirit—and passively but not actively resisting His will.

[4.] The general character of Gnostic systems was not strictly Dualistic. They assumed two eternal principles of spirit and matter, of which the first at least was conceived, more or less distinctly, as personal: but matter was made into finite beings, not by the action of the eternal Spirit, but of a created or generated one; who, though not eternal, held a place so exalted as to be practically a third God; and usurped, more or less, the bad eminence of the eternal matter, since in opposition to orthodox Christians, it was necesssary to distinguish Him from the eternal Spirit. [Demiurge.]

The most ancient form of Dualism, the Persian, does not come in for consideration here; as its antithesis is not between spirit and matter, but between light and darkness. Owing to its antiquity, the distinction between personal and impersonal principles is not formulated in it.

III. The third and fourth of the forms of Dualism just enumerated make their cosmogony depend on the distinction devised by Anaxagoras, and formulated by Aristotle, between matter and form. If matter be conceived as eternal, and yet a creation by a spiritual Being be in some sense admitted, this is necessary. If matter be believed to be itself the work of a Spirit, it is possible, but by no means necessary, still to believe that He first created matter, and then formed it. Such was perhaps the general view of the Scholastic period in the widest sense of the term: the belief recognised absolute creation by God out of nothing, while it left a meaning for the Aristotelian distinction which was familiar. And it seemed to derive direct support from the narrative of the Creation in Gen. i. 2. But it is evident that the word "without form," in this passage, is not to be pressed in so strict a philosophical sense: if the meaning of the word were less general, it would still follow from the fact, that the "formless" matter is already called (not the universe merely but) "the earth." It therefore follows, that the scriptural or Christian doctrine of Creation admits, but does not require, the complication of this intermediate step. It probably is ignored by almost all modern thought on the subject: in the last age of Scholasticism, Sir Thomas Browne still continued to assume it, and his critic Digby thought it needless.

MATTER, SACRAMENTAL. The external and visible substance used in the administration of a sacrament, as distinguished from the internal and spiritual substance, and from the verbal form used. [Baptism. Eucharist.]

MEANS OF GRACE. This expression is common in popular language, and is once used in the Book of Common Prayer, the "General Thanksgiving" containing the words, "We bless Thee . . . above all for Thine inestimable love in the redemption of the world by our Lord Jesus Christ, for the means of grace; and for the hope of glory." As thus used it is a comprehensive expression which includes all substances, agencies, and operations, by which the redemption accomplished for all by Christ is made available for those who accept the benefit of it. In the popular sense it signifies everything which promotes the religious life, such as prayer, preaching, sacraments, &c. In a more strictly theological sense the "means of grace" are the instrumenta by which Christ conveys grace to the soul. The sacraments and sacramentals may properly be so called, but the term can only be very loosely applied when used respecting the instruction given in sermons, the good gained by meditation, or the reflex action on the soul of devout prayer.

MEDIATION. The signification of the word "mediate," to interfere as an equal friend to both parties, suggests both the office of our Blessed Lord and His fitness for exercising it. It will be necessary to consider, first, The necessity for mediation; secondly, The fitness of our Lord by nature for exercising this office; and, thirdly, The manner in which it is exercised.

I. The Necessity for Mediation. The necessity for mediation arose from the effects of Adam's fall. Man, as originally constituted, was fitted to be the mediator between God and all created things. Although his body was derived from the dust of the earth, he had a higher nature inbreathed by God Himself. In this his life differed from the rest of the animal creation, for we never read of any one of them that God breathed into his nostrils the breath of life. Like the other creatures he had a natural body, σάρξ, but he had also a reasonable soul, ψυχή. This last attribute was immeasurably superior to any possessed by the animal creation, for the soul that God had made could never die. It was the seat of conscience and reason, of wisdom and invention. But superadded to this was the divine πνεῦμα, by which man was made partaker of the nature of God. By reason of this last gift he was enabled without premeditation to give names to every living thing expressive of its properties and uses, so that whatsoever Adam called it, that was the name thereof. Hence, too, he was enabled to detail the process by which Eve had been formed out of a rib taken from his side. St. Cyprian interprets the words "God breathed into his nostrils the breath of life," concerning the gift of the Holy Ghost, in which he is said to have been anticipated by the ancient Jews of our Saviour's time.

It was the possession of the πνεῦμα which was the connecting link between God and man. Through it divine graces flowed into the human nature, and man was enabled to approach God, as our first parents were accustomed to do, when He walked in the garden in the cool of the day. They required then no mediator between their Maker and themselves, since by the indwelling presence of this Divine πνεῦμα, the breath of life, man was himself a mediator; the middle term through which communication passed from heaven to earth, and earth to heaven, being contained within his own nature.

But with the Fall this gift was lost. In the day he sinned he died, for he forfeited the Divine πνεῦμα, and therefore our first parents hid themselves from God's presence, because they had now need of a mediator. This need of a mediator, and its partial supply, was set forth in all the ordinances of old. Prophets were mediators between God and man; priests, both of the Patriarchal and Levitical age, were mediators between man and God. The law was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator. The people said to Moses, "Speak thou with us and we will hear, but let not God speak with us, lest we die." To Moses the promise was made, "Thy brother shall be to thee instead of a mouth, and thou shalt be to him instead of God." As respects God's dealings with man, Moses was a mediator between Jehovah and the children of Israel; but as respects man's dealings with God, Aaron was their appointed mediator, for "he was taken from among men, in things pertaining to God to offer both gifts and sacrifices for sins." One side of the mediatorial office was shewn in the long line of prophets, who spoke to men in God's stead; and the other in the priestly order, which descended from generation to generation, until the One Mediator between God and man, the God-Man, Christ Jesus, appeared on the earth. The fall of man was the loss of personal union with God, but all that Adam lost was destined to be restored in Christ, Who is the Mediator of the better covenant. In Him the breach which sin occasioned was healed, and the privilege of union with God restored to men.

II. The Fitness of our Lord by Nature for exercising this Office. Our Blessed Lord was fitted by the constitution of His nature to exercise the office of Mediator. Indeed the fulfilment of this office was the result of His Incarnation, for He, Who in one Person was perfect God and perfect Man, must of necessity be a Mediator, since the two parties between whom reconciliation must be made were equally represented in Himself. The Church, therefore, has always insisted with greater vehemence on the doctrine of the Incarnation than on the many doctrines which flow from it; for to those who rightly believe the Incarnation of our Lord, His Mediation, Atonement, and Intercession, will appear as its natural consequence. Those who deny our Lord's Divinity might believe that He was a Mediator in the sense in which Moses, or Aaron, or the Jewish priests were temporally appointed to the office, but it would not follow that, from the constitution of His nature, He was the Mediator of the human race, or that His mediation must continue as long as the union of that nature lasts. If either the Divine or the Human Nature of our Lord be denied one term in the mediation is lost, and if the two natures be confused, a tertium quid is substituted for His two distinct Natures. Both parts are thus lost, for He would be the representative neither of the Divine nor the Human Nature, but of a new nature which partook of both and yet was neither in its full integrity. The truth of the Incarnation being granted, our Lord's fitness for the office of Mediator follows as a necessary deduction.

He was the second Adam. As Adam had been originally created in communion with God in consequence of the Divine πνεῦμα, so the Man Christ was in communion with God in consequence of the co-existence of the Deity in His Person. The Deity imparted to His Humanity the fulness of grace, and therefore the Man Jesus Christ was perfect in holiness. As Adam was the father of the human race, and transmitted to all his posterity all the attributes of his humanity, shorn, as it had become, of original righteousness and inheriting the guilt of sin by reason of the Fall; so the second Adam imparts to the members of His Church the new nature which He had purified by its reunion with the Godhead. The transmission of the old nature is by generation, but the new nature is imparted by regeneration. It is the participation of the new nature which is implied in the term "members of Christ," "branches of the vine," &c. St. Anselm has noticed that, whilst man was redeemed by the Son of God entering Adam's line and purifying his nature, the fallen angels could not be so saved, as they had no common nature, which was transmitted from one source, but had been created independently of each other. Bishop Pearson says, "'He took not on Him the nature of angels,' and therefore saved none of them, who for want of a redeemer, are 'reserved in everlasting chains under darkness unto the judgment of the great day.' And man once fallen had been, as deservedly, so irrevocably, condemned to the same condition, but that He took upon Him the seed of Abraham. For being as we are partakers of flesh and blood, we could expect no redemption but by Him who likewise took part of the same; we could look for no Redeemer, but such a one who by consanguinity was our brother" [Pearson, On the Creed, vol. i. p. 218].

III. The Manner in which the Mediatorial Office is exercised. Our Lord's mediation, being the natural result of that twofold nature in which He manifested Himself to men, implies a twofold action, [1] His relation towards men, and [2] His relation towards God.

[1.] The acts of His mediation on earth were, first, to reveal God's will; secondly, to exhibit Himself as a pattern for the imitation of mankind; thirdly, to fulfil all righteousness; fourthly, to offer sacrifice for sin.

1. As God the Mediator spoke more distinctly than the Prophets had ever done before—that which He received of the Father He shewed unto His disciples—His precepts, His exhortations, His explanation of the scheme of redemption, were divine revelations made to men. As God, He was the Fountain of Truth, and as man, He was enabled to speak to men.

2. In exhibiting Himself as a perfect model of righteousness and obedience, He shewed by His example what God would have His children be, so that the actions of His life are a rule of imitation for His people.

3. His righteousness was not only a perfect example for the imitation of mankind, but it was also an offering to God. Whilst his righteousness, considered as a model, was part of His mediation as God to man; as an offering, it was no less a portion of His mediation as man to God, since His holy life was an offering up by Him of a sweet savour acceptable to God. It was an offering which no mere man had ever yet been able to present. It represented the obedience which man owes to his Maker, and was typified in the peace-offerings provided under the Mosaic dispensation. It is this obedience which supplies the imperfections of our own, and its merits shared with men make their works acceptable to God. This righteousness is imparted to mankind through their union with Christ, for as the guilt of the First Adam was transmitted to his posterity, so the righteousness of the Second Adam is handed on to His people.

4. a] Before man could do works pleasing to God, it was first necessary that atonement should be made for sin. In men sacrifice for sin must precede the offering of a holy life, but in our Lord's case this process was reversed. In Him the offering of a holy life preceded the atonement for sin, because He was sinless. His holy life was therefore not only an acceptable offering to God, but it was a preparation for the great priestly act which He performed upon the Cross. Although the negative holiness of innocence He possessed from the time He was conceived in the womb, yet the positive holiness of righteousness attained a growing perfection, for He was made perfect by the things that He suffered. Both priest and victim were representatives of a perfect humanity. God required expiation for sin, and no other priest and no other victim would have satisfied that claim.

b] It has been a question amongst theologians, "Why God should have required a sacrifice for sin?" The law was, "the soul that sinneth it shall die," and "without blood there is no remission of sins." The reason of this law is variously stated. St. Anselm asserted that it was not fitting that God should forgive sin without punishment [Cur Deus Homo, i. 12]; but this view, as far as it is grounded on à priori arguments from the Divine Attributes, was combated by the later Schoolmen, and is not sanctioned by the writings of the earlier Fathers. St. Athanasius grounds the necessity of expiation on that which is beneficial for man [Orat. ii. cont. Arian. sec. 68; De Incarn. vi.]. It was beneficial for man that the truth of God's Word should be vindicated, that he might learn to trust alike in His promises and His threats. It was beneficial for him that he should learn the enormity of sin from the magnitude of the expiation required and the ransom paid, and that the love and gratitude, inspired by the means by which the sacrifice was provided, should be a fresh inducement to obedience. We may, therefore, conclude with Hooker, "The world's salvation was, without the incarnation of the Son, a thing impossible; not simply impossible, but impossible, it being presupposed that the will of God was no otherwise to have it saved than by the death of His own Son." [Hooker, Ecc. Pol. V. li. 3.] c] He who offers sacrifice is a priest. Since a priest is a mediator in action, and Christ was a Mediator by nature, He was by nature fitted to be priest. As the second Adam, He was the representative of the human race, the only one who could offer an acceptable sacrifice, because He alone was without sin. He must be man to offer sacrifice for men, and He must be God, for His consecration consisted in the uniting of the Divine to the Human Nature.

d] As the priesthood of Christ was the result of the union of the two natures, so also was the efficacy of the sacrifice. The sacrifice was none other than the body of the Second Adam, the representative of mankind. It was human, and therefore could be offered for the sins of humanity. It was Divine, and therefore of illimitable extent and transcending value. "We may look first to the Divine and then to the human side of His character, and see why this was the only real sacrifice which could be presented to God. For by reason of His Divine Nature had the sacrifice of Himself such intrinsic value, that the representative of mankind could offer it effectually in mediation for our race. For, from Christ's Divinity there flowed such consecrating virtue, as made Him a fitting Priest, and such atoning efficacy as made Him a sufficient Victim." [Wilberforce on Incarnation, p. 229.]

[2.] The acts of our Lord's mediation after His Ascension.

1. That which He does on man's behalf to God is summed up in the word "Intercession;" and to the article on the Intercession of Christ reference may be made. [Intercession of Christ.]

2. His action as Mediator towards men may also be summed up in the words, "His Presence."

a] When our Lord was upon earth, in the prospect of His Ascension, He promised that His perpetual presence should remain with His Church on earth: "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." He spoke, moreover, of His absence and return, and the restoration of His presence depending on His departure to the Father. This could not refer to His Divine Presence, which never could be absent from any part of creation, and was in Heaven even whilst He dwelt as the God-man on earth. It must, therefore, have had relation to the presence of His Deified Humanity with His Church and with His people on the earth. That which His Humanity received from His Divine Nature, it was part of His mediatorial work to hand on to the Church as His body, and to His people individually as the members in particular. The fulfilment of the promise of His presence depended on the mission of the Comforter, for as the original union of the Divine and Human Nature in Christ was effected by the operation of the Holy Ghost in His Conception, so was also the union of Christ with His people to be effected by the same power. His Human Nature, purified and sanctified, is thus by the operation of the Holy Ghost imparted to His people, and is the means whereby we are made partakers of the Divine Nature. The inseparable union which existed between the Divine and Human Nature in our Lord rendered this diffusion of His Human Nature possible; but its presence is not after a carnal, but after a spiritual manner. His bodily form was removed to Heaven, and will be seen no more on earth until He comes to judgment; but after His departure His presence was more intimate, because it was of a more spiritual kind than it had been before. Whilst He was on earth He conversed with men as a man, but when He had ascended He could dwell in them and receive them into a real unity with Himself. "When the Son of man," says St. Leo, "betook Himself to the glory of His Father's Majesty, He began in some ineffable way to be nearer by His Divine power, for the very reason that, according to His Humanity, He was removed further off." And it was to this more intimate union that He referred St. Mary Magdalene on the day of His Resurrection, when He bade her touch Him not, for He had not yet ascended to the Father. "I would not have you come to Me," explains St. Leo, "in bodily wise, nor recognise Me by carnal touch: I put you off to something higher, I prepare you for something greater: when I am ascended to My Father, then you shall touch Me in a more true and perfect manner, when you shall lay hold of that which you do not touch, and believe that which you do not behold." [St. Leo, Serm. lxxii. 4. Bp. Moberly on the Great Forty Days, p. 90. Bp. Andrewes, Serm. for Easter xv.]

It is in this presence that the spiritual life of the Christian consists; and the sacraments and ordinances of the Church are the channels through which it is conveyed. The work of the Holy Ghost is still used in making them effectual to that end. "By one spirit we are all baptized into one Body;" and in the Holy Eucharist the Holy Ghost is again the operator, whereby the sacred elements become the Body and Blood of Christ. Hence the invocation of the Holy Ghost which is found in the ancient liturgies, and which, though absent in the Roman and in our own, was restored in the Scotch office. In baptism we first receive the renewed nature of our Lord; for, as through birth the corrupt nature of the first Adam is transmitted to us, so in baptism, our second birth, the renewed nature of our Blessed Lord is imparted to us. We become members of the family of which He is the Head, even as before we were members of the race which derived its origin from Adam. In the Holy Eucharist not only is that acceptable sacrifice offered, which, uniting with our Lord's work in heaven, is the perpetuation of the sacrifice on the Cross, but we feed upon the sacrifice, even as the Israelites fed upon the paschal lamb, when we eat the flesh and drink the blood of Christ, and thus are made one with Him and He with us. Christ's mediation is therefore, in all things, our real bond of union with God, and supplies the place of that which Adam lost.

b] The end and object of this Presence of Christ through His mediatorial office, is that He may be the great fountain of holiness and truth to His people.

1. In God alone dwells absolute holiness. This holiness, imparted to the human nature of our Lord through its union with the Divine, constituted Him the Holy One of God, and all that He thus receives He imparts to His people, for "God hath made Him Head over all things to the Church, which is His Body, the fulness of Him that filleth all in all." This imparted holiness is perfect, supplying the lack of ours, and in this shall Christ "present the Church unto Himself, a glorious Church, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing, but holy and without blemish." It was to this that St. Paul trusted when he prayed that he might "win Christ and be found in Him, not having his own righteousness which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ."

2. Besides this imparted righteousness through the mediation of Christ, there is also an infused holiness, which, equally with the first, proceeds from our union with Him; for without Him we can do nothing, and "the branch cannot bear fruit except it abide in the vine." It is that grace which sanctifies the human will, which gives strength to human weakness, which forms Christ within us and makes us in all our actions like unto Him.

3. Christ the Mediator is also the source of knowledge. As God is the fountain of holiness, so is He also the source of knowledge. He is a God of Truth, for to be the depository of truth is amongst the mysterious laws of His inscrutable existence. Knowledge is the reception of Divine Truth. Adam possessed it before the Fall, but lost it through his sin. Its restoration was a part of our Lord's mediatorial work. "The Word," or communication of truth, was one of His titles, and that He might communicate it to men was one of the objects of His Incarnation. "The Word was made flesh, and dwelt amongst us, and we beheld His glory as of the only begotten Son of God, full of grace and truth—of His fulness have we all received, and grace for grace: for the law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ" [John i. 15-17]. The Divine Word took on Him our flesh that He might without the intervention of any mere human prophet or lawgiver communicate truth to men. His humanity provided a common nature through which His Divine Truth could be communicated. As the Word He spoke when He was upon earth—for the things, He said, which He had heard of God, He spake unto His disciples; but this communication of Divine Truth was not confined to His sojourn here below, for He expressly promised that it should be continued after He was ascended. This was to be effected through the instrumentality of the Holy Ghost, "When He, the Spirit of Truth, is come, He will guide you into all truth, for He shall not speak of Himself, but whatsoever He shall hear that shall He speak. He shall glorify Me, for He shall receive of Mine and shall shew it unto you" [John xvi. 13, 14].

Although the Holy Spirit is the immediate agent, yet the Incarnate Word is no less "the Truth" than He is "the Way" and "the Life." The Church derives Her knowledge of Divine things through Her union with Christ, which is effected by the perpetual operation of the Holy Ghost.

This knowledge is [a] objective and [b] subjective.

a] That which is objective is made known by Holy Scripture and by the authority of the Church. Holy Scripture was handed down by our Lord's disciples to their successors as a complete system of external truth, which through the one Mediator was delivered from God to man [Wilberforce on the Incarnation, p. 478]. Much with respect to its interpretation, statements of doctrine and rules for practice, was left to the authority of the Church, that Christians might hear the voice of the Word spoken through the Church. When the Church spoke collectively through the decrees of her Œcumenical Councils, the promise was realized that the Church, which is the Body of Christ, would be guided into all truth through the operation of the Spirit and the indwelling of the Word; and Christians received the decisions arrived at by those Councils as the voice of the Mediator spoken to them through His Body, the Church.

b] Knowledge is also subjective. This is the gift which, derived from their union in Christ, enables Christians to receive the objective truth which is conveyed to them through the instrumentality of Holy Scripture and the authority of the Church. The natural heart is incapable of receiving Divine Truth, but the gift of knowledge which flows from the indwelling of the Mediator imparts that wisdom which is from above, which enables the understanding to comprehend the truth and to believe that which is too mysterious for explanation, as well as to apply it to the guidance of life. And since this subjective knowledge, which is imparted to individuals, is subordinate to the objective truth revealed to the Church, it can give no possible sanction to the wild claims which are so often made for the supremacy of private judgment.

[3.] The Mediator will also be the Judge of all men. "The Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son" [John v. 22]. He Who has ascended into Heaven, and is now acting as our Intercessor there, whilst His spiritual Presence is also on earth, will come again at the last day to be our Judge. "There is," says Bishop Pearson, "an original, supreme, autocratorical, judiciary power; there is" also "a judiciary power delegated, derived, given by commission. Christ as God hath the first together with the Father and the Holy Ghost; Christ as man hath the second from the Father expressly, from the Holy Ghost concomitantly. For 'the Father hath given Him authority to execute judgment, because He is the Son of Man;' not simply, because He is a man, therefore, He shall be Judge (for then by the same reason every man should judge, and consequently none, because no man could be judged if every man should only judge), but because of the three Persons which are God, He only is also the Son of Man; and therefore for His affinity with their nature, for His sense of their infirmities, for His appearance to their eyes, most fit to represent the greatest mildness and sweetness of equity, in the severity of that just and irrespective judgment" [Pearson on the Creed, i. 350, 351].

He will still be our Mediator then. As God, His knowledge is perfect; as man, His sympathies are unfailing. As man, we shall behold Him, and His righteousness will be our plea for acceptance. In that day those who are united to Him in the union of His Body will have confidence, since He, in whom they lived and died, will still be their refuge.

[4.] The glory of the Saints in Heaven is derived from Christ's mediation. The Transfiguration on Mount Tabor was a foreshadowing of the glory of the Resurrection, for those who sleep in Jesus "will awake up after His likeness, and be satisfied with it. They will be like Him, for they shall see Him as He is." Then the glory of His Deity shone through the veil of His human nature, and His humanity was irradiated with the glory of the Godhead, but that glory He transmitted to others; for Moses and Elias, the respective types of quick and dead, were seen with Him in glory. It was the glory reflected from His visage which shone on their countenances; and so in the description of the heavenly city we are told that "it hath no need of the sun to lighten it, for the Lamb is the light thereof." The saints are described as stars which shine with different degrees of brightness according to their nearness to their Lord. We may therefore conclude that the glory of the Godhead imparted to the human nature of our Lord will be reflected on all the members of His Body, the Church; and that they will hereafter shine with His glory, as the stars of heaven now borrow their light from the brightness of the sun.

Thus does the doctrine of our Lord's mediation wrap itself round every stage of our life. It explains the need of sacraments, and, by so doing, it humbles pride and exalts humility. It teaches us how Christ is our all in all. It raises our hope and encourages our confidence, leading up our hearts to Him Who sits at the right hand of our Father's throne as our Mediator, and is preparing a New City of God for us where the glory which was lost in Adam will be more than restored in Him.

MELCHITES. A name originally given to the orthodox members of the Egyptian Church by the followers of Eutyches. [MONOPHYSITISM.] It is derived from the Syriac word "melec," which signifies "king," and was intended as a reproach [q.d. "Erastian Royalists"] to those who had accepted the Council of Chalcedon after it had been ratified by the Emperor. The name is still borne by a community of monks in Syria, who repudiate the Jacobite heresy with which the East is overrun.

MELETIAN SCHISM. One of the schisms of the early Church, somewhat similar in character to that of the Donatists. It arose in the beginning of the fourth century, and originated in the following circumstances. During the persecution under Diocletian, Peter, Bishop of Alexandria and Metropolitan of Egypt, passed sentence of deposition on Meletius (or Melitius), Bishop of Sycopolis, an important city of the Thebaïd, on the charge, among other crimes, of having apostatized from the faith by sacrificing to the heathen deities. Meletius, denying the charge, paid no attention to the sentence, but retorted upon Peter that he had been guilty of undue leniency in dealing with the lapsed. On the question which was in the right, as regards the facts authorities are conflicting, but the more trustworthy are on the side of the metropolitan. Supported by numerous followers in his own diocese however, Meletius not only continued to exercise the authority of Bishop, but even took upon himself to ordain clergy, which, by the rules of the Egyptian province, could not canonically be done without the consent of the metropolitan. Thus was formed a schismatical body, the distinctive feature of which was hostility to the Alexandrian bishop. Even after the death by martyrdom of Peter, this hostility continued under his successors, Achillas and Alexander, till on the rise, under the last named bishop, of the heresy of Arius, the Meletians, purely, as it would seem, from the spirit of opposition, set themselves thoroughly in the wrong by joining the Arian party.

The schism spread through Egypt, though not, it appears, to any extent beyond it, and at the Nicene Council [A.D. 325], formed, after the Arian heresy, the next subject which engaged the attention of the assembled Fathers. The manner in which Meletius and his followers were dealt with by the Council, perhaps, on the ground that they were free from actual heresy, is an example of leniency and firmness. Meletius was allowed to retain his rank as bishop, but was confined to his own city, and forbidden to exercise any episcopal functions. The clergy ordained by him were, on submission to reordination, to be readmitted to communion, and to be allowed to exercise their ministry, but to rank after those who had received canonical ordination. These measures, however, were not fully successful, as Socrates and Theodoret, who wrote in the first half of the fifth century, both speak of the schism as being still in existence in their time. Soon after that period it must have died out. [Dict. of SECTS and HERESIES.]

MENÆA [Μεναῖον]. A Greek Office Book of the Eastern Church containing all the changeable parts of the Services used for the Festival Days of the Christian Year. It is usually arranged in twelve volumes, one for every month, but the whole is sometimes compressed into three volumes. The Menæa of the Eastern Church nearly answers to the Breviary of the Western Church, omitting, however, some portions of the Services which the latter contains, and inserting others which are not in the Breviary. [Zacchar. Bibliothec. Rit.; Neale's Eastern Church, 829.]

MENOLOGY. [MARTYROLOGY.]

MERIT. [CONDIGNITY. CONGRUITY.]

MESSIAH. [CHRIST.]

METAPHORICAL interpretation is included under the literal. A metaphor is an interchange of ideas, of which one is said to represent the other, without altering thereby the grammatical position or import of the sentence. Thus, Ps. cvii. 30, "He bringeth them into their desired haven," i.e. refuge. The process in the case of the trope (τροπός, in its literal sense), which, however, is included under the metaphor, differs as follows: In the metaphor what is sensible may be spiritualized—as "Ye are the salt of the earth;" in the trope, on the other hand, the more sensible, or, as it were, tangible expression is used in place of the abstract—as [1 Sam. ii. 33] "in the flower of their age," i.e. in their youth. [TROPOLOGICAL.]

METEMPSYCHOSIS. Metensomatosis, the term used by Irenæus [tom. i. p. 192, Cambr. ed.], expresses more accurately the idea of a transmigration of souls after death. The notion may be traced back to a remote antiquity; having taken its rise in the natural abhorrence with which the human mind recoils from the idea of a total annihilation of the soul by death. The analogy of nature also favoured it, "Mutat terra vices." In many systems, as in that of the Vedas, the Avesta, the Jewish Cabbala, and the Platonic theory, it marked a belief in the eternal preexistence of the souls of men. Nothing, it was held, can be created out of nothing, neither can any existent substance suffer annihilation. Therefore, when the union of body and soul was dissolved, a fresh sphere of action was found for the latter in other bodies, of which it was successively the animating principle. Wherever the notion occurs in the intellectual systems of antiquity, it may be traced back to India, or rather to Central Asia, from whence it was imported into the Punjab, and extended itself also in a westerly direction among the Aryan families of the human race. Thus when Asiatic hordes overran Egypt, and drove back the race of Ham, the notion obtained in Africa a local habitation. Herodotus [ii. 123] speaks of it as the ancient belief of Egypt; and there was no essential distinction between the Indian and Egyptian theories of transmigration. They are both based upon Pantheism. Life, of whatever kind, in the Indian theory, is an emanation from the one source of life. The material world is but Máyá, illusion; the aggregate of appearances with which Brahma invests himself are the embodiment of his thought; subject and object form one Brahma. Each individual life in this system is an associated ray of the light of the universe, and, as life, it continues to exist under an infinite succession of apparent form, whether human or brute, or even as vital principle in the vegetable and mineral world; for there is life in everything, and the moral fitness developed under one phase of life determines the contingencies of the next. Those who are gradually raised above the impurities of this state of existence approach more nearly to their liberation, and are rewarded in the end by the blessedness of annihilation in the mere glory of Brahma. The Pantheism of Egypt took a more concrete form, and Polytheism was there developed, which Greece adopted as the basis of her poetry and religion. Matter was believed to be a substantial reality; and the material form that was once united with spirit in the one being of man, was believed to maintain that connection so long as the material form remained. Hence the Egyptian practice of embalming the dead, to arrest the passage of the soul into other forms. The transmigration of the soul was in no sense held to be a purifying dispensation, but was the necessary consequence of its existence. The vital spark could not be quenched, but during three thousand years it passed through every form of life, until it resumed once more the human form, and passed away to the isles of the blessed [Herod. ii. 123]. The transmigration of souls was also a tenet of the Persian religion before the time of Zoroaster [Franck, Et. Or. 243], and was derived, with the language of the Avesta, from Indian sources. Pherecydes of Syros, who lived before the age of Zoroaster, taught the doctrine, and Pythagoras received it in Babylon from the Magi.

In the system of Plato it had a remedial function. Men of effeminate character reappeared as women in their next condition of trial. The slave of passion became the brute that he most closely assimilated; and as reason recovered its ascendancy, the first condition of humanity was regained [Phædr. 248, C. D. E. 249; Tim. 42. B. C.; see also Pindar, Ol. ii. 123]. From Babylon the Jews received the notion of transmigration, which they termed Gilgula hanneshamoth. [CABBALA.] Josephus [B. J. II. viii. 13] ascribes to the Pharisees a qualified belief in the metensomatosis of souls; the just being reinvested with a human body, the evil consigned to their place of punishment. They were half-instructed disciples who put the question to the Lord, "Master, who did sin, this man or his parents, that he was born blind?" renewed existence in this case being supposed to be penal.

It is not surprising that a notion adopted by Persia and Greece, and not ignored by Judaism, should have formed a distinctive tenet also of Gnosticism. Basilides, and Carpocrates [Iren. Cambr. ed. i. 207] both adopted it. It is doubtless to these heretical notions, rather than to any floating misbelief among primitive Christians, as Franck imagines [La Cabbale, p. 245, f.], that St. Jerome alludes, when he says that a belief in the transmigration of souls lurked in the early Church, "abscondite quasi in foveis viperarum" [Ep. ad Demetr.]. Lactantius also indicates the ravings of heresy when he says that it was "sententia deliri hominis" [vii. 12]. Origen, however, did not scruple to avow the tenet; a belief in the pre-existence of souls being necessary, as he imagined, to explain the apparent anomalies in the Divine government of the world; at the same time, however, he is careful to say that Plato was not the master that he followed, but that a far higher and purer doctrine was taught by him [π. ἀρχ. i. 7]. Yet it is certain that Plato, with whose writings he was intimately acquainted, gave the first impulse to his heterodox teaching as regards a metensomatosis of souls. The work in which these errors are mainly contained is the treatise περὶ ἀρχῶν, in four books. It was written as a confutation of the dualistic theories of Valentinus and Marcion, with whom evil was inseparable from matter and co-eternal with the principle of good. Origen sets himself, therefore, to account for the evil that abounds in the world on principles drawn from the philosophy of the schools, vindicating at the same time the fullest freedom of will for man. The Creator, he said, called into being a vast number of perfectly similar spirits, who, as being short of perfection, and free to act, fell more or less from the standard of purity according to which they had been created. They were therefore embodied in various disciplinal forms of matter, according to the ratio of their degeneration; thus they became angels of various rank, the souls of men and star spirits; for he held with Plato that the stars were animated with a soul of intellect, of which they are the beautiful prisons. Even the human soul of our Lord he declared to have been such a spirit, but on account of its highest excellence united inseparably with the Godhead. All other spirits are in a state of flux, improving or degenerating according to their own free choice, to whom the pains and sorrows of existence are all remedial; even the Spirit of evil is capable of improvement, and will at some time cease from his hostility to all good, when, his evil will having been annihilated, God will be all in all. But a Platonic ἀπειρία of long ages is required to work out these results; for as this world is the last of an infinite series of antecedent worlds, so is it the first of others that shall succeed; and as there never has been a time without an universe, so no limit can be imagined to the creative power of the Deity, and for long ages the purification of created spirits will be carried on in every varying form of existence. He states expressly, however, that a belief in the absolute eternity of matter is wholly atheistic [Comm. in Gen. περὶ ἀρχ. ii. 4. See Gieseler, K. Gesch. sec. 31; Fleury, H. Eccl. v. 54; Redepenning's Origen; Ritter, Chr. Phil. i. 465]. In Northern Europe the Druidical priesthood of the Celtic races [Cæs. B. G. vi. 14] made the transmigration of souls an article of the credenda of their religion, having adopted it in all probability from the continually westward flowing stream of Indo-Germanic population. In later days Herder and Lessing have spoken of the notion with a respect which it in no degree deserves.

METHODISM. This name was originally given to a movement for the revival of religion which was begun in the Church of England in the middle of the last century. The movement has ended in later times in the formation of several sectarian bodies, and the system of Methodism has ceased to have any organic unity with the Church in which it arose

I. Methodism as a Movement in the Church. Methodism is for ever associated with the name of John Wesley, whose strong will, unwearying industry, power of organization, great preaching ability, and, last but not least, personal excellence, enabled him to originate the system, and to guide its fortunes for more than half a century. He was one of three brothers, sons of the Rector of Epworth in Lincolnshire, who all received their education at public schools and at Christ Church. The eldest and youngest, Samuel and Charles, were Westminster scholars, and became students of Christ Church. John, the second of the three, was at Charter House School, and after taking his degree at Christ Church, became a Fellow of Lincoln College. He was born June 17th, 1703, being eleven years younger than his brother Samuel, and five years older than Charles. His life extended over nearly the whole of the eighteenth century, and he died at the great age of 88, on March 2nd, 1791.

John Wesley never held a cure of souls, having been ordained on his Fellowship, which he held from 1726 to 1751. In the latter year, at the age of forty-eight, he married a widow lady of some fortune, and with four children, and could, of course, hold his Fellowship no longer; but the nature of the work he had taken up quite precluded him from settling down in a parish;[1] and for the remaining forty years of his life he had no official connection with the Church, though constantly officiating within its walls. About the time that John Wesley became Fellow of Lincoln College he was also associated with an Oxford "Society for the Reformation of Manners," one of the many which then existed throughout the country. For a short time he became curate to his father, but on his return to College as tutor in 1727, he organized a small body of religious young men, who agreed to read together (Sunday evening being given to Theology), to visit the prisoners at the Castle,[2] and the sick poor in the city, to observe Wednesday and Friday as fast days, and to communicate frequently. The undergraduate persiflage of the day eventually fastened on this little community the name of Methodists, a name by which the Puritans were known early in the 17th century, and which was afterwards extended to all the communities founded by Wesley. For a time the religious zeal of John Wesley sought a field for its exercise in mission work, and the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel sent him to Georgia, one of our North American colonies, then in its early infancy. But his attempt to revive the ritual and discipline of the Church brought him into trouble, which was aggravated by the imprudent manner in which (whether rightly or wrongly) he refused the Holy Communion to a lady to whom he had been betrothed, but who had subsequently (after some misunderstanding with Wesley) married a Mr. Williamson. Hopelessly failing in his mission work, he returned to England in February 1737-8,[3] and it is from this time that the history of his religious revival begins.

Wesley's mind was not of the highest order, and he was entirely wanting in originality of thought, so that, being of an extremely warm and zealous temperament he was very susceptible of intellectual and religious bias from those with whom he came in contact. On his voyage to Georgia, and during his sojourn there, he had been much influenced by friendship and intercourse with the Moravians. Immediately on his return to England he met with a German named Peter Böhler, belonging to the same sect. From the Moravians he learned those ideas about assurance and instantaneous conversion which have ever since given their colour to Methodism, and some of the practical details of the system were borrowed from the same source. The first mention of these special doctrines is found in his account of his first landing in Georgia, in February 1736. "My brother," said Mr. Spangenberg, one of the Moravian pastors, "I must ask you one or two questions. Have you the witness within yourself? Does the Spirit of God bear witness with your spirit that you are a child of God?" "I was surprised," writes Wesley, "and knew not what to answer. He observed it and asked, 'Do you know Jesus Christ?' I paused, and said, 'I know He is the Saviour of the world.' 'True,' replied he, 'but do you know He has saved you?' I answered, 'I hope He has died to save me.' He only added, 'Do you know yourself?' I said, 'I do.' But I fear they were vain words." During the few weeks of Wesley's intercourse with Böhler, he was "clearly convinced of unbelief, of the want of that faith whereby alone we are saved with the full Christian salvation." The climax was reached in the "conversion" of his brother Charles, on May 21st, and of himself, on May 24th and 25th, 1738, his own "conversion" being completed during the afternoon service of the latter day, at St. Paul's Cathedral, when the choir were singing the anthem, "My song shall be alway of the loving-kindness of the Lord; with my mouth will I ever be shewing forth Thy truth from one generation to another." Three weeks afterwards, on June 13th, 1738, he and his brother went with some friends on a summer tour, during which they visited Herrnhut, the Moravian settlement near Mayence, where they arrived on August 1st. Remaining here for some weeks, he became familiar with the system of the Moravian sect. In September they returned to London, and both the Wesleys again began to preach about conversion and assurance as frequently as possible in every church to which they could get access.[1] Thus the Methodist movement was energetically set on foot in the form of what would, in more modern times, have been called a "mission," voluntarily undertaken by two English priests in the parish churches of London.

[1] The same circumstance made his married life extremely miserable, and even scandalous. He and his wife separated finally in their old age, about 1772, and Mrs. Wesley died in 1781.

[2] "They had prayers at the Castle most Wednesdays and Fridays, a Sermon on Sunday, and the Sacrament once a month" [Watson's Life of Wesley, p. 40].

[3] George Whitfield sailed to join his friend just as Wesley was landing in England, but he spent only three months in Georgia. Charles Wesley, who had accompanied his brother, returned in 1736.

A month later, on October 13th, 1738, Wesley wrote from Oxford to Dr. Koker at Rotterdam, "His blessed Spirit has wrought so powerfully both in London and Oxford, that there is a general awakening, and multitudes are crying out 'What must we do to be saved?' So that till our gracious Master sendeth more labourers into the harvest, all my time is much too little for them." This stage of Methodism he wrote of thus in the Minutes of Conference for A.D. 1765: "Q. What was the rise of Methodism so called? A. In 1729 my brother and I read the Bible, saw inward and outward holiness therein, followed after it, and incited others so to do. In 1737 we saw 'This holiness comes by faith.' In 1738 we saw 'We must be justified before we are sanctified.' But still holiness was our point, inward and outward holiness. God then thrust us out, utterly against our will, to raise a holy people" [Minutes of Conf. i. p. 50, ed. 1812]. This next stage may be also traced in his own words, written in the Minutes of A.D. 1766. "In November 1738, two or three persons who desired to flee from the wrath to come, and then seven or eight more, came to me in London, and desired me to advise and pray with them. I said, 'If you will meet on Thursday night, I will help you as well as I can.' More and more then desired to meet with them, till they increased to many hundreds. The case was afterwards the same at Bristol, Kingswood, Newcastle, and many other parts of England, Scotland, and Ireland. It may be observed the desire was on their part, not mine. My desire was, to live and die in retirement. But I did not see that I could refuse them my help and be guiltless before God" [Minutes of Conf. i. p. 58, ed. 1812].[2]

The "prayer meetings" thus established were supplementary to the Church services, and do not appear to have been held, at first, on Sundays. Those in London were principally held in a Moravian meeting-house in Fetter Lane, until Wesley and the Moravians quarrelled in 1740, but probably Wesley's own lodgings were also frequented for the purpose.

At the end of April 1739, Wesley went to Bristol to assist Whitefield, and two days after his arrival, on May 2nd, he adopted the plan of out-of door preaching, by means of which the latter had attracted such vast crowds around him. Ten days afterwards he laid the first stone of his first preaching-house, the "New Room," in the Horse Fair, Bristol, but before it was completed he had opened the "Foundry" in Moorfields (an old cannon foundry), for the same purpose; the house next door being taken for his own residence, which became the headquarters of his system. From this time preaching-houses began to increase in number very rapidly, and with them arose a definite organization of the Methodists into a body which they named "The United Society;" a name doubtless copied from the "Unitas Fratrum" of the Moravians. Wesley's own description of this is given in the Minutes for A.D. 1766. "In a few days, some of them said, 'Sir, we will not sit under you for nothing. We will subscribe quarterly.' I said, 'I will have nothing, for I want nothing. My fellowship supplies me with all, and more than I want.' One replied, 'Nay, but you want £115, to pay for the lease of the Foundry. And likewise, a large sum will be wanting to put it into repair.' On this consideration I suffered them to subscribe. And when the Society met I asked, 'Who will take the trouble of receiving this money, and paying it where needful?' One said, 'I will do it and keep the account for you.' So here was the first steward. Afterwards I desired one or two more to help me as stewards, and in process of time a greater number" [Min. of Conf. i. p. 59, ed. 1812].

The original purpose for which these preaching-houses were erected was that of providing places in which the Wesleys and their clerical coadjutors might preach at any time without requiring the permission of a parochial clergyman, and in which also the prayer meetings and other gatherings of the Society might be held. But while they increased in number Wesley's clerical coadjutors diminished instead of increasing in number, and thus a supposed necessity for lay-preachers arose, although, like most other developments of Methodism, lay-preaching was forced upon Wesley by others rather than designed by himself. He appointed John Cennick to take charge of his Kingswood Society, and Thomas Maxwell to undertake the same post at the

[1] In his journal he mentions seven in which he had preached between May 7th and 19th, 1738, and in the same year, he records that he had preached at St. Antholin's, St. Botolph's, Islington, and St. Clement's in the Strand, on one Sunday, October 29th.

[2] A very similar account of the origin of Methodism is given by Wesley in the "Rules," drawn up and signed by him and his brother, on May 1st, 1743.

Foundry. They were laymen, and were enjoined not to preach, though they were permitted to pray and expound the Scriptures in his own absence. While Wesley was at Bristol in 1741, Maxwell began to preach, without any authority from him, at the Foundry. At first he was very angry, hastening up to London to stop the innovation, but he soon resigned himself to the influence of others, and allowed the system of lay-preaching to be developed to any extent, provided the preachers were subject to his appointment and control.

Eventually the preaching-houses developed into chapels, which were looked upon as rivals instead of auxiliaries to the parish churches. The lay preachers also called themselves ministers, claiming to possess sacerdotal powers, and setting themselves up as rivals to the parish priests. Thus, the system which had originally been carried out by clergymen of the Church of England, was at last entirely changed through the admission of "lay-co-operation;" and as the original clergy died off, the lay-element entirely exterminated the clerical element from Methodism.

The intentions of Wesley in respect to the association of his revival movement with the Church of England, are shewn by many passages in his writings, and by the rules which he imposed upon his followers. "Do we separate from the Church?" was one of the questions asked in the first Conference, which was held in 1744. The answer was "We conceive not. We hold communion therewith, for conscience' sake, by constantly attending both the Word preached, and the sacraments administered therein" [Min. of Conf. i. 9, ed. 1812]. "In every place," say the Minutes of 1749, "exhort those who were brought up in the Church constantly to attend its service. And, in visiting the classes, ask every one, 'Do you go to church as often as ever you did?' Set the example yourself. And immediately alter every plan that interferes therewith. Is there not a cause for this? Are we not unawares, by little and little, tending to a separation from the Church? O remove every tendency thereto with all diligence. [1] Let all our preachers go to church. [2] Let all our people go constantly. [3] Receive the sacrament at every opportunity. [4] Warn all against niceness in hearing, a great prevailing evil. [5] Warn them likewise against despising the prayers of the Church. [6] Against calling our Society a church, or the Church. [7] Against calling our preachers ministers; our houses meeting-houses; (call them plain preaching-houses.) [8] Do not license them as such. The proper form of a petition to the judge is, 'A. B. desires to have his house in C. licensed for public worship.' [9] Do not license yourself, till you are constrained; and then not as a Dissenter, but a Methodist preacher. It is time enough, when you are prosecuted, to take the oaths. Thereby you are licensed" [ibid. p. 57].

Seventeen years afterwards, in 1766, the same strong protest was made against being thought Separatists. The question is asked, "Are we not then Dissenters?" And the answer, an unusually long one for the minutes, is as follows: "We are irregular:—[1] By calling sinners to repentance, in all places of God's dominion; [2] by frequently using extemporary prayer. Yet we are not Dissenters in the only sense which our law acknowledges: namely, persons who believe it is sinful to attend the service of the Church: for we do attend it at all opportunities. We will not, dare not, separate from the Church, for the reasons given several years ago. We are not Seceders, nor do we bear any resemblance to them. We set out upon quite opposite principles. The Seceders laid the very foundation of their work, in judging and condemning others. We laid the foundation of our work, in judging and condemning ourselves. They begin everywhere, with shewing their hearers, how fallen the Church and ministers are. We begin everywhere, with shewing our hearers how fallen they are themselves. And as we are not Dissenters from the Church now, so we will do nothing willingly which tends to a separation from it. Therefore let every assistant so order his circuit, that no preacher may be hindered from attending the church, more than two Sundays in the month. Never make light of going to church, either by word or deed. Remember Mr. Hook, a very eminent and a zealous Papist. When I asked him, 'Sir, what do you for public worship here, where you have no Romish sermon?' He answered, 'Sir, I am so fully convinced, it is the duty of every man to worship God in public, that I go to church every Sunday. If I cannot have such worship as I would, I will have such worship as I can.' But some may say, 'Our own service is public worship.' Yes, in a sense: but not such as supersedes the church service. We never designed it should. We have a hundred times professed the contrary. It presupposes public prayer, like the sermons at the University. Therefore I have over and over advised, Use no long prayer, either before or after sermon. Therefore I myself frequently use only a collect, and never enlarge in prayer, unless at intercession, or on a watch-night, or on some extraordinary occasion. If it were designed to be instead of church service, it would be essentially defective. For it seldom has the four grand parts of public prayer; deprecation, petition, intercession, and thanksgiving. Neither is it, even on the Lord's day, concluded with the Lord's Supper. The hour for it on that day, unless where there is some peculiar reason for a variation, should be five in the morning, as well as five in the evening. Why should we make God's day the shortest of the seven? But if the people put ours in the place of the Church service, we hurt them that stay with us, and ruin them that leave us. For then they will go nowhere, but lounge the Sabbath away, without any public worship at all. I advise, therefore, all the Methodists in England and Ireland, who have been brought up in the Church, constantly to attend the service of the Church, at least every Lord's day" [ibid. p. 57].

In 1768, also, the twelfth minute is, "Lastly, [1.] Let us keep to the Church. Over and above all the reasons that were formerly given for this, we add another now from long experience; they that leave the Church, leave the Methodists. The clergy cannot separate us from our brethren, the Dissenting ministers can and do. Therefore, carefully avoid whatever has a tendency to separate men from the Church. In particular, preaching at any hour which hinders them from going to it. Let every assistant look to this. [2.] Let all the servants in our preaching-houses, go to Church on Sunday morning at least. [3.] Let every preacher go always on Sunday morning, and, when he can, in the afternoon. God will bless those who go on week-days too, as often as they have opportunity" [ibid. p. 82]. In 1785, under the date of September 4th, he writes: "Finding a report had been spread abroad that I was going to leave the Church, to satisfy those that were grieved concerning it, I openly declared in the evening, that I had now no more thought of separating from the Church than I had forty years ago" [Wesley's Works, iv. p. 320]. Two years later, on January 2nd, 1787, he writes in his journal:—"I went over to Deptford, but it seemed I was got into a den of lions. Most of the leading men of the Society were mad for separating from the Church. I endeavoured to reason with them, but in vain; they had neither sense nor even good manners left. At length, after meeting the whole Society, I told them, 'If you are resolved, you may have your service in Church hours; but, remember, from that time you will see my face no more.' This struck deep; and from that hour I have heard no more of separating from the Church" [ibid. p. 357]. Respecting the Conference of 1789, he writes, about eight months before his death, "The Conference began: about a hundred preachers were present, and never was our Master more eminently present with us. The case of separation from the Church was largely considered, and we were unanimous against it." And among his very last words to his preachers were the fervid ones, "Be Church-of-England-men still. Do not cast away the peculiar glory which God hath put upon you, and frustrate the design of Providence, the very end for which God raised you up" [Armin. Meth. Mag. 1790, p. 234].

These extracts, and they might be greatly multiplied, are enough to shew that Wesley from the beginning to the end of his work, that is for more than half a century, believed himself to be labouring in close communion with the Church, and that he wished all his followers to continue in that communion. It may be added that he was never subjected to any ecclesiastical censure, that he had about twenty-five clergymen, beneficed and unbeneficed, as coadjutors, that he was kindly received by several of the bishops, that he often assisted in Divine service, that in the latter years of his life he had more invitations to preach in churches than he could find time to accept, and that the last entry in his journal is to the effect, that on October 24th, 1790, he had preached at Spitalfields Church in the morning, and at St. Paul's, Shadwell, in the afternoon.

It is evident, therefore, that the originator of Methodism regarded it, to the last, as an organization ancillary to the parochial system of the Church. It was viewed in the same light by many of his immediate followers, and the original rule as to the attendance at Church and the Holy Communion was observed by "old-fashioned Methodists" for thirty or forty years after the death of their founder. Had the rule been generally observed, and according to the intention of Wesley, Methodism would have brought a great blessing to the Church, and would have preserved a far higher character for spirituality than has belonged to it in later times.

II. The Schismatical Aspect of Methodism. But the system which Wesley established did, in fact, contain elements of schism from the very first, and his own acts cannot by any means be adjudged to be so clear from schism as he alleged, and probably supposed, them to be.

The very position which he assumed was essentially sectarian. Having been ordained on his Fellowship, and never being charged with any cure of souls, he acted throughout his life without that Mission which, in every branch of the Church Catholic, is considered essential to the pastoral office. He was charged with this want of proper jurisdiction in 1762 by (of all people in the world) "Beau" Nash, who being a social, if not a magisterial, leader at Bath, required Wesley to state on what authority he, as a clergyman of the Church of England, was acting when preaching there. "By the authority," replied Wesley, "of Jesus Christ, conveyed to me by the now Archbishop of Canterbury, when he laid hands upon me and said, Take thou authority to preach the Gospel" [Wesley's Works, xxvii. 88]. But, of course, ordination does not qualify a Fellow of a College to say (as he did on another occasion) "the world is my parish;" and Wesley garbled the quotation from the Ordination service by omitting the very important words "in the congregation, where thou shalt be lawfully appointed." He may never, perhaps, have seen a curate's license, and probably knew nothing about the form of institution to a cure of souls, but it is surprising that he should have given so false a turn to such solemn words, even with the knowledge which he did possess. He was originally misled, perhaps, by some words spoken by Archbishop Potter, whom he consulted in 1734, as to the duty of taking his father's benefice of Epworth, which the elder Mr. Wesley earnestly entreated him to do. "It doth not seem to me," said the Archbishop, "that at your ordination you engaged yourself to undertake the cure of any parish, provided you can, as a clergyman, better serve God and His Church in your present or some other station." At a later date his true position was more clearly put before him by Gibson, Bishop of London. "Are you a licensed curate?" asked the Bishop, when Wesley claimed a right to act on an ignorant and presumptuous opinion by rebaptizing Dissenters [Re-Baptism], and by preaching when and where he pleased. "No," replied Wesley, "but I have leave of the proper minister." "But do you know," said the Bishop, "that no man can exercise parochial duty in London without my leave? If any one does it, it is only sub silentio." "But you know," said Wesley, "that many do take that permission, and you yourself allow it." "It is one thing to connive," said the Bishop, "another to approve. I have power to inhibit you." "Does your Lordship exact that power? do you inhibit me?" "Oh! why will you push matters to an extreme?" was the gentle remonstrance; and the Bishop concluded by saying, "Well, Sir, you knew my judgment before, and you know it now."

At the first Conference of 1744, the question was asked, "In what view may we and our helpers be considered?" to which Wesley answers, "Perhaps as extraordinary messengers, designed by God to provoke others to jealousy" [Min. of Conf. i. p. 14, ed. 1812]. In 1785, he writes: "I exercised that power, which I am fully persuaded the great Shepherd and Bishop of the Church has given me" [ibid. p. 190], the particular power referred to being that of ordination. In 1790, he emphatically repeated to the preachers: "Ye were fifty years ago, those of you that were then Methodist preachers, extra-ordinary messengers, not going in your own will, but thrust out, not to supersede, but to provoke to jealousy the ordinary messengers." These statements, made at the interval of half a century, shew clearly what plea Wesley used in justification of his conduct. But the plea was an evasion of the truth. For such an extraordinary mission could only be conveyed by some supernatural communication of it from the Chief Bishop, in Whose power alone it is to give it; and Wesley never stated, nor does he seem to have believed, that he had received such a communication. It was his impression, or opinion, or persuasion, that he had an extraordinary mission; but if such a persuasion is to have weight, without any further evidence, the whole principle of Apostolical Succession is given up, a principle which—in the case of others—Wesley urged very strongly.

Excellent man as he was in many respects, there can be no doubt that Wesley fell into the grievous error of becoming a schismatic priest, and that his work failed in attaining a true hold upon the Church in a large measure through this original and fundamental defect. Whether that work could have been done at all in subjection to the system of the Church is a question on which it would be useless to speculate.

In the early stages of Methodism its founder was able to control, in some degree, the impatience with which his lay agents regarded the restrictions laid upon them. But as we have seen, they forced him to permit them to preach as early as 1741, and lay-preaching became from that time a conspicuous feature of his system.

At a later date Wesley gave permission to the preachers to use the Book of Common Prayer in the preaching houses, as he explains in a paper dated from Bristol, on July 22nd, 1786: "Perhaps there is one part of what I wrote some time since which requires a little further explanation. In what cases do we allow of service in Church hours? I answer, [1] When the minister is a notoriously wicked man; [2] When he preaches Arian, or any equally pernicious doctrine; [3] When there are not churches in the town sufficient to contain half the people; and [4] When there is no church at all within two or three miles. And we advise every one who preaches in the Church hours, to read the Psalms and Lessons, with part of the Church prayers: because we apprehend this will endear the Church service to our brethren, who probably would be prejudiced against it, if they heard none but extemporary prayer" [Min. of Conf. i. p. 191, ed. 1812].

This permission was further extended by the Minutes of 1788, when it was ordered that "The assistants shall have a discretionary power to read the Prayer Book in the preaching houses on Sunday mornings, where they think it expedient, if the generality of the society acquiesce with it; on condition that divine service never be performed in the Church hours on the Sundays when the Sacrament is administered in the parish church where the preaching house is situated, and the people be strenuously exhorted to attend the Sacrament in the parish church on those Sundays" [ibid. p. 208].

Before he died, Wesley heard his lay-preachers (more logical than himself) clamouring for permission to administer the Lord's Supper in the preaching houses; as had been done by Wesley himself and by other Methodist priests in impatient resistance to the unjust conduct of some of the clergy in refusing the Holy Communion to those of their people who were enrolled as Methodists. Wesley preached and published a sermon on the subject just before his death, in which is the following passage:—"In 1744, all the Methodist preachers had their first conference; but none of them dreamed that the being called to preach gave them any right to administer Sacraments; one of our first rules was given to each preacher: 'You are to do that part of the work which we appoint.' But what work was this? Did we ever appoint you to administer Sacraments? To exercise the priestly office? Such a design never entered into our mind; it was farthest from our thoughts; and if any member had taken such a step, we should have looked upon it as a palpable breach of this rule, and consequently as a recantation of our connexion. I wish all you, who are vulgarly termed Methodists, would seriously consider what has been said, and particularly you whom God has commissioned to call sinners to repentance. It does by no means follow hence, that you are commissioned to baptize and to administer the Lord's Supper. Ye never dreamed of this for ten or twenty years after ye began to preach; ye did not then, like Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, seek the priesthood also; ye knew no man taketh this honour unto himself, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron. Oh, contain yourselves within your own bounds."

This indignant remonstrance was, however, much weakened in its force by the fact that Wesley had not "contained himself within his own bounds." In 1784, he had gone through the mock ceremony of ordaining "elders or presbyters" for America, and of giving to Dr. Coke and Mr. Asbury commissions as "superintendents," which they understood in the sense of consecration to the Episcopate; they and their successors, to the present day, calling themselves "Bishops."[1] It is not surprising, therefore, to find that Wesley's remonstrance had little effect. At the next Conference after he had been laid in the grave, that is in 1792, the following odd document was the result of the continued agitation:—"To the Members of our Societies, who desire to receive the Lord's Supper from the hands of their own Preachers.

"Very dear Brethren,—The Conference desire us to write unto you, in their name, in the most tender and affectionate manner, and to inform you of the event of their deliberations concerning the administration of the Lord's Supper.

"After debating the subject time after time, we were greatly divided in sentiment. In short, we knew not what to do, that peace and union might be preserved. At last one of the senior brethren (Mr. Pawson) proposed that we should commit the matter to God by putting the question to the lot, considering that the Oracles of God declare, that 'the lot causeth contentions to cease, and parteth between the mighty:' and again, that 'the lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord:' and considering also that we have the example of the Apostles themselves, in a matter which we thought, all things considered, of less importance.

"We accordingly prepared the lots; and four of us prayed. God was surely then present, yea, His glory filled the room. Almost all the preachers were in tears, and as they afterwards confessed, felt an undoubted assurance that God Himself would decide. Mr. Adam Clarke was then called on to draw the lot, which was, 'You shall not administer the Sacrament the ensuing year.' All were satisfied. All submitted. All was peace. Every countenance seemed to testify that every heart said, 'It is the Lord, let Him do what seemeth Him good.' A minute was than formed according to the previous explanation of the lots, that the Sacrament should not be administered in our Connexion for the ensuing year, except in London. The prohibition reaches the clergy of the Church of England as well as the other brethren.

"We do assure you, dear brethren, we should have been perfectly resigned, if the lot had fallen on the other side. Yea, we should, as far as Christian prudence and expediency would have justified, have encouraged the administration of the Lord's Supper by the preachers; because we had not a doubt but God was uncommonly present on the occasion, and did Himself decide. Signed, in behalf of the Conference, ALEXANDER MATHER, President. THOMAS COKE, Secretary." [Min. of Conf. i. 262, ed. 1812.] This was followed up at the next Conference, in 1793, by two other addresses, dated from Leeds, on August 6th and 8th; in which, while professing that "we have no design or desire of making our societies separate churches," and "we have never sanctioned ordination in England, either in this Conference or in any other, in any degree, or ever attempted to do it;" the point demanded was granted, on the ground that if the preachers were not permitted to administer the Lord's Supper the societies would be broken up [ibid. 278-282]. Since that time "ordinations" have been long adopted, and in 1836, the ceremony of imposition of hands was introduced, in imitation of Catholic ordinations.

From this narrative it will be seen that a schismatical position has been definitely and deliberately adopted by the Methodist Societies, and that they have superseded the Episcopate, the Priesthood, and the Altar, of the Church from which they originally sprang, by a Presbyterian ministry, and by an ordinance which, in the absence of a priesthood, is only a human imitation of the divinely instituted Eucharist.

At the time of Wesley's death, in 1791, the Methodist Society numbered 136,000, in England, Ireland, Scotland, America, and the West Indies. In England there were about 58,000, viz., 35,000 in the Northern Counties, 12,000 in the West of England, 3,000 in London, and 8,000 distributed over the remaining parts of the country. Four-fifths of the whole number, therefore, were in the North and the West of England. In an early stage of their history a large body had followed Whitefield, and became Calvinistic Methodists. Since Wesley's death his own followers have been broken up into several sects. For further details respecting these, and the original community in its sectarian form, the reader is referred to the Dict. of SECTS and HERESIES.

MIDRASH, from the verb "darash," to make research, means that thoroughgoing "investigation" which a subject receives from the teacher (Haddarshan), that it may be placed in a clear light before the taught. Wherever the word occurs in the Hebrew Bible it does not mean an indefinite search for that which may or may not exist, but "research" with respect to that which is ready to hand, but the nature of which cannot be known without careful pains: such as the works of God, His Will, Law, Commandments, &c. The term Midrash is founded on the use of the verb in Ezra vii. 10: "Ezra had prepared his heart to seek [lid' rosh] the Law of the Lord, and to do it." Thus, in apparent allusion to this text, the Talmud says "Midrash is not the chief matter, but action" [Aboth. i. 17]. It is the Hebrew equivalent for "story" [2 Chron. xii.

[1] It is right to state that a very well-informed personal friend of Wesley wrote as follows, when severely criticizing Southey's Life of Wesley, in 1820: "I blame Mr. Wesley's conduct respecting the Church of England, toward the close of his life at least, as much as Mr. Southey himself; yet sure I am the poor old man was utterly unconscious of duplicity or prevarication. If Mr. Southey had known as much of those transactions as even I had happened to do, he would as much as ever have condemned the conduct, but he would have pitied the otherwise venerable person, who was thus mysteriously permitted to be the dupe of his own weakness and of other men's arts." [Remains of Alex. Knox, iii. p. 470, ed. 1837.]

23, xxiv. 27]. Thus the word may be considered to represent the act of study, exposition, and any book that contains the result of such study, the body of such exposition. The Midrash-house was the rabbinical school of instruction. It was by means of this Midrash, or research into the hidden meaning of the written Word, that the Law was made binding on the whole inner life of Judaism, in all its complicated interests and conditions. It dates in its most simple form perhaps from a Mosaical antiquity. It was more fully developed after the Captivity by Ezra, the men of the Great Synagogue, and the Tanaite series of teachers that was foreclosed on the compilation of the Mishna, in which its results as authoritative HALACOTH were embodied. "What is the essence of the Mishna?" the Talmud asks in its usual catechetical way; "Rabbi Meir affirms it to be Halacoth, or Mosaical constitutions; Rabbi Jehuda says that it is Midrash" [Kiddushin, 49 A.]. But Midrash as an entirety is not comprised in the Talmud. It expressed any and every ancient exposition on the Law, Psalms, and Prophets; disquisitions that took the form of allegorical illustration, homiletics, or practical commentary. The Talmud enjoins that a blessing be invoked before every act of study of Midrash as well as of Torah and Talmud [Berachoth, ii. 6]. Midrash was the source of light Haggadic narrative as well as of the authoritative Halacah [HAGGADAH. HALACAH]; and the innumerable commentaries and figurative expositions of the sacred text all go by the same generic name; which may thus be said, in its most general meaning, to express the whole uncanonical Jewish literature, including Mishna and Gemara, or Talmud, down to the compilation of the book Jalkuth in the thirteenth century. From that time the term gradually ceased to be applied to rabbinical writings. Midrash therefore is venerable from its antiquity. Modern Judaism presumes not to give it further development. Exposition now assumes the name of D'rasha. [Zunz, Gottesd. Vortr. d. Jud.; Jost.]

MILLENNIUM. The prophetic period of a thousand years spoken of in Rev. xx. 1-7.

The Millenarians, or Chiliasts, accepting this prophecy literally, hold, that after the destruction of the powers symbolized by the beast and the false prophet, Satan will be "bound," i.e. his power will be suspended for the period of a thousand years, or for the period represented by a thousand years; that there will be a first resurrection of martyrs, and of those worthy to share the martyr's crown; that for the thousand years these will live and reign with Christ on earth, in free communion with the heavenly powers; that after this will be the general resurrection. There are on both sides many shades and varieties of teaching, but the crucial point is that of the first and second resurrection. Some undoubted Millenarians (e.g. Mede) assert a glorious Presence of Christ, but not the "visible converse" of a personal reign; and the accepting as literal, instead of explaining as metaphorical, the first resurrection stands as the test of Chiliasm.

The doctrine of the Millennium is of Jewish origin. "The idea of a kingdom of Christ upon earth, which should endure for a thousand years, passed from Judaism into Christianity" [Dollinger, Hist. by Cox, i. p. 194]. "Though the ancient Jews had no distinct knowledge of such an order in the resurrection as first and second, but only of the resurrection in gross and general, to be in die Judicii magni, yet they looked for such a resurrection, wherein those that rose again should reign some time upon earth, as appeareth, Wisd. iii. 1-8" [see also 2 Esdras ii., the interpolation of a Jewish Christian]. "This opinion is here and there also dispersed in the Chaldee paraphrase and in the Talmud, as of ancient tradition. . . . In fine, the second and universal resurrection, with the state of the saints after it, now so clearly revealed in Christianity, seems to have been less known to the ancient Church of the Jews than the first, and the state to accompany it" [Mede, Works, ii. 943]. The opponents of Chiliasm, Jerome in particular, commonly raised the objection that Chiliasm was Judaizing. By Judaizing they appear to have meant interpreting the prophecies in a carnal sense. But Judaizing, in the sense of carrying on into the later dispensation the divine truth of the earlier dispensation, is not an objection to any proposed doctrine, but rather a necessary mark of its truth. What doctrine of Christianity was not prepared for and ushered in by Judaism?

There are very distinct proofs of belief in a Millennium among the early Christians, but these seem to indicate rather that this prophecy of the Apocalypse (in which culminated such prophecies of the Old Testament as Isa. xxvi. 19; Ezek. xxxvii. 12; Jer. xxiii. 5-8; Dan. vii. 27), was generally received in its literal meaning, than that Chiliasts were mere Judaizers. Papias,[1] Justin,[2] Irenæus,[3] Tertullian,[4] Nepos,[5] Victorinus,[6] Lactantius,[7] Cyprian,[8] are among the best known authorities, but other testimonies might be quoted, and may readily be found in Lardner's Credibility, and Cave's Historia Literaria. Papias, "John's hearer, and the associate of Polycarp," is indeed commonly said to have been the author of Millenarianism. "He was the cause," writes Eusebius, "why most of the ecclesiastical writers urging the antiquity of the man, were carried away by a similar opinion; as, for instance, Irenæus." But, as Maitland [Eruvin, p. 170] pertinently asks, How could respect on the score of antiquity be felt by Irenæus, who was Papias' contemporary. "The truth, I believe is," continued the same writer, "that it was not the antiquity of the man, but the antiquity of the doctrine which prevailed." To the general prevalence of the doctrine, Justin's testimony is express and full,[1] and may, with that of the other authorities referred to, be summed up by a reference to the Formula Doctrinæ, Διατύπωσις, of the Council of Nicæa,[2] which says, "We look for new heavens and a new earth, when there shall have shone the appearing and kingdom of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ: and then, as Daniel saith, the saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom. And the earth shall be pure, holy, the earth of the living, and not of the dead (which David foreseeing with the eye of faith, exclaims, I believe verily to see the goodness of the Lord in the land of the living), the earth of the gentle and lowly. For, blessed, saith the Lord, are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth: and the prophet saith, the feet of the poor and needy shall tread it." [Gelasius Cyzicenus, Comment. Actorum Nic. Concil.; De Diatyposibus Ecc. Sermo Dogmaticus, cap. xxxi. viii.; De Providentia Dei, p. 42; and in the Greek original which follows the Latin, p. 44. See also the chapter De Resurrectione.]

It is easy to see that this doctrine of the Millennium is very open to perversion and misrepresentation. The new heavens and the new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness are naturally, perhaps inevitably, described in the old prophetic language of temporal felicity, and such language is easily perverted so as to imply sensuality. There can be no doubt that some, perhaps many, held the doctrine in a carnal sense, but it is a misrepresentation to attribute that sense to such writers as, e.g. Irenæus. His well-known passage [v. 23] regarding vines with ten thousand branches, &c.[3] is in fairness to be interpreted by prophecies such as Isa. vi. 2, lxv. 21, Baruch iv. 36, and v., and by our Lord's words, Matt. xxvi. 27, with which he connects it, as also by his own words, "Through Him shall the righteous become accustomed to partake in the glory of God the Father, and shall enjoy, in the kingdom, intercourse and communion with the holy angels, and union with spiritual beings." So Lactantius' familiar words "rivers of milk and wine,"[4] borrowed from the old descriptions of the reign of Saturn, are explained by what follows: "Quæ vaticinia eorum cum paulatim fama vulgasset, quoniam prophani a sacramento ignorabant quatenus dicerentur, completa jam esse veteribus sæculis illa omnia putaverunt; quæ utique fieri complerique non poterant homine regnante." [Lactant. vii., De vita beata, cap. 23.] Augustine, moreover, speaking of the sensual ideas of some Millenarians, distinctly adds that others did not hold such a carnal beatitude; that he himself once held the opinion of the latter, and that to hold their opinion was tolerable. He then proceeds: "Sed cum eos qui tunc resurrexerint dicant immoderatissimis carnalibus epulis vacaturos in quibus cibus est tantus et potus, ut non solum nullam modestiam teneant, sed modum quoque ipsius incredulitatis excedant, nullo modo ista possunt nisi a carnalibus credi. Hi autem qui spiritales sunt istos ista credentes χιλιαστὰς appellant Græco vocabulo, quod verbum e verbo exprimentes nos possumus Miliarios nuncupare" [De Civ. xx. 7].

Coming then to the opposition which was offered to the Millenarian opinions of the early Chiliasts, we have to consider, first, whether the arguments of their opponents are really directed against the correct doctrine, or only against the perversion of the doctrine; secondly, whether the opponents of the doctrine, as correctly stated, may not have been led by the spirit of controversy to mix up the correct statement with the perversion. Thus Origen "attacked severely the doctrine of a Millennium." His words [De Principiis, ii. 11] are (after speaking against the notion of corporeal delights): "Those, however, who receive the representations of Scripture according to the understanding of the Apostles, entertain the hope that the saints will eat indeed, but that it will be the bread of life. . . . By this food of wisdom the understanding is restored to the image and likeness of God, so that . . . the man will be capable of receiving instruction in that Jerusalem, the city of the saints." But these words are not inconsistent with the notion of a life, although a life on earth, in which the spirit will be so superior to the body, that the righteous shall enjoy intercourse and communion with the holy angels, and union with spiritual beings. Origen was the first, so far as we know, who opposed the doctrine of a Millennium. His work [De Principiis], just now quoted, was written at Alexandria, probably, i. e. before A.D. 216. In the reign of Gallienus [A.D. 260-268], "Nepos, a bishop in Egypt, taught that the promises given to holy men in the Scriptures should be understood more as the Jews understood them, and supposed that there would be a certain Millennium of sensual luxury on this earth" [Euseb. Hist. Ecc. vii. 24, Cruse's transl.]. He composed a work, Refutation of the Allegorists; Dionysius of Alexandria answered him in a work, On the Promises. Dionysius' words that "Nepos asserts there will be an earthly reign of Christ, that in many other respects he accords with and loves Nepos, on account of his faith and industry, and See, for what may be said in favour of a different conclusion from his words, Whitby's Treatise, vol. ii. of his Commentary.

[2] This is at least a very early statement of Nicene doctrine, and was probably taken by Gelasius Cyzicenus from the older writings which were the foundation of his history.

[3] Whitby writes [Treatise, p. 691] that he is informed by some learned persons that the words cited by Irenæus from Papias are to be found in Jewish writings.

[4] The significance of milk and honey was as familiar to the ancients as that of wine is to us. "Inde [from the Font] suscepti lactis et mellis concordiam prægustamus." [Tertul. De Corona, p. 121; Rigault.]

his great study in the Scriptures," compared with the title of Nepos' book, make it probable that the "sensual luxury" is merely a flourish or misrepresentation of Eusebius, and that Nepos only advocated a reign of Christ upon earth. Even of the Millenarians of Arsinoe, whom we may well suppose to have been less spiritual in their conceptions than Nepos himself, Dionysius says only that they persuaded the brethren "to expect what is little and perishable, and such a state of things as now exists in the kingdom of God." This does not amount to a promise of sensual luxury. Augustine's statement is that Nepos taught "sanctos cum Christo in delitiis regnaturos." He had just before reported of Tertullian and Lactantius that they agreed with Papias in looking for that "quod ad cibum vel ad potum pertinet." We may suppose the deliciæ of Nepos to be equally innocent.

The controversy is much embarrassed by the constant reference made to heretics. This begins with Caius' report of Cerinthus [Eusеb. Hist. Eccl. iii. 28 and vii. 25]. Mosheim has shewn the utter improbability of Caius' accusation, that Cerinthus promised a Millennium of sensual luxury [Mosheim's Commentaries by Vidal, i. p. 341, note]. He states that to prior ages the accusation was utterly unknown—that no doubt it originated with Caius and Dionysius, who with a view to suppress the doctrines of Chiliasm, made it appear that Cerinthus was the author of it; and, further, that he was a distinguished patron of vice and iniquity. Professor Jeremie writes, "The Millennium was also held by the Marcionites," &c. [Encyc. Metrop. xi. 161, note.] It was held by the Montanists, and it is said that there is no trace of the doctrine in Tertullian's works before he became a Montanist. But there is no proof whatever that he received the Millenarian doctrine on the authority of the new prophecy.[1] In all these cases the question is not whether heretics held the doctrine, for they may have retained it as a part of the truth which their heresy did not lead them to deny; but whether the heresy was so connected with the doctrine, that in the condemnation of the former the latter is also condemned. Of all such cases, the most important (next to that of Cerinthus), is that of Apollinaris; because a supposed condemnation of Millenarianism in the person of Apollinaris by a Council at Rome [A.D. 374] has greatly influenced the Church of Rome in rejecting the teaching of the early Fathers. The words of that council, however, as given in Mansi, contain not a word regarding this doctrine: nor is there anything in the heretical tenets of Apollinaris to connect them with the doctrine.[2]

But that Chiliasm is a doctrine liable to be seized and perverted by fanaticism is very clear, as the later records of the Church too largely shew; and when fanaticism was added to heresy it is probable that the doctrine suffered accordingly. Whether it suffered in the hands of the Montanists in general does not appear. The asceticism of Montanus would forbid his advocacy of a sensual Millennium; and certainly the doctrine did not suffer in the hands of Tertullian.

The liability of this doctrine to perversion made peculiarly necessary the wise reserve which our Lord commands [Matt. vii. 6], and the exercise of such reserve is perhaps to be discerned in Origen's words, as quoted by Whitby, "They were only some that held this doctrine, and that so clancularly, that it had not yet come to the ears of the heathen" [Philocalia, c. xxvi. p. 99]. The absence of Millenarian doctrine from the writings of the Apostolic Fathers may be probably accounted for by this consideration. It seems, further, as if this reserve had extended to the Apocalypse itself, and caused in some degree, the lateness of its reception by the Church, with the doubts concerning its author. For the most part they who rejected Millenarian doctrine rejected or doubted the Apocalypse, as Dionysius, Eusebius, Caius: Origen and Jerome being distinguished exceptions. "Lücke suggests, in explanation of the omission of the Apocalypse from the canon by the Synod of Laodicæa, that possibly the churches of Asia Minor, especially that of Cappadocia, had excluded the Apocalypse from public reading in the Church, on account of the countenance which it had been made to give to the errors of Montanism" [Alford, Proleg. to Rev. viii. 1].

After the period we have been considering, little is heard of Chiliastic doctrine in the Church. The agitation at the end of the tenth century was a panic arising from the notion that the thousand years of Rev. xx. were to be dated from the birth of Christ, that Satan was therefore about to be loosed for his final effort, and that the day of Judgment was at hand; but such a notion is quite contrary to the doctrine of Chiliasm, the essence of which is the reality of the first resurrection. The popular belief of the time would have thrown that first resurrection to the date of our Lord's birth.

From time to time advocates of Chiliastic doctrine appeared: and one author mentioned by Gerhard [Loci Theolog. tom. ix.; De Consummatione Sæculi, cap. vii. sec. 76, p. 164] should be noticed, because his book Onus Ecclesiæ, A.D. 1524, was published in the Roman obedience "cum approbatione superiorum."

But it was the fate of the doctrine to be again brought into discredit through its perversion by fanatics. The Anabaptists proclaimed the coming reign of Christ on earth, and by their hideous excesses and crimes destroyed whatever chance there was at the Reformation for a calm consideration of the doctrine. Against the Anabaptists was directed the 17th clause of the Augustan Confession, A.D. 1531, "Damnant et alios, qui nunc spargunt Judaicas opiniones, quod ante resurrectionem mortuorum, pii regnum mundi occupaturi sint, ubique oppressis impiis." The Anathema was repeated in nearly the same words in 1540, with the addition, "Scimus enim quod pii debeant obedire præsentibus magistratibus," &c. [Sylloge Confess. 1837, pp. 128, 176]. The authors of Socinianism, Spiritus of Holland and Lælius Socinus, appear to have sprung from the Anabaptists: and the Anabaptist perversion of Millenarian doctrine in some degree passed into Socinianism. The course and extent of its influence is traced in Gerhard, and need not be followed here.

In England, Millenarian doctrine singularly appears in Edward VI.'s Catechism, 1553 [Randolph, Euch. Theol. i. p. 34, Two Liturgies and Documents, Parker Soc. p. 520]. "Antichrist is not yet slain. For this cause do we long for and pray that it may at length come to pass and be fulfilled, that Christ may reign with His saints according to God's promises: that He may live and be Lord in the world, according to the decrees of the Holy Gospel, not after the traditions and laws of men, nor pleasure of worldly tyrants." "Atque vivat et dominetur in mundo" is the Latin. So [Rand. p. 22, Two Lit. p. 510] there is also described the purification by fire of the whole world, which shall then be brought to its full perfection. "The lesser world, which is man, following the same, shall likewise be delivered from corruption and change. And so for man this greater world (which for his sake was first created) shall at length be renewed, and be clad with another hue, much more pleasant and beautiful. Master. What then remaineth? Scholar. The last and general doom. For Christ shall come: at Whose voice all the dead shall rise again," &c.

Two causes would combine to suppress this teaching, the recurrence to Romish doctrine under Mary, and the discredit cast (however erroneously) on the doctrine of the Millenarians by the Anabaptists. In like manner, the excesses and rebellions of the Fifth Monarchy men would in later times tell against the teaching of Mede and his scholars. One other discredit to Millenarian doctrine is the weakness which leads so many to affix a date to the Millennium, a weakness seen not only in men whose names have passed into a proverb for their rash and presumptuous interpretations of the Apocalypse, but even in such a theologian as Bengel, who named the year 1836 for the commencement of this period [Hagenbach, Hist. Doct. ii. 462; Clarke's transl.].

In conclusion, the reader is referred to Alford's Note on Rev. xx. 4-6, asserting the necessity of accepting St. John's words regarding the first resurrection in their literal sense, not according to the spiritual interpretation now in fashion. "If the first resurrection is spiritual then so is the second, . . . but if the second be literal then so is the first, which in common with the whole Primitive Church, and many of the best modern expositors, I do maintain, and receive as an article of faith and hope." [C. Maitland's Apostles' School of Prophetic Interpretation. 1849.]

MINOR ORDERS. [ORDERS, MINOR.]

MIRACLES. The events denoted by this term are designated in the New Testament as δυνάμεις (expressing the objective idea of the miracle), as τέρατα (the subjective), as σημεῖα (the signs of the Divine Kingdom)—[see Acts ii. 22; 2 Cor. xii. 12]. Miracles, together with Prophecy, are the direct and fundamental proofs of revealed religion; they alike supply, with special energy, the "demonstration of the Spirit, and of power" [1 Cor. ii. 4]—the one in the department of action, the other in that of knowledge. What is commonly called "the supernatural" includes both. Now the only distinct meaning of the word natural is stated, fixed, or settled, "since what is natural as much requires and presupposes an intelligent agent to render it so, i.e. to effect it continually, or at stated times, as what is supernatural or miraculous to effect it for once."[1] A miracle, accordingly, in its very notion, "is relative to a course of nature; and implies somewhat different from it, as being so;"[2]—it results from the exercise of a power which is not included among the ordinary forces of nature. On this admitted fact, Hume's famous argument against miracles rests; and from this same fact the answer to that argument may be derived. "A miracle," writes Hume, "is a violation of the laws of nature; and as a firm and unalterable experience has established these laws, the proof against a miracle, from the very nature of the fact, is as entire as any argument from experience can possibly be imagined."[3] In order to maintain this position, the objector must assume that no power exists in the universe except that with which the abstraction termed nature is endowed. Such a supposition, however, denies the existence of an Author of nature. Admit, on the other hand, that an Author of nature—that God—exists, and it is irrational[4] to deny the possibility of His intervening in order to vary nature's ordinary course, whatever opinion may be held as to the probability of such an intervention. Hume erroneously defines a miracle to be "a violation of the laws of nature." The laws of nature "are not violated when a new antecedent is followed by a new consequent; they are violated only when, the antecedent being exactly the same, a different consequent is the result."[5] The assertors of a miracle do not contend "that when the extraordinary event which they term miracu-

Having described "the general method of divine administration," Bishop Butler thus replies to the objection, "'But all this is to be ascribed to the general course of nature.' True, this is the very thing which I am observing. It is to be ascribed to the general course of nature; i.e. not surely to the words, or ideas, course of nature; but to Him who appointed it, and put things into it: or to a course of operation from its uniformity or constancy called natural; and which necessarily implies an operating agent" [ib. ch. 2].

[4] "What ground of reason," asks Mr. Mozley [Bampton Lectures, On Miracles, p. 39], "can we assign for our expectation that any part of the course of nature will the next moment be like what it has been up to this moment, i.e. for our belief in the uniformity of nature? None. . . . No reason can be given for this belief. It is without a reason. It rests upon no rational ground and can be traced to no rational principle."

lous happened, the previous circumstances were the same as at other times when no such event was consequent. . . . On the contrary, they contend that the difference of the effect, as proved by the evidence of their senses, or of indubitable testimony, in the same way as the truth of any other rare phenomenon is established, implies an extraordinary cause." In this reasoning, the truth of the first principles of Theism is assumed; and, on this assumption, the evidence of the Deity's asserted agency, in any particular instance, is to be regarded in the same manner as the evidence of any other extraordinary event that is supposed to have resulted from any other new combination of physical circumstances. We cannot surely think ourselves justified in rejecting that evidence "because the physical power to whose agency the extraordinary event is supposed to bear witness, is the greatest of all the powers of nature."[1] The force of this reasoning is thus pointed out by Mr. J. S. Mill: "A miracle (as was justly remarked by Brown) is no contradiction to the law of cause and effect; it is a new effect, supposed to be produced by the introduction of a new cause. Of the adequacy of that cause, if present, there can be no doubt; and the only antecedent improbability which can be ascribed to the miracle, is the improbability that any such cause existed."[2]

Mr. Mill suggests a difficulty of another kind. No evidence, he observes, can prove a miracle to any one who did not previously believe the existence of a Being possessed of supernatural power; and, even admitting the existence of such a Being, the alternative of an unknown natural agency remains; for, with the knowledge which we now possess of the general uniformity of the course of nature, there is an antecedent improbability in every miracle. The supposition of an unknown natural agency, at which Mr. Mill here hints, is a favourite one with those who love to taunt theology with an undue jealousy of physical science. And yet, what little force this objection really possesses will appear manifest on considering an acute remark of Dean Mansel: "In whatever proportion our knowledge of physical causation is limited, and the number of unknown natural agents comparatively large, in the same proportion is the probability that some of these unknown causes, acting in some unknown manner, may have given rise to the alleged marvels. But this probability diminishes when each newly discovered agent, as its properties become known, is shewn to be inadequate to the production of the supposed effects, and as the residue of unknown causes which might produce them becomes smaller and smaller."[3] The progress of physical science, in fact, enables the Christian apologist to retort this argument against miracles, founded on the assumption of "an unknown natural cause."

In order to establish the fact of a miracle, there is required, as stated above, either the evidence of the senses or of trustworthy testimony. The nature of this proof is set forth in the usual treatises on the evidences of Christianity; let it suffice here to indicate the fallacy latent in another well-known argument of Hume. "No testimony," he asserts, "is sufficient to establish a miracle, unless the testimony be of such a kind that its falsehood would be more miraculous than the fact which it endeavours to establish. And even in that case there is a mutual destruction of arguments, and the superior only gives us an assurance suitable to that degree of force which remains after deducting the inferior." The weakness of this reasoning has been thus pungently exhibited by Archbishop Whately: Hume's "argument respecting miracles stated clearly and in regular form would stand thus:—Testimony is a kind of evidence very likely to be false. The evidence for the Christian miracles is testimony; therefore it is likely to be false. Now, it is plain that everything turns on the question whether what is meant be all testimony, or some. The former is what no one in his senses would maintain. . . . But if the meaning be some testimony, this is true enough, but involves a gross fallacy: '[some] testimony is likely to be false; and the evidence for the Christian miracles is [some] testimony,' proves nothing."[4]

From what has been said it appears that it is impossible even to comprehend the general argument against all miracles, except on the principles of the Atheist, or, one may add, the Epicurean. It may be at once admitted that if there is no God, or if He regards not the affairs of men, there can be no miracle; and it is on assumptions such as these, although seldom avowed, that the opposition to miracles has mainly been founded.

St. John [chap. x. 37, 38] records the saying of Christ: "If I do not the works of My Father, believe Me not. But if I do, though ye believe not Me, believe the works." But why, it has been often asked, is the word of a teacher believed to be of Divine authority, because he is enabled to work a miracle? It is because we have a natural conviction that all the attributes of God are inseparably united; or rather, that our notions of His attributes are only different ways of conceiving the Supreme Excellence, Whom we cannot represent to ourselves in that perfect oneness which belongs to His nature. This principle irresistibly leads us to think that whenever the power of the Creator is displayed, His Wisdom and His Goodness must also be present, and that the worker of a miracle must have been commissioned by God.[5] [PROPHECY, SUPERNATURAL.]

MISHNA. The term Mishna expresses the traditional exposition of the Law, compiled by Judah the Holy, and completed about A.D. 219.

Various derivations of the term have been given. That supplied by the Rabbinical Lexicon, Shulchan Aruch, is probably the true one, referring the name to the word "Sheni," "second." The Mishna, or Oral Law, תּוֹרָה שֶׁבְּעַל פֶּה, being second to the Written Law, תּוֹרָה שֶׁבִּכְתָב. Mishna is distinct from Mishneh, which signifies a copy [Josh. viii. 32]. The Mishna had its origin in traditional glosses upon the Law; and its compilation became a matter of necessity when Judaism in the dispersion assumed a cosmopolitan character. The Midrashim that were developed after the Captivity, embracing Haggadic narrative and Halacic constitutions [HAGGADAH. HALACAH], represented a body of traditional exposition of high authority, which increased rapidly and required the life-long study of a numerous body of Sopherim, or Scribes, to digest and hand on without loss to succeeding generations. There was danger that the Jews of the dispersion would depart from their ancestral laws and customs. Their altered relation also, as inhabitants of regions so different from the climate of Palestine, rendered some modification of the letter of the Law necessary, if its spirit was to be observed; and a vast increase of expository matter was, from this cause, added to the already bulky decisions and placita that had been handed on by word of mouth from one generation to another. The Temple service being lost, the synagogue became the centre of the Jewish system; it was at once a place of worship, a judgment-hall, and a school. The plan had this advantage, that wherever Jewish families settled down they could carry with them their religion and hedge themselves in from the world without. The tabernacle in the wilderness was not more completely "stained with the variation of each soil," than were the newly developed applications of Mosaic principle, that were struck out by the Jews in adapting themselves to the different climates under heaven. While the Temple yet stood, the gift of tongues on the first Pentecost of the Christian Church declared how wide had been the people's wanderings. These were indefinitely increased on the final submerging of the Jewish polity. The necessities of one locality were not those of another; Babylon and Sora, Pumbeditha and Nehardea involved different social conditions from Alexandria and Rome, Corinth and Asia Minor. If the Law had been a body of dogmatical teaching its application would have been equable and universal; but it was essentially a system of observance, consisting of principles of action domestic and religious, varying of necessity with the believer's habitat. All this accumulated experience and results, flowing in from every quarter, met together in the Mishna and Talmud, and were marked with every variety of social condition, language, and habits, through contact with humanity in every phase of its existence. Traditional principles received from the very foot of Sinai may, even in their origin, have been as the echo of antecedent tradition, reaching yet further back to Abraham the friend of God, and to the very cradle of the human race, when the traditions of paradise had not wholly died away. The Jews claim a Sinaitic origin for the Hilkoth of the Wise. And it may be observed, that in a certain sense our Lord appealed to such tradition in answer to the Sadducæan deniers of the resurrection. The resurrection of the dead was a doctrinal Halacah deduced from the designation of the Most High as the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, the God of Jacob, i.e. not the God of the dead but of the living. The Talmud declares that Abraham, by a prolepsis of obedience [Gen. xxxvi. 5], observed the whole Law in every minute particular [Kedushin, close of Mishna]. Portions of his observance in ritual matters were very possibly reflected in the Law. Thus traditional matter in some form accumulated from the earliest times; and by a later constitution it was forbidden to commit these dicta to writing; partly that they might not be confounded with the inspired Word, partly because the keen intellects of the Great Synagogue feared the narrow and cramped spirit of a written exegesis, and preferred leaving freedom of action to successive doctors. A certain degree of elasticity was thus preserved to oral tradition, and the possibility of progressive improvement was guaranteed. The faulty would die out, the sound would be retained, and become the centre for fresh hermeneutical and judicial ramification. Necessity at length compelled the use of parchment and ink, for the world that should be possessed by the seed of Abraham was being gradually subdued to the Church of Christ. If the tide was to be breasted, some strong bond of union must be created, some principle that might penetrate Judaism through and through, and give it the spirit as of one man, and in every position of doubt and difficulty speak to the sons of Abraham in their hearts—"This is the way, walk ye in it."

Tradition that had proved so sure a principle of union in the Schools must now be extended out for the benefit and safeguard of the whole people, and thrown around as a shield to protect them. There was sufficient reason of old for the injunction that tradition should be preserved memoriter; but it was no longer in operation. The purpose had been answered, and a mass of traditional decisions and expositions of Scripture had accumulated that was beyond the grasp of the most tenacious memory; all that was of value must be put on record or it would perish; onward growth was no longer desirable, if only the rich legacy of the wise might be retained. Simon ben Gamaliel, the father of Jehuda the Holy, had added to the digest of HILLEL matter that had since grown up, and Jehuda early in life followed in his father's steps, and lived to see the completion of the Mishna [A.D. 219], for which the way had been so intelligently pioneered. Hillel, grandfather of Gamaliel the instructor of St. Paul, had digested the traditional Halacoth under eighteen heads; these Jehuda rearranged under six Sedarim [Juchasin, 56 A; Seder Haddoroth, 91 c]. With Jehuda the series of Tanaim, or "reiterators" of oral tradition, closed, having commenced with Simon the Just, born B.C. 180. Tradition having now been fixed in a written form, its teachers were termed "Amoraim," or "spokesmen;" the Amora's duty under the Tanaim having been to repeat the Tana's utterances to the class as Methurgeman, or interpreter. The earlier elements of the Mishna are indicated as the "words of the Soferim;" but the relics of every age are thrown together in very much the same kind of admired confusion as the salvage of a fire or the waifs of a wreck. So much of it as related to the Temple service was already overdated, and a mere object of antiquarian interest. A knowledge of the Mishna soon reached the Christian Fathers, by whom it was termed δευτερώσεις. Jerome first mentions it [Ep. ad Algas. qu. 10]; "I cannot declare how vast are the traditions of the Pharisees, or how anile their myths, called by them δευτερώσεις [Mishnaioth]; neither would their bulky nature permit the attempt; moreover, many of them are so vile that I should blush to produce them." Epiphanius also says, but with a dislocation of text [Hær. xv. Jud.; also Hær. xiii. 26]: "The Jews have had four streams of those traditions that they term δευτερώσεις—the first bears the name of Moses the Prophet; the next they attribute to a teacher named Akiba; the third is fathered on a certain Andon or Annon, whom they also call Judas [Hannasi]; and the sons of Apamonæus [Asamonæi] were the authors of the fourth." So, too, Augustine, writing shortly before the date of the Jerusalem Talmud, says, "Beside the Scriptures of the Law and the Prophets, the Jews have certain traditions belonging to them, not written but retained in memory, and handed down from one to another, named δευτερώσεις" [c. Adv. Leg. et Proph. ii. 1]; and again [b], "Deliramenta Judæorum ad eas traditiones quas δευτερώσεις vocant pertinentia." The Fathers could hardly have remained ignorant of a movement that had been made, as Maimonides says [pref. Zeraim], with the express purpose of checking the further growth of Christianity. MISSA. [MASS. LITURGY.]

MISSA CATECHUMENORUM. That portion of the ancient liturgies at which Catechumens were permitted to be present. It consisted of the Prefatory Prayer, the Hymn, the Little Entrance, the Trisagion, the Epistle and Gospel, and the Prayers after the Gospel. Before the Great Entrance, or Procession of the Elements to the Altar, all the Catechumens were obliged to leave the Church, with such words of dismissal as those used in the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom, "As many as are Catechumens depart; Catechumens depart; as many as are Catechumens depart; let none of the Catechumens remain." The Catechumens being still unbaptized, it was not considered fitting that they should witness the actual celebration of the Holy Eucharist, though they were permitted to take part in the earlier prayers of the Liturgy, and to hear the reading of Holy Scripture. [CATECHUMENS. DISCIPLINA ARCANI. Bona, Rer. Liturg. i. 16.]

MISSA FIDELIUM. A term for the latter part of the Liturgy, as distinguished from that portion at which alone Catechumens were allowed to be present. [MISSA CATECHUMENORUM.]

MISSA PRÆSANCTIFICATORUM. A Eucharistic Office, in which the Great Oblation is made and Communion administered with Elements consecrated at a previous celebration.

The forty-ninth canon of Laodicea [A.D. 314, according to Baronius and Leo Allatius; A.D. 352, Brun; A.D. 367, Johnson; about A.D. 363, Gieseler, q.v.] states that bread ought not to be offered during Lent, save on the Sabbath-day and Lord's-day. The fifty-second canon of the Council in Trullo, or "Quinisext" [A.D. 692], renews this canon, and orders the use of the rite of the Presanctified every day in Lent, except on Saturday, the Lord's-day, and the Feast of the Annunciation.[1] The present practice of the Eastern Church accords with this regulation, excepting that the Liturgy of St. Basil, not of the Presanctified, is said on Maundy Thursday and on Easter Eve. [Neale, Hist. of East. Church, part I. chap. vii. p. 713.] The present rite is called, from a not very certain reason, from Pope St. Gregory the Great. It may be seen in Goar's Euchologium, and, translated, in Neale. [See also in Renaudot, Liturg. Or. Collectio, I. p. 76, ed. 1847, "Alia apud Ægyptios ex Liturgia Præsanctificatorum Apostoli Marci post perceptionem sanctorum mysteriorum."] For the rite itself, the reader must be referred to these books, as its essentials only will be given here, as stated by Neale, who says that, technically speaking, the office of the Presanctified is merely an addition to the usual Vespers.

In the Prothesis of the Sunday preceding, when Reservation is to be made, the priest, having as

[1] The authority of the Trullan Canons becomes of great importance in reference to this subject. Jenkins (Margaret Professor, Cambridge, chaplain to Bishop Lake, Nonjuror) wrote on this point: "The Greeks maintain against the Latins that this Council was general; they allege that the Pope's legates were present and subscribed its canons, which the Pope himself indeed afterwards refused to do; but the Council styles itself General; and if want of the Pope's approbation could hinder it from being so, it was sometime before the fifth could deserve that title, however it came by it at last; but the greatest fault of this Council in Trullo is, that it approves and confirms the second canon of Constantinople and the twenty-eighth of Chalcedon, in which the Latins are καιρίως πληττόμενοι, as Balsamon observes. However, the one hundred and two canons of this synod are cited in the second Council of Nice. And Adrian I., in his epistle to Tarasius, says that he receives the sixth Council, with all its canons, by which he can mean no other but this; for the sixth, as it is distinguished from this, made no canons. Nicholas I., in an epistle to Michael, the Greek Emperor, says that they were confirmed by Pope John VII. at the request of Justinian II., whom that Pope commends there as a most holy Emperor; besides, Gratian attributes them to the sixth Council, and so does the Council of Florence. All which was so convincing to Carranza, that he sets them down as the canons of the sixth General Council, and after him Sylvius chose rather to distinguish and refine upon the thirty-sixth canon, than to reject them all. Angelus Roccha says plainly it was a continuation of the former synod, not a new one, since both were subscribed by the same bishops, as he proves out of the second Council of Nice." [Histor. Examin. of Authority of Councils, 1688, p. 14.]

usual cut and stabbed the first loaf, cuts also the other loaves, saying for each, "In remembrance," &c., as in the usual office. Then he pours forth wine and water in the holy chalice. When he is about to sign the loaves, he speaks in the singular, "Make this Bread," because Christ is one. He elevates all the loaves together, and breaks the first loaf of the oblations, and puts the portion in the holy cup, and pours in the warm water as usual. Then taking the holy spoon in his right hand, he dips it in the holy Blood; and in the left hand he takes each loaf, by turns, and holding the holy spoon that has been dipt in the holy Blood, he moves it crosswise on the part where the cross has been made on the crumb, and puts it away in the artophorion." So with the other loaves of reservation. In the rite itself, after the prayers and responses of the three antiphons, "while the troparia are being sung, the priest goes to the holy prothesis, and taking the presanctified bread from the artophorion, puts it with great reverence on the holy disk, putting also wine and water,[1] after the accustomed manner, into the holy chalice, and saying, not the Prayer of Prothesis, but only, Through the prayers of our Holy Father, Lord, God, Jesu Christ, have mercy upon us. For the sacrifice is presanctified and accomplished." After the Cathisma, &c., the Little Entrance takes place without the Gospel. Then the prayers of the Catechumens; and the prayers of the Faithful, in the second of which is, "Behold at the present time His spotless Body and quickening Blood entering in, and about to be proposed on this mystic table, invisibly attended by the multitude of the heavenly host." Then is sung the hymn, "Now the heavenly powers invisibly minister with us: for, behold, the King of Glory is borne in. Behold the Mystic Sacrifice, having been perfected, is attended by angels: with faith and love let us draw near that we may become partakers of life eternal." After which, the Great Entrance is made, but instead of the prayer of the Cherubic Hymn, the fifty-first Psalm is said. After the entrance, the deacon saith, "Let us accomplish our evening supplication unto the Lord. For the proposed and presanctified gifts, let," &c. In the following prayer occur the words, "Look down on us who are standing by this holy Altar as by Thy Cherubic Throne, on which Thine Only-Begotten Son and our God is resting in the proposed and fearful mysteries." After further prayers, "the priest, the divine gifts being covered, stretches out his hand and touches the quickening blood with reverence and great fear: and when the deacon saith, Let us attend, the priest exclaims, Holy things presanctified for holy persons. Then having unveiled them, he finishes the participation of the divine gifts. And the Communion being finished, and the holy things that remain taken away from the holy table, the concluding prayers are made."

In the controversy regarding this rite between Cardinal Humbert and Nicetas Pectoratus, the only matter of real liturgical interest appears to be Humbert's objection, that a double oblation is made of the same thing, first in the liturgy in which it is consecrated, next, in that in which it is received. Neale denies the existence of the second oblation. "The mere fact of the Great Entrance," he writes, "without any formal oblation, and simply considered, does not involve of necessity a sacrifice." It is a bold thing to differ from Neale in a province he made his own: but we must venture to express an opinion, that the prayer following the Great Entrance, of which some words have been given, especially when compared with the words preceding the Entrance "about to be proposed," are, to all intents and purposes, the Anamnesis, or Memory of the Sacrifice, or Sacrifice which constitutes the Greater Oblation. Let the reader weigh the words above quoted. The Oblation is not formally repeated, but there is a Presentation before Almighty God of the holy Body and Blood. Is not the true case this,—that the reserved Elements, while unconsumed, are a perpetual oblation "in Memoriam," and that the only repetition is the recurrence of the worshippers to the attitude of offerers, which attitude had been interrupted? To this theory there can be no theological objection. It should also be considered, whether the act of Communion does not require the communicant to join in the Oblation. From this consideration, and the example of the Eastern rite, we may conclude that reservation carries with it the capacity of use for making the Oblation, though rather as a continuation of the original Oblation than as a separate action.

Leo Allatius, in his tract on this rite [at the end of his work, De Eccl. Occ. et Or. Perpetua Consensione], names several variations. One is on the point just mentioned: "Alii sustollebant Præsanctificata. Alii non exaltabant, sed tantum modo tangebant" [1595]. Another important variation is, "Constantinopolitanus Præsanctificatum panem sanguine non tingit; cæteri tingunt" [1593]. Again, as to the times when the rite is used, "Alii, prima et secunda primæ jejuniorum hebdomadis feriis, Præsanctificata non celebrant; alii celebrant" [1594].

In the Roman Church, the omission of consecration is limited to Good Friday and Easter Eve. The Missal Rubric for "Feria v. in Cœna Domini" is, "Hodie Sacerdos consecrat duas Hostias,[1] quarum unam sumit, alteram reservat pro die sequenti, in quo non conficitur Sacramentum: reservat etiam aliquas particulas consecratas, si opus fuerit, pro infirmis: sanguinem vero totum sumit: et ante ablutionem digitorum ponit Hostiam reservatam in alio Calice, quem Diaconus palla et patena co-operit, et desuper velum expandit, et in medio Altaris collocat."

On Good Friday the reserved Host is brought

[1] This wine is not consecrated, but merely used to facilitate the administration of the Eucharist. The "lamb" itself has been, so to speak, imbued with the consecrated wine in the liturgy of the preceding Sunday; so that the communicants, though they apppear to receive under one kind, do in fact receive in both species. The case is the same for administering the Holy Eucharist to the sick. [INTINCTION.]

[1] In the Sarum rite three Hosts were consecrated.

in procession to the altar, after the Adoration of the Cross, while the hymn is sung, "Vexilla Regis prodeunt." "Cum venerit Sacerdos ad altare, posito super illud calice, genuflexus sursum incensat et accedens deponit Hostiam ex calice super patenam quam diaconus tenet: et accipiens patenam de manu diaconi, Hostiam sacram ponit super corporale, nihil dicens. . . . Interim diaconus imponit vinum in calicem et subdiaconus aquam, quam Sacerdos non benedicit, nec dicit super eam orationem consuetam: sed accipiens calicem a diacono ponit super altare nihil dicens: et diaconus illum co-operit palla." After censing the oblations and the altar, the priest, turning to the people, says as usual, "Orati fratres ut meum ac vestrum sacrificium acceptabile fiat. . . . Tunc celebrans . . . supponit patenam Sacramento, quod in dextera accipiens elevat ut videri possit a populo: et statim supra calicem dividit in tres partes, quarum ultimam mittit in calicem more solito, nihil dicens. Pax Domini non dicitur nec Agnus Dei, neque pacis osculum datur." The priest's prayer before reception follows:— "Et sumit Corpus reverenter." "Deinde omissis omnibus quæ dici solent ante sumptionem sanguinis, immediate particulam Hostiæ cum vino reverenter sumit de calice." "Quod ore sumpsimus," &c.[1] "Non dicitur Corpus tuum Domine, nec Post Communio, nec Placeat Tibi, nec datur Benedictio: sed facta reverentia coram altare sacerdos cum ministris discedit: et dicuntur Vesperæ sine cantu: et denudatur altare."

The principle upon which these regulations regarding Lent are founded is that the Eucharist is a feast, and the Consecration Service proper only for festivals. The Sabbath as well as the Sunday was a stated feast in the early Church, and the Western Church received the Laodicæan canon; but in later times in the Roman obedience Saturday has been held a fast. Yet Socrates [E. H. v. 21] tells us that at Rome they fasted three weeks before Easter, excepting Saturdays and Sundays.[2]

The "Missa Præsanctificatorum" is of such early date and so general, that one cannot but wonder it has not been authoritatively adopted by the English Church. The infrequency of Communion on Good Friday has probably, in great measure, originated from a sense that consecration is on that day contrary to primitive practice. A statement of the position in which the Church of England actually stands with reference to both will be found in Blunt's Annotated Book of Common Prayer, in the notes for Good Friday.

MISSA SICCA. The recital of the Ordinary of the Mass without the Canon, there being neither consecration nor communion.

The rite is described and commented upon by Durandus, Rationale, IV. i. 23; Durantus, De Ritibus, II. iv.; Bona, Rerum Liturg. I. xv. 6; Martene,[3] De Ant. Eccl. Ritibus, I. iii. 1; Bingham, Antiq. XV. iv. 5; Neale, Eastern Church, I. vii. 4. The earliest mention of this abuse made by these writers is its condemnation in the Capitulars of Charlemagne [Neale], that is, in A.D. 805: the leading example is its practice by St. Louis, who died A.D. 1270. Durantus says that the book "Liber Sacerdotalis," in which this rite is described, was approved by Leo X.: and finds the Missa Sicca in the passage of Socrates, Hist. v. 22, where Leo Allatius finds the rite of the Presanctified. The more learned Roman theologians of the sixteenth century condemned this abuse, and Bona states its general suppression. Neale, however, says that it was common in Belgium as late as A.D. 1780. The rite was never in use in the East, except in Egypt.

Neale has charged the Church of England with deliberately retaining the "Missa Sicca," but this charge is without foundation. There is an essential difference between the use of the Eucharistic hymns, without which the rite could hardly be called a Missa, and the use of the prayer for the Church militant only, made real, as far as can be, by the offering of alms. The English custom is not an approval of abstaining from Communion, such as certainly was more or less implied in the Missa Sicca, but a practical illustration of the words of the priest's exhortation, "I for my part shall be ready," and a protest against the remissness of the people.

MISSAL. An Office book of the Western Church, containing the Liturgy, that is, all which is required for the celebration of the Mass, or Missa, the fixed "Ordinary" and "Canon," with the changeable Introits, Collects, Epistles, Gospels, &c. The Missal is a development of the ancient Sacramentaries, the form which the book of the Liturgy took in the Western Church, and which was revised by St. Leo, Gelasius, and St. Gregory. Up to the time of the Reformation, there had been much variation in the Missals of the Church, those of the Anglican rite being known by the names of the Sarum Use, Hereford Use,

[1] But this practice of the priest's communicating alone is not earlier than the tenth century. See Annot. Book of Com. Prayer, p. 101.

[2] In Leo Allatius' Tract. ch. xii. col. 1570-7, may be seen the authorities of the Greek theologians and ritualists.

[3] From Martene's statements one is inclined to suspect that the "Missa Sicca" began with communicating in one kind, and even then was so called. For he gives the order of the "Missa Sicca" for a sick man, from a Pontifical eight hundred years old, which having prescribed the prayers to be used, proceeds: "Postea communicet eum. Sequitur oratio post Communionem." Martene's next example is of a mass for strangers coming to a church where there is no priest prepared to celebrate: "Sacerdos dicit missam, non tamen dicit canonem, nec consecrat: sed ostendit eis reliquias alias loco elevationis Corporis Christi." This is properly a Missa Sicca; the former is a Communion of reservation in one kind. Martene allows that when the sick received the Eucharist, presently after its celebration, and when they had sufficient strength remaining, they received in both kinds [I. v. 2. See also Whitby, Demonstration, &c., touching Communion in one Kind, 1688, p. 97]. If the Reservation in one kind for the sick was the original Missa Sicca, it will account for the mistake which even some theologians appear to have fallen into of confounding the Missa Sicca with the Missa Præsanctificatorum, especially as there was sometimes the presence of the Host, but no communion by its means.

Lincoln Use, Bangor Use, &c. The tendency to reform, condensation, and uniformity which then shewed itself in respect to the Liturgy of the English Church, gained some ground also in the Continental Churches. A decree of the Council of Trent, followed up by a bull of Pius V. in A.D. 1570, restricted this liberty to churches which had possessed local or independent liturgies for at least two centuries previously, requiring the use of the Roman Missal in all other cases. This had never been used in the Church of England, nor was it used by the Roman sect in England until forced upon it by the Jesuits in the end of the sixteenth century.[1] The Roman Missal was revised under Clement VIII. in 1604, and again in 1634, under Urban VIII. [LITURGY.]

MISSION. An indispensable qualification in the clergy for the lawful exercise of their function and ministry [Rom. x. 15]. It is the power given to bishops and ministers of the Church to preach and administer the Sacraments. Our Lord Jesus Christ gave His commission to the Apostles when He said, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost" [John xx. 22]. This has been transmitted to bishops, and the power to confer it resides in them alone; and this they do as they themselves have received by ordaining pastors, and sending them forth to fulfil the duties of the sacred ministry. It is delegation by one who has authority thereto of another to exercise the ministry of the Church, in preaching the Gospel and administration of Sacraments. It is sometimes called Vocation, and is the base of the Christian edifice [Rom. x. 15].

There are two kinds, 1. Immediate or Extraordinary; 2. Mediate and Ordinary. In the first, persons are called directly by God its Author, as were Apostles, the Seventy Disciples, St. John Baptist, St. Paul [Acts ix. 17; Rom. i. 1; Gal. i. 12], and St. Barnabas [Acts xiii. 2]. The second is a call mediately by authority committed to the ordainers from the Apostles; an ordinary vocation, the communication of spiritual power. It is made by superiors and prelates, as by Titus [Tit. i. 5] and Timothy [1 Tim. i. 3; 2 Tim. ii. 10, 15], yet those who were thus called are said to be appointed by the Holy Ghost [Acts xx. 28].

Ordinary, or mediate mission, which is the very same as ordination, has God for its Author, but is transmitted by those who have received it by an uninterrupted succession in the Catholic Church, from the Apostolic times to the present day, as proved by ancient tradition and historical evidence; and in unison with the divine promise of her Divine Founder. The extraordinary, which is mediately from the Church and its ministers, is done after an unusual and extraordinary manner, either in respect of the ministers or of the forms, or of the rites and ceremonies used in it. At the extraordinary call of St. Paul and St. Barnabas, fasting, prayers, imposition of hands, and the celebration of the Liturgy [Acts xiii. 2, 3] were observed.

The original power of giving holy orders, and all authoritative mission, is from our Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of the harvest, who sends forth His labourers [Matt. ix. 38], the Giver of faithful pastors to His Church [Eph. iv. 11], constituting them ministers and stewards of His Word and Sacraments for His household the Church [1 Cor. iv. 1], and His ambassadors [2 Cor. iv. 7, v. 20].

He has committed a ministerial power to His Church to ordain, by the imposition of the hands of bishops, fit persons to serve in His sacred ministry, whereby the grace of holy orders is derived from Him to them by a line of perpetual succession. "God bestoweth episcopal grace by man, man lays on hands, God grants grace; the priest imposes his suppliant right hand, and God with His strong right hand bestows the blessing; the bishop initiates the order, God giveth dignity" [Pseudo-Ambros. De Dign. Sacerd. c. v., Op. tom. ii. app. 363].

The bishop, being a ministerial, not an authoritative agent, confers holy orders, but has no power to revoke them; he can restrain or suspend their canonical exercise only where he has actual jurisdiction over the person suspended, and where he acts with a just sentence.

For the actual and lawful exercise of that habitual power which is conferred by ordination, according to the constitution of places or societies, nomination, presentation, election, confirmation, collation, installation, institution, or a "congé d'élire" are necessary. But the essentials of holy orders, and a calling or commission to preach and minister the Word and Sacraments, are previously indispensable to their existence. [JURISDICTION. MISSIONS. The history of Christian missions is, to a large extent, the history of Christian Churches, and cannot be told at any length in a work of so condensed a character as the present volume. It will, however, be useful to many readers to have a compact sketch of the course which the missionary work of the Church has taken since Apostolic times, and especially of the manner in which the Church of England has carried out its responsibilities towards the vast Empire that has been gathered under the authority of the English Crown.

[I.] EARLY MISSIONS OF THE CHURCH. These may be traced back nearly to the time when the peace of the Church was established throughout the Roman Empire by the accession of Constantine.

Ulphilas and the Goths. In the year 348, a lately converted Christian of the name of Ulphilas, or Ulfilas, was consecrated missionary bishop at Constantinople, for the purpose of spreading Christianity among his countrymen. He was then thirty years of age, and had not long before been driven away from the country north of the Danube by the heathen. He was very active in converting the Goths, and when a great number of them had been compelled to cross the Danube by persecution, he led them to Nicopolis in Mœsia, which had been assigned them as their dwelling-place by the Emperor Constantius II. in A.D. 355. Afterwards the leader of the Visigoths, their persecutors, was himself converted, and assisted Ulphilas in carrying on his work of conversion among his people, when they had settled down in Thrace. Ulphilas was the first to translate the Holy Scriptures into any "barbarian" tongue, his Gothic version still existing in a fragmentary form, with the Gospels entire. For the purpose of this translation he is said to have invented the Gothic alphabet, the language not having previously been a written one. The four Books of Kings were omitted from his version for fear of encouraging the warlike habits and fierce spirit of a people who needed more the bit than the spur. Ulphilas died in A.D. 388, at Constantinople, where his zeal and his imperfect knowledge of orthodox theology suggested to St. Chrysostom the establishment of a missionary college for training up a Gothic ministry.

St. Patrick and Ireland. The first certain information about Christianity in Ireland is associated with a mission conducted by Palladius, who had been sent thither by Pope Celestine in A.D. 431, and who had died before much fruit had been produced by his labours. He was followed by St. Patrick, the son of a Scottish deacon, who arrived in Ireland (according to Dr. Todd) about A.D. 440. He spent half a century in the missionary work to which he had been appointed, founding the see of Armagh, building some hundreds of churches, baptizing twelve thousand persons with his own hands, and ordaining a great number of clergy. When he died in A.D. 493, he left a flourishing church, with a settled episcopate and priesthood, in a country which he had found in an entirely heathen condition; and no church was ever more zealous than the early Church of Ireland in sending forth missionaries to other lands. Within half a century after the death of St. Patrick, the monastery of Iona was founded by St. Columba in one of the islands of the Hebrides, already Christianized by St. Ninian, who preached among the Southern Picts from A.D. 412 to A.D. 432. From hence, and from the monasteries in Ireland itself, many zealous missionaries were sent among the uncivilized tribes of Germany and Northern Europe.

St. Augustine and the Saxons of England. Towards the end of the sixth century [A.D. 595] St. Gregory (who had himself undertaken a mission to England, but was obliged to withdraw from it on being elected to the See of Rome) originated the famous mission of St. Augustine, which ended in the foundation of the Archbishopric of Canterbury. Christianity had long before been planted, and dioceses organized, in England, but the invasion of the Saxons had driven it into the mountainous districts of the West, and the enslaved English who remained among the Saxon conquerors had been able to do nothing towards their conversion. Augustine re-established the Church in the conquered districts, and by the conversion of King Ethelbert brought about the conversion of the great body of his people; though it was long before the newly-founded churches of the Roman missionaries were amalgamated with the ancient and primitive native churches. A similar mission was sent out by Justus, the third of St. Augustine's successors, to the Northumbrians, when Paulinus was consecrated as a missionary bishop for England north of the Humber. He baptized King Edwin at York on Easter Day, A.D. 627, in a small wooden church which was the beginning of the great cathedral afterwards erected there.

Early Missions to India. Among the early mission-fields of the Church, there is no doubt that we must reckon India. St. Thomas, the Apostle, is said to have passed over from Arabia Felix and the Isle of Socotra to Cranganore on the western coast of India, where a large colony of Jews resided, to have founded the Church there and in other parts of India, and even China, being at last martyred at Mailapoor, now a suburb of Madras. Pantænus is also said to have organized a mission to India from Alexandria late in the second or early in the third century. In the first half of the fourth century, St. Athanasius consecrated, as a missionary bishop, a Tyrian named Frumentius, who, having been taken captive to India in his youth, had risen to high office in the government of some unknown kingdom there; and remembering the Christianity of his youthful days, consolidated some churches on the coast, and went to Alexandria to seek the Episcopate for further work in his adopted country. Early in the sixth century Cosmas, an Alexandrian merchant, wrote, "There is in the island of Taprobane [Ceylon] in the farthermost India in the Indian seas a Christian church with clergy and believers. I know not whether there are any Christians beyond this island. In the Malabar country, where pepper grows, there are Christians, and in Calliana, as they call it [Callianee, near Bombay], there is a bishop who comes from Persia, where he was consecrated" [Kaye's Christianity in India, 9]. In the ninth century there seems to have been a mission to India even from England, for, under the year 883, the Saxon Chronicle says that Swithelm and Athelstan carried "to India, to St. Thomas and St. Bartholomew, the alms which the King had vowed to send thither when they sat down against the army at London." Swithelm was Bishop of Sherburn, but nothing further is known of his mission to India: and of the Church there little more is known until it was visited by the Portuguese in the sixteenth century.

English and Irish Missions to Germany. About the same time that St. Augustine was beginning his mission to England, an Irish monk named Columbanus was extending Christianity into the kingdom of Burgundy, where he founded monasteries and introduced the customs of his mother Church. His zeal eventually offended King Theodoric II., who banished him from the country, when he carried on similar labours among the populations around the lake of Constance, and afterwards founded the famous Irish monastery of Bobbio in a valley of the Apennines. After his death in A.D. 615, his work was taken up by St. Gall and St. Kilian, the latter of whom was martyred at Wurzburg in A.D. 689, while Christianity was fast extending its borders by means of their labours in Switzerland, Suabia, and Franconia. The remonstrances of St. Columbanus and St. Gregory aroused the Frankish Churches to co-operate with the labours of the Irish missionaries, and Eustasius was appointed to succeed Columbanus at Luxeuil, whence he sent a mission to Bavaria. This was followed by that of Rupert, Bishop of Worms, who eventually founded the great See of Salzburg, from which the Church was extended throughout Bavaria and Carinthia. In Northern Germany, or Friesland, Amandus had established many monastic centres of Christianity early in the seventh century: and his work was followed up by that of Eligius, or St. Eloy, and that of the English Bishops Wilfrith [A.D. 677] and Willebrord [A.D. 692-741], who met with much success in that part of ancient Friesland now known as Holland. The greatest missionary of Germany was, however, the English St. Boniface (a Devonshire priest, originally named Winfrith), who carried on the work of evangelization for forty years [A.D. 715-755], converting districts to which previous missionaries had not penetrated, and organizing and consolidating the Church in those where it had already gained a footing. He became Archbishop of Mentz, and was martyred by the hands of some heathen Frieslands at the venerable age of seventy-five. He had worthy successors in Gregory of Utrecht, St. Lebuin, and Willehad, the last of whom was a Northumbrian, who died Bishop of Bremen, A.D. 789.

French and English Missions to Scandinavia. Denmark having become feudatory to Charlemagne, a Frankish mission was sent thither under Ebbo, Archbishop of Rheims, which resulted in the baptism of Harold, King of Jutland [A.D. 826]. At the request of Harold, a fresh mission to Denmark was organized under Anskar, a monk of Corbey, near Amiens, who is often spoken of as the "Apostle of the North." From Denmark Anskar made his way to Sweden, where [A.D. 831] he was favourably received by the king. After his death in the year 865, Christianity in Denmark passed through a stage of decadence and persecution, from which it was rescued by English missionaries sent over by Canute in the early part of the eleventh century. The light of the Gospel had become almost extinguished also in Sweden in the tenth century, but English missionaries were invited over by King Olaf, who had been baptized about the year 1008, and the English priest Turgot became bishop of the first see established in Sweden, that of Skara in West Gothland. Norway also owes its Christianity entirely to English missionaries, and they penetrated as far north as Iceland.

After the eleventh century few directly missionary enterprises are recorded. The age of the Crusades was very unfavourable for such work, and after their cessation, the Church was suffering too much from those abuses and divisions which brought about the Reformation to engage in any labours among the heathen. It must be remembered, moreover, that most of the then accessible parts of the world had been evangelized before the twelfth century, and that the field of missionary work was necessarily contracted to very small dimensions, until the colonizing and trading spirit of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries opened up fresh countries as a sphere for the renewed labours of the Church.

[II.] Modern Missions of the Church. The revival of missions may be dated from the discovery of America in the end of the fifteenth century. Wherever Columbus landed he solemnly planted the Cross, as a token that the Church was taking possession of the newly-discovered lands; and this symbolical beginning was so far followed up, that when the Spanish State settled in the Southern Continent of America, the Spanish Church also settled there, with its episcopate, its priesthood, and its monastic orders. As cities and palaces sprung up, so did cathedrals and churches, and Christianity has never lost the footing it then gained. In all colonizing expeditions undertaken by sovereigns in obedience to Rome there was, indeed, a special provision made that newly-discovered countries should always be annexed to the Catholic Church; and this provision, doubtless, had a good effect in securing the witness of Christianity among the heathen natives of Peru and Mexico. The plantation of the Spanish Church on South American soil was not, however, a missionary work; and when the Jesuits afterwards originated such work among the Indians, baptizing vast numbers, and carrying civilization among them, the zeal of the missionaries met with discouragement at the hands of the government, so that they were eventually expelled altogether from the Spanish Indies in the last century.

Xavier's Mission to India and Japan. It was during the great epoch of the Reformation that the great organization of the Jesuits came into existence, and one of the first of Loyola's associates, Francis Xavier, was also one of the greatest and most zealous of modern missionaries. He was sent out to the Portuguese Colonies in India by John III., King of Portugal, in 1541, being then thirty-six years of age; presenting his letters of authority from Paul III. to the Bishops of Goa, on May 6th, 1542. His fervid preaching and holy example soon wrought upon the European settlers, and produced a reformation upon them which was a step towards the introduction of Christianity among the native population. Working first among the pearl fishers on the coast, he afterwards visited the kingdom of Travancore, where he is said to have baptized ten thousand natives in a month. For four years he laboured among the natives of the Indian coast and islands, and in 1547 passed over to Ceylon, where he baptized the King of Kandy, and great numbers of the Ceylonese. Meeting with a Japanese nobleman, his attention was turned to that vast empire, and eventually to China. The mission which he founded in Japan lasted for a century, and produced extraordinary fruits, the Jesuit missionaries shewing zeal and fortitude only to be paralleled by that of the early teachers of Christianity. After fearful persecutions, the remnant were expelled from Japan in the middle of the seventeenth century. Having laboured nearly three years in Japan, Xavier started for China in 1551, but he never accomplished a landing there, and, overcome by disappointment, he fell into a sickness which took him to his rest in the Island of Sancian, on December 22nd, 1552, his remains being removed thence to Goa two years afterwards. Thirty years after his death, the Christians of Japan numbered 150,000, there being two hundred churches, and fifty-nine monasteries. The Jesuit missions afterwards extended to China, where they met with great success, a success which was of a more lasting character, and of which traces still exist.

The Roman Propaganda. At the end of the sixteenth century, the missionary system of the Roman Churches was organized more completely by the appointment of a Congregation of Cardinals, under the name of the Congregation De Propaganda Fide. To this congregation is intrusted the whole superintendence of the missions which are conducted under the sanction of the Pope. It was originated by Gregory XIII., but not fully organized until some forty years afterwards, when Gregory XV. gave full authority by a Bull dated June 22nd, 1622. His successor, Urban VIII., supplemented the work of his predecessors by establishing a great missionary college in connection with the congregation, where many natives of the various countries into which mission work extends are continually being trained for it from an early age, many Europeans also being educated in the languages of the people among whom they will have to labour as missionaries. The College of the Propaganda is also the great missionary printing establishment of the Roman Churches, and it has accumulated literary resources for its particular work which are quite unrivalled. It is the most perfect missionary organization in the world, and from its walls multitudes of devoted men have gone forth ready to labour and to die in propagating the faith among the heathen.

Missions of the English Church. The great work which had been done by English missionaries in early mediæval times was stopped for want of fields in which missionary labours were required. But as soon as the maritime genius and enterprise of England was directed towards the discovery of new countries, a revival of missionary spirit ensued, the progress of which in recent times is too well known to need any detailed account here, but the early history of which has been little noticed.

The earliest attempts at the foundation of English colonies were made in the reign of Queen Elizabeth by Sir Walter Raleigh and Sir Humfry Gilbert, his half-brother, who was of as enterprizing a disposition as Raleigh himself. In those early days there was a strong religious element at work in connection with all voyages of discovery, as indeed there was with all navigation; and it seems also to have been a first principle with the enterprizing voyagers by whom English settlements were originated, as it had been with Columbus, that the Church should be planted on all ground which was taken possession of in the name of the Crown.

Thus good old Hakluyt, who promoted many voyages of discovery in addition to writing their history, says that "the glory of God is the great end to which the extension of the borders of a Christian state should be subservient, and that each step made in this extension should be regarded as a fresh summons to promote it:" a missionary principle which ought to be printed in letters of gold on the walls of our Colonial Office. Raleigh seems, too, to have been imbued with a similar spirit, for the same old writer says to him, "I know you mean hereafter to send some good Churchmen thither, as may truly say with the Apostle to savages, 'We seek not yours, but you.' I conceive great comfort of the success of this your action, hoping that the Lord, whose power is wont to be perfected in weakness, will bless the feeble foundation of your building." Nor was this the principle of private men only. When Gilbert took possession of St. John's, Newfoundland, one of his first official acts was to ordain that the "public exercise" of religion should be according to the Church of England;" and this he did on the authority of a clause in the patent granted to him before setting out on his voyage, in which such a provision was ordered generally with respect to any territories discovered and occupied by him. This good old commander was a true son of the Church of England, and found his practical religion useful to him at the last: for it is recorded of him that in the storm in which he and his ships were lost on their return voyage in A.D. 1583, he encouraged his sailors by bidding them remember the old saying that "they were as near to heaven by sea as by land."

The first actual colony founded by Englishmen was that of Virginia, which still retains (even as a member of the American Republic) the name first given to it in honour of the virgin Queen. The establishment of this colony was commenced by Sir Francis Raleigh after the death of his half-brother Gilbert, and went on with varying success through the reigns of Elizabeth and James I.; in the latter of whose reigns it began to be a country of some importance to England.

When James I. granted letters patent and orders in Council for the occupation of Virginia —what we should now call a Constitution—it was directed that the presidents, councils, and ministers who were to form the governing body of the new country should provide that "the Word and service of God be preached, planted, and used, not only in the said colonies, but also, as much as might be, among the savages bordering among them, according to the rites and doctrines of the Church of England." A clergyman accompanied the voyagers, and the first thing he did on landing was to celebrate the Sacrament of the Holy Communion. That was probably the first occasion on which the continent of North America was blessed by that holy rite; and it is worth remembering that the date of the celebration was June 21, 1607, and the name of the clergyman was Robert Hunt. It appears also that the colonists were so far intent upon carrying out the principles of the Church of England according to their charter, that they built a log hut of much better workmanship than their own dwellings (a fact noticed in the contemporary account of their proceedings), in which the "Daily Common Prayer, Morning and Evening," with the other ordinances of religion, were duly observed. Fifteen years after, the clergy of North America were five in number, but five only; and application was made to the Bishop of London to send out more, all sent being declared to be under his jurisdiction—an absurd arrangement, some remains of which still exist, and which, in the case of the North American colonies, tended much to prevent the extension of the Church there.

Honoured names were connected with this first establishment of a daughter of the Church of England in the West. Nicholas Ferrar, John Ferrar, Dr. Donne, and Sir John Sandys (son of the Archbishop of York, and pupil of Hooker), were all members of the Council by means of which the home management of the colony was conducted; but they continued to influence its affairs only till A.D. 1624, when the Virginian Company was dissolved. Yet the results of that influence were long felt, for their work was the germ of North American Christianity.

New England, a more northern colony, was also intended by its original founders to be a Church of England settlement, as is shewn by a letter of Winthrop, their leader, and by a publication of a clergyman at Boston, entitled The Planter's Plea, in which the "causes moving such as have undertaken a plantation in New England" are stated. But there was a larger leaven of discontent among these colonists than among those of Virginia, and in a few years, when the discontented portion had gained the upper hand, they shewed their freedom from superstition by burning numberless old people as witches, persecuting the clergy, and suppressing the use of the Book of Common Prayer. When the rapid colonization of the great continent proceeded, it was only natural that a mixed multitude should find a home on its shores; and experience teaches that the early colonists of any land are neither the most loyal nor the most religious subjects of the country which they leave.

Archbishop Laud had his attention drawn to the North American Colonies when he was officially connected with them as Bishop of London; and was maturing a plan for making the Church there independent of the Church at home by means of a local episcopate, when his troubles began, and interrupted the progress of the scheme. His plans, however, were so far taken up by the Puritans, that parochial collections were made in the time of Cromwell for the promotion of Christianity among the Indians; and a society for the purpose was incorporated in 1649, which received a fresh charter from Charles II. in 1661, under the presidency of the Hon. Robert Boyle, who instituted the "Boyle Lectures" by his will with the same object. Sir Leoline Jenkins also established for a similar object two fellowships at Jesus College, Oxford (still going by his name, and still held by clergymen going to the Colonies), about the same period.

But the first really great attempt on the part of the mother country to convey the blessing of religion to her colonies, was the foundation of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in June 1701. The persecution of Churchmen in the American settlements had gone so far during the time of Cromwell, that the clergy were almost rooted out; and it was only after petitioning the King himself, "that a church might be allowed in that city for the exercise of religion according to the Church of England," that the Boston Churchmen of A.D. 1679 could obtain freedom of worship. This petition excited attention and led to inquiry; and when it was discovered that hardly any clergy at all remained among a population rapidly increasing, great efforts were made by such men as Bishop Beveridge, Archbishop Wake, Archbishop Sharpe, Bishop Gibson, and Bishop Berkeley, to put the Colonial Church on a more satisfactory footing: for, at this time, many thousands—even a majority in some colonies—declared themselves members of our communion. A clergyman named Dr. Bray had been sent out to Maryland as deputy (so far as a priest could be deputy to a bishop) to the Bishop of London; and it was chiefly at his suggestion that the first great Missionary Society of the Church of England was originated. "The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts," as its full title is, was incorporated in 1701, and at once began operations in North America which have since extended to all parts of the British dominions. For a hundred years it was the only Church Society of the kind, but in the beginning of the present century another was originated, more especially for the purpose of carrying Christianity among the heathen who lie beyond British territory; and this, the "Church Missionary Society," has so extended its work that —although not chartered as the Propagation Society is—it has assumed an equally important position in the foreign labours of the Church of England.

There is not room here to follow up in detail the missionary work of the Church of England since the beginning of the last century; but we shall endeavour to sketch an outline of the most important fields of labour, referring the reader to Bishop Wilberforce's History of the Protestant Episcopal Church in America, and to the series of publications entitled Missions among the Heathen, and Annals of the Colonial Church of the Propagation Society, for further particulars.

The great difficulty under which the Church in North America laboured for many years was that of obtaining a supply of ministers. The double position of our bishops as peers of parliament and purely ecclesiastical officers has always hindered statesmen from allowing their number to be increased: at the same time that endowments for bishoprics are not easy to procure.

In Charles the Second's days, and in Queen Anne's also, it was proposed to supply the Colonial Church with several bishops; but in both reigns the plan was so opposed that eventually it dropped through. The clergy who were already there were working on, therefore, without superintendence: none of their people could be confirmed unless accident brought them to England, and all who were anxious to be ordained were obliged to cross the Atlantic to receive holy orders, and to cross it a second time to regain their homes and sphere of duty. It was monstrous to allow such obstacles to continue in the path of the Church for so long a period: and one does not wonder to find the clergy writing home that "the Church of England in these colonies is in a low, depressed, and very imperfect state, for want of her pure primitive Episcopal form of Church government." Nor is it to be wondered at that less than half of the English Christians in the North American Colonies were, in 1761, members of the Church of England.

Thus North America passed out of the hands of England before it had received from her the means of continuing a lawful ministry, of confirming the baptized, and of governing the whole Christian body according to Apostolic ordinances.

Soon after the Declaration of Independence, however, the people of New York endeavoured to obtain from England what England had not previously been willing to bestow. Dr. Seabury was sent over with a request that the Archbishop of York (the See of Canterbury being vacant) would consecrate him to the Episcopal office. As he was not an English but an American citizen, there was supposed to be a constitutional difficulty in the way, and he was ultimately consecrated in Scotland on November 14th, 1784, by the Bishops of Aberdeen, Ross, and Moray. Three years later Dr. White and Dr. Provoost were sent over to be consecrated, and were made bishops by the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, and the Bishops of Bath and Wells and Peterborough, on February 4th, 1787. In 1790 Dr. Madison was consecrated in England as Bishop of Virginia, and since that time the Church of the United States has ceased to be a missionary branch of the Church of England. It now numbers thirty-nine bishops, five assistant and nine missionary bishops, nearly three thousand other clergy, and a body of communicants increasing at the rate of five thousand a year.

The example being thus set in the separated States of North America, it was soon followed in those which still retained their allegiance to the old country. In the same year that White and Provoost were consecrated, Dr. Inglis was also appointed by Mr. Pitt to the first foreign see erected under the jurisdiction of the British Crown, which was that of Nova Scotia; and a few years afterwards [A.D. 1793], Dr. Jacob Mountain was consecrated Bishop of Quebec. For many years these were the only bishops in British North America, but about thirty years ago the missionary work of our Church received a great stimulus from the munificence of private individuals, and there are now ten bishops altogether in Canada and the adjacent settlements. This indicates a large increase of the Anglican Church there, especially when it is remembered that a great portion of the population of Canada are descendants of the original French settlers, and consequently Roman Catholics. The number of clergy is between six and seven hundred, and in many places the extent of their "parishes" is that of an English county, their parishioners being a very scattered population. In the Diocese of Toronto, which comprises West Canada, the people number about a million, and the area of the country is about 100,000 miles; but the clergy are under one hundred and thirty, so that their work is still of a thoroughly missionary character.

The colonization of Australasia belongs almost entirely to the history of the last forty years; for although Captain Cook's discoveries brought a portion of it into the possession of England soon after the American revolution had deprived her of our chief colonies in the western hemisphere, it was not until quite recent times that any great progress was made in settling it: nor, indeed, until the recent gold discoveries opened up the enormous resources of the new continent. A few clergy worked on single-handed, until the year 1836, when the Diocese of Sydney was founded as a step towards the more perfect organization of the Australian Church. In 1841, the islands of New Zealand were separated off from the impossible territory which had been put under Bishop Broughton's jurisdiction; and in 1842, the district of Tasmania was also formed into a diocese. The missionary work among the natives and among the settlers has since then increased very rapidly, and there are now twenty-two bishops in Australia and the islands of the Pacific, with a rapidly increasing number of clergy.

Very similar is the history and position of the growing Church of South Africa, to the superintendence of which Bishop Gray was consecrated in 1847. In this, as in all cases, the presence of a bishop has immediately led to a much more rapid progress in the evangelization of the country, and there are now six bishops where twenty-three years ago there was only one; while missionary bishops are also sent into the North-eastern and North-western parts of Africa to evangelize the Negro races.

In the West Indies, and in India, the work of the Church can hardly, it is to be feared, be called a work of much progress. Since 1824, there have been four dioceses erected in the West Indian Islands; and the formation of the single Indian diocese of Calcutta, in 1814, was followed up at twenty years' interval by that of Madras, Bombay, and Colombo. There are also three other dioceses which belong to the Asiatic quarter of the globe. It would, however, drive us into greater detail than space will allow, if we were to follow out the subject of Anglican missionary work among the Negro and the Hindoo races, and it must therefore be dismissed at once.

It may be well, in conclusion, to sum up the results of Anglican Church missionary work by saying that the Church of England since the Reformation has conveyed the ministrations of the Gospel into all the quarters of the world; that ninety-one dioceses of her communion have been founded within the last eighty-six years in countries beyond England, Scotland, and Ireland; that about six thousand clergy of her communion are working in the United States of America and in British Colonies; and that the number of her converts is greatly on the increase year by year both among the heathen, and also among those who speak the English language. MOLINIST. [JANSENISM.]

MOLINOS. [QUIETISM.]

MONARCHIA. The doctrine of the Monarchia is the leading or opening statement in the orderly enunciation of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity. It is, That there is one and only one Ἀρχή, principle or fountain of Divinity, God the Father, the First Person in the Blessed Trinity, who only is Αὐτόθεος, God of and from[1] Himself. The doctrine of the Trinity proceeds, that the Son and the Holy Spirit derive their Divinity from the Father as the one Ἀρχή. The scriptural and only true idea of God involves in its development the idea of the Tri-unity: and the doctrine of the Monarchia may be approached either from the side of the Unity of God, or from the side of the Trinity of Persons. Coming to it on the side of the Unity there is presented to the mind first the Existence of God, then the Unity of God, then the underived Nature, that is, His Self-existence. Coming to the doctrine on the side of the Trinity of Persons, Scripture reveals God the Son, who is Θεὸς ἐκ Θεοῦ by an eternal generation, and God the Holy Ghost who is Θεὸς ἐκ Θεοῦ by an eternal procession. This refers us to the First Person of the Trinity, as to Him from whom the Second and Third Persons derive their Divinity.

The doctrine of the Monarchia, flowing as it does directly from the Unity of God, in its expression guards that Unity; while, at the same time, it renders it possible to hold that the Son is God, and the Holy Ghost God, by a derivation of Godhead: the full doctrine of the Godhead of the Second and Third Persons being maintained by the further doctrine of the Perichoresis. It is to be remarked that as ἀρχή has the meaning of "beginning" with reference to time, as well as the meaning of "principle" with reference to origin, so with regard to the former meaning the Son and the Holy Spirit are ἄναρχοι, as well as the Father. Αἰτία, cause, is also used in the enunciation of this doctrine, the Father Himself ἀιτία, is ἀναίτιος; the Son and the Holy Spirit are ἀιτιατοι, or τὸ ἀιτιατόν.

Scripture and the Church avoid the appearance of tritheism by tracing back (if we may so say) the infinite perfections of the Son and Spirit to Him whose Son and Spirit They are. They are, so to express it, but the new manifestation and repetition of the Father; there being no room for numeration or comparison between them, nor any resting-place for the contemplating mind, till they are referred to Him in Whom they centre. On the other hand, in naming the Father, we imply the Son and Spirit, whether They be named or not. This is the key to much of the language of Holy Scripture, which is otherwise difficult to understand, as, e.g., 1 John v. 20; 1 Cor. xii. 4-6; John xiv. 16-18 [Newman's Arians, p. 192].

Viewing this doctrine on the side of the Second and Third Persons of the Trinity, it becomes the doctrine of their subordination to the Father. In nature, in perfection of substance, equal to the Father; in authority, in origin, the Son and Holy Spirit are subordinate. Bull expresses it thus: "Patre igitur minor est Filius κατ' ἀιτίαν. Æqualis vero est Patri Filius κατὰ φύσιν. Deus ac Dominus est Filius æque ac Pater: et in hoc solo discrepat a Patre Filius, quod Deus et Dominus sit a Patre Deo ac Domino: hoc est, Deus licet de Deo sit, de vero tamen Deo Deus verus est, ut definivit synodus ipsa Nicæna" [Bull's Works, Burton's ed. vi. 707]. The like things may be said of the Holy Spirit. This subordination, and the ministrations of the Son and of the Holy Spirit in executing the counsels of the Individual Society of the Godhead, is styled the œconomy of the Holy Trinity. MONARCHIANISM. A part of that line of heresy of which Sabellianism was the most permanent form, and which confused, under various modifications of statement, the three Persons of the Godhead. It was an early form of Antitrinitarianism, which sheltered its heresy, like the Unitarianism of modern days, under the specious disguise of a zeal for the Divine Unity.

The first propagator of this heresy seems to have been Theodotus [ὁ σκυτεύς], a Byzantine, and though known as "the currier," a man of some learning. In an early work quoted by Eusebius, he is called "the leader and father of the God-denying apostasy" which was being developed by Paul of Samosata at the time when the words were written, and is said to be "the first who asserted Christ to be a mere man" [Euseb. Eccl. Hist. v. 28]. Theodotus was in [1] Bull uses the word "from," "of and from Himself." Pearson considers it to be a contradiction. "Whereas if we speak properly God the Father hath neither His Being from another, nor from Himself: not from another, that were repugnant to His Paternity: not from Himself, that were a contradiction in itself." [Expos. of Creed, fol. 1741, p. 39.] There is no real difference (as need hardly be said) between these two great divines. The contradiction is one of those contradictions which often arise (perhaps inevitably) when we attempt to propound in words a truth, such as this of the self-existence of God, which is really unintelligible by a finite mind.

Rome for some time, and was excommunicated by Victor, in the last years of the second century. He was followed by another Theodotus, called "the money-changer" (ὁ τραπεζίτης), Asclepiades, Natalius, and Artemon, the last being the best known of his disciples. Artemon charged Zephyrinus, the successor of Victor [A.D. 202], with having corrupted the faith of the Church by introducing the doctrine of our Lord's Divinity, an absurd charge which shews either the ignorance or the audacity of the sect. "Perchance," says the primitive writer previously quoted, "one might believe what they say were it not that the Holy Scriptures contradict them; as well as the works of certain brethren older than Victor's time, which they wrote in defence of the truth, and against the heresies of their day. I speak of Justus and Miltiades, and Tatian and Clement, and many others, in all of which the Divinity of Christ is asserted. Who knows not the works of Irenæus and Melito, and the rest, in which Christ is announced as God and man? Who knows not the psalms and hymns written by the brethren, which from the beginning celebrate Christ the Word of God by proclaiming His Divinity? How then could it happen that since the doctrine of the Church has been proclaimed for so many years, that yet until the time of Victor, the Gospel was preached after the manner alleged by Artemon?" [Euseb. Eccl. Hist. v. 28.]

The Monarchians were designated Alogi [Epiphan. Hær. li.] as denying the Logos of St. John, and their distinctive principle was evidently the simplest form of Antitrinitarianism, viz. the recognition of one Divine Person only; without much, if any, endeavour to refute the orthodox belief respecting the other two Persons of the Holy Trinity. [PATRIPASSIANS. SABELLIANISM. UNITARIANISM. Dict. of SECTS and HERESIES.]

MONASTICISM must not be judged by its condition at the time of the Reformation, far less by the character that interested adversaries have given to it from a hope of profit in its suppression. But even the enthusiastic advocacy of Montalembert [Moines de l'Occident] allows that gross corruption had then set in, and that the Monasticism of the fifteenth century was as much unlike its original form as modern Christianity falls short of the high exemplar of the Apostles' days.

It will be the object of this article to trace the growth of Monasticism from its early origin; and the account will have been carried down to a sufficiently recent date, when it is shewn that our most ancient Episcopal sees in England have been established on conventual foundations. There are works that give all the information which can be needed with respect to the subsequent development of the different orders of Monasticism. The day of Monasticism has for ever set, at least in England. There is no longer any need for its existence, even if it could be set up again in its best condition. More than Benedictine learning sheds a ray of glory on our colleges. Our Poor Laws render unnecessary the alms from the monastery wicket; and such doles would become a positive evil now as an encouragement to idleness and sloth. Our parochial clergy are welcome visitors at the cottage fireside, where the monk of later days was not, with his sack of contributions for the house. The glory of Monasticism was the fidelity with which it discharged its earlier mission; the self-sacrifice with which it taught men to rise superior to the trials and calamities of life; the unfeigned piety with which the monk resigned every earthly advantage that he might win a heavenly reward. But it survived its reputation, and there is more hope of recovering to life the carcase around which the eagles have gathered than of a renovated monkdom. The ribaldry of Boccaccio and Rabelais, the Ep. obscuror. Vir. and the more measured terms of Piers Plowman and Chaucer, were mainly instrumental in bringing about the downfall of Monasticism; but this was after it had already been shorn of its splendour, and when scarcely a ray remained to it of its true glory.

The word Monasticism is derived from the verb μονάζειν, to dwell apart in solitude. Μοναχός, in its original acceptation, referred to the recluses of the Egyptian deserts, or hermits (ἐρημῖται), who lived for the sake of contemplative piety in cells apart from each other termed "lauri." When these cells were united under a common regimen, they became a Cœnobium (κοινὸς βίος), but the individual anchorite (ἀναχωρητὴς), separated from the world, was still termed μοναχός. The institution is far more ancient than is generally imagined. Contemplative asceticism is a link that binds the most remote antiquity with our own times. India, when Moses received the Law on Mount Sinai, had its hordes of self-mortifying devotees. Wherever Buddhism has become the dominant faith, the Cœnobium has been as unvarying a feature as it ever was in Italy, or Austria, or Spain. The Pythagorean recluse, the Neo-Platonic dreamer, and the more severe sects of Judaism, were as forecast shadows of Monasticism. Pliny speaks of the Essenes in terms of admiration that might be adopted by the eulogist of La Trappe [H. N. v.]. Philo is equally eloquent in his praise of the Therapeutæ, who established themselves as recluses on the self-same Nitrian mount that afforded an asylum to the earliest monks. It may also be noted that the places of Therapeutic worship were termed μοναστήρια.

In times anterior to the Gospel, prophets and martyrs "in sheepskins and goatskins," wandered over mountains and deserts, and dwelt in caves and dens of the earth, as pre-evangelic monks. Nazarites and the sons of Rechab were but harbingers of future institutions. The advocates of Monasticism have always claimed for it an evangelical origin. Its lines were laid, they say, in the Gospel of Christ; and the vow of poverty was indicated by our Lord when He charged the rich young man in the Gospel to sell all he had, if he would be perfect, and give to the poor, and that, as a follower of Christ, he should receive an hundred-fold more "with persecution." But the instance is scarcely in point. Our Lord's words had a present application, whether they referred to apostolic life and duties, or to entrance into the infant Church, where for a time all things were in common. If they had any bearing upon the monastic vow of poverty, they remained dormant till persecution drove Christians into the wilderness. Persecution also was not the result, but the exciting cause of Monasticism. So, too, the following of which our Lord spoke involved a life of active exertion, hardly to be identified with the leisure of the "laurus," where the hermit twined his rush mats and baskets for a livelihood, while his heart was engaged in prayer. The case is evidently unable to bear the assertion built upon it by Suarez [Tr. VII. iii. 2], that Monasticism is "de jure divino non præcipiente sed consulente."

Neither can that community of life, which is the earliest phase of Christianity, represent the origin of Monasticism; else it would have continued without intermission. But such a state of things was a social impossibility. It gives a beautiful picture of what Christianity might be, and possibly may be, when all are of one mind and one spirit; but it was incompatible with the general course of human affairs, and it ceased to be. It may have suggested the theory of monastic institutions, but it certainly was not the germ from whence they were developed. Neither was there Monasticism in the ascetic discipline of the first centuries. The baptismal engagement was to primitive Christians that which the religious vow was to a Benedict or a Borromeo. They were a nation of priests, offering the holiest sacrifices with pure hands, and garments scarce spotted with the flesh. The highest exercises of faith and devotional piety filled in the intervals of persecution that assailed their constancy in vain. Severe asceticism was the religion of thousands throughout the Christian world. But those who practised it neither separated themselves from the world, nor from its social and political duties. They were a standing memorial of the solemn nature of the Christian vow in the heart of the families of the people. The most rigid monastic rule could have added neither severity to their self-discipline nor higher temper to their chastened spirit; and the solitary recluses of the Thebaïd carried out in newer forms their ancestral traditions in a life of self-mortification.

It was during the persecution under Decius [A.D. 249-251] that Christians were driven to seek an asylum in the desert; where a spring of water and a patch of land regulated in its spontaneous growth, and some rude handiwork supplied, the means of existence. They were, as Montalembert says, "naifs comme des enfants, et forts comme des géants;" though Villemain, forming a more unimpassioned estimate of the results of Monasticism, says, "De cette rude école du desert il sortait des grands hommes et des fous;" heroes and madmen [Melanges Eloq. Chr. p. 356]. It has been with Monasticism as with every other intellectual movement. An idea exists long in a state of free solution, till the master mind is revealed, destined to give it fixity and permanence; and from that time it becomes a nucleus around which system gathers and crystallizes. Thus the recluses of the desert continued to gain in strength and number, until Anthony, of noble family and wealth, in the fourth century, incorporated the scattered individuals in Cœnobia; the connecting tie being a triple vow of chastity, poverty, and manual labour for the common good. Thenceforth the attention of Christendom was attracted to the Thebaïd; all who needed it found there an asylum. Athanasius, whose years of banishment exceeded those of his episcopal residence, was the guest of Anthony, and by the austerities of the cell braced up his spirit for the further trials of his faith. The first monastic rule of which we read was framed by Pachomius, for the union of eight monasteries that he formed at Tabenna, an insular position on the Nile, just below the first cataract. When Athanasius visited him, Pachomius and three thousand monks passed before him in procession, chanting hymns, and giving practical proof of the devotional spirit that existed in the desert. The elder Ammonius founded the monastery on the Nitrian mount, which soon numbered five thousand members. The rapidly increasing numbers of monks in Egypt give an almost incredible array of figures. The monks of Tabenna, soon after the death of Pachomius, exceeded seven thousand; and in the time of Jerome numbered fifty thousand at the annual gathering of the order. The development in the Nitrian and Thebaïd deserts was equally rapid; so that Ruffinus [V. Patr. ii. 7] affirms that the monastic population of Egypt equalled the inhabitants of the towns. Neither was the movement confined to Egypt. Arabia, Syria, Palestine, and more especially the region of Mount Sinai, swarmed with recluses, and were thickly studded with monasteries. "We daily receive monks," says St. Jerome, writing at Bethlehem, "from India, and Persia, and Ethiopia." But human frailty was at work, and the Homilies of Ephraem, himself a Mesopotamian monk, shew that all who wore the monastic garb were not animated by the holy spirit of the main body. Yet care was always taken that none should be incorporated without due deliberation. At first the noviciate age was fixed at seventeen. Afterwards none were allowed to take the vow before their twenty-fifth year [Conc. Carth. III.], while later Gallican and Spanish Councils deferred it to the fortieth year; so careful was the Church to impress upon men's minds that, "Better it is not to vow, than to vow and not perform" [Eccl. v. 5]. Convents for nuns are as ancient as those for monks. Anthony and Pachomius were tended by their sisters; Ammonius by his wife: and crowds of heroic women confided their honour to the wilderness rather than to the caprices of fortune in times of trouble. They formed the germ of those convents for nuns which developed their growth as rapidly as the monasteries, but they were separated from the latter either by a wide tract of waste, by a river, or by isolation upon some rugged eminence.

The beneficial effect of Monasticism in its earlier phases cannot be easily overrated. The rich were forcibly reminded of the nothingness of all earthly loss and gain by the readiness with which earnest spirits parted with every element of worldly property; the poor were consoled in their low estate by seeing how the self-sought "crown" of poverty could dignify the individual; and the whole Church was edified by the labours of men who had given up all, that they might follow closely in the steps of their Redeemer. The light of Christian truth also was made to burn more brightly by the labours of these students of the desert. The preparation of the Vulgate from the numerous old Italic fragmental versions of Scripture that existed before the time of Jerome, was worked out by him in his cell at Bethlehem. The treatises of Athanasius against the Arians gave him employment during his retirement in the Thebaïd. From the middle of the fourth century, with three exceptions, Ambrose, Hilary of Poictiers and Leo the Great, all the great writers of the Church, its patriarchs and bishops, had received their early training as monks. Basil was taken forcibly from his Pontine cell to be ordained to the priesthood, and eventually to be raised to the see of Cæsarea. Gregory of Nazianzum had shared his cell, and with it the daily task of manual labour; his fourth oration is an eloquent encomium of Monasticism. Saint Chrysostom passed some years of his early life in monastic seclusion in the mountainous district of Antioch [Pallad. Vit. Chrysost. v.]. His eighth, and sixty-eighth Homilies on St. Matthew [ἤθικα], glow with the praises of religious life in the desert. Imperial conversion involved no reform in civic corruption; and the low condition of public life in the towns possibly called forth the highly-wrought panegyrics of Monasticism which the Fathers have left [Chrys. Adv. Oppugn. v. Monast.; Hom. in Matt. and 1 Tim.]. The desert was the abode of the best men of their generation.

It was the courageous, self-sacrificing spirit of a monk that brought to a close the horrors of the arena. When Honorius revived the gladiatorial shows of the circus [A.D. 404], the monk Telemachus journeyed to Rome from his Nitrian cell, firm of purpose to declare, as a prophet of old, God's detestation of the contemplated cruelties. Pressing through the excited crowd of the Coliseum, he threw himself between the pair of gladiators, matched for the death-struggle. The people beat him down with stones and clubs, and the gladiators dispatched him. But it was the last human blood that was shed in the Coliseum. Men began to realize to themselves the hideous character of the exhibition, and an edict of the same emperor proscribed all gladiatorial exhibitions for the future [Montalemb. i. 126].

If we turn to the West, we observe the same enthusiastic reception of Monasticism that marked its rise in the East. Athanasius, under exile, became a guest at Rome after he had visited the Thebaïd; and two monks, named Ammon and Isidore, accompanied him as living evidence of the sanctifying principles of the new "religio." The movement, when once fairly established, rapidly gained ground. Patricians, rich merchants, and men of letters adopted the distinctive dress of the anchorite, and with it the three self-denying vows of the religious life. Villas, bearing the names of Gracchus and Scipio, Camillus and Marcellus, were converted by the representatives of these great names into monasteries. The ruins of the Anician palace, of vast extent, were still to be seen in the middle of the eight century at the gate of Nursia [Montalemb. ii. 8]. The family from whence it had its name is renowned in the annals of Monasticism as the stock of which Benedict and Gregory the Great were descendants. From Rome the movement spread through the provinces, and established itself in the isles of the Mediterranean; chiefly through the energetic action of Eusebius of Vercellæ, who, like Athanasius, had obtained a temporary resting-place in the Thebaïd when driven from his see. A further impulse was given to Monachism by Jerome's Lives of the Desert Fathers, and the Life of Anthony by Athanasius.

Basil had given a rule to the vast army of monks, and bound them by a formal vow to chastity, poverty (involving the duty of self-support by manual labour), and obedience to authority; but it is vague and desultory. An order of mendicant monks who, disliking work, preferred to obtain their living by hawking about bones and relics, was severely dealt with by Augustine [de Op. Monach.]. It was a condemnation beforehand of Monasticism in its decline, when indolence became its just, but not its least, reproach. Some useful canons were passed at the Council of Chalcedon for the regulation of monks; subjecting them to diocesan authority—though this was unfortunately modified by Gregory—and enforcing fixity of residence. The desecration also of conventual buildings was prohibited. Generally however monasteries, sown broadcast over the world, differed widely in their code of rules. Notwithstanding Basil's Digest, Cassian, on visiting the different institutions of Egypt and Palestine and Mesopotamia, found almost as many rules as monasteries [Cassian, Inst. ii. 2]. The inmates of different cells under the same head varied in their observance, each recluse retaining his accustomed usage when admitted into the community. But, in truth, no rule could well be universal. In Gaul the monks reclaimed against the severe rule of fasting imported from the East. Athanasius terms fasting "the meat of angels;" but the rule must vary with the varying climate. A discipline that was practicable under a burning Syrian sun required modification to suit the colder latitude of Gaul. Less food is evidently required in countries where the intense noontide heat curtails the hours of work, and where man has a less robust physique. Benedict [Milman, Lat. Chr. iii. 6; Montalemb. iv.], a young patrician of the Gens Anicia, consolidated the Western monks under one rule. At the age of fourteen he determined to renounce the world and all its high hopes, and to devote himself to the service of God. For three years he inhabited a tomb-like cave amid the rocks of Subiaco, still shewn to the traveller, where he was sustained by a neighbouring monk, who brought to him a part of his own daily pittance. The sanctity of the young recluse and his fervent oratory having become known, crowds flocked to him for the bread of life. Soon the number of those who established themselves around him compelled him to form them into twelve monasteries, each containing twelve monks, of whom he was the superior. The holy St. Maur, a name venerable in literature, with a few others, received instruction from himself. A diabolical attempt to corrupt these youths caused him to leave his monasteries and to quit Subiaco, when he removed to Monte Casino, close to St. Germano, and in the vicinity of Aquino, the birthplace of Juvenal, and of the "Angelic Doctor," Thomas Aquinas, who was himself a student at Monte Casino, though he afterwards joined the Dominicans. It became the capital of Western Monachism. Here Benedict passed the fourteen latter years of his life; preaching in the neighbourhood, instructing noble youths, controlling the affairs of his house, and ministering with a lavish hand to the neighbouring poor the offerings that poured in from the surrounding district. The Benedictine Order, as Montalembert observes, has always remained faithful to the tradition of liberality thus established by its founder.

The Rule of St. Benedict is more methodical than those that precede it. Its dominant principles are obedience and labour. Being administrative rather than creative in its origin, it presupposed the existing rules of chastity and poverty. The founder speaks of his rule as merely a beginning, a tentative ordinance, "Hanc minimam inchoationis regulam," &c. [c. 73]. The principal of every establishment was enjoined to take council, either of the whole house in capitular assembly, or of the decanal body chosen from the different decads of the community. A candidate for the noviciate was long kept without the walls to try his constancy. When admitted within, he was placed for two months under the tuition and surveillance of an experienced monk, and warned daily with respect to the hardships and discipline of the monastery. If the novice still wished to take the vow, the laws of the Society were read over to him, and permission given him to return to the world if he so pleased. The same opportunity was three times repeated during the year of noviciate, at the expiration of which time he was admitted as a member of the community. The sixty-three heads under which the rule is arranged, refer to the relative duties of the principal and subordinate members—Divine Worship—Discipline—Household Economy—and various ordinances referring to hospitality, missions, nursing, &c. The prescribed dress was, in all probability, that which had always been adopted by recluses, for it is almost the same coarse garb as that which Columella [de Re Rustica xi. 1] recommends for the farm serf in all weathers; "Vestitum . . . pellibus manicatis . . . vel sagis cucullis. Id si fiat nullus dies tam intolerabilis est, quo non sub divo aliquid moliri possit."

Gregory the Great, another member of the Anician family, a Benedictine monk, was the first of any religious order who became pontiff. Having devoted his property to the foundation of six monasteries in Sicily, he converted his palace on Mount Cœlius at Rome into a seventh, in which he had his cell as a monk; and Rome beheld with astonishment the rich young patrician, foremost hitherto in the gay and gallant show of life, relieving the poor at the gate of the convent, or performing menial acts for the brothers, to whose level he had descended by a self-sought poverty.

The election of Gregory as pope took place during a severe visitation of plague; and his first act was to form a litanical procession of all the monks and nuns that the city contained. Monte St. Angelo takes its name from the vision with which he was said to have been favoured, of an angel sheathing his sword upon the Moles Hadriana, the former name of the site. The humility of the monk is seen in the title that he first assumed, "Servus servorum Dei," to check the ambitious claim of John, Patriarch of Constantinople, as universal patriarch; though it has been asserted that the title belongs to an earlier date [Ducange; Schröckh, xvii. 78; Gieseler, I. ii. 411]. No Bishop of Rome has ever left more enduring traces of his pontificate than Gregory. His Sacramentary is in substance the Mass book of Rome at the present day. His "Tones" are the groundwork of all that is noble and impressive in the sacred melodies of the Church; and the Roman school of students from all nations gave Catholicity and permanence to the newly-awakened musical taste. Gregory never forgot the monk. In a council at Rome [A.D. 595], the Benedictine rule was confirmed; and [A.D. 601] a constitution, the Magna Charta of Monasticism, secured all conventual rights and privileges. One privilege, ruinous in its effects, appeared to be necessary when first granted. The mixture of races had introduced many elements of confusion among the secular clergy; wherever the peace of a convent seemed to be imperilled by the surrounding discord, exemption from episcopal authority was granted to it, whereby it was released from all external control—one sure cause of mischief. Thus certain cures in England, down to our own times, have claimed exemption from episcopal jurisdiction, as having been outlying cells of privileged monasteries. Gregory died [A.D. 604] in his fifty-fifth year, and in the fifteenth of his pontificate.

Passing over the establishment of Monasticism in Spain and Gaul, we proceed to trace its rise in the British Isles. St. Patrick is said, in one account of his life (according to the barbarous practice of the Celtic races, more difficult to eradicate than paganism), to have been sold as a youth of sixteen years, and carried as a slave to Ireland [A.D. 387-465]. Having recovered his liberty, he passed over to Gaul, and became an inmate of Marmoutier, "Martini Monasterium." He proceeded afterwards to Rome, and having been invested with the episcopal dignity, returned as missionary bishop to Ireland. During thirty-three years he worked at the conversion of the people to the Christian faith, and filled the island with schools and monasteries, the sites of which are still to be distinguished by the round towers that served as belfries for the conventual churches. The prefix "kill" is the Latin "cella," and marks the "religio loci" of innumerable localities in Ireland. Macaulay's assertion, as regards European monasteries in general, is especially true of Ireland; without these Christianizing institutions the population would have been made up of "beasts of burthen and beasts of prey" [H. E. i.]. The services that Monasticism has rendered to civilization in the transition of society from ancient times to the Middle Ages have been most important. Monks were the skilled agriculturists of the period; and many terms in rural life, and in the fauna and botany of all Northern Europe, may be traced back through them to Greek and Latin terms, e. g., "hawky," ὀίκι, harvest-home; "ranny," aranea, a shrew mouse; chervil, χηρόφυλλον. The belladonna that is now found indigenous, was introduced first among the pharmaceutical herbs of the convent garden; for the monks were the physicians of the period. As men of letters also, and energetic missionaries, they kept the lamp of knowledge and civilization from expiring in the very darkest periods, and whatever was done in the way of educating the young was carried on within the walls of the monastery.

Bangor (Bana-chor, "wide precinct") was the name of three important ecclesiastical sites. The original Irish monastery in county Down; the sister convent on the banks of the Dee in Flintshire, and the later episcopal see on the coast of Caernarvon, all bore the same name. The county Down monastery, on the north-west coast, and Clonfert, were towns of monks rather than monasteries; the former contained more than three thousand under religious vow in the time of Patricius. The founder having been accompanied by learned monks from Gaul and Lerins, these monasteries soon became renowned for their sound learning, as well as for a pure faith. The most steady adherents having been recruited from the race of bards, the harp has always been the emblem of the national religion. A missionary spirit always distinguished the Irish Church. Its monks, as hardy navigators, established themselves in the Hebrides, with Iona for its capital, and passed over to the western districts of Britain; from whence they settled upon the coast of Brittany, together with the British population expelled by Saxon invasion in the fourth and fifth centuries. It was a province of Gaul that had remained comparatively free from Roman rule, and had preserved old Celtic habits while the rest of Gaul was Romanized. The missionary spirit of his race impelled Columban to settle in Gaul, and to found the monastery of Luxeuil in Burgundy, the mother of numerous conventual establishments, and the capital of monastic Gaul. [Milman, Lat. Chr. iv. 5.] He has been termed the Irish Benedict; and various legends are connected with his name which are only reproductions of Benedictine fable. Though he treated the Roman See with respect, he never sacrificed his own independence of opinion to its authority; and he gives to the See of Jerusalem precedence in point of honour. [Ep. v. sec. 18.] He also gave his monks a rule, but its excessive severity prevented its extended use; and it was superseded by the Benedictine rule, which became the universal law of Monasticism. [Conc. Autun. A.D. 670.]

In England, all our most ancient sees have been established upon pre-existing monastic foundations. At the close of the fifth century, Dubricius, Bishop of Caerleon, founded Llandaff monastery. St. David, his successor at Caerleon, built the monastery at St. David's on a site indicated to him by St. Patrick, the wild promontory on which the cathedral now stands. He also rebuilt the convent of Glastonbury; and it was in honour of St. David that the privilege of asylum was indulged to sites in any way connected with his name—a privilege that may occasionally have secured innocence against oppression and wrong, but which became intolerable from abuse in later days. St. Asaph, in its origin, was a convent of nine hundred and sixty-five monks, founded at the end of the sixth century by Kentigern, himself a monk and missionary bishop among the southern Scots and Picts. Bangor on the Dee was founded by Iltud, a fellow-disciple with St. David at St. Germain of Auxerre. It contained within its "wide precincts" a whole army of monks. Yet it was little more than half the size of the Irish establishment of the same name, which numbered three thousand monks. The diocese of Bangor owes its origin to the foundation of Daniel, a disciple of Dubricius, at the commencement of the sixth century. Winchester, first established as a monastery by Cenwalch, King of Wessex, under promise to his dying father, was made an episcopal see by the same king about the middle of the seventh century. Ripon was a monastery founded by Alfrid, King of Northumberland, having Wilfrid for its first abbot. He repaired and beautified the cathedral of York, of which see he became bishop, and built the priory of Hexham in the most costly style; the church was said to have been the most beautiful on this side the Alps. Wilfrid was the first of a series of clerical and monastic architects who for several centuries made Anglican ecclesiastical buildings the glory of Europe. It is curious to find that the churchwarden's sovereign cure for all defects was also introduced by him: "Parietes lavans . . . alba calce mirifice dealbavit" [Montalemb. iv. 235]. Ely was at first a double monastery for monks and nuns of the foundation of Etheldreda, Queen of Northumberland, "virgo bis nupta."

Columba, like Pelagius, is the classical equivalent for a Celtic name. He is not to be confounded with Columban, the Celtic founder of

Luxeuil. Columba [born A.D. 521, died A.D. 597] was of the royal race of Neill, masters of Ireland and of the west coast of Scotland. Columba, himself a monk, founded thirty-seven monasteries in Ireland; and passing over to the Hebrides, selected Iona, the most desolate of these desolate islands, flat-lying and sandy, as the site of a monastery which was destined eventually to become the "glory of the West," and the cradle of civilization in North Britain. He was famed for a poetic vein, and for his passionate love of beautiful MSS., some traces of which still exist in our libraries. He is said to have transcribed three hundred copies of the Gospels with his own hand; but, as Montalembert observes, three hundred and three thousand seem the only numbers known to early Irish story. The Druids attempted in vain to check the progress of the religion which he preached and practised. From Iona Aidan went forth as the Apostle and Bishop of the Northumbrians, and having found a site as desolate and unattractive as Iona in Lindisfarne (since Holy Island), there founded a monastery, which became the mother Church of all the provinces north of the Humber. The character of sanctity impressed upon it by St. Aidan long distinguished it; and its abbots, like himself, mostly became bishops of the northern provinces. His great and benevolent character has been nobly drawn by Bede [H. E. iii. 3, 5, 17]. Hilda, foundress [A.D. 658] and Abbess of Whitby, received the veil from him. The feminine love of whatever is beautiful in nature led to the selection of a most noble site for her abbey, and contrasts strongly with the masculine austerity and contempt for æsthetics that led the Celtic monks to choose Iona and Lindisfarne. The Benedictines also, with a keen perception of the beautiful, placed their monasteries where the loveliness of nature was most likely to draw up the affections of the religious to heaven, and their names were generally descriptive of the sites. The influence of Hilda was everywhere felt; kings and princes sought her counsel; she was a "mother" by endearment to the very poorest who received alms at the abbey gate. Bede [H. E. iv. 23] speaks in enthusiastic terms of her tender care and administrative tact. A convent for monks as well as nuns was under her rule, and Bede notes that six prelates, eminent for their piety and learning, received their training at Whitby under her eye. To Hilda also we are indebted for having drawn the earliest Saxon poet, Cædmon, from his obscurity. He was a common herdsman, but at her persuasion became a monk. He anticipated Milton in taking as the theme for poetic song the fall of Satan and the sin of our first parents. The Saxon name for Whitby was Streaneshalc, the "beacon site." It was at Whitby that the first Witenagemot, "Synodus Pharensis," was held, which clearly distinguished between Lords and Commons [A.D. 664], and which settled the observance of Easter in accordance with the Roman rule. It was no longer, however, the old QUARTODECIMAN controversy which divided the Church, but the choice lay between two lunar cycles: the Roman, which had been found faulty, and the Alexandrian, which is still followed, and determines the incidence of Easter between the limits of March 22nd and April 24th. In consequence of this diversity, Oswy, King of Northumberland, celebrated Easter by Alexandrian rule while his Queen Eanfleda was observing Palm Sunday, and was preparing herself for the fast of Holy Week. The foundation of Wearmouth Abbey by Benedict Biscop, a monk of Lindisfarne [A.D. 665], was remarkable for the introduction of painted glass. Workmen were brought over from the Continent, who instructed the Saxon monks in the mystery of their craft. [Milman, Lat. Chr. iv. 4.]

The sister foundation at Jarrow, endowed with a domain granted by Egfrid, was the monastery in which the Venerable Bede had his cell.

In South Britain the most ancient monastery was that founded by Augustine at Canterbury, and placed under Benedictine rule. The deed of gift whereby King Ethelbert conveyed the site [A.D. 605] is the earliest existing document of our public records [Palgrave, Br. C.]. The founder's private copies of the Gospels are still preserved in Corpus College, Cambridge, and in the Bodleian. Gregory followed up the mission with a colony of monks, who also imported all that could be required for the observance of the Romish ritual; and the nucleus of an ecclesiastical library, that still existed in the reign of Henry VIII. Thus the subjugation of England to the See of Rome was the work of Benedictine monks. One of their number, Mellitus, first Bishop of London, founded Westminster Abbey. The vault at St. Paul's that preserves the remains of Nelson and Wellington bears his name; neither is there anything incongruous in the association. A heart of truest heroism has often beat beneath the gown of the monk; and great men, of whatever caste, have only become great by obeying the dictates of duty.

The first metropolitan recognised by all England was Theodore, an Oriental monk, native of Tarsus, and placed in the See of Canterbury by Pope Vitalianus, A.D. 668. The council held at Whitby on the subject of Easter [A.D. 664], showed that strong traces still remained of the Oriental tendencies of the British Church; and an African monk, Adrian, was sent with the bishop elect, as a safeguard and trusty envoy, "ne quid ille contrarium veritati et fidei, Græcorum more, in ecclesiam cui præesset, introduceret" [Bede, H. E. iv. 1]. To him is due the creation of the parochial system, by persuading the territorial lords to build and endow churches, retaining the advowson in their own hands. The Church-rate is of co-ordinate date. Theodore was a laborious student, and with the aid of Adrian he gradually made the monasteries of England schools of sound learning. Every father throughout the land was expected to teach his children the Lord's Prayer and the Creed in the vulgar tongue. The principal sees having sprung from a monastic origin, the canons were naturally monks; after the Conquest, disputes arose between the secular and regular, i.e. between the parochial and monastic clergy; and an attempt was made by Walkelin, Bishop of Winchester, to supersede the monastic chapter by a body of forty secular clergy. Lanfranc however vigorously opposed the change, and obtained from Pope Alexander a constitution in confirmation of the capitular rights of the monasteries affected [Fleury, H. E. lxi. 53].

The example of Gregory in forming the nucleus of an ecclesiastical library at Canterbury was copied elsewhere by others [Muratori, Storia d. lit. It. iii. 29]. Monasteries were the sole preservers of learning in the darker ages that followed. The Benedictines, bound by the rules of their order to mental as well as bodily labour, performed a work that has been of priceless value. That anything at all has come down to us from classical antiquity is owing in great part to their diligence as transcribers. Gerbert, an abbot, and afterwards Pope Silvester II. [A.D. 999], speaks of his care in collecting books, and of the host of copiers that were found in every town: "Tu sai con quanta premura io raccolga da ogni parte libri; tu sai quanti scrittori e nelle città e nelle ville d' Italia in ogni luogo s' incontrino" [Murat. Lit. It. III. i. 29]. Desiderius, Abbot of Monte Casino, and subsequently Pope Victor III., employed many copyists, "antiquarii" as they were called [Muratori, Stor. IV. xxviii.; Mabillon, Act. Bened.]. Three offsets from the Benedictine stock have also rendered invaluable services to literature; the Cluniac monks, dating from the early part of the tenth century; the Carthusians [A.D. 1084]; and the Cistercians [A.D. 1090]. They created a craving for the luxury of books beautifully written and sumptuously illuminated; and libraries, gradually increasing in number and size, soon grew up from their labours. "It was their pride to collect, and their business to transcribe books" [Hallam, L. Mid. A. i. 82]; and their collections were the "germ from whence a second and more glorious civilization" should in due time spring [Macaulay, H. E. c. 1].

The multiplication of monastic orders was owing to the steady flow of the tide of corruption, "in negotiis religionis facilius possunt nova fundari quam vetera reparari" [Pet. Clun. Ep. i. 23]. Thus, when the Benedictines evaded the severity of their rule by qualifying glosses, the Cluniac order arose; but beginning in the tenth century with a strict rule, they sunk into luxury in the twelfth; the Cistercians started to shame them, but soon lost all moral vigour; next the Franciscan mendicants appeared, but degenerated more completely in the first quarter of a century after their introduction into England, than other orders had in three or four centuries [Matt. Paris, A.D. 1243. See Brakelond, Chron. Abb. S. Edmundi.; Tho. Elmham, Hist. Mon. St. Aug. Cantuar.; Hugh de Poictiers, Monastère de Vezelai.] The orders that preserved themselves most free from corruption were the Carthusians, the Trappists, and the Jesuits, if these latter may be classed with monks. They mixed more freely with the world, and the average yearly cost for maintaining each Jesuit was £25 as set against £18 for the Benedictine monk. [JESUITISM.]

The account of Monasticism need not be carried further; its history thus far has declared the distinctive character that its founders impressed upon it. The good that it achieved for the Church in the Middle Ages cannot be overvalued. The picture drawn by Manzoni in the Promesi Sposi, though imaginary, is a true representation of the monk in days of darkness and oppression, when every mountain fastness was the seat of a titled brigand, and a trembling peasantry could only suffer where they dared not complain. The monk alone upheld God's controversy against the perpetrator of rapine and wrong. And when the infliction of plague executed upon earth the judgment of Heaven, when friend and kinsman fled in terror from the stricken victim, the monk remained faithful to his mission: he administered comfort both to body and soul, nor shrunk from contact that was only too likely to prove the touch of death. The scholar may speak with especial gratitude of the labours of the learned monks of the order of St. Benedict. [Reyneri, Disceptatio Historica. Herzog, *W. MONITION. A formal notice from a bishop to one of the subordinate clergy requiring the amendment of some ecclesiastical offence. The General admonition was anciently made publicly and solemnly, so that it could come to the knowledge of the person in fault; and when it expressed his name it was called Nominal. Lindewood defines canonical monition as requiring three several proclamations, or one for all, with a proper interval of time allowed. The name of the person should be distinctly mentioned, where law or custom demand it; this is called monition "in specie:" a general monition being known as "in genere." A public monition in synod by the bishop is equivalent to three monitions otherwise given. If the offender did not comply after the third monition he was formally subjected to excommunication, because the term, distinctly named, gave to the monition the character of an introductory sentence, and after its expiration no offer of explanation was admitted. No monition is required when the superior gives sentence of excommunication, or when an inferior does not submit to his superior in the discharge of his special right, as in the office of visitation; or after he has been visited when he refuses to pay procurations which are due; as these are cases of positive and manifest contumacy. But if the superior proceeds as judge, and punishes offences, past or present, monition is necessary before the fulmination of the ecclesiastical censure. Although three monitions were held to be fair, yet one would suffice, provided that a suitable delay elapsed between it and the sentence.

Any incumbent or curate allowing unauthorized persons to officiate in his church, is liable to be called before the bishop in person, and to be publicly or privately monished. When a living has been for one year sequestered, the person who holds it, if he neglects the bishop's monition to reside, is deprived; and so also for drunkenness, or gross immorality, after monition.

Sentence of suspension ought not to be given without a previous admonition, unless where the offence is of such a nature as to require immediate suspension; and if in ordinary cases suspension should be given without monition, there may be cause of appeal.

MONOPHYSITISM. A designation by which the distinctive heresy of a large number of Eastern sects is characterized, viz. the tenet that there is only one Nature [μόνη φύσις] in our Lord Jesus Christ. This heresy originated with Eutyches [EUTYCHIANISM]. After Eutyches its chief supporter was Dioscorus, Patriarch of Alexandria, who presided over the Eutychian Council of Ephesus, the "Latrocinium," and who was deposed by that of Chalcedon [A.D. 451]. Proterius, Archpriest of Alexandria, became his lawful successor, but many of the Alexandrians still acknowledged Dioscorus as their patriarch. These latter assumed, or received, the name of Monophysites, while the orthodox were stigmatized as Melchites or royalists, because the Emperor Marcian had supported the decision of the council. Monophysitism broke up into a great number of sects, and thoroughly corrupted the Church of Egypt and Syria. In later ages those who hold the heresy have been called "Jacobites," either (as they themselves assert) after St. James the Less, or because Dioscorus was named James before he became patriarch, or (as is most likely) from Jacobus Zanzalus, Bishop of Edessa in the latter half of the sixth century. [Dict. of SECTS and HERESIES.]

MONOTHELITISM. A heresy which arose in the early part of the seventh century, the distinctive feature of which is the dogma that, although our Lord had two Natures, the Divine and the Human, yet since these were united in one Person, there must necessarily have been but one will [μόνον θέλημα]. The name Μονοθελῆται is first found in St. John Damascene.

This subtle phase of a misbelief respecting our Lord's Human Nature which troubled the Church for many centuries, is said to have originated with Theodore, Bishop of Pharan in Arabia, of whom nothing else is known. The opinion was taken up by Sergius, the Patriarch of Constantinople, and received a great impetus from being set before the Emperor Heraclius by Athanasius, the Jacobite Patriarch of Antioch [A.D. 629], as the foundation for a compromise between the Monophysites and the orthodox. The Emperor adopted the opinion with some enthusiasm, and placed Cyrus, Bishop of Phasis, one of its chief supporters, in the see of Alexandria for the purpose of carrying out the proposed scheme of comprehension. A council was held in that city, at which nine articles were agreed to, the seventh affirming that one Divine Will governed both the Divine and the Human actions of our Lord. The words are τὸν αὐτὸν ἕνα Χριστὸν καὶ υἱὸν ἐνεργοῦντα τὰ θεοπρεπῆ καὶ ἀνθρώπινα μιᾷ θεανδρικῇ ἐνεργείᾳ [Gies. ii. 173], being so given in an epistle of Sergius to Pope Honorius, to which the articles of agreement are affixed [Mansi, Concil. xi. 561, 563]. Sophronius, afterwards Patriarch of Jerusalem, opposed the new dogma with great zeal, and sent Stephen, Bishop of Dora, to Honorius, beseeching him to use his influence in suppressing it. The Pope, however, signified his agreement with Sergius, and admonished Sophronius to abstain from teaching two operations of will in Christ. The Monothelite heresy was condemned in a Lateran Council held in A.D. 649, and more authoritatively by the sixth Œcumenical Council, that of Constantinople [A.D. 680]. In the thirteenth session of this council, Honorius was anathematized in company with Theodore, Sergius, and others, as having followed them in the heresy [Mansi, Concil. xi. 556, 622, 655]. This anathema was confirmed by Leo II., who wrote to the Emperor Constantine Pogonatus: "Anathematizamus . . . nec non et Honorium, qui hanc apostolicam ecclesiam non apostolicæ traditionis doctrina lustravit, sed profana proditione immaculatam subvertere conatus est" [ibid. 731; see also Ep. ii. ad Episc. Hisp., ibid. 1052, and Ep. ad Ervig., ibid. 1057]. Succeeding Popes for three centuries invariably repeated this confirmation in the profession of faith which they made at the time of their accession [Pusey's Eirenicon, iii. 198]. But the spread of Mahometanism, and the rise of the Iconoclastic controversy, thrust aside Monothelitism, and it has never been definitely revived.

The theological error of this opinion is in reality a consequence of that which is embodied in the Monophysite or Eutychian heresy, and, however subtle the language which may have been used by the Monothelites, they could not logically escape from a denial of our Lord's perfect humanity. To the Divine Nature of Christ belongs a Divine Will, to the Human Nature belongs also a Human Will, or the latter cannot be complete. The Divine Will belongs to the equality of His Godhead with the Father: the Human Will to the inferiority of His Manhood to the Father. Hence our Lord speaks of His human will as distinct from the will of the Father, "I seek not Mine own will, but the will of the Father Which hath sent Me" [John v. 30]; "I came down from heaven, not to do Mine own will, but the will of Him that sent Me" [John vi. 38]; "not My will but Thine be done" [Luke xxii. 42]. And as it was part of Christ's work that He should learn obedience through suffering, so the subjugation of His free human will to perfect obedience to the Divine will is shewn to be the very climax of His work: a fact which is in itself an entire confutation of the heresy of the Monothelites. [Dict. of SECTS and HERESIES.]

MONTANISM. A heresy of very early date, originating with Montanus of Pepuza in Phrygia, whence Montanists were also called Cataphrygians and Pepuzians.

Montanus seems to have been a priest of Cybele, Didymus saying that he had formerly been ἱερεὺς εἰδώλου [Didym. de Trin. iii.], and St Jerome speaking of him as "abscissum et semivirum" [Jerom. Ep. xxvii. ad Marcell.]. He began to assert his antichristian pretensions about A.D. 140 [Apollonius ap. Euseb. H. Ecc. v. 18, Epiphan. Hær. li. 33]; though Eusebius, in his Chronicles, dates the commencement of the sect in A.D. 172. At some time, certainly, in the middle of the second century, Montanus proclaimed it to be his mission to complete, in his person and by his system, the perfection of the Church, which had hitherto been waiting for the Paraclete, of which he seems to have almost professed to be a kind of incarnation. In aid of his blasphemous pretensions he associated with himself two fanatical women, Maximilla and Priscilla, as prophetesses, established an ascetic system among his followers which was dangerously attractive, and promised the immediate approach of a Millennium.

Although Montanus himself claimed a position and office which was quite inconsistent with Christianity, it appears as if his followers gave up these pretensions after his death, and that the Montanism of a later period was little more than a very strict system of asceticism and ecclesiastical discipline, maintained by a sect which had separated from the Church, but which professed to retain the belief and practice of the Church in their integrity. They looked upon themselves as "spiritual" and other Christians as "carnal," on account of their own professed strictness of life, and the laxness with which they charged those who were not of their body. Montanus seems to have been ultimately considered as one to whom the Holy Spirit had made special revelations respecting Christian perfection: in supposed obedience to which very long and stringent fasts were established; celibacy exalted to an extravagant degree of importance, and martyrdom sought rather as a duty than accepted as a privilege. Their penitential system was very strict, since they refused to receive back any sinners to communion, however penitent, at any time of their lives. Attracted by such strict discipline, the great Tertullian joined their community in the latter part of his life; and this fact is almost a guarantee that the early pretensions of the sect had been very much modified. Nothing is heard of the Montanists after the sixth century. [Dict. of SECTS and HERESIES.]

MORALITY, NATURAL. So much of the glory of man's origin remains in him, that even when farthest removed from the light and grace of Christ's presence in the Church, he retains some spark of that divine conscience which is derived from Him, "the true Light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world" [John i. 9]. Hence a knowledge of good and evil, some sense of responsibility to God, and some capacity for practical virtue, may be possessed even by persons not Christians, those of them at least who have not been brought within reach of the Church, with its revelation of truth, and its sacraments of grace. Of such St. Paul speaks in Rom. ii. 14, or, at least his words respecting the Gentiles which had not the Jewish "law" may be fairly interpreted as extending also to those who have not the Christian law. They may do by nature some of those duties which are extended and heightened by grace, and may thus be "not far from the kingdom of God."

To what extent such natural morality now exists (after eighteen centuries of Christianity) it is impossible to say. Probably to a very small extent. Neither can we define the position in the future life of those heathen who have possessed it. Hoping and believing that every really good man will receive his reward from God, we have yet far too little evidence of real goodness among those who have never heard of Christ to justify any relaxation of the missionary works of the Church. On the other hand, if it is found that there is real goodness here and there among those who have only natural religion—the fragmentary relic of original grace—to guide and help them, such evidence offers great encouragement to those who are engaged in such missionary works. Heathen who are advanced even this small distance on the way of holiness are those of whom it may be hoped that they may be cut out of the olive tree which is wild by nature, and grafted by the supernatural work of grace into the good Olive Tree to partake of His root and fatness.

It may be added that the Thirteenth Article of Religion, "Of works before Justification," refers to those who are within reach of supernatural grace, not to heathen who have never heard of Christ, the Church, or the Sacraments. [CONGRUITY. RELIGION, NATURAL.]

MORAVIANISM. The "Hernnhuters," "United Brethren" (Unitas Fratrum), or "Moravian Brethren," claim to be descended from the "Bohemian Brethren" of Bohemia and Moravia, who looked up to John Huss as their founder; and also to be the representatives of the first Bohemian Christians, who had been converted by Paulician missionaries in the ninth century. This claim is, however, entirely unhistorical, the sole foundation for it being that the sect originated with a small number of refugee Moravians, who formed a sort of Socialist community and adopted Pietistic principles in the year 1722. The original leader of the community was a carpenter named Christian David, a Roman Catholic of Moravia, who had been obliged to leave his native country and take refuge in Saxony. There he was brought under the notice of Count Zinzendorf, a disciple of Spener, and an enthusiastic Pietist, who allowed David and his friends, to the number of ten, to form a settlement on his estate at Bethelsdorf. Fresh refugees soon came to the settlement, which grew into a village and received the name of Hernnhut, from which the German name of the sect originated. They called themselves the "Unitas Fratrum," and as the community grew in numbers those members of it who had come from Moravia formed only a small part of the body, so that the name by which they are known in England is rather calculated to mislead.

Shortly after the establishment of Hernnhut, Count Zinzendorf became the head of the community. He was then a young man, fresh from the Universities of Halle and Wittenberg, having been born in 1700, but he seems to have had a capacity for organization and leadership, such as was found in his friend John Wesley, and he remained at the head of all the Moravian communities in Europe until his death in 1760. There was, however, this essential distinction between Wesley and Zinzendorf, that while the former organized the "United Society" for reviving practical religion in the Church, without contemplating the formation of a sect [METHODISM], the latter intended the "United Brethren," or "Moravians," to be a sect from the beginning of their existence. From A.D. 1736 to 1747 Zinzendorf was banished from Saxony on the ground of introducing innovations into Lutheranism. During that time his colony at Hernnhut continued in quiet possession, and won the admiration of Wesley, who visited it in 1739. Meanwhile, Zinzendorf founded branches of his sect in Holland, Prussia, England, and America. At Chelsea, near London, he bought a large mansion, Lindsey House, and established a community there, similar to the one at Hernnhut, the memory of which is still kept up by a burial-ground, and by the building which was his meeting-house, the two having originally formed the stable and stable-yard of Sir Thomas More's mansion, Beaufort House. In 1734, Zinzendorf was surreptitiously (i.e. under a false name) admitted to the Lutheran ministry; but he was openly appointed "Bishop" of the Moravians, at the request of the Prussian King, in 1737. Some of his latter years were spent in a second visit to America, where he was authorized by Act of Parliament to establish Moravian settlements. But he returned to Hernnhut, married a second wife, and remained there as the head of his new sect until his death on May 9th, 1760.

The doctrinal aspect of Moravianism may be defined as that of Pietistic Lutheranism. Moravians are officially recognised in Germany as accepting the AUGSBURG CONFESSION, but their relation to Lutheranism is not more close than that of the Methodists to the Church of England. The fanaticism of the sect was at one time its most conspicuous feature, shewing itself in the repudiation of all means of grace, and in assumptions of a union with Christ, which were expressed in such shocking terms as to impress even hard-headed men like Bishop Warburton with the idea that Moravians were persons of grossly immoral lives. These extravagances of expression were cultivated in their sermons and hymns, and in all their acts of worship, and their hymns bear witness to it to this day. Apart from such extravagances, their principles may be considered as very similar to those of the Evangelical school in the Church of England, being chiefly distinguished by the idea of union with Christ independently of sacraments, and of justification by faith alone irrespective of good works. Circumstances over which they had no control preserved to the English school of Evangelicals a valid priesthood and episcopate: but that of the Moravians is a mere human institution, having no association with any chain of Apostolical succession from our Lord.

The Moravians have always been noticeable for an earnest missionary spirit. In various parts of the world they have about three hundred missionaries at work, chiefly among the Negroes of the West Indies, the Hottentots of Africa, and the Esquimaux tribes of Greenland. There are very few of the sect now in England, but those few are energetic promoters of this missionary work, and doubtless a large amount of good is done by their labours. MORMONISM. A grotesque, but pernicious imposture, not deserving to be called a Christian sect, which takes its name from a pretended revelation of its principles contained in "The Book of Mormon." The teachers and victims of this imposture assume the name of "Latter-Day Saints," but they also accept the popular designation by which they are known, that of "Mormons."

The founder of Mormonism was an ignorant American farmer named Joseph Smith, born in 1805 at Sharon, Windsor county, in the State of Vermont. At the age of fourteen he was brought under the influence of some of the fanatic Methodists of the United States at one of their revivals, and after four years of "prayer and meditation," he received "angelic visits," the most remarkable of which were on the night of September 21st, 1823, when an angel told him that his sins were forgiven, that the Second Advent was drawing near, and that he, Smith, was chosen to prepare the way for it. The angelic visitor gave him "a brief sketch of the origin, progress, civilization, laws, and government" of the aborigines of America, and told him where to find some golden plates on which the records of their ancient prophets were written. Smith professed to have received these plates on September 22nd, 1827, and with them a pair of crystal spectacles, which he called "Urim and Thummim," and by means of which he avowed that he was able to read the "reformed Egyptian" characters in which the records of ancient America, from the time of the dispersion at Babel, were written on the golden plates. These plates were never made visible to any one but Smith; but what he pretended to read from them (while concealed behind a screen) was written out by an amanuensis, Smith himself being unable to write. The Book of Mormon was printed in 1830, and was eventually shewn to be a somewhat interpolated version of a fictitious history of aboriginal America, which had been written some twenty years before by a Presbyterian preacher named Solomon Spalding. This was proved by the affidavits of Spalding's widow, his brother, and his partner in a business which he followed; and a facsimile of one of the plates of "reformed Egyptian" characters was shewn by Professor Anson to be a mere medley of badly formed letters taken from Greek, Hebrew, and English alphabets, ending with a Mexican hieroglyph copied from a work of Humboldt, but nothing which could be called "Egyptian." The book itself answers to its description as an historical romance, and its religious character is also consistent with the Presbyterian origin to which it was traced. It contains many allusions to modern religious controversies, and expressly condemns infant baptism, polygamy, and freemasonry.

In 1830 Smith and his fellow-impostors, Cowdery, Harris, Whitner, and Rigdon (the latter of whom seems to have been the chief inventor of the details of the imposture) opened a "Church of Latter-Day Saints" in the town of Manchester, New York. From thence they were soon driven by persecution to Kirtland in Ohio, where they professed to found the "New Jerusalem" and to establish the Millennium. Here they persevered in the face of very severe treatment from 1834 to 1838, when the leaders of the community having been detected in gross commercial imposture, they migrated still further west to Illinois; where, in the midst of a wilderness, they shortly established a settlement of many thousands, calling their town "Nauvoo," the City of Beauty. Here Smith professed to have a revelation enjoining him to practise polygamy. When this revelation extended the license to others, on July 12th, 1843, he began to be looked upon as a public enemy; and having been imprisoned by the Governor of Illinois, he was eventually shot by a lynch mob which broke into his prison on June 27th, 1844.

After the death of Smith, the "Council of twelve Apostles" elected Brigham Young as his successor; and in the following year a further general emigration of the Mormons was organized, the place of settlement ultimately fixed on being that now well known as Utah, in the valley of the great Salt Lake, in Upper California. Here a large population has gathered, many thousands having emigrated even from our own country, chiefly from among the Methodists of Wales and the west of England.

Looked at from a theological point of view, Mormonism must be regarded as an ignorantly amalgamated compound of Materialism and the lower phases of American Methodism. The systematic profligacy which, under the name of polygamy, has been so conspicuous a feature of Mormon life for a quarter of a century, shews however, that the opinions of Mormons are regulated by their feelings; for polygamy is forbidden by the Book of Mormon, and has been adopted on the authority of a pretended revelation given at a later date. Whatever definite principles of religion there are among them, are in fact those of a few half-educated persons here and there, such as one Orson Pratt, their most prolific writer and apologist; and although a profession of Christianity like that above indicated may have been made by the leaders of the community, such a profession is no standard of belief among those who claim to receive revelations on every convenient occasion by which inconvenient articles of belief may be superseded.

As a religion, Mormonism is the most contemptible invention of the kind that ever obtruded itself on mankind, but it has proved itself to possess great charms for the ignorant classes of English speaking people, and there is reason to fear that its dangerous influence will be still very much extended notwithstanding all our civilization and culture. MORTAL SIN. [SIN.]

MORTIFICATION. This term is twice used in the Authorized Version. First in Rom. viii. 13, "For if ye live after the flesh, ye shall die" [μέλλετε ἀποθνήσκειν], "but if ye through the Spirit do mortify [θανατοῦτε] the deeds of the body, ye shall live." Secondly, in Coloss. iii. 5, "Mortify," [Νεκρώσατε] "therefore, your members which are upon the earth." In both cases the Apostle uses the words so rendered as a strong antithesis to Life and Resurrection in Christ; the idea being that of severe subjugation of whatsoever ministers to sin, that the grace of God may gain more power over our nature. [ASCETICISM.]

MOTHER OF GOD. [THEOTOKOS.]

MOZARABIC LITURGY. The term Mozarabic is the participial form of the tenth Arabic conjugation, in which the action and inflexion of a verb is communicated to a noun. Thus from "Arab" is formed "Estarab," to Arabize, and the participle Mostarab, one who has thus adopted the Arab mode of life. This word, by transposition of two letters, easily became Mozarab. The term applied in the first instance to those members of the African and Spanish Churches, and Jews, who from fear of persecution adopted the ways and customs of their Arab rulers; abstaining from meats forbidden by the religion of the Korân, and submitting to the rite of circumcision. [Fleury, H. E. iv. 48.] It is not clear how this designation came to be applied to the Liturgy so called, but probably it was connected with it at a much later date than the original introduction of the Liturgy itself into Spain.

The Mozarabic Liturgy is the most perfect extant form of the ancient Gallican and still more ancient Ephesine Liturgy. Its history was lost in antiquity even in the seventh century, Isidore speaking of it as composed by St. Peter [de Eccl. Off. i. 15]. Had it been introduced, as Pinius supposes [de Lit. Moz. ii. 1], by the Goths in the preceding century, its modern and foreign origin must have been well known to Isidore. Its similarity to the Gallican Liturgy, however, effectually disproves this notion; which was so great that Charles the Bald mistook it for the old national liturgy of Gaul, which his ancestor Charlemagne suppressed that he might establish the Roman Use. [Ep. ad Presb. Ravenn.] Two centuries later [A.D. 1060], the Mozarabic Liturgy was silenced in Arragon for the same reason, though it was still heard in Navarre, Castille, and Leon till A.D. 1074, when Sancho III. of Navarre introduced the Roman Order, to the great regret of the people, who consoled themselves eharacteristieally with a proverb, "Quo volunt reges vadunt leges" [Roderie. Tolet. De Reb. Hisp. vi. 26]. Cardinal Ximenes revived it in the beginning of the sixteenth century by endowing a ehantry at Toledo for its peeuliar use; where it has been preserved down to these times. In comparing together the various liturgies of antiquity, eare must be taken to separate from the rest the most ancient part or eanon, corresponding with the prayer in our own liturgy that follows the Ter Sanetus, and the prayer of Consecration. This portion was invariably the same for all festivals in the Roman Order; in the Mozarabie it varied with the varying year. [Mabillon, Lit. Gall.]. The groundwork of it is of the highest antiquity; Vigilius, Bishop of Rome [Ep. ad Eucher.], says "we have reeeived from Apostolie tradition the text of the eanon prayer." The same writer distinguishes the "Missa" prayers from the canon, as "preees" and "eapitula." They are variable and of different dates. The number and order of prayers in each Missa are uniform, but in substance they vary with the varying season. A eolleetion of these Missal prayers, apart from the canon, was the "Saeramentary;" such a eollection was first made by Gelasius [A.D. 492], and was published by Thomasius [Cod. Sacr. Rom. A.D. 1680] from a MS. of the sixth century in the eolleetion of the Queen of Sweden. The order of the Mozarabie Liturgy differs materially from that of the Roman, but agrees, with slight variation of eolleets and lessons, with the Gallican, of which it is the sister [Lesleius, Pref. in Miss. Mozarab. see. 5, 6]. It is of Oriental east, for Gaul reeeived the gospel from Eastern missionaries at an earlier date than Spain, and its eeelesiastieal records reach mueh further back. Pothinus, Bishop of Lyons, had suffered martyrdom nearly a hundred years before we read of a Spanish bishop [Cypr. Ep. Syn. lxvii.], and, five years later, of a Spanish martyr [A.D. 259. Ruinart, Act. Mart. 219]. Mabillon gives two speeimens of the Mozarabie Liturgy, the service for Advent Sunday, and that for the Nativity [Lit. Gall. 440, 453]; in which the eanon as well as the Missal prayers are varied. The different parts of the Roman Liturgy [Gregorian] are as follows:—Antiphon or introit, Kyrie eleëson, Gloria in excelsis, colleets, epistle, gradual psalm with hallelujah, gospel, offertory, secret prayer, prefaee, trisagion, canon, Lord's Prayer, Agnus Dei, eommunion antiphon, postcommunion prayer, blessing. The homily follows the "offertory," and the osculum paeis the Agnus Dei. No heresy having arisen in the Roman Chureh, the Nieene Creed was not reeited, until it was introdueed by the order of the Emperor Henry I. The Mozarabic order is thus described by Isidore of Seville, as consisting of seven parts: "The first prayer is invitatory, that all may be urged to the aet of prayer; the second is invoeatory, that God may vouehsafe to accept the prayers of the faithful and their oblation; the third is for those that offer, and for the faithful dead, that by this saerifice they may obtain pardon; the fourth introduces the kiss of peaee and eharity, that all being reconciled may worthily have fellowship through the Saerament of the Body and Blood of Christ; the fifth is the "illatio" for the eonsecration of the offering, in whieh the whole universe of terrestrial ereatures, and of the heavenly host, is bidden to the praise of God, and Hosanna in the highest is sung; the sixth is as a confirmation of the Saerament, that the oblation made to God and eonsecrated by the Holy Spirit, may be eonfirmed as the Body and Blood of Christ; the last is the Lord's Prayer." [Isidor. Hisp. de Div. Off.] The existing Liturgy agrees elosely with this; and as compared with the Ordo Romanus, its various parts are—An introductory antiphon or introit, with hallelujah and doxology, "Glory and honour" to the Father, &c.; on festivals, "Gloria in exeelsis;" 1st colleet for peaeeful eelebration; salutation "Dominus vobiseum," and response; lesson from Old Testament, prefaeed by the people with "Deo Gratias," and coneluded by a general "Amen;" salutation and response, then a gradual or versieles from a psalm; the deaeon proelaims, "Silentium faeite," then the epistle, prefaeed and eoncluded as before; salutation and response; then the gospel, prefaeed with "Gloria tibi Domine," and coneluded with "Amen;" salutation and response, hallelujah and versiele, while the priest offers the Host with the Cup; four prayers "Aeeeptabilis sit . . . hæc oblatio," "Offerimus tibi Domine calieem," "Hane oblationem," "In spiritu humilitatis;" "Adjuvate me fratres;" then the offertory antiphon or "saerifieium," while the bread and wine is offered on the altar, which concludes the Missa Cateehumenorum. The priest washes his hands, and with three fingers extended, blesses in silenee the oblation in the name of the Holy Trinity; he prays also in silenee for his own sanctifieation; the Missa here begins with the salutation and response, and prayer for a pure eonscienee and holy faith; amen and "Hagios, hagios, hagios, Rex æterne, tibi laudes et gratias;" preface eommending to the prayers of the eongregation the lapsed, prisoners, siek, and wayfarers; prayer for purifieation from sin and for dread of judgment; offering of the Church for the living, and eommemoration by name of the saints in glory, and of those who have gone to their rest; prayer "post nomina" to keep us in the faith and fear of God, who is the life of the living, healing to the siek, and the rest of all the faithful who have departed this life; the prayer of peace, with the "oseulum." Pr. "Introibo ad altare Dei." R. "Ad Deum qui lætifieat juventutem meam." Pr. "Aures ad Dominum." R. "Habemus ad Dominum." Pr. "Sursum corda." R. "Levamus ad Dominum." Pr. "Deo ae Domino nostro Jesu Christo Filio Dei qui est in eœlis, dignas laudes dignasque gratias referamus." R. "Dignum et justum est;" the "illatio" or prefatory prayer adapted to the season; Ter Sanctus; eanon or prayer of eonsecration, in silenee, the Host and the cup veiled with the filiola, are elevated at the words of Institution, and the words "in meam commemorationem" are uttered aloud, as is the text "quotiescunque manducaveritis," &c.; the prayer "Post pridie" for profitable communion. Then the priest unveils the chalice, and places upon it the Host, repeating the antiphon which is called "ad confractionem." The Host is elevated without the chalice and held over it till the end of the Symbolum, introduced with the words "Fidem quam corde credimus ore autem dicamus;" the Nicene Creed is repeated by the priest, the choir, and the congregation; then follows the breaking of the bread into nine pieces, which are arranged crucially on the paten, each having its particular name, e.g., Corporatio, Nativitas, Circumcisio, Apparitio, Passio, Mors, Resurrectio, Gloria, and Regnum; the Lord's Prayer, with proper preface, and in sequence, prayer for the living and the dead; the priest takes the piece "Regnum" from the paten, and placing it over the cup, says "Sancta sanctis, et conjunctio Corporis Domini nostri Jesu Christi, sit sumentibus et potantibus nobis ad veniam, et defunctis fidelibus præstetur ad requiem;" the piece is put into the cup, which is then covered over; salutation and response; sentences of blessing, to each of which the people answer Amen; "Gustate et videte quoniam suavis est Dominus," Hallelujah and doxology as before, while the priest takes the next piece "Gloria," and placing it over the chalice, prays that this communion may be to him the forgiveness of sins; communicates; before receiving the cup, he says, "The Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ preserve my body and soul unto everlasting life." Here also the congregation communicates; according to Conc. Toletan. iv. can. 17, the priests communicating at the altar, the clergy in the choir, the congregation without the choir; post-communion, prayer of thanks, and hallelujah; dismissal. The only words that are spoken by the priest, turning himself to the people, are the words towards the close of the Missa Catechumenorum, "Adjuvate me fratres."

Such is the Liturgy of which Isidore gives a brief but sufficient sketch; by comparison it will be observed that it differs from the Roman in having two Scripture lessons before the gospel, whereas the Roman merely has the epistle. It differs also in the variation of the canon, in the fuller form of the words of Institution, and in many minor particulars. The few modern additions have been separated from the more ancient portions by Lesleius [Miss. Mos. Præf., sec. vii.]. It shews better than any other the great variety of which the Liturgy is capable in the festal Missæ, many of which were composed by Isidore and Leander. [Isidor. Hisp. de Eccl. Off. i. 11-15. Card. Bona, Rer. Liturg. i. 11. Pinius, de Lit. Mos. Thomasius, Op. i. Lesleius, Mis. Mos. Præf. Martene, de Antiq. Eccl. Ritibus, i. 457 ff.]

MYSTERIES. The name belongs originally to certain sacred rites established in Greece, at Eleusis and elsewhere, which were kept secret from all except the initiated worshippers, and were supposed to have special efficacy for the purification of the soul. The word is generally used in the plural, and therefore must be understood of the proceedings, not of the assemblies of μύσται. It is doubtful what is the precise meaning of this last; it is certainly derived from a Greek verb, μύω, which signifies to close either the lips or the eyes; but we do not know whether this refers to the behaviour enjoined during the rite, or to the silence required from the initiated in order to keep the secret from the profane.

The use of the word in the New Testament stands in a distinct relation to its classical use, generally implying something in itself profound and difficult, and made known by the special intervention of a superhuman intelligence. In this way St. Paul speaks of the calling of the Gentiles as "the mystery that was kept hid from ages and generations" [Col. i. 26; Eph. iii. 4-6]; and again, of the resurrection, "Behold I shew you a mystery" [1 Cor. xv. 51]; and even of "the mystery of iniquity" [2 Thess. ii. 7], which seems synonymous with "that wicked who shall be revealed in his season." We find an approximation to the later ecclesiastical usage in Eph. v. 32, where the Apostle says of the union of Christian marriage, "This is a great mystery, but I speak concerning Christ and His Church." Here, again, we trace a side of the classical meaning of the word; for the rites anciently so called were always symbolical of secrets, though the symbol was commonly more important, at least more prominent, than the thing symbolized. The wonderful unity of Christian marriage is in itself a secret till disclosed; but it is only wonderful as the type of the higher unity between Christ and His Church. This is the ordinary ecclesiastical use of the word, in which sense it is exactly equivalent to the Latin Sacramentum.

From this point of view, all the types of the old law might be called indifferently "mysteries" or "sacraments;" so might the sacraments of the new law; so might an ecclesiastical custom; so might anything in nature or history that symbolized and manifested a spiritual law. So far, there is certainly some plausibility in the late Archbishop Whately's view, that it would be more accurate to regard a mystery as something which is obscure till explained, than as something in its own nature inexplicable. It is clear also that the antithesis between mysteries and science which is implied in the popular idea of mystery as a riddle without an answer is untenable; and that when the eighteenth century Deists wrote books to prove that Christianity was not mysterious, it was certainly permissible to turn the objection by insisting on a neglected side of the New Testament use of the term. Moreover, it was certainly the tendency of early Catholic theology to treat "mysteries" as subjects to which the illuminated reason of the instructed faithful was not inadequate. Till the fourth century, at the earliest, theological opinion continued to be freely moulded by mystical theology, that is, by finding "mysteries" in Holy Scripture; and although this tendency was discredited as a means of reaching new and positive results by the conflict with Origenism, yet the results of the discredited method kept their place in tradition. On the other hand, it is to be remembered that mysteries were always implicitly at least conceived as the subjects of a special economy; by virtue of which some were expressly revealed, the believer being enabled by the use of diligence to recognise others, whether as extensions of his original knowledge or, according to the later view, as illustrations only. This implies that either our faculties or our experience, or both, are naturally inadequate to the reception of mysteries, for otherwise a special economy would be unnecessary.

Perhaps the most accurate definition of mysteries would be "the distinctive contents of revelation however ascertained;" and revelation might be represented as an addition made to our experience in the first instance, directly or indirectly, and therefore enlarging our faculties. We are capable of discerning the truth of the Being and Providence of God from the action of our ordinary faculties on the ordinary facts of the world; we only know the mystery of the Trinity by the extraordinary facts of the Incarnation and the gift of the Holy Ghost. Accordingly, we do not call the truths of natural religion mysteries, although they are quite as difficult to understand and to establish as the truths of revealed religion, and though our inadequate conception of their nature involves us in just the same kind of difficulties and contradictions when we attempt to analyze our knowledge or to pursue it into consequences. Nor are we to assert that the mysteries of revealed religion are above our reason in a sense in which the truths of natural religion are not: for the evidence of the Christian revelation is also direct evidence of its central mysteries. We believe that Christianity comes from God by reason of the supernatural works of Jesus Christ, and the supernatural history and constitution of the society which He founded, the Catholic Church. Of course it is possible to say that this being so, it follows that the mysteries of the Trinity and the Incarnation are certainly true, inasmuch as it can be shewn that they are integral parts of the Christian revelation, as taught by Christ, His Apostles, and His Church. And this line of argument is necessary, because, as our conceptions are inadequate, it is impossible to silence all objections and close all controversy by argument alone. And though the balance of evidence in a given controversy may warrant a positive conclusion on intellectual grounds, yet the longer a controversy remains open the stronger is the moral tendency to reject all conclusions, because the state of a mind in conscious contact with a belief imperfectly understood and imperfectly established in presence of difficulties unanswered or answered imperfectly, is and must be an uncomfortable state, as compared with the deliberate decision that nothing can be known. But this necessary line of argument is in its own nature not the most convincing. It is more natural and satisfactory to use the same facts in our Lord's life which prove His divine mission as proofs of His Divine Nature, for from this Nature will follow the certainty of His promise that His Spirit will guide His Church into all truth. In like manner, when we find in the facts of the Gospel dispensation the action of three Divine Persons, the mystery of the Trinity in Unity becomes a necessity of reason, as well as a postulate of faith. Nor are we to suppose that this rational necessity is impaired by the fact that to us the direct immediate action of the Son and the Spirit is matter of testimony, not experience, because the testimony is verified by historical and spiritual effects, which can only be referred to the things testified, as to their adequate causes.

There is, however, one class of Christian mysteries which cannot be thus established, and which have to be received simply upon authority. These are the mysteries connected with the doctrine of the Sacraments, for the confidence in their efficacy derived from a devout and diligent use of them is not an intellectual ground of certainty, since devout diligence in the practices of any religion would tend to create a confidence in those practices. A reason of this may be that the efficacy of Sacraments presupposes a certain unity of living spirit and lifeless matter, of which we have no other experience, and no direct experience in them, and therefore no positive or rational conception. But, in general, it is reasonable to regard the mysteries of our religion as the rewards rather than as the difficulties of faith: the difficulties of a reasonable faith being to be found in the world, not in the Church; or if in the Church, so far as the Church is conformed to the world.

MYSTICAL interpretation, otherwise termed spiritual, figurative, is either TROPOLOGICAL or ANAGOGICAL—i.e., according to which, words having a distinct literal sense receive either a moral or a heavenly reference. (Some include the Allegorical under the Mystical.) The Mystical differs from the Literal sense in this, that the meaning cannot at once be derived from the words; but the literal sense being assumed, from it, and from the things signified by it, the meaning wrapped up in the words is disclosed.

MYSTICISM. The name given to a school of thought which arose in the way of recoil from the cold and exact logic of Scholasticism in the twelfth century. Its leading idea is that perfect holiness and spiritual knowledge are to be attained by devout contemplation rather than by outward means of grace and theological study. The three stages of such perfection are defined as Purification, Illumination, and Perfect Union with God.

The Mysticism of the twelfth century was, however, no novelty. There must, indeed, be a certain element of the kind in the religion of all contemplative natures, as is shewn by the writings of St. John; and such an element would be much developed by the ascetic life which was led by so many in the days of persecution. The older forms of Monasticism were, accordingly, characterized in a high degree by Mysticism, especially those which were brought within the range of Alexandrian influence. But it received a greater impetus than it had ever received before from the methodical development of its principles in writings which appeared towards the end of the fifth century, but which were attributed, falsely, to Dionysius the Areopagite. In the Mystical theology of this writer, the Divine essence is represented as the source from which all existences receive, in regular gradations, their being and perception; and the perfect Christian life is set forth as a gradual elevation of our human nature by successive communion with each higher order of beings until perfect union with God Himself is effected. The theology of Dionysius was doubtless a graft upon the stock of Neo-Platonism, Plotinus and Proclus using language which is almost identical with that used by the Christian Mystic.[1] It had much influence on the religious thought of the Middle Ages, moulding the theology of Duns Scotus, and, in some particulars, that of St. Thomas Aquinas.

The Schoolmen who endeavoured to reconcile the claims of contemplative piety with those of scientific theology were the real originators of the later Mysticism, and have been called the Dialectical Mystics. Their mystical tendencies were carried to a still further length by St. Bernard of Clairvaux, and St. Norbert, who in the earlier half of the twelfth century offered strong opposition to the speculative Scholasticism of Abelard. They maintained that the mysteries of Divine Truth cannot in all cases be analyzed in thought by the understanding, but can sometimes be embraced only by mystical contemplation. St. Bernard was followed by the two St. Victors, Hugh and Richard, who were, in succession, priors of the monastery of that name in the suburbs of Paris, down to A.D. 1173, i.e. for many years before, and for twenty years after, his death. With these latter, Mysticism assumed the form of devotion rather than of knowledge; and from their time its subjective tendency grew stronger and stronger, till those who embraced its principles dared to venture on the idea of direct union with—almost absorption into—God, by devout yearning and ecstacy. Such ideas of spiritual union with the Divine Nature were doubtless, in some degree, a recoil from the almost materialistic notions with which an extreme school were overlaying the doctrine of Transubstantiation; but while their practical tendency was towards fanaticism, their theoretical tendency was to Pantheism, a climax which was actually reached by Amalric of Bena [Dorner's Person of Christ, II. i. 301; Clark's transl.]. A more wholesome result of the Mysticism of this age is found in the Imitation of Christ, and the devotional works of St. Bonaventura.

The German Mystic to whom may be attributed the paternity of Mysticism in its modern forms, was John Tauler, a Dominican priest of Strasburg [A.D. 1294-1361]. The Dominicans had already been inoculated with its theories by Eckhart, one of their order, and a prior of a monastery at Frankfort. In A.D. 1324, Eckhart was brought to trial for his opinions before the general of his order, and afterwards in A.D. 1327, before the bishop at Cologne, from whom he appealed to the Pope. A bull of condemnation was issued against him by John XXII. in A.D. 1329, but Eckhart had died shortly before. His theories were taken up by Nicolas of Basle, who put them in practice by establishing a community for cenobite life moulded on them, his associates calling themselves "Friends of God," and "The Family of Love." The Dominican Tauler became one of the followers of Nicolas, who is probably the "layman" referred to in the dialogue in which Tauler narrates the circumstances of his conversion. Tauler was a favourite preacher at Strasburg, and while in the height of his fame was visited by Nicolas, and at his request preached a sermon on the means of attaining perfection in the Christian life. This sermon was criticized by Nicolas as being "the letter that killeth;" and he accompanied his criticism of the sermon with a condemnation of the preacher, whom he declared to be a Pharisee, without light, and one that had not yet tasted the sweetness of the Spirit. A sickness into which Tauler shortly after fell brought about a kind of trance, on his revival from which he found himself possessed of some new spiritual power and illumination by means of which he saw and understood spiritual truths as he had never done before. When he began to preach again, his first sermon was on the Second Coming of our Lord, and numbers fell down as if dead with excitement. Tauler died at Strasburg, A.D. 1361, twenty years before his master Nicolas, who was burned for heresy at Vienne, A.D. 1382. The theological principles on which Tauler's future teaching were based are set forth in his "Theologia Germanica" and his sermons, which largely influenced his countrymen before, and at the time of, the Reformation.

"It is clear," says Dorner, "that the Incarnation of God, though regarded in a Pantheistic light, constituted the central feature of the speculations of these mystics; and that, apart from it, the world seemed to them dead, and life not worth living. They regarded it as the jewel of their life; in it they saw the manifestation of their redemption and the blessedness of their soul." But in their endeavours to teach the living power of the Incarnation, they explained away its theological force, and the same may also be said as to their mode of teaching respecting the doctrine of the Blessed Trinity. The one point for which they made was the deification of man's nature. This, "(Vergottung) is the universal destiny of men, or it is already an actual fact, because God wills to become man in their will and spirit. Even the very origin of humanity is a commencement of this goal: humanity, however, when it proceeded forth from God, did not at once return to its source and origin, but gave itself up to self-seeking. This was sin, to abide in the love of the creature; and thus not merely to hinder its own process of deification, but also to bring to a standstill the process of the Incarnation of God. Still both the one and the other continue to be the destination of men" [Dorner's Person of Christ, II. ii. 13, Clark's transl.].

Mysticism had its influence upon the theology of the Anabaptists in England before the Reformation, and upon their Puritan successors of a later date, the tone of the Pre-Reformation Dominicans sensibly affecting that of the uneducated classes from whom these sprung. But this influence was of an indirect character. A more direct influence was communicated at a later period through Jacob Böhm, the Quietists, and William Law, which is traceable to the present day among the Quakers, the Methodists, and the Swedenborgians. MYTHICAL theory of Scripture. This system, otherwise known as "Ideology,"[1] rests on the assumption that a miracle is "ex vi termini" incredible, as irreconcilable with philosophical principles,[2] and as contrary to experience. Its object is to reconcile belief in the spiritual truths which are admitted to form the ideal basis of Christianity, with the rejection of everything supernatural. To the supernatural narrative of Scripture this theory applies the term μῦθος, which the lexicons explain to be a word employed in Attic prose to denote "a tradition of the early Greek times before the dawn of history." During the course of the eighteenth century, the notion of the Mythus, or fable, had begun to be applied to ancient history. Heyne had laid down the principle that "ancient history as well as ancient philosophy originated in myths;" and the method which Wolf had applied to the Iliad,[3] and Niebuhr to the history of Rome, was now transferred to the criticism of the sacred writings. This method was applied by Semler (who died in 1791) to the histories of Samson and Esther; and a little later De Wette professed to explain the Pentateuch as the Epic of the Hebrew Theocracy, pronouncing that it contained no more truth than the great Epic of Greece. In the year 1802 Bauer extended the application of the same principles in a work entitled "A Hebrew Mythology of the Old and New Testaments;" and his example was soon followed by others. According to such critics the Mythus is not the product of design and invention; it presents the idea of a fiction unreflectingly formed by the united imagination of many, while even they who construct it take it for a reality. The allegory, on the other hand, is the result of design.

[1] See on "Ideology and Subscription"—Aids to Faith, p. 133, &c.

[2] Ideology presents the developed result of Pantheism as applied to Christianity. Strauss is the disciple of Hegel. "The Christology of the theologian," writes Mons. Renan, "is but the symbolical translation of the abstract theses of the philosopher." [Études d'Hist. Réligieuse, 5me ed. p. 157.]

[3] Renan, writing of Strauss, observes: "Les Prolégomenes à Homère de Wolf devaient nécessairement amener la Vie de Jésus" [ib. p. 154].

The representative exponent of the Mythical interpretation of Scripture is confessedly D. F. Strauss. The first edition of his Leben Jesu was published in 1835. Influenced by the success of Renan's Vie de Jésu Strauss has re-written, and modified his earlier work, and we now have a New Life of Jesus, published in 1864.[4] His theory is as follows: A few persons among his contemporaries saw in Jesus of Nazareth the Jewish Messiah, and convinced themselves that all which Old Testament prophecy led them to expect of Messiah, met in Him. Messiah is the son of David: Jesus must, therefore, be born in Bethlehem—for so Micah had foretold. Moses, the first deliverer of Israel, had wrought miracles: consequently, Messiah, the second deliverer—Jesus—must do so likewise. Isaiah had written that in Messiah's days the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the deaf shall hear: thus it was known what class of miracles Jesus, as Messiah, must perform. The Messianic Myths had been growing up from the time of the Babylonish captivity, and earlier: nothing more, therefore, remained to be done after the birth of Christ, than to transfer the Messianic legends, nearly all of them constructed already, to Jesus.

As in similar cases, the Canon of Scripture supplies the criterion by which this theory may be tested. Strauss himself has said: "It would most unquestionably be an argument of decisive weight in favour of the credibility of the Biblical history could it be shewn that it was written by eye-witnesses, or even by persons nearly contemporaneous with the events narrated." The hypothesis of Gieseler as to the origin of the Synoptic Gospels supplied Strauss with the proof to the contrary which he required. [GOSPELS.] "Since the opinion," he writes, "that the first three Gospels originated from oral traditions became firmly established, they have been found to contain a continually increasing number of Mythi, and Mythical embellishments." Strauss, adopting, in like manner, Bretschneider's denial of the Apostolic composition of the fourth Gospel, discovers also in it the Mythical element. In fact Strauss assumed (in his earlier work) that all the Gospel narratives were the product of the latter part of the second century. In his later work he has been compelled to modify this assumption: "Soon after the beginning of the second century," he now writes, "certain traces are found of the existence" of the first three Gospels; the fourth "was not known until after the middle of the century."[5] And thus the limits within which it is asserted that the "Gospel Myths" were formed, and accepted by the early Christians as true, become narrower and narrower.

At all events, it is to be borne in mind that the Epistles of St. Paul afford a proof of Christianity detached from all others. The Mythical theory has never ventured to assail this testimony to the facts of the life of Christ. Amid the countless assaults of the so-called criticism of modern times, the Epistles to the Corinthians, and that to the Romans are, perhaps, the only monuments of primitive Christianity which remain unassailed; and the central miracle of Christianity—the Resurrection—might rest on the sole testimony of the first Epistle to the Corinthians. Dr. Arnold, who was well-versed in all the sceptical theories of history, speaks in terms of utter scorn, in one of his letters, of "the idea of men writing Mythic histories between the time of Livy and Tacitus, and St. Paul mistaking such for realities."[1] writes: "What the Resurrection of Christ is in the historical sphere, the authenticity of John's Gospel has now become in the critical department,—it is the all-pervading shibboleth; and we can hardly deny the remark of Strauss, that we must first be clear on John, and his relation to the Synoptic Evangelists, before we can say a word concerning the history of our Lord" [John's Gospel, Apologetical Lectures. Clarke's transl. 1849, p. 11].

[4] He here writes [Pref. p. xii.] that the negation "what the Gospel history is not"—an object which is his "principal, if not sole consideration,"—"consists in this, that in the person and acts of Jesus no supernaturalism shall be suffered to remain."

N

NAME. By a common usage the authority, honour, and power, of a person are frequently represented by the expression "in the name of;" and this form of expression as adopted in reference to the three Divine Persons of the Blessed Trinity has often a very wide and important theological bearing on the subject in reference to which it is used. Thus to prophesy "in the Name of the Lord" is to profess direct communication with Him, and to claim supreme authority for the words which are thus spoken [Deut. xviii. 22; Jer. xxvi. 9, 16]; and it was an accusation made by God against some who set themselves up as prophets in the days of Jeremiah, "The prophets prophesy lies in My Name: I sent them not, neither have I commanded them, neither spoke unto them" [Jer. xiv. 14]. So also to bless in the Name of the Lord [Deut. xxi. 5] is to speak in the authoritative terms "The Lord bless thee, and keep thee," &c. [Numb. vi. 24, 27], and this is so interpreted by God Himself, "and they shall put My Name upon the children of Israel; and I will bless them." The same may be said of other ministrations [Deut. xviii. 5, 7, xxi. 5], so that when the work of true sacrifice was about to be renewed in Israel, Elijah is said to have "built an altar in the Name of the Lord" [1 Kings xviii. 32].

Our Blessed Lord adopted this form of expression in reference to His own Mission, for which He claimed the fullest authority as being in the Name of His Father: "I am come in My Father's Name, and ye receive Me not" [John v. 43]; "the works that I do in My Father's Name, they bear witness of Me" [John x. 23]. He also used it in a similar manner with reference to the mission of those whom He Himself sent forth, speaking of those who could "do a miracle in My Name" [Mark ix. 38, 39]; acknowledging the homage of the seventy when they "returned again with joy, saying, Lord, even the devils are subject unto us through Thy Name" [Luke x. 17]; and declaring of His disciples in His last words, "In My Name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues," &c. [Mark xvi. 18]. The fulfilment of these promises was at once claimed by St. Peter and St. John, when the former said to the lame man at the Temple gate, "In the Name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, rise up and walk" [Acts iii. 6]; and the same Apostle declared to the multitude that "His Name, through faith in His Name, hath made this man strong" [Acts iii. 16].

The authority and power of words spoken and acts done in the Name of the Lord Jesus is therefore shewn to be analogous to that which belonged to those done in the Name of God under the Old Testament dispensation, as signified by the words previously quoted, "They shall put My Name upon the children of Israel, and I will bless them."

And as this was the case with respect to the extraordinary work of the Church which belonged to the ages of its foundation, so also it must be taken as applying to its ordinary work in perpetuity. To say or do anything "in the Name of" our Lord is not merely to speak that holy Name at the time of saying or doing it. For anything to be said or done effectually "in His Name" it must be done by His authority, as the act of an earthly sovereign's officer is only done in that sovereign's name when done with real authority, as well as with verbal assertion. Thus we arrive at the true force of our Lord's promises respecting prayer, "Whatsoever ye shall ask in My Name that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son. If ye shall ask anything in My Name, I will do it" [John xiv. 13, 14]. "Where two or three are gathered together in My Name, there am I in the midst of them" [Matt. xviii. 20]. The previous illustrations shew that these promises involve conditions which are by no means to be met by the simple invocation of our Lord's Name. As a man is not truly an ambassador, qualified to act in the name of his sovereign, unless he has been invested with authority, and has received commission to do so, in the same manner none can truly act in the Name of our Lord unless they are authorized and empowered to do so. And thus for two or three, or any larger number, to be gathered together "in the Name" of Christ is for them to be met together under some formal evidence of His authority; and to ask in His Name, is not only to plead His Mediation, but to ask under the authority of His commission. We are thus led to the conclusion that as blessing and ministering "in the Name of the Lord," under the Old Testament Dispensation, was the office of those set apart for the ministerial office, so under that of the New Testament only those so set apart can truly fulfil the condition of the promises made.

The "two or three gathered together in My Name," therefore, refers to a church assembly, with such a ministerial person, so authorized, acting as its authorized mouthpiece. [WORSHIP.]

NATIVITY OF CHRIST. [CHRISTMAS. INCARNATION.]

NATURAL RELIGION. [RELIGION, NATURAL.]

NATURAL THEOLOGY. [THEOLOGY, NATURAL.]

NATURE. This is a concrete term for expressing the whole of the qualities belonging to a person or thing. But as the qualities of things, whether animate or inanimate, are seldom entirely known, the term is also used very commonly in a restricted sense for the more distinctive qualities, or "characteristics." Thus one quality of the Divine Nature is that God is eternal, and hence we say eternity is the nature of God. It is also one quality of human nature to be mortal, and hence we say mortality is the nature of man.

NATURE. The visible creation and its phenomena. The word has had an ideal personality given to it by poets, and this poetical fancy has been adopted by Deistical writers as if it were a reality. Hence, many have accustomed themselves to look upon the physical world as having an origin and a continued power of existence distinct from God's originating creation, and His sustaining providential power. Such ideas are, however, a mere illogical evasion of truths which are based on sound evidence: and a belief in "Nature" instead of the Creator must logically end in a belief that everything originates and sustains itself. [MIRACLE. NATURE, LAWS OF. SUPERNATURAL.]

NATURE, DIVINE. It may be said that the study of the Divine Nature is the ultimate and highest problem of all theology—the only possible doubt as to its importance being, whether any knowledge on the point is attainable, or whether the theologian must be content with a record of the divine actions.

As a matter of fact, the Christian revelation does contain propositions relative to the Divine Nature, and consequently the Christian theologian is not at liberty to dismiss the problem as lying beyond the sphere of study or of knowledge. But in approaching the problem, there are particular difficulties which appear not only to preclude a satisfactory solution, but even a satisfactory statement of it.

It is remarkable that a term of so deep theological significance, and yet by no means recondite or technical, should occur only once in the New Testament [2 Pet. i. 4]; and then in a context which proves that it is not used in a strictly theological sense. In fact, this passage would almost seem to prove, as an extreme instance, that the Divine Nature, if cognoscible at all, was only so through the divine acts which brought it into relation with man: and therefore, that though independent of the divine actions—being, in fact, their source and cause—not the aggregate of their effects, nor an abstraction from their character,—it was not to be known apart from them. The only proposition that man, even inspired, appears able to make with direct reference to the Divine Nature, is that the divine promises enable man to share it.

It is true that it is difficult to separate the doctrines of Christianity as to the Divine Nature from those referring to the acts or dispensations of God towards the world. To separate the divine attributes from these, or to express the Divine Nature in adequate formulæ, without self-contradiction, is no doubt impossible. Our only method of describing God is in human language; and therefore, whatever our conception be, our language is necessarily anthropomorphic. We describe God's actions and attributes by ascribing to Him certain human relations. Supposing that we ascribe them rightly, it must be that the propositions ascribing them are true either absolutely or analogically. For instance, we make a proposition respecting a divine action, "God will judge the world." We make another, respecting a divine attribute, "God is just." The first of these, hardly any one would say was a statement affecting the Divine Nature. Is the second such, and in what sense? Are there any truths of the Divine Nature further than those of the Divine attributes? And in what sense can each of these classes of propositions respecting God be called true?

In ascribing an action to God, we speak of a thing that has a real and necessary relation to man, or to some other finite object cognoscible by man. There is therefore no reason why human thought and language may not be able to conceive and describe it accurately. In the instance selected, though the description may not be accurate or adequate, the conception is. By "judging" we always mean two things: [1] investigating the guilt of persons accused of crime, and (to a certain extent) the merit of persons innocent or virtuous: [2] punishing or rewarding the persons under judgment, in proportion to their guilt or merit. Now, in speaking of the Divine Judgment, we do not mean that God investigates the guilt or merit of man for His own information, nor that He rewards and punishes men in exact proportion to their definite actions, in furtherance or in breach of His laws; but we do mean that He (for other ends) causes their guilt or virtue to appear, and rewards or punishes in proportion to the merit or guilt of each (though merit and guilt are estimated by a different standard than that of definite actions known or secret). It is a perfectly fair use of the common word "judgment" to describe this act. Though not performed under the same conditions as the human acts for which the name was invented, its essence is the same, i.e. the conditions do not differ in those points that determine the meaning of the name. When we say "God will judge the world," we do not know, and do not affirm, that He will do anything to mankind more than is done in the act commonly called "judgment:" we do affirm that He will do what is so involved, though in a manner and with an object different from those of other judges.

But when we say "God is just," is our proposition as adequate, as accurately and literally true? Do we mean only that He has in His mind the habits, feelings, or affections which we call justice? the impartiality, interest in the subjects submitted to His decision, a sense of responsibility, if not to a person, yet to a standard of right and wrong external and superior to Himself, which constitute, or help to constitute, our notion of that virtue? Clearly not: this would be gross anthropomorphism, and imply a finite and subordinate position of the just One. Then do we mean only that He acts justly, that His government of the world, and disposal of retribution to its inhabitants, are conducted according to the principles which we call just; those to which a man who adheres will be, and will (if the facts are known) be universally considered a just man? No, we mean more than this: for we should say that God was eternally just; was just, therefore, before He had creatures to govern or to judge. And, moreover, it seems that the statement that God is just does not necessarily even involve His acting in the manner we consider just. It is certain that some people have asserted God's justice, without confessing it to have the same rules as man's: and the fact that it has the same may be more fitly proved from the doctrine of the Incarnation than regarded as involved in the term itself.

What, then, do we mean by the proposition? We mean to assert a fact of the Divine Nature, which, being inconceivable by us for want of experience or intuition of its presence, and having no term in our language to describe it, we attempt to represent by ascribing an attribute to God. We mean to say that God's Nature is such, that when He regards an action or person (past, present, or future), or when He acts towards a person, His action or regard is characterized by something which we call justice, as having some analogy to the character of a just man. Wherein this analogy consists, and how far it reaches, are further questions: all that need here be determined is, that as we mean by a just man not only one who does just acts, but who has the formed habits, and spontaneous mental affections, that lead to them; so by God being just, we mean not only that He acts or thinks justly (whatever "justly" means with Him), but that His Nature involves so acting and thinking. If it be asked what is meant by its being involved in His Nature, perhaps the best explanation would be—"If it were otherwise, He would not be God, or not the same God that He is." To a believer in the God of Christianity, or any other exalted theism, goodness is part of the meaning of the name of God: a God who should not be good, would be called an Ahriman, a Demiurge, an almighty Spirit of Evil—anything but God.

And other propositions respecting the Divine Nature, besides those which consist of the ascription of attributes, seem to conform to this text. They concern the Divine Nature, in respect that they assert things of God which are true of Him, and if they were not, He would be other than He is. The doctrine of the Holy Trinity, for instance, is a truth of the Divine Nature. The statement may be otherwise worded—the God of Catholic Christianity is not the one God, the absolute Unit, of (modern) Judaism and Mahommedanism.[1]

There is a somewhat different sense, or rather a different usage, of the term "Divine Nature" from that above explained. The distinction may perhaps be thus stated: we have used the word thus far as implying "What God is:" it is used to imply what any one has in virtue of which he is Divine. When we speak of our Lord's Divine Nature, in relation to the doctrine of the Incarnation, the term is obviously used in a different manner from that in which we say, that the Divine Nature includes the Trinity of Persons. In the one case, to say that we are speaking of the Divine Nature means, that we are stating essential or analytical judgments of which God is the subject: to say so in the other means, that we are speaking of a subject of which Deity may be predicated. In the former case, the Divine Nature is conceived as the whole essence, the sum total (directly or by implication) of all the true propositions that can be made concerning God: in the second, it is (speaking logically) an attribute of the Person of Christ that He is Divine: His Divine Nature is not the sum total, but only a part, of the qualities in virtue of which He is What He is. It is only necessary to point out the distinction to prevent confusion between the two senses of the term.

NATURE, HUMAN. [BODY, NATURAL. BODY, SPIRITUAL. IMAGE OF GOD. SOUL. SPIRIT.]

NATURE, LAWS OF. The modes in which force, instinct, and will are observed ordinarily to act are frequently defined by this inexact term. A stone is said to fall to the ground, the heart to beat, a beast to feed, a man to think, or all animals to die, by "the laws of nature." The original meaning of the phrase was simply that such was the ordinary action of the things animate and inanimate to which reference was made, according to their constitution and the course of events commonly within our knowledge and experience. But the personification of an idea [NATURE] has led superficial thinkers to speak of a "law of nature" as of a rule spontaneously adopted and adhered to by this imaginary "nature." As the one notion is, however, an intellectual evasion of the received ideas respecting God, so is the other a similar evasion of those respecting the laws which He imposes on all the things which He has created. Uninstructed conviction, intellectual reflection, and Divine revelation, all combine in bearing witness that the modes in which natural forces act are fixed by the Creator; and hence that the "laws of nature" are in reality the Divine constitution which God's will has given to things and persons.

NECESSITY. [FATALISM. SPINOZISM.]

NEOLOGY. [RATIONALISM.]

NEOPHYTE [νεόφυτος = "newly planted"]. A term applied to a new convert, i.e. a person newly baptized [1 Tim. iii. 6].

Among the ceremonies anciently enjoined for the Neophytes, there may be mentioned, a] The kiss of peace, which was the token of brotherhood and union in Christ.

b] The carrying of lights, to symbolize the illumination [φωτισμός] which they had received.

c] The taste of honey and milk, as a type of the blessings of the heavenly Canaan, of which they were made citizens.

d] The delivery of white robes, in token of their being cleansed from sin.[1]

The white robes were worn eight days, and then laid up in the Church, as witnesses against those who violated their professions. The first Sunday after Easter was one of the days on which the Neophyte put off these garments,[2] and hence acquired the name of Dominica in albis. From wearing these robes the Neophytes were known by the name of λευχειμονοῦντες.

It was in the white robe of the Neophyte that the Emperor Constantine died [A.D. 337]. He had deferred baptism until his end was approaching, and, after receiving it, refused to wear the purple.

In addition to these symbolical ceremonies, the Neophyte, whether infant or adult, received forthwith, in ancient times, the Seal of Confirmation and the Blessed Sacrament. [BAPTISM. CONFIRMATION.]

NEO-PLATONISM. The latest school of Heathen Philosophy, in which an attempt was made to supersede the Atheism of the Academics by a system in which Polytheism was practically as well as theoretically repudiated, and an alliance sought between the residuum of philosophical heathenism and Christianity. Neo-Platonism arose side by side with the famous ALEXANDRIAN SCHOOL, being originated by Ammonius Saccas, about A.D. 193, when the great St. Clement was the leader of Christian thought in that learned city. Some account of this philosophy will be found under ECLECTICISM and PANTHEISM. In its original form it possessed some attractions for the Christian philosopher, was not altogether disapproved of by St. Clement, and had considerable influence on the speculative theology of Origen, the Pseudo-Dionysius, and Maximus his disciple. But Neo-Platonism soon shewed a tendency to break off from its friendly attitude towards Christianity, and by the time it had passed through the hands of Plotinus to those of Porphyry, it had become very decidedly antagonistic to it.

NESTORIANISM. A heresy which took its rise in the fifth century from Nestorius, Patriarch of Constantinople. From his words and illustrations it was inferred that he held there were two Persons in Christ, although he never in terms asserted such a view, and, indeed, repudiated all such inferences drawn from his writings. From his own statements the following brief summary of his doctrine is drawn up by Dupin.[3] [1] He expressly rejected the error of those who said Christ was a mere man, as Ebion, Paul of Samosata, Photinus. [2] He expressly maintained that the Word was united to the humanity in Christ Jesus, and that this union was most intimate and strict. [3] He held that these two Natures made one Christ, one Son, one Person; only made up of two natures. [4] And that this one Person may have either divine or human properties attributed to Him. Hence he willingly spoke of Christ being born of a Virgin, suffering, dying: but would not say God was born, suffered, died. He rejected the term Θεοτόκος as applied to the Virgin, and would only consent to call her Χριστοτόκος, the Mother of the Person made up of these two Natures. The rejection of this term by Nestorius was the original cause of quarrel. The term was in use, and a specific rejection of it seemed to imply a denial of the Divinity of Christ; and in point of fact, Nestorius did condemn the Hypostatic Union, and allowed only a moral union. His expressions confirmed this. The Humanity in Christ was the Temple, the Habit, the Veil of the Divinity. The union was like that of a husband and wife. People connected his views with those of Paul of Samosata, who held Christ to be a man only; and concluded that he held no real consubstantial union, but one only of operation and will.

This heresy was opposed by Cyril of Alexandria, and condemned in the Council of Ephesus [A.D. 431]; the specific error there condemned being "that in Jesus Christ our Blessed Saviour, there are two distinct Persons, as well as two Natures:" and the doctrine established "that Christ was one Divine Person in whom two Natures were most closely and intimately united, but without being mixed or confounded together."

The vitality of the heresy is very remarkable; the Nestorians, truly descended from the original separation, remaining a distinct body to this day. [THEOTOKOS. Badger's Nestorians and their Rituals. Dict. of SECTS and HERESIES.]

NEW CREATION. [I.] Predictions of a great and universal renovation are, in a more or less direct form, an almost invariable feature of Biblical Eschatology. Such was the tone of prophecy before Christ's first Advent, such that of the Apostolic writings, and such that of our Lord's own words as recorded in the Gospels and the Apocalypse. This may be shortly indicated by the words of an ancient prophecy, "Behold, I create new heavens and a new earth; and the former shall not be remembered nor come into mind" [Isa. lxv. 17; cf. lxvi. 22]; those of an Apos-

[1] "Fulgentes animas vestis quoque candida signat;
Et grege de niveo gaudia pastor habet."
Lactant. Carm. De Resurr. Dom. quoted by Bingham.

[2] St. Aug. Hom. lxxxvi. De Diversis in Octav. Pasch. "Paschalis solemnitas hodierna festivitate concluditur, et ideo hodie neophytorum habitus commutatur; ita tamen, ut candor, qui de habitu deponitur, semper in corde teneatur."

[3] Dupin, Bibliothèque, i. 442, ed. 1722.

tolical epistle, "The heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat; the earth also, and the works that are therein shall be burned up . . . Nevertheless we, according to His promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness" [1 Pet. iii. 10, 13]; and those of the great Christian propheey, "I saw a new heaven and a new earth; for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away. . . . And He that sat upon the throne said, Behold, I make all things new" [Rev. xxi. 1, 5].

That these predictions of a new creation are figurative is an easy explanation, and it may be in some slight degree corroborated by the fact that the kingdom of Christ is a re-creation of human nature in His own Person by His Incarnation, and of the souls of mankind by their regeneration in Holy Baptism. Such an explanation, however, reaches but a little way towards drawing out the meaning of the predictions in question, for even if they include that which it refers to (as is not unlikely from the analogy of our Lord's own prophetic language), they yet undoubtedly look beyond it and point unmistakeably to a new creation, not of souls, but of the material earth, its surrounding "HEAVEN" or heavens, and the works, as well as the beings, which it contains.

The chief difficulty in the way of belief in such a renovation is probably that which arises from the accompanying prediction of a preceding destruction. Looking on the changes which are wrought on the surface of the earth, or which have been wrought during the historic ages, we observe that the whole sum of them, after all the ordinary, and all the convulsive, operations of the physical forces which affect them, falls far short of anything approaching the magnitude of so stupendous a change as that which would be made by a destructive catastrophe such as is predicted. The terrific operation of fire on the body of the sun is now, however, well known to scientific observers, as well as the vast and most rapid changes which it effects. There is no difficulty in believing that such changes may be effected on the body of the earth, when we observe enormous craters to be almost instantly created on that of the sun—so enormous that many planets as large as the earth might be engulphed in them, and so intensely heated that the very granite would melt in the midst of them.

A more formidable objection is one drawn from the moral aspect of such a destruction. Allowing that it is reasonable to set aside the physical difficulty as being confuted by scientific knowledge not less than by à priori reasonings as to Almighty Power, is it consistent with our ideas of God's attributes that the magnificent works of man, works of architecture, engineering, art, and skill,—works that betoken the use of God's own gifts of intellect, and the progress of humanity in the development of those powers, and the application of those materials, with which the Creator has provided it,—that these should be utterly destroyed? Can there be no consecration of man's handiwork, by which it may be symbolically renovated? Must the very foundations of the earth and all that rests upon them be utterly broken up before the palace of the New Creation can be erected? Would not such a destruction, we are almost tempted to say, be a kind of waste, and contrary to the first principles on which God's Providence is ever working?

No doubt such objections as these, and many more such, will arise in thoughtful minds; and no doubt they will be accompanied by a wish to understand the statements of the Bible in some easier way; to adopt a metaphorical meaning, for example, such as would take the new creation of heaven and earth to be a moral regeneration, and the passing away of the old creation as the cessation of sin.

But St. Peter appears to have been inspired to meet such objections with a plain contradiction beforehand. For when he is about to speak of the destruction of the earth and the heavens in a manner that quite shuts out the idea of his words being intended to be metaphorical, he prefaces the awful statement by predicting that in the last days there will come scoffers, arguing that from the apparent firmness and permanence of all things for so many ages there is no probability of their future actual destruction. The Apostle therefore warns us off from such objections, and leaves us little rational ground for supposing a metaphor to have been intended by the words "new heaven and new earth."

And perhaps we may be better reconciled to a literal sense of these words if we take into account a few considerations respecting the power and authority of the Creator and His probable purpose in organizing a New Creation.

1. It is manifest that all things belong to God to deal with as He may think proper: there is no known law by which He binds Himself to preserve as it now stands either the Creation of His own hands, or the handiwork of the race that He has created.

2. The infinite power of an Almighty Creator that can call forth a New Creation at His will, makes the destruction of many worlds a matter of no importance in the vast scheme of His general purposes and His eternal existence. "Behold the nations are as a drop of a bucket and are counted as the small dust of the balance: behold, He taketh up the isles as a very little thing, and Lebanon is not sufficient to burn, nor the beasts thereof sufficient for a burnt offering. All nations before Him are as nothing, and they are counted to Him less than nothing and vanity" [Isa. xl. 15-17]. Or, to use a homely simile, as we often see portions of beautiful columns, mouldings, and carvings built into the rubble of mediæval churches as if they were common stones of no value, and are aware that this was done by builders who knew that they could produce better work than that which they were concealing or partially destroying—so we know the great Architect of the Universe can replace all that He causes or suffers to be destroyed with a New Creation of still greater beauty, glory, magnitude, and use, without effort and at any moment.

3. And this seems as if it led up to the object of so wide a destruction as that implied by the words of Holy Scripture. The "whole creation groaneth and travaileth together," fallen with fallen man, even in Christ's Dispensation degenerating age by age, and removing further and further from the high standard of perfection in which it first came forth from the hands of the Creator. It is to make room for a perfect creation that this degenerated one is to pass away: to make room for one in which there will be no capacity for degeneration, no trace of imperfection, no stain of a will adverse to the Will of God.

By the consideration of truths such as these we may fortify our faith in the word which God has four times spoken by His prophets; and believing that we can see some reasons why there should be a new Heaven and a new Earth, believe also that there are many others which are beyond our knowledge, and that therefore our safest course is to take the Divine proclamation simply and literally as it stands. Whether by an utter destruction and an entirely new Creation, or whether (as is more probable) by a regeneration and purification effected by fire, in some way or other God will cause the heavens and earth that now are to pass away; and will fulfil His own words, "Behold I make all things new," in the sense of a material renovation.

II. And although it would be venturesome to pursue this idea of a new Creation into details, by speculating as to the new features that will characterize the abode of mankind, and its celestial surroundings, we are fully justified in following it up as regards our own nature. Respecting human nature there is no room whatever for doubt. It will be taken into the presence of its Creator after having passed again under His creating hand, renovated into a perfectness of condition even greater than that which belonged to it in its most perfect temporal condition.

1. First it is to be considered that there will be a new Creation of the body. "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of heaven; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption" [1 Cor. xv. 20]. Such is the truth which St. Paul declares to us when he is dealing theologically with the question of the resurrection. Such also is the truth that we are taught by the very instinct of self-consciousness. It is not bodies such as we are provided with for the work of this world that will be suited to inhabit a new earth, or to stand in the immediate presence-chamber of the all-glorious and all-holy God. Such bodies as these can never be dissociated from imperfection and degeneration, disease, decay, and dissolution. They are endowed with functions that are evidently incompatible with a never-ending immortality: and we cannot imagine hunger, thirst, and the capacities and desires which are most characteristic of bodily life as it now is, to have any place in heaven. They exist under laws that involve the loss of strength, vigour, and beauty, after the lapse of a few score years, and we cannot imagine the wrinkles, or weakness, or decrepitude, of old age, to have any consistency with the perpetual youth of a renovated creation.

Hence the same inspired teacher tells us that the body which is sown in corruption is raised in incorruption, that which is sown in dishonour is raised in glory, that which is sown in weakness is raised in power, that which is sown a natural body is raised a spiritual body; . . . this corruptible must put on incorruption and this mortal must put on immortality. These are most wonderful statements, but can we gain from them, from other light of Holy Scripture, or from the light of our own experiences, observations, and reasonings, any definite ideas on the subject of this renovated body which is to find itself fit for making a home of a renovated world? It is almost impossible to do so except by a string of negatives. For the spiritual body of the resurrection era there will be no hunger nor thirst, no marrying nor giving in marriage, no pain, no suffering, no decay, no dissolution. It will answer to the great Catholic dogma "I believe in the resurrection of the body," "the resurrection of the flesh," in such a manner that every one will have a ready consciousness of identity, as of something restored which had long been lost, and yet it will be "a spiritual body," one of which, if we can positively say "it is the same," we must also say with equal certainty "it is not the same." Perhaps the very phrase "spiritual body," which sounds like a contradiction of terms, contains the real explanation as far as we can now reach it. That which we think of in this life as the human body is a complex structure of substances and organs whose principal purposes are those of sense: but even as it now exists we can discover traces of a lower organization and a higher organization. There is that which seems at once to be of the earth earthy, that which the Scripture calls "flesh and blood," the grosser organization associated with the maintenance of animal life and action: and there is also that which we find little difficulty in associating with spiritual life and action, the nervous system, or that portion of it which is connected with the organs and faculties whereby the mind works and communicates with the world around. The one seems to belong to our bodies in common with the bodies of creatures lower than ourselves in the scale of creation, the other to belong to those bodies in common with beings higher than ourselves. We easily believe of angels that they speak and think, and reason; that they see and hear; that they remember and increase in knowledge; that they love and adore: and some of these properties which belong to men and angels we dare to think of as belonging even to God. Is there not then in that part of our bodily system which enables us to do all this which is done even by angels and by One higher than angels, the germ of that "spiritual body" which can "inherit the kingdom of God?" And may we not venture to think of the resurrection of the body as a clothing again of our souls and spirits with all the organizations that belong to the higher part of our being, while that which belongs to the lower part lies for ever in the dust with which it has mingled?

And it is not difficult to imagine of bodies so regenerated that they find their original Pattern in the body that arose from the grave three days after death, and afterwards ascended into heaven. It is, in fact, most easy and most rational to believe that as the Incarnation of the Son of God was the New Creation of a Man perfect in body and soul, so it was the first step in the New Creation of all human nature: and that as we have borne in our bodies the image of the earthy, which is the First Adam, so in our bodies also we shall bear the Image of the Heavenly, which is the Second Adam. [Resurrection of Christ.]

And thus when the word has gone forth, "Behold I make all things new," this will be a part of that new creation, that the bodies of the redeemed will be as the glorified body of Him who is not ashamed to call them brethren, bodies such as were laid in the grave, and with something about them yet which identified them with a former life; and yet spiritual bodies on which the Incarnation will have done its thorough work by restoring to them their share in the Image of God: making them ever pure, ever incapable of evil, of degeneracy, or of decay. [Resurrection of the Body. Body, Spiritual.]

2. Secondly, as the external features of human nature will be thus renovated, so also will there be a renovation of all that belongs to its mental and spiritual faculties.

Towards such a New Creation it is easy to see that the work of the Incarnation has ever been tending. What man lost by the Fall he regains by his restoration in Christ. Man lost the Image of God, but the express Image of the Father took upon Him the fallen nature, raised it to its first estate in His own Person, and made it possible for it to regain that position in the persons of all men. Man lost by the Fall the Spirit which was breathed into him so that he became a living soul, but the Holy Spirit descended to dwell in the Church on earth, and to continue the power of the Incarnation; and now each sacramentally built up man has the loss repaired, and becomes once more body, soul, and spirit, as in his first creation. [Spirit.]

But this is a gradual, not a sudden work, and although in the first regeneration of human nature at Holy Baptism, and in all subsequent stages of sacramental edification, the Lord is causing it to go through a process of renovation and re-creation, the climax of that building up of the restored spirit of man will only be attained when the final fiat of re-creation goes forth. Under the operation of such a re-creation, that which we sometimes call "the religious faculty" will become supreme among all the mental qualities of our nature. Then, too, all evil passions, all sorrows, all cares, having passed away as part of the former things that have no place in the renewed world, it is reasonable to believe that other mental faculties will have room to develope in a degree for which there has been no sufficient opportunity in this life; so that the intelligence of each one of the renovated persons will be like the intelligence of an angel. And thus, all that is good and all that is noble in the spiritual and intellectual part of human nature, will become infinitely more good and infinitely more noble still. The humblest sinner of this life that attains to the life everlasting will stand as a glorious saint before the throne of God. And the lowliest intellect will be so cleared, so vivified and developed, by the making of all things new, that there will be no such thing as ignorance—as we now understand it—possible, nor any bar set up by the will to the attainment of an exalted reach of knowledge.

It seems then that we must blend together the highest earthly saintliness and the highest earthly intelligence if we seek for a type of the perfectly renovated inner nature of man. And when we have thus gained some idea of what will be effected by the New Creation, we still have to remember that this type of the new created mind and spirit of man places us only on the threshold of his future life. He will go on, without limit of time and age, dwelling in close communion with the all-holy and all-knowing God; and from the perpetual shining of that "Light which no man" in his mortal condition "can approach unto," there must be a never-ceasing growth of saintliness and intelligence, a development of each which can find no limit short of the holiness and knowledge of the One who is without bounds.

III. Finally, as the renovation of the material world, and of the corporeal and incorporeal parts of man's nature, will alter all the conditions of what we should call from our present standpoint man's existence and work in the world, so also it will alter those of his existence in the Church. And hence, among the revelations of that future life which were made to St. John, there was a special one of a "New Jerusalem coming down from God, out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband" [Rev. xxi. 2].

We are all familiar with the glorious things which are spoken of this city of our God. Inwrought with our habitual devotions as they dwell on the future are such words as

> "With jasper glow thy bulwarks,
> Thy streets with emeralds blaze,
> The sardius and the topaz
> Unite in thee their rays."

But we are probably disposed to dwell on these glorious pictures of the holy city without a sufficient recognition of the fact that they represent a development and New Creation of the religious life, and especially of that part of it which is associated with Divine worship. For this renovation of the religious life and of Divine worship is also the glorious climax of our Lord's Incarnation: and therefore the coming down of the New Jerusalem from God is followed by "a great voice out of heaven," which recalls to our mind the fact that our Lord's Incarnation was a tabernacling of the Deity in the Humanity. "I heard a great voice out of heaven, saying, Behold the tabernacle of God is with men, and He will dwell with them, and they shall be His people, and God Himself shall be with them and be their God" [Rev. xxi. 3].

That same Presence of God, therefore, which has been at once the great power of the religious life and the great object of Divine worship in the Church Militant, will be the same in the Church Triumphant. As God is now with His people in the Sacraments, whose vitality is derived from the Incarnation, so will He be with them then in a direct Presence, the power of which will be to them a perpetual Light and an inexhaustible Life. And as now God is in His holy Temple, and thither we gather that before His altar we may bow down in adoration of His mystical Presence, so then, when there shall be no temple in the Holy City, "for the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the Temple of it" [Rev. xxi. 22], the glorious and visible Presence of Him that sitteth on the Throne will be that before which the elders will cast down their crowns, and the vast multitude of the redeemed sing forth their hallelujahs.

Thus the Church Militant will develope into the Church Triumphant; Christ's First and His Second Advent will prove to be two stages in the mighty work of New Creation. The former things that are to pass away—a degenerated world, a fallen man, an imperfect religious life, a halting worship—all these having derived what good there has been in them from the first stage of the New Creation, that good will still remain, even though their distinctive characteristics of evil, weakness, and imperfection will have been burnt out, and annihilated. But God is pleased that there should be a degenerated world, and a fallen man, and an imperfect religious life, and a halting worship no longer, and therefore the second stage of the mighty work of the Incarnation will be attained in the complete fulfilment of the words, "Behold I make all things new."

NEW TESTAMENT. [TESTAMENT.]

NICENE CREED. The Creed put forth by the Council of Nice [A.D. 325], and completed at Constantinople [A.D. 381]. This has always been known as the Nicene Creed, though not framed by the Fathers of the first General Council. They adopted the existing Oriental Creed, as the Roman or Apostles' Creed was followed by the churches of the West. Eusebius the historian exhibited it to the council as the ancient Creed of the Church of Cæsarea, of which he was the bishop. Doubtless it had descended in that church from primitive times. A general likeness may be observed between it and the Creed of Antioch, as given by Lucian the Martyr [Socr. H. E. iii. 5, vi. 12]. The only addition made to it by the council was the insertion of the term ὁμοούσιον τῷ Πατρί, "of one substance with the Father," rendering the Creed all that could be wished as a standard of orthodoxy. [ARIANISM. CREEDS.] No other alteration was made, ἑνὸς μόνου προσεγγραφέντος ῥήματος τοῦ ὁμοουσίου, [Eus. Ep. ad Cæsar.; Socr. H. E. i. 8]. Eusebius says expressly that this was no new term: "We are aware that certain illustrious bishops and writers among the ancients have made use of this expression ὁμοούσιον in defining the Godhead of the Father and Son" [ibid.]. Athanasius declares the same thing in his epistle to the African bishops, and states that the term was incorporated in the Nicene Creed on the authority of ancient bishops; τῇ μαρτυρίᾳ τῶν ἀρχαίων ἐπισκόπων. In the preceding century Dionysius of Alexandria still appeals to older writers who used the expression, τὸ ὁμοούσιον τῷ Πατρὶ εἰρήμενον ὑπὸ τῶν ἁγίων πατέρων [Athanas. de Sent. Dionys.]. Origen, the preceptor of Dionysius, used the word in the same sense as the Nicene Council, as shewn by Ruffinus, and Pamphilus in his apology. Tertullian, writing in Latin while he thought in Greek, as was often the case with him, says that the three persons of the Godhead were "unius substantiæ" [Adv. Prax. 11], which was the equivalent for ὁμοούσιον, as Bishop Bull affirms; so also Ruffinus, "unius substantiæ, quod Græce ὁμοούσιον dicitur" [Ruff. de Deprav. libr. Orig.]. The term itself was coined in the philosophical schools of ancient Greece: thus Aristotle affirmed the consubstantial character of the stars, ὁμοούσια δὲ πάντα ἄστρα; and Porphyry uses it with respect to the soul of life or vital principle that man shares with the lower animals, εἴγε ὁμοούσιοι αἱ τῶν ζώων ψυχαὶ ἡμετέραις [Porph. de Abstin. ab esu Anim. i. 19]. Hence it was adopted by the Gnostic heretics to express the oneness of nature that existed between the psychic seed of the human race and Demiurge [Iren. Contr. Hær. i. 9, 10, Cambr. ed.]. The term fell into a certain degree of discredit when Paul of Samosata made use of it in his heretical Christology. He maintained that our Lord had no pre-existence before His birth of the Virgin Mary, and that he could only be consubstantial with the Father through the deification of His mortal body. The very gainsaying of heresy thus helped to establish the high antiquity of the term as used by the Church. The Council of Antioch denied the consubstantiality of the Son in this gross sense, but left no doubt as to their belief in the eternally Divine Substance of the Word, though they suppressed for the time the term ὁμοούσιον as having been rendered suspicious by Paul. Altogether there can be no doubt but that the term was well known and of familiar use for more than a century before the Church stereotyped it in her Creed at Nice.

The Cæsarean Creed contained the clause, "God of God," which was omitted by the Fathers at Constantinople, but was afterwards restored to its position. On the unauthorized insertion of "FILIOQUE" by the Spanish Church see that article. The final clauses were added at Constantinople, the Nicene formula having ended with καὶ εἰς τὸ Πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον. But midway between the two councils Epiphanius indicates three clauses in his longer creed as used by the Church of Cyprus. It is probable therefore that the Creed of Cæsarea also contained them, but Eusebius having quoted so much of the formula as was germane to his purpose, stopped when he came to the expression of faith in the Holy Spirit, in order that he might assert the hypostatic unity of each person; and so never completed the words of the Creed. The Creed so foreclosed by Eusebius remained on record as the faith of the Nicene Fathers, an anathema against all who held Arian notions having been substituted for the closing words of Eusebius. The Creed thus framed was used for catechetical instruction, and was the baptismal confession of faith, as in fact it had been from the earliest days [Euseb. ad Cæsar.]; but it had no place in the Liturgy until the time of Peter Fullo, Bishop of Antioch, who embodied it in the service [A.D. 471]. Timothy, Patriarch of Constantinople, adopted the same course [A.D. 511]. In the third Council of Toledo [A.D. 589] the Spanish Church made it part of the Liturgy as an antidote to the Arianism of the Goths. The Gallican Church admitted it soon afterwards, but it was only received into the Ordo Romanus A.D. 1014. The scandal of centuries caused by the schism between the churches of the East and West, A.D. 1054 [FILIOQUE], can probably be removed only by a recurrence to the form set forth with authority by the primitive councils. [See Bull's Defensio Fid. Nic.; Blunt's Annotated Prayer Book, Nicene Creed; and Harvey's Hist. and Theology of the Three Creeds.]

NICOLAITANS. These are mentioned in our Lord's words to St. John for the angel of the Church of Ephesus, "But this thou hast, that thou hatest the deeds of the Nicolaitans, which I also hate:" and also in those to the Church of Pergamos, "So hast thou also them that hold the doctrine of the Nicolaitans, which thing I hate" [Rev. ii. 6-15]. Many writers associate them with the followers of Balaam mentioned in the verse preceding the one last quoted, as well as by St. Peter and St. Jude [2 Pet. ii. 15; Jude 11; Rev. ii. 14], and a supposed analogy between the Hebrew name Balaam and the Greek Nicolas has been thought to confirm this identity. The two sects—or perhaps rather parties in the Church—seem, however, to be spoken of in the Revelation as distinct from each other, though both to be found in the Church of Pergamos; and, if so, the Nicolaitans are not mentioned in any way that will characterize their principles. But Irenæus says: "The Nicolaitans are the followers of that Nicolas who was one of the seven first ordained to the diaconate by the Apostles. They lead lives of unrestrained indulgence. The character of these men is very plainly pointed out in the Apocalypse of St. John, as teaching that it is a matter of indifference to practise fornication, and to eat things offered to idols" [Iren. Contr. Hæres. i. 26]. Hippolytus gives a similar account of them [Hæres. vii. 24], and so does Epiphanius [Adv. Hæres. I. ii. 25]. Clement of Alexandria, however, distinctly declares that he can find no reason for thinking that Nicolas the Deacon was given to immoralitics [Stromat. iii. 4], and Theodoret says that his name was falsely given to the sect. The difficulty in ascertaining anything authentic about this sect probably arises from its subsequent existence under some other name, or from its principles being absorbed by later sects. NOËTIANS. [PATRIPASSIANISM.]

NOMINALISM. [THEOLOGY, SCHOLASTIC. CONCEPTUALISM.]

NONCONFORMITY. Before the Reformation, and for some years after the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign, there was no organized body of Separatists from the Church of England. In many respects the Lollards closely resembled the Puritans of Elizabeth's time; and it is probable that, notwithstanding the check received from the sanguinary law of Henry IV., many held the principles of Wickliffe down to the time of Henry VIII. But Lollardism, though it had its conventicles and schools, did not organize itself into a sect and secede. The Christian Brethren [see Blunt's History of the Reformation, p. 525] and the Cambridge party [ib. p. 527], who, if not Lollards in name, no doubt sprang from the Lollards, were still parties within the Church. Lollardism contributed largely to form that state of the public mind which in England produced the Reformation, but most largely that in it which produced the evils that accompanied the Reformation. The cockle had outgrown the wheat. Lollardism embraced in its doctrines errors and half truths; it embraced in its ranks turbulent and designing fanatics, both politieal and religious; and to its influence must be ascribed much of the insubordination and superstitious zeal which engendered Nonconformity.

Again, the followers of the Anabaptists cannot be considered as, by themselves, an organized body of Separatists. After the taking of Munster in 1535, Anabaptists found their way through Holland into England. The first notice of them in English history is in 1538. The English who joined them were treated by Elizabeth just as she treated the foreigners themselves, being ordered to depart the realm. Notwithstanding the order several remained, and joined the French and Dutch congregations in London and in towns near the coast. From these, there can be little doubt, sprung the sect of the Baptists, who may be distinguished from their parent stock in 1620, when they presented a petition to Parliament disclaiming the false notions of the Anabaptists; and who became an organized sect under Henry Jessey in 1640.

Nonconformity properly begins with the refugees from Frankfort and Geneva. They brought back with them Genevan doctrine, discipline, and worship. After some years of contest, which turned principally on the question of ecclesiastical dress, separate congregations were formed in 1566, in which the Prayer Book was wholly laid aside and the service was conducted by the book of the English refugees at Geneva. Among the leaders of these Separatists, Cartwright held that presbyters assembled in synod had an authority the same in kind with that of bishops. He was the founder of the Presbyterians, aided in his enterprise by the influence and example of Scotland, which had well learned the lessons of Geneva. Brown found the Ecclesia in the congregation, and denied the authority both of bishop and synod. From him descend the Independents, Robinson being the founder of the separate sect. In later times the Quakers appear in considerable numbers. Amidst the fanatical excitement of the Rebellion they gathered quickly round Fox, who began preaching in 1650.

There were some minor sects, such as the Family of Love, an offshoot of the Anabaptists; but the four sects, Presbyterians, Independents, Baptists, and Quakers, with the Popish recusants, make up the great body of Nonconformists until the rise of Wesleyan Methodism. Against these it was that Canons and Acts of Parliament were directed.

1. Ecclesiastical Censures. Canons III. to XII. declare the Church of England a true and Apostolical Church, and censure the impugners of her public worship, of her Articles, of her rites and ceremonies, of her government, of her forms of consecration and ordination. They censure also the authors and maintainers of schism, schismatics, conventicles, and constitutions made in conventicles. Canon LXXIII. forbade ministers to hold private conventicles. Articles XX. On the authority of the Church, and XXIII. Of ministering in the Congregation, directly contradict the principles of Nonconformity. Such statements and censures are, of course, within the province of every national Church.

2. Acts of Parliament. Nonconformity began, as we have seen, in Elizabeth's time. Earlier Statutes then, such as Henry VIII.'s, were directed against heresies, and against overt acts of opposition to the established order by those who still considered themselves to be members of the Church. When separate congregations were formed, simple Nonconformity was made punishable. At the beginning of Elizabeth's reign, her council suggested to her that those Protestants who affected improper alterations, and were for throwing the ecclesiastical polity into a new form, ought to receive an early check: it being by no means advisable to allow more than one church.

By 1 Eliz. cap. 2, sec. 14, all persons are commanded to resort to church, and absentees are to be fined twelve pence for each non-attendance. By 23 Eliz. cap. 1, sec. 5, the forfeit is increased to £20 a month: and after twelve months' absence the absentee is to be bound himself, and to find sureties in £200 at least until he conform. Those who maintain a schoolmaster who is not a church-goer shall forfeit £10 a month.

By 29 Eliz. cap. 6 sec. 4, 6, on default of payment of the £20 a month, the Queen may, by process out of the exchequer, seize all the goods and two parts of the lands of such offender.

During these years, the Court of High Commission[1] had been labouring to suppress Puritanism, but its efforts were often thwarted by the interference of the Earl of Leicester. At length, in 1593, the first conventicle act was passed, the precursor of the Act of A.D. 1664. By 35 Eliz. cap. 1, those not present at divine service for a month, and those who move and persuade people to deny the Queen's authority in causes ecclesiastical, and to that end persuade people to forbear church and to frequent conventicles, are to be committed to prison without bail till they conform and make the submission prescribed in the Act: failing to make which submission within three months, they are to abjure and depart the realm, failing which they are declared guilty of felony without benefit of clergy. This Act, though made to continue no longer than the end of the next session of Parliament, was afterwards kept in force by the two succeeding Parliaments of this reign. And its penalties were not repealed until 1 Will. & Mary, cap. 18, sec. 4.

In 1593 there was also passed an Act against Popish recusants, by which they were confined within five miles of their respective dwellings.

Elizabeth's Act was declared by Charles II.'s Conventicle Act [A.D. 1664] to be in force. This latter Act [22 Car. II. cap. 1] imposes, for being present at a conventicle, under colour or pretence of any exercise of religion, at which there shall be five or more persons assembled above the household, a penalty of £5 or three months' imprisonment; for the second offence, £10 or six months; for the third offence transportation for seven years. It orders conventicles to be dispersed by military force, or by magistrates by what force they can raise. In the next year [A.D. 1665] was passed the Five-Mile Act, which enacts that those in orders, or pretended orders, who have not made declaration of assent and consent to the use of the Book of Common Prayer, and taken and subscribed the oath of the illegality of taking arms against the King, shall not come, except in passing upon the road, within five miles of any city or town corporate.

By the Conventicle Act, A.D. 1670, any one magistrate is empowered to impose a fine of five shillings for being present at a conventicle (which is defined as before); ten shillings upon the second offence; £20 for preaching or teaching; £20 on the owner of the premises in which the conventicle is held.

Lastly, in 1672, the Test Act was passed "for preventing dangers which may happen from Popish recusants," enacting that all in place or office, civil or military, under the Crown, or in receipt of any pay or salary by patent or grant, shall take the oaths of supremacy and allegiance, and shall receive the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper within three months after admittance. So stood the law until the Toleration Act of A.D. 1688.

The Statutes which have been named proceed on [1] This court was established by the Act of Supremacy [1 Eliz. cap. 1], which restored ecclesiastical jurisdiction to the Crown. Nothing can be more comprehensive, Collier observes, than the terms of the clause which empowers the Queen to erect this court. The whole compass of Church discipline seems transferred upon the Crown. The High Commission Court, and the Court of Star Chamber (a Judicial Committee of the Privy Council), were suppressed in 1641.

two principles which used to be thought undeniable, viz. that the Church and the Commonwealth are co-extensive, the same body under its two aspects; and that the government of such a Christian state has the duty of training its subjects in Christian truth and religious practice. Rulers, it was thought, were bound to enforce the observance of Church laws as well as of the laws of a secular political economy. The former of these was, at the end of the sixteenth century, no such Utopian notion as it now appears to be. For the first ten years of Elizabeth's reign Papists frequented the English service, and it might have been not unreasonably hoped that such a reformation was possible as would retain the whole nation in the established Church. So long as this theory of the identity of the Church and nation appeared not impossible to realize (and there is no wonder that patriotic statesmen were slow to relinquish it), it followed inevitably that temporal penalties were added to spiritual censures, that breaches of Church bounds were met by strict enactments. Rebellion against the Church was also rebellion against the State. And in point of fact, secession from the Church was accompanied by insurrection against the Government. The conspiracy of Hacket and Coppinger was just before the passing of the Act of A.D. 1593. Presbyteries and independent congregations would lead, it was well understood, to the overthrow of temporal as well as spiritual thrones. Rebellion against the sovereign began with disobedience in religion, and disobedience in religion was dealt with according to its results. The hundred and thirty years from Elizabeth's accession to the Revolution are the attempt to realize the high ideal of the true union and coincidence of Church and State. [DISSENTERS. SCHISM. Dict. of SECTS and HERESIES.]

NONJURORS. Those who refused the oath of allegiance to William and Mary at the Revolution. William and Mary were proclaimed King and Queen of England, February 13th, 1689. Two new oaths of allegiance and supremacy were immediately framed, which were to be taken by all in office, civil, military or ecclesiastical, before August 1st, on pain of suspension for six months. Deprivation ipso facto was to follow upon a persistent refusal. Sancroft (Canterbury), Turner (Ely), Lake (Chichester), Ken (Bath and Wells), White (Peterborough), Thomas (Worcester), Lloyd (Norwich), Frampton (Gloucester), Cartwright (Chester), refused the oaths. Of these, Thomas and Cartwright died before the time of suspension, Lake before the time of deprivation. The remainder were deprived. About four hundred clergy were deprived, of whom a list is given in the Life of Kettlewell. No list of deprived laymen has come down to us.

The terms "rightful and lawful king" of the usual oath, implying a hereditary right, had been omitted; and the oath was only "to bear true allegiance" to the King and Queen. Upon the death of James and the recognition of his son by the King of France, the oath of abjuration of the Pretender was imposed: and a few who had taken the oath of allegiance refused this oath. Kettlewell's list gives four non-abjurors.

At the restoration of Charles II. the doctrines of non-resistance and passive obedience assumed (it could not be otherwise) an importance almost paramount. They were represented as the "distinguishing character" of the Church of England, if not as the true tests of Christianity. [See the deathbed declarations of Thomas and Lake. Kettlewell's Life, 8vo, pp. 199-206.] That these doctrines are taught in the "Institution of a Christian Man," in the homilies and canons, and that they were declared by the University of Oxford in her decrees of A.D. 1622, 1647, 1683, is well known.[1] That they are taught by our Lord Himself is true. But to this assertion must be subjoined a comment. It is the manner of our Lord's teaching to lay down a principle of action broadly, and to leave the necessary limitations to be worked out afterwards, as occasion shall arise. Thus, "Give to him that asketh thee," is undeniably a precept of indiscriminate almsgiving: reasonable limitations are supposed, such as that men are not to be supported in idleness, that a man is not to neglect his duty towards his own; and these limitations are recognised in Scripture. "Resist not evil" has its necessary limitations for the preservation of life and property, for the maintenance of the good order of society: and, in St. Paul's allowance of courts Christian for judgments in things pertaining to this life, is recognised a limitation to our Lord's command, "If any man will sue thee at the law," &c. So passive obedience, which is the highest case of non-resistance of evil, has analogous limitations[2] for the preservation of society, and for the saving that liberty which is the life of a nation; while St. Paul's precept of obedience proceeds on the hypothesis that rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil. That such limitations were accepted by the majority of our bishops is clear from their votes. On the regency question, two bishops voted that the vacant throne should be filled up by a king: they considered that James had forfeited the throne for himself and his heirs. Thirteen voted for a regent: they were not then prepared to transfer their allegiance to a new king, but were prepared to obey a regent wielding in the king's name the authority for which James was personally disqualified. Sancroft absented himself from the debate and the division.[3]

[1] See History of Passive Obedience. Amsterdam, 1689. In "Four Letters to a Friend in North Britain, upon . . . Dr. Sacheverel's Trial," it is said that this book was approved and licensed at a general meeting of Nonjuring bishops held at Lambeth for that purpose. The book is anonymous. The copy in the writer's possession has in MS., in an old hand, "Supposed to be written by Mr. Th. Brown, B.D., Fellow of St. John's College in Cambridge:" but it is generally assigned to Abednego Seller.

[2] For a defence of strict passive obedience, see Dr. Pusey's Patience and Confidence the Strength of the Church.

[3] It is not easy to account for Sancroft's absence from the convention. His settled opinion was that a Custos Regni ought to be appointed to carry on the government in the king's right and name. See his paper in D'Oyly's

When Parliament had determined for a king, not for a regent, then the nine bishops named above refused to transfer their allegiance. Others considered it their duty to submit to the determination of the convention. Of all judgments passed upon the actors in these difficult times, those are the worst which so freely impute sordid motives and conscious dishonesty. When we see Ken and Kettlewell on the one side, Bull and Beveridge on the other side, harsh judgments may surely be avoided.

The deprived bishops had now to ascertain their duty. There was no pretence of a canonical deposition. They were deprived by the civil power; illegally, they believed, and in consequence of their adherence to the doctrines of their Church. They had a duty, first, as trustees of the Apostolical succession for the benefit of the nation; secondly, to the portions of their flocks which adhered to their communion. [1.] It was by no means clear that Presbyterianism would not be established; if not at once, and formally, yet by degrees through a surrender of Church principles in the attempt at a comprehension, and the giving over the Church to the Latitudinarian party. Again, it was by no means clear that the work of the Revolution would not be in a few years reversed; in which case the course of the restored king, and of the Revolution bishops, supposing such to be retained, could not be predicted. In these doubts it was their duty to preserve for a while the line of an undoubted episcopate. [2.] The spiritual wants of their adherents required the same course. The deprived bishops were not, however, unanimous regarding the necessity of providing a ministry of the Nonjuring succession. Ken took no part in the proceedings, and Frampton appears to have stood aloof. Sancroft died before the consecration took place, but it must be regarded as having his sanction, not only from the delegation of his powers to Lloyd, but from his joining in the preliminary steps, the consultation with King James and the nomination of Hickes. The remaining three, Lloyd, White and Turner, consecrated Hickes and Wagstaffe suffragans of Thetford and Ipswich. This was on the 24th of February 1693. A statement of the case, drawn up on canonical principles, is in Kettlewell's Life, p. 340 [8vo, ed. 1718]. The justification of the step, whether, namely, it was expedient to insist on their canonical rights, must lie in the uncertainty of the times, and in the necessity for preserving a true Episcopal succession.

At the next consecration in 1713, the case is essentially different. On the 1st of January 1710, Lloyd died, the last of the deprived bishops who claimed the obedience of the Nonjurors; for Ken, the only survivor, actually resigned his pretensions and claims to Hooper, who had succeeded Kidder in Bath and Wells [Lathbury, History of Nonjurors, p. 203]. Wagstaffe died in 1712, so that in 1713 there remained besides Ken, who wished to close the breach by union with the bishops in possession, only Hickes, a suffragan, whose commission was dissolved by the death of his diocesan. Again, in 1713, it was evident that the Church of England had passed through the trial of the Revolution, if not without deterioration, yet unimpaired in essentials. There was no pretence for asserting a necessity of preserving an episcopal succession to provide against the contingencies of the times. Whatever excuses there may be made for Hickes on the score of his attachment to the exiled family, and his repudiation of the principles of the Revolution, it must be held that he was formally in schism in procuring the consecration of Collier and others; and that the Scotch bishops who joined in the consecration were guilty of an unauthorized intrusion into the province of Canterbury. Dodwell, Nelson, and Brokesby at this time were reconciled to the Church of England.

The three epochs that have been named are the leading epochs in the history of the Nonjurors in their relation to the Church of England. After 1713, their history, with the exception of the attempt to effect a union with the Greek Church, is the history of their own divisions, in which, it must needs be said, schism bore the fruit of schism. The proposed alterations in the Liturgy, by no means unimportant in themselves, are yet neither any one of them, nor all together, sufficient to justify separation, and the setting up altar against altar. The changes desired by Brett and Collier were the introduction of the Mixed Cup, of Prayer for the Dead instead of a mere commemoration, of the Invocation of the Holy Ghost, and of an oblatory prayer after the Prayer of Consecration. On these points a separation of communion took place; and "after the death of Hawes, Taylor, and Bedford (see the tables below), Spinckes and Gandy being desirous of a succession in their line, applied to the bishops in Scotland; and they (again as it seems to me unmindful of their duty) consecrated Henry Doughty for their friends in England." [Perceval's Apostolic Succession, p. 225.]

The following list of consecrations is corrected from the ordinary sources by formal documents, partly on paper and partly on vellum, in the Bodleian Library :—

Timothy Mawman, . .	1731	by Brett, T. Brett, junr., & G. Smith.
Robert Gordon, . . .	1741	by Brett, Smith and Mawman.

Gordon was the last bishop of the regular Nonjurors. There was an irregular offshoot, R. Laurence, T. Deacon, P. J. Brown, claiming consecration from the Scotch bishops originally: Price and Cartwright from Deacon, Garnet and Boothe from Cartwright. Boothe died in Ireland in 1805. Cartwright formally renounced his schism and was received into communion by the late Rev. W. G. Rowland, at Shrewsbury, about 1799.

When to the well-known names in the foregoing list we add the names of Kettlewell, Dodwell, Nelson, Baker, Howell, Parker, Leslie, Law, and Carte, it will be seen at once how high a place the Nonjurors hold in the theology and literature of the eighteenth century. Dodwell in ancient history, Collier and Carte in modern history, Parker as a Commentator, Baker and Hickes as antiquaries, Howell as a canonist, Hickes and Brett in theology, Kettlewell, Nelson, Law, Spinckes, Deacon, in devotional theology, Leslie as a polemic, stand on the highest level of their times, surpassed by none but Bull and Butler.

It may be questioned indeed whether any divines, their contemporaries, have influenced the theology of the nineteenth century so much as have Brett by his liturgical writings, Nelson by his Eucharistic treatise (Mede's doctrine came to Nelson through Hickes), and Laurence by his treatises on Holy Baptism: whether to any one except Bishop Wilson can be attributed such power over the hearts and lives of men as has been exercised by Law and Spinckes. Their influence upon their own generation was much opposed by the facts of their separation from the Church and of their attachment to a family of Papists. And their separation was most hurtful to the Church, inasmuch as it withdrew so large a portion of that element which was wanted to compensate defects in the Latitudinarian school of theology, the sacerdotal and sacramental element. But the Nonjurors are now recovering the place due to them in the history of our Church: and are important links in the catena which connects the divines of Charles II.'s day with those divines of our day who are known, and will hereafter be better known, as the true representatives of English theology.

A complete history of the Nonjurors is still wanting. Lathbury's is good as a first essay. He read diligently the controversial tracts and printed documents: but, with the exception of the correspondence with the Greek Church taken from Bishop Jolly's MSS., he made little or no use of the materials which, it can hardly be doubted, still exist in MS. in public and private libraries.

NOTES OF THE CHURCH. Certain diacritical marks or notes have always distinguished the Church from the numberless sects that have seceded from her communion: but scarcely any two writers have drawn them alike. Some of these notes having a polemical cast are cramped, and involve a "petitio principii;" others suited well in the age that propounded them, but are now obsolete. Some remove essential barriers; others are severe, and involve an exterminating judgment on all who do not exactly fall within the proposed limits. Tertullian in his Præscriptio makes priority in point of time, and therefore Apostolicity, the principal mark of the true Church. But he includes in this the rule of faith or creed descending from the beginning [Præscr. xiii.], as also intercommunion through unity of the Sacraments [ibid. xx.]. Irenæus makes truth to depend on Apostolical succession, as guaranteeing a true creed [Contr. Hær. i. 2, 3]. Augustine adds œcumenical consent, the name "catholic" [de V. Rel. 8], miraculous power, and holiness [Adv. Hær. I. 10, iii.; de Unit. Eccl. 6-17]. Jerome mentions the universality of succession, and the designation of "catholic:" Vincent of Lerins, universality, antiquity, and consent. After the Reformation notes of a polemical character are introduced. Bellarmine adds to those given by the Fathers temporal felicity of the Church, and the miserable end of opponents [de Eccl. iv. 3], which, however, are rejected by other writers of the same communion [see Bishop Taylor's Critique on his fifteen notes, Diss. fr. Popery x. 377, ed. 1839]. Luther, on the other hand, makes tribulation of the Church externally and internally a mark of the true Church in connection with the Gospel faithfully preached, sacraments duly administered, the power of the keys exercised, a ministry lawfully constituted, and a vernacular ritual [de Eccl. Notis, vii. 147, ed. 1550]. So Melanchthon, "Plerumque Ecclesia est cœtus exiguus veræ doctrinæ professionem retinens, et sustinens varias et ingentes ærumnas, communes et peculiares" [Loci, p. 498]. Calvin recognises only the Word preached, and Sacraments administered [Inst. IV. i. 10] by a ministry constituted by Christ [ib. 7], i.e. "pastors and teachers" [ib. IV. iii. 4; Eph. iv. 11]. In the Church of England different views have been adopted. Bishop Taylor enumerates antiquity, duration, succession, intercommunion, purity of doctrine [Diss. II. i. 1]. Field [Of the Ch. II. i. 2-5] notes pure doctrine, sacraments, a lawful ministry, antiquity, succession, and successional universality. Sir Humphrey Lynde, in his Via Tuta, p.

75, makes the signs of a true Church to consist in "the three Creeds, the two principal Sacraments, the twenty-two Books of canonical Scripture, the first four General Councils, the Apostolic traditions, the ancient Liturgies, and the ordination of pastors." Liebermann and Palmer follow the definition of the Constantinopolitan Creed, which describes the Church as ONE, HOLY, CATHOLIC, and APOSTOLICAL [Tr. on Ch. i. 2]. The last of these terms, however, comprises subjectively the other three.

1. A church is Apostolical in its origin as founded directly by Apostles, as the churches of Jerusalem, Antioch, Rome, or indirectly as the many churches that have been established throughout the world by those who succeeded the Apostles, "per hoc Apostolicæ deputantur, ut soboles apostolicarum ecclesiarum" [Tert. Pr. 20]. There must be Apostolicity also in purity of doctrine such as the Apostles delivered, and such as the Church has at all times and everywhere received. Christ built his Church on the Apostles, and no other foundation can any man now lay. It is as essential a note of the Church, as the sacrifice of the Death of Christ is of the Christian covenant.

2. All the scattered members of the Church, wherever they are situated, form one Apostolical Church. The flock is one, as the Shepherd is one; one by the operation of one sanctifying Spirit; one in faith, one in hope, one in charity; one in derived succession from the Apostles, and therefore one in regimen; one in harmonious acceptance of Scripture; one as joining in one sacrifice of prayer and praise; one as the life conferred on each member in one Baptism, and sustained by the Body and Blood of Christ in the Holy Eucharist, is one; it is one also "by way of complexion" [Pearson]; for as the various members of the human body, in intimate union with the seat of intelligence, the head, form one material body, so the various members of each Church, and the several churches throughout the world, form in the aggregate the one Body of Christ; united in one corporate existence with their heavenly Head, and deriving from it, so far as God vouchsafes to grant His good grace, power to will and act in obedience to the will of Christ.

3. The one Apostolical Church is holy in its origin as deriving its being from Christ: holy in its doctrine, the law of the Lord being an undefiled law, converting the soul; holy in its members, whom God according to His good purpose hath sanctified to Himself as a "peculiar people, zealous of good works." The Spouse of Christ must needs be holy. "Be ye holy, for I am holy," is a command that by Divine grace carries with it in some degree its own fulfilment, as when it was said, "Let there be light, and there was light." The declaration "without holiness no man shall see the Lord" was intended to draw with cords of love, not to repel. Time past, present, and future is one sustained hope of this holiness to the believer. It was first lit up within the soul at baptism; though clouded over at times with sin, it has exercised a renewing power, and won back the faltering soul to thoughts of God and duty, and in the end this hope of holiness will be made perfect in reality, and union with Christ will cast out all fear of future falling. If such be the life of each individual member of Christ, the whole body cannot be otherwise than holy.

4. This one holy Apostolical Church is also Catholic. Our Lord, in many a figurative utterance, foreshadowed this catholic character of the Church. His last words gave to His Apostles their catholic mission, and from their days the Church has gradually spread over the face of the earth. In every age, whether in times of persecution or seasons of respite, it has held on its way, warring and travailing in the cause of truth: both with respect to time and space therefore the Church has shewn itself to be catholic. It is catholic, also, as having been animated by the same devotional spirit in every age of the world; its Scriptures, its creeds, its sacraments, and, in all essential particulars, its liturgies and offices of devotion, have met with universal acceptation, as having been received from Apostles or Apostolic men. Every attempt to introduce new doctrine into the Church is uncatholic, as Liebermann [Inst. Theol. ii. 233] plainly confesses, "nunquam tempus aut locum assignare potuerunt adversarii, quo novum dogma in hanc ecclesiam irrepsisset; omnes, e contra, qui sectas introduxerunt ab antiqua fide dissentientes ab eâ damnati et ejecti sunt, tamquam avitæ religionis corruptores."

Apostolicity then represents substantially the unity, the holiness, and the catholicity of the Church. And each branch of the Apostolical Church has preserved, as jewels of her marriage dowry, the Holy Scriptures, the sacraments, the creeds, and the liturgy, which we trace as an established ordinance in Justin Martyr [Apol. i., and in the Ap. Constit. ii. 57; viii. 6]. These are the co-ordinate signs of Apostolicity, and are the inheritance of every portion of the Church Catholic.

NOVATIANISM. A sect founded by Novatian, a presbyter of Rome, in the third century. He embraced very severe views on the question of the readmission of the lapsed to communion, and the rejection of his views by the council held on the question caused him to establish a schismatical communion. [LAPSED.] A writer of the sect, Sempronianus, has condensed the doctrine of the Novatians into this proposition,—that penance is not allowed after baptism, because the Church cannot forgive mortal sin; and, in short, that she destroys herself by receiving sinners.[1] They were considered irregular in not administering chrism at baptism.[2] They condemned second marriages, nor would they associate with any that had contracted them. They assumed the name of καθαροί, as expressive of the rigour of their doctrine. They refused all the privileges of the Church to the lapsed; but it does not seem that they denied them hope of salvation.[1] Socrates, a quasi-Novatian himself, or at least well-affected to the sect, says that men reject Novatianism only because their discipline was so severe, and the objectors favoured a laxer system.[2] An anonymous writer,[3] said to be a contemporary of Cyprian, who maintains the proposition "quod lapsis spes veniæ non est deneganda," divides his argument into three. He impugns the severity of the Novatians because [1] of the injustice of refusing penitence to those who had remained firm in the persecution of Gallus, although their hearts had failed them in that of Decius; because [2] God's mercy and readiness to receive penitents are most abundantly to be proved from Holy Scripture; and because [3] the scriptural arguments adduced by the Novatians are insufficient. The text on which they mainly relied was Heb. vi. 4-8. Epiphanius [A.D. 400] answers their use of this text by urging that those who had fallen and were restored, could never be restored to the same status; penitence is not innocence. St. Hilary [A.D. 360], in his tract on the 137th Psalm, says that it annihilates the views of the Novatians.[4] The following texts are quoted by Philartrius [c. A.D. 380] against the sect:[5] Ezek. xxxiii. 11; Luke xii. 20; Job xiv. 2; 2 Cor. xi. 29, xii. 21. The case of St. Peter was early instanced to Novatian himself, as one that disproved their position. Here was one who had lapsed, was penitent, and forgiven. Novatian replied to this that Peter had never been baptized.[6]

[2] Baronius, ed. 1738, i. 35; xviii.

They were never regarded as heretical on the great doctrines of the faith; and in the Arian controversies they always sided with the Catholic party. They were heretical only in denouncing the orthodox for their readiness to receive penitents, and in accusing them by so doing of encouraging sin. Those who joined the Catholics from the Novatians were received with laying on of hands only; and even perverts to Nestorianism were received after long penitence. This was also the only heresy in which the status of the clergy was acknowledged, a fresh ordination not being required. This was the subject of one of the canons of Nicæa. NOVELS. [LAW, ECCLESIASTICAL.]

NUNS. In the first ages of the Church there were virgins called "ecclesiasticæ," or canonesses, who, although resident in private houses, were registered in the Canon or Church books, and were specially under the bishop's supervision. In the fourth century there were monastic virgins living in a monastic society—to such the twenty-third canon of the third Council of Carthage, and St. Augustine [De Mor. Eccl. c. xxxi.] allude. St. Leo I. ordered that nuns should not receive the veil unless they were full sixty years of age. The Council of Chalcedon, c. xv., defined forty years for the office of deaconess, and the Novels, about the same period, required the same age in nuns. St. Athanasius relates that the sister of St. Anthony, then advanced in years, visited her brother in the wilderness in order to adopt his solitary life. St. Pachomius, at his desire, founded for her and for his own sister a monastery near the Nile, at a distance from the convent of men. The ardour of these women communicated itself to others, and soon four hundred virgins joined the new society. Two ladies of high birth, Euphrasia and Macrina, the former a widow of Lycia, retiring into the Thebaïd, and the latter a sister of St. Basil into the solitudes of Pontus, founded new monasteries on their own property. At the end of the fourth century there are said to have been forty thousand religious women in Egypt, and seventy-six thousand men. St. Scholastica, the sister of St. Benedict, promoted Monasticism in Italy.

The interior government of a monastery is entrusted to an abbess or superior, but the spiritual rule is in the hands of the bishop, or regular chief, who selects the confessors, and makes periodical visitations. The form of admission, or veiling of a novice at her profession as a nun, varies with the different orders. In England they were forbidden to have their girdle, veil, or chin cloth of silk; or silver or gold needles in their veil; or a garment of silk, or having rich embroidery, or artificially dyed cloth called burnet. They were allowed to wear a single ring, which they received at their dedication. An abbess left the cloister on business or to do homage accompanied by a sister; a nun might go out if she could not remain without danger or scandal in the convent, or on a holiday visit to parents or relations for three days, or in case of necessity for six days, but always with another nun in her company.

The various orders of nuns were founded on modifications of one of the three great rules of St. Basil, St. Benedict, and St. Augustine. The earliest regulation of convents in England was made at the Council of Cloveshoe; when the irregularities of visits by laymen and relaxation of discipline were forbidden, as well as the use and manufacture of particoloured apparel. Devotion, reading books and singing psalms, and restriction to residence in the cloister, were prescribed. In 877, by the dispensation of the king or bishop, they could leave the convent and marry. However, even in 785, a nun was regarded as the spouse of Christ, marriage with such an one was declared to be adultery, and being branded in A.D. 943 as incest. The solution of any discrepancy in these conditions lies in the fact that there were two distinct classes, generically included under the one name of nun; the "mynchen" (μοναχαι), who were women-monks, and "nonnæ," women of advanced age, spinsters or widows, who were classed with canons, the former observing a stricter discipline. The names are distinguished in the councils of the beginning of the eleventh century.

In the Acts of the Apostles we find in the four virgin daughters of Philip the deacon [xxi. 9] the first notice of those professed women who are alluded to by St. Paul, and mentioned so frequently by the early Fathers Ignatius, Tertullian, and Cyprian. In the ages of persecution, as appears from the Council of Seville, their vows were irrevocable. They resided in their own homes, but were secluded from society; and if they were in poverty were maintained by the alms of the Church. In the third century, Ammianus Marcellinus relates the noble conduct of Sapor, who permitted the exercise of their religion to Christian nuns, and preserved them from harm. In the fourth century, with the return of peace, religious women were multiplied, and St. Chrysostom mentions a thousand as residing at Constantinople. At that period the common life began practically in the East and West. The nuns gave themselves up to devotion, psalmody, handiworks, and abstinence; wearing a dark dress and a cincture of wool. They had a place allotted to them in church, and were under the supervision of the deaconesses.

There were two kinds of consecration, one the vow of a young girl to a kind of perpetual noviciate at home, made at the age of sixteen years; she was called "Deo devota;" the other, the profession of perpetual vows at twenty-eight years of age, or, according to some councils, forty years, by virgins thenceforward known as "Christo dicatæ" or "Deo sacratæ." The veil generally used by women in the Primitive Church was appropriated as a habit by these women in particular. From the East the West adopted this conventual life; the monasteries of men being adopted as the exemplar, and the same founders of orders being recognised by both sexes, with similar habits and rules. Marcella at Rome instituted a sisterhood from information of similar communities given to her by exiled priests of Alexandria, in the time of St. Jerome. The regular canonesses adopted the so-called rule of St. Austin, which appeared in Africa; the Benedictines were founded by Scholastica, sister of St. Benedict, in 530; and the reformed branches of the order, the Cluniacs, appeared (founded by Abbot Odo), in 940; the Cistercians in 1118, founded by Humberlina, sister of St. Bernard; the Camaldolese by Romuald; the Carthusians in 1309. The Basilians were instituted in 309 by Macrina, sister of St. Basil. The rule of St. Austin, under various modifications, was professed by the Beguines in the Low Countries in the seventh century. The various communities of Hospitallers, and Knightesses were founded in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries; the Præmonstratensians in 1121, the Dominicans in 1206, the Franciscans in 1212, the Carmelites in 1122, Servites in the fourteenth century, Austin Eremites, Capuchins, and Poor Clares in 1225.

In the early Northumbrian monasteries there were often two communities, one of either sex. St. Etheldreda also founded such an one at Ely in A.D. 673. These hermaphrodite houses were also established by the orders of Fontevrault in 1100; the Bridgettines in the fourteenth century, and Gilbertines, the only English order, in 1148. The sexes were divided even in church by curtains and parcloses; and strict regulations confined them to their respective monasteries.

The noviciate, previous to the reception of the black veil and the assumption of an irrevocable vow, was fixed at one year's duration in the thirteenth century.

Since the Reformation of the sixteenth century many new communities have been set on foot in the Roman communion, some with rules of extraordinary and novel severity. Houses of mercy and establishments of religious women are also again appearing in England.

Respecting this latter revival, some wise words of Bramhall may be quoted: "So as the vow of perpetual celibate were reduced to the form of our English Universities, so long a fellow, so long unmarried, or of the Canonesses and Beguines, which are no longer restrained from wedlock than they retain their places or habits, so as their blind obedience were more enlightened and secured by some certain rules and bounds, so as their mock-poverty were changed into a competent maintenance, and lastly, so as all opinion of satisfaction and supererogation were removed, I do not see why monasteries might not well enough agree with reformed devotion."

O

OATH. An oath may be defined as a solemn appeal to a Superior Being, in which the person who makes such appeal calls upon that Being either to attest the truth of some statement made or to be made by him, or to witness and record some promise which he is about to make. According to this distinction, oaths fall naturally into classes—assertory and promissory. This definition by no means includes all that is implied in every form of oath; not all, indeed, which is implied in the English judicial oath, but it is based upon that characteristic of an oath which the oaths of all nations possess in common, and which may therefore be considered its essential element. Oaths of this, the simplest, form, which may be called by way of distinction simple antestatory oaths, have been common in all countries, having had their origin in the natural imperfection of society and the consequent distrust of men for each other.[1] Of such a character was the ancient Jewish oath [Gen. xxiv. 2, 3, 37] and the oath of a more public character [Judg. xxi.; and 1 Kings xviii. 10], and that given in Lev. vi. 3, 35, which is the first example of a strictly judicial oath. The frequency of Greek oaths, and the sanctity attached to them, appear from numberless Greek authors from Homer downwards;[2] and it was amongst the Romans that the judicial oath, as applied to witnesses and litigants, as well as judges, became invariable.

All these oaths were accompanied by a tacit assumption that the person taking the oath believed not only in the existence of the Being whom he invoked, but in his aversion to falsehood and his will and ability to punish it;[3] and any appeal to a Divine power to witness a statement or promise, accompanied by an assumption of this kind, contains all the essentials of an oath. The English form of oath, however, contains more than this. It is imprecatory in form, as well as antestatory; and it is, accordingly, defined by Paley as the "calling upon God to witness, i.e. take notice of what we say, and it is invoking His vengeance or renouncing His favour if what we say is false, or what we promise is not performed."[4] This we do in our oath by using the form of adjuration, "So help me God," i.e. So, or upon condition of my speaking the truth, and not otherwise. It is this latter portion of our oath which is the cause of the Moravians' objection to take it. Unlike the Quakers, they do not object to a solemn appeal to God as the witness of their words, but they shrink from what they consider the impiety of imprecating under any circumstances the Divine vengeance on their souls. It is evident that this portion of the oath must be superfluous to any one who believes that the Deity will punish falsehood without any invocation from us, the only persons whom an oath can be conceived to bind. Nor can this argument be fairly pressed, as has been sometimes attempted, against the use even of the simple antestatory form of oath. The assumption that the juror is convinced the Deity will punish falsehood without special invocation, does not render an oath completely superfluous to him as an inducement to tell the truth: for it should be the object of an oath to remind him of this which he is too prone to forget. The object, as it has been well expressed, of all forms of adjuration, "should be to shew that we are not calling the attention of God to man, but the attention of man to God; that we are not calling upon Him to punish the wrongdoer, but upon man to remember that He will."[5] And in this sense a wider and better definition of an oath would be "an outward pledge given by the juror that his assertion or promise is made under an immediate sense of his responsibility to God."

The Lawfulness of Oaths. The scruples of the Quakers and Moravians upon this point have been alluded to above; but, indeed, such objections are of considerably earlier date than either of these two sects; the unlawfulness of taking an oath having been one of the tenets of the old Anabaptists. Even in still more remote times we find that it was thought necessary by the Anglican Church to take measures against the spread of such doubts. Thus the Constitutions of Arundel contain a penal enactment, attainting of heresy those who should question the determination of the Church concerning any oaths to be taken in

[1] For an inquiry into the origin of oaths, and an acute disquisition on oaths generally, see Heineccius, Exercit. xviii., De Lubricitate, &c.

[2] See especially the story of the punishment inflicted on Glaucus and his family for the mere contemplation of perjury.

[3] Such Oriental forms of oath as the Persian invocation, "By the King's head!" and the like, cannot be considered as oaths proper, except in so far as they were accompanied by a belief that breach of them would be punished by the vengeance of some divine person, in which case they were virtually appeals to that divine person.

the ecclesiastical or temporal courts, and providing that it should be publicly taught and preached by all that "in judicial matters an oath may be lawfully taken." And the declaratory part of the constitution, without its penal adjuncts, is embodied in our own Thirty-ninth Article. With regard to the Scriptural authority of the lawfulness of oaths, it is generally admitted that they are sanctioned in the Old Testament. This appears not only from such a command as "Thou shalt fear the Lord thy God and serve Him, and shalt swear by His Name" [Deut. vi. 13] (which may be regarded rather as a prohibition against swearing by any other name than an express injunction to swear at all), but by such passages as Exod. xxii. 11, where there is a direct injunction to the civil magistrate to administer "an oath of the Lord" in confirmation of the truth. Those who deny the lawfulness of oaths do so generally on the ground that this permission of the Mosaic dispensation has been since abrogated, and that oaths have now been expressly forbidden to Christians both directly by our Lord Himself and mediately by His Apostles. That, however, the prohibition in Matt. v. 34 cannot be taken as an assertion of the unlawfulness of the judicial oath, at least, may be shewn from our Lord's own acts. It has been observed that to the question of the High Priest, "I adjure Thee by the living God whether Thou be the Christ?" our Lord, in replying "Thou hast said," submitted himself in effect and without any remonstrance to a judicial oath.[1] Had it been his wish to prohibit it to his followers, no better opportunity of doing so could have presented itself. And the passage in St. James is evidently directed not against the taking of oaths in general, but against a practice then common amongst the Jews, that viz. of avoiding any adjuratory appeal to the name of Jehovah, under the idea that swearing by the names of heaven, earth, &c., did not involve them in the guilt of perjury in the event of their having forsworn themselves.[2] Amongst the Fathers there existed a diversity of opinion on the subject of oaths. Chrysostom, Epiphanius, Basil, and Theophylact,[3] amongst others, seem all to have considered our Lord's words as peremptorily forbidding all oaths; while, on the other side, may also be marshalled a considerable number of authorities headed by Cyril of Alexandria and St. Augustine.

The Obligation of an Oath. The obligation of an assertory oath is of course absolute in its nature, involving an unequivocal moral duty of speaking the truth. But with regard to a promissory oath, the obligation is absolute to make it with a full present intention of performing its subject-matter; but with regard to its ultimate performance, cases sometimes occur which give rise to a conflict of duties. A disquisition upon this subject would be beyond the limits of the present article, but see for an elaborate treatise on the casuistry of oaths, Sanderson's de Juramt. Oblig. Prælect., ed. 1688.

OBEDIENCE. [Counsels of Perfection.]

OBIT. [Annual Commemoration.]

OBJECTIVE. The terms "object" and "objective" were much used in Scholastic theology for the purpose of expressing that phase of anything which comprehends its existence, but of excluding that phase of anything which comprehends our knowledge of it. Thus the term "objective" distinguishes that which is really existent from that which is ideally known. An "object" is that which a thing is in itself independently of our cognition; that which is known, whether it is known or not, and which must exist as such before it can be known.

The correlative terms "subject" and "subjective" belong to that which knows in contradistinction to that which is known.

It may be useful to the general reader to illustrate the modern theological use of these terms by examples. Thus, the energy of thought may be directed towards the Divine Nature objectively and subjectively:—

Objectively, by contemplation of the Divine Nature as in Itself, and not as in its relation to us: i.e. our contemplation of It as "non-Ego."

Subjectively, by contemplation of the Divine Nature as It forms part of a system, of which "Ego" is the start-point if not the centre.

Applying the illustration to Faith, it will be seen that Objective Faith looks to that in which we believe, Subjective Faith to that with which we believe: the first being that phase of belief in God, e.g., which fixes its gaze on God as its Object; while the second is that phase of faith which sees the believer in God, and the operation of his mind in believing. Or again, the first represents a dogma, the second a faculty.

In the same manner the terms may be applied to Worship. Objective worship is adoration in its purest and most unselfish form; adoration of God as its Object without reference to the person adoring. Subjective worship, on the other hand, is praise, prayer, or thanksgiving, offered for the advantage of the Subject, that is of the person worshipping.

A full account of the history and use of the words will be found in the notes at the end of Hamilton's edition of Reid's Works, Edinburgh, 1846.

OBLATION. That which is offered to God as the material substance for sacrifice. The word is also used to signify the act of the person so offering as distinguished from the act of the priest in sacrificing. The term is used with reference rather to the gift to God [קָרְבָּן, Corban, δῶρον], in the sense of that which had passed entirely beyond the disposal of its possessor and been devoted to sacred uses, than to the destructive consumption of it by sacrificial burning. Out of oblations so offered, a portion was taken to be consumed upon the altar (if it was not a whole burnt-offering), while the remainder formed part of the daily provision on which the priests and Levites subsisted; a portion being also eaten by the offerer, in some cases (especially in that of the passover lamb), as an act of communion, and a portion, in some cases, given to the poor. Thus, of the unleavened cakes of flour and oil, baked in an oven, a pan, or fried in a frying-pan, "the priest shall take from the meat-offering a memorial thereof, and shall burn it upon the altar, it is an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord. And that which is left of the meat-offering shall be Aaron's and his sons': it is a thing most holy of the offerings of the Lord made by fire" [Levit. ii. 9, 10]. A similar rule is made respecting peace-offerings of animal sacrifices. "He that offereth the sacrifice of his peace-offerings unto the Lord, shall bring his oblation unto the Lord of the sacrifice of his peace-offerings. . . . And the priest shall burn the fat upon the altar; but the breast shall be Aaron's and his sons'. And the right shoulder shall ye give unto the priest. . . . For the wave breast and the heave shoulder have I taken of the children of Israel from off the sacrifices of their peace-offerings, and have given them unto Aaron the priest and unto his sons by a statute for ever from among the children of Israel" [Levit. vii. 28-34].

In the highest possible sense the word oblatio is used in the Vulgate as the representative of προσφορὰ for the offering of Himself by our Blessed Lord; and though the Authorized Version uses the English word "offering" in preference, yet in the Prayer Book we find the Latin form appearing in the Prayer of Consecration, in the words, "Who made there, by His one oblation of Himself, once offered, a full, perfect and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction, for the sins of the whole world."

The use of the word in association with the Holy Eucharist is of primitive date, it being often found as a general designation of the Eucharist itself. So Tertullian says, "Oblationes pro defunctis, pro natalitiis, anuna die facimus" [Tertull. De Coron. iii.]. St. Cyprian also uses the expression in the same sense, "et celebrentur hic a nobis oblationes et sacrificia ob commemorationes eorum" [Cypr. Ep. xxxvii.]. It is common in Irenæus [Iren. Adv. Hær. iv. 18, &c.] In the same sense it is used in the well-known expression of the Latin Canon "Hanc igitur oblationem servitutis nostræ, sed et cunctæ familiæ Tuæ, quæsumus, Domine, ut placatus accipias."

In the modern English Liturgy the "oblations" are all offerings to God which are not of the nature of alms; but chiefly, and almost exclusively, the bread and wine which are offered as the material substances to be used in the Eucharistic sacrifice, and the subsequent Communion. In liturgical language this is called the first oblation, or the oblation of the elements; the second oblation being the sacrificial act of the celebrant, by which he offers the same elements after they have become the Body and Blood of Christ by consecration. [Eucharist. Offertory. Prothesis.]

OFFERTORY. That portion of the Eucharistic service in which the people, in virtue of the Priesthood of the Faithful, make their offerings to God.

[1.] The presentation before God of the consecrated elements, which is the great or proper oblation. [Eucharist.] In the Apostolic Canons the word "oblation" standing alone signifies this great oblation, the holy action of consecrating and offering the Sacramental Body and Blood of Christ. [2.] The elements to be so employed were always solemnly offered to God in an introductory presentation, and this, too, was called an oblation. [3.] This was accompanied by other offerings for the service of God. These are not properly called oblations. The word "offertorium" is sometimes used (as in the Sarum Missal) for the anthems sung during the collecting and making these offerings, and sometimes, improperly, for the offerings themselves. Thus Freeman [Principles of Div. Service, ii. p. 345, note G.] writes, "The offertory, it need hardly be said—whether we mean thereby the words used or the contributions of the people—is but a department of the oblation." Bona, on the other hand [Rerum Liturg. II. viii. 3], shews from Amalarius and others that the offertory was the whole portion of the service from the end of the Creed to the end of the Oratio Secreta, thus making it include the oblation. But the extent of the offertory in one particular liturgy is not a definition; and in the next section he gives a principle upon which a definition may be founded by explaining Tertullian's words, "Nonne et laici sacerdotes sumus?" [De exhort. Castit. p. 668, Rigault], of the right of the laity to offer bread and wine at the altar. The word "oblations" is reserved in the English Liturgy for the offering of that which is designed for the Eucharistic service, and the more general term "offerings" includes both the alms and oblations, as in the definition given above.

Besides this oblation of the material for the Christian Sacrifice, offerings were made for the service of the sanctuary, for the support of its ministers, for the relief of the poor. These are a suitable adjunct to the oblation, not only [1] because the Christian thinks scorn to offer to God that which costs him nothing, and therefore supplements the uncostly offering with an offering of price [see Annotated Book of Common Prayer], but also [2] because the oblation is made to the Father,[1] and in our alms we make an offering to the Son, fully completing our worship, and carrying our thoughts to His future coming, when such service will in His infinite mercy be acknowledged as rendered to Him.

As a matter of principle, all offerings may be made at the altar, though this is not necessary in the case of alms, as it is in the case of oblations. But it is very necessary to mark clearly the distinction between the alms and the oblations, to mark, if offerings are made in kind, what are the materials of the coming Eucharist, and therefore proper oblations, what are offerings for God's other service. On this account, as well as for the decency and order of so holy a service, the form and manner of the offerings is a matter of ceremonial discipline. The third Apostolic canon forbids anything to be offered in the sacrifice at the altar besides what the Lord commanded, whether honey, milk, &c. Ears of new corn or grapes in the proper season are allowed to be presented on the altar, and also oil for the lamps and incense for the time of the Holy Oblation. All other fruits are to be carried to the bishop's house. The twenty-fourth canon of the third Council of Carthage runs thus, "Ut in sacramentis corporis et sanguinis Domini nihil amplius offeratur, quam ipse Dominus tradidit, hoc est panis et vinum aquæ mixtum; nec amplius in sacrificiis offeratur quam de uvis et frumentis." For "sacrificiis" Hardouin reads, "primitiis," and the sense requires it: it was necessary to forbid an extension of the permission to offer "primitiæ." The twenty-eighth of the Trullan or Quinisextine Council notes that by some grapes are joined on to the unbloody sacrifice: this is forbidden, grapes are to be blessed only as first-fruits,[1] not as part of the oblation. These examples are sufficient for illustration. In modern usage no difficulty or doubt can ordinarily arise, as alms will not be confounded with oblations.

[1] There are exceptions to this. "In some rites (Syr. St. Jas., but especially Copt. St. Basil) the prayer of oblation is addressed to the Son as Priest, which the consecration never is" [Freeman, ii. p. 342].

The prayer of oblation varies much in different liturgies. "None is simpler than the Syriac, 'Alleluia, receive our oblations;' and the revised English, in the prayer for the whole Church, 'We humbly beseech Thee most mercifully to accept our oblations, which we offer unto Thy Divine Majesty'" [Freeman, ii. p. 342]. From the various forms may be quoted [from Martene, I. iv. art. 6], according to the Gallican Ordo, "Veni Sanctificator omnipotens æterne Deus, benedic hoc sacrificium tuo nomini præparatum. Per Christum Dominum nostrum." To which Micrologus states is to be subjoined by Church use, "Suscipe, Sancta Trinitas, hanc oblationem, quam tibi offerimus ob memoriam Passionis, Resurrectionis, Ascensionis." It is to be remarked that the intercessions, which accompany the prayer of oblation, properly belong to that prayer. Our prayer for the Church Militant is not a simple prayer of intercession, with an oblation thrust into it, but a prayer of oblation, to which the intercessions belong. This is well seen in the prayer from a Missal of Tours, "Suscipe, Clementissime Pater, hanc oblationem quam tibi offero ego indignus famulus tuus pro me misero peccatore, et pro cuncto populo Christiano, pro fratribus quoque et sororibus nostris, et pro his qui nostri memoriam in suis continuis habent orationibus, ut in præsenti hoc sæculo remissionem peccatorum recipiamus, et in futuro præmia consequamur æterna" [Martene, I. iv. 6]. But these intercessions are framed and expressed in different modes. Thus, in the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom, while the general supplications are making, the priest says secretly the prayer of oblation, summing up the supplications in the words, "Sacrifices for our sins and for the errors of the people . . . that the good Spirit of Thy grace may tabernacle upon us, and upon these gifts presented unto Thee, and upon all Thy people" [Neale, The Liturgies . . . translated, p. 111]. Martene, in the chapter cited above, gives one instance, a Missal of Narbonne, which distinguishes expressly the oblations of the two elements; the general prayer "Suscipe hanc oblationem" being subjoined to the two distinct oblations.

From Freeman [ii. p. 343] must be noticed the connection of the solemn Hallelujah with this oblation. "The feast is now being spread by man for God, in the oblation of the gifts of bread and wine, conveying His reasonable service; by God for man in the same gifts, as the Body and Blood of Christ. Accordingly, the Church throughout the world says fitly in this place her Hallelujah. For the one occurrence and one application of this sublime hymn, or mutual exhortation to praise, in the New Testament, is when the marriage-supper of the Lamb is announced as ready. . . . The Western Church in the sixteenth century had entirely lost all knowledge of the significance of the Alleluia. . . . And in the English revision the Alleluia was, to our great loss, from the same cause omitted altogether."

For the changes that have been made in the English Reformed ritual see the Annotated Book of Common Prayer. As regards the present Liturgy it may be added, that while we have a valid oblation, it must be confessed that it is a meagre one. We need a fuller prayer of oblation, with a reintroduction of the alleluiatic hymn: but in practice it is possible to mark distinctly the offering of the congregation by appointing that the elements be brought to the priest by appointed officers. Our prayer of oblation is constructed, as it ought to be, in the name of the congregation; the prayer quoted from the Tours Missal being faulty from running in the name of the priest alone. The intercessions of our prayer are also sufficient to represent primitive practice, except in one respect, that we have only a commemoration of the departed, and not also prayer for them. [Prayers for the Dead.]

Lastly, it is to be noticed that the solemn self-dedication which accompanies every memory of the sacrifice of the death of Christ, is expressed in the prayer of the greater oblation. As the material elements offered in the first or lesser oblation become the spiritual offering of the second oblation, so the faithful, who offer of their substance in the first, become a reasonable, holy, and lively sacrifice in the second. In this manner the first oblation passes into the second.

OFFICIAL. A priest who exercises ecclesiastical jurisdiction (contentious) in a diocese. In early times bishops availed themselves of assistants, as St. Gregory and St. Basil were employed; and Pope Damasus sent the priest Simplicius to assist St. Ambrose. About the close of the thirteenth century, in order to reduce the assertions of the archdiaconal office, bishops used vicars-general and officials; but previous to that date the Canon Law is silent about such persons, as it regarded archdeacons simply as in fact the vicars of the bishops. The Council of Lateran contented itself with suggesting the employment of "fitting men" to bishops, and it appears that at first the titles of vicar-general and official were tenable together, as now in Italy, for the administration by one person both of voluntary and contentious jurisdiction. A bishop when absent from his diocese, or when ill and incapable, was obliged to appoint a vicar. He was sometimes called "missus dominicus." The principal officials and vicar-general in temporals and spirituals hold the consistory court as the bishop's representative, as if he sat in person. The official has a territory or district, and holds his office by commission, for hearing causes in a whole diocese, but without the power of inquiry, correction, or punishment of offences; he can only deprive of a benefice or give admission to it by special commission. A vicar-general holds all these powers except collation to a benefice. A commissary-general is a special deputy. An official's powers terminate with the death of him by whose appointment he acts; and also may be recalled. An appeal lies from their sentence, not to the bishop, but to him to whom an appeal would be made from the bishop himself. The official principal resides in the chief place and is an ordinary; others are deputies "officiales foranei" (i.e. living out of it), and from them appeal lies to the bishop. The official principal is the assistant of the bishop in matters of civil or criminal nature, to aid him in points of law, and to defend the rights of the Church. These officers were not at first deputed and assigned to any certain place, but supplied the office of the bishops at large in hearing ecclesiastical causes which were of a contentious jurisdiction. They were called "judices" or "officiales foranei," viz., "officiales astricti euidam foro diœceseos tantùm." To them the cognizance of causes is generally committed by such as have ecclesiastical jurisdiction throughout all the diocese, but not the power of inquisition nor the correction of crimes, nor can they remove persons from their benefices or collate to benefices without a special commission. The archdeacon's official exercises jurisdiction in certain parts of a dioceese for cognizance and hearing of causes transferred, in virtue of the office itself, by some general commission made to them for that purpose, and he may visit in the right of the archdeacon when the latter himself is hindered. [Ayliffe, Parergon, 160, 161.]

OLD TESTAMENT. [TESTAMENT.]

OPUS OPERATUM. This term, long used by Schoolmen, was employed by the Council of Trent in declaring the instrumentality of Sacraments, and the nature of their instrumental agency.

Some, at least, of the Schoolmen had used the words, if not in a different signification, yet certainly without the necessary limitations. At Trent an authorized usage was established. And doubtless, such of our theologians as employ the term employ it according to that usage; for our Church has avoided its use, and they who use it, use it, we must presume, in the sense of the Church which has adopted it.

The Council of Trent then [sess. vii. can. vi.] determined that the Sacraments are not merely outward signs of grace or righteousness received by faith, not merely signs of a Christian man's profession, but that they contain the grace which they signify, and confer it on those who do not place a bar to the grace. Canon vii. declares that the grace never fails to those who receive the Sacrament rightly; and canon viii. is, "Si quis dixerit, per ipsa novæ legis sacramenta ex opere operato non conferri gratiam, sed solam fidem divinæ promissionis ad gratiam consequendam sufficere: anathema sit." Here the phrase ex opere operato is shewn, by the proposition to which it is opposed, to mean, that the Sacrament is itself the instrument by which the grace is imparted. For they who assert that faith alone is sufficient to obtain the grace, make faith the instrument at well as the mean. Faith is the mean [see our Art. XXVIII.], in that mean the instrument works; the Solifidian denies the instrumentality of the Sacrament, which the Council affirmed by the words ex opere operato. By the former canon is shewn what the opus is, the transaction, namely, of a sacrament which contains grace, and the necessary limitation is given, that the grace is imparted "non ponentibus obicem." That this teaching is identical with the teaching of our church is indisputable. The Sacraments contain grace; they are "no bare signs, no untrue figures of things absent" [Homily]. The inward grace is "a part" of the Sacrament [Catechism]. They confer grace on those who interpose no barrier. See Articles XXVII. XXVIII. They confer grace ex opere operato, that is by their transaction, as instruments. "They are effectual signs by which God works invisibly in us" [Art. XXV.]. "Instruments" [Art. XXVII.]. "Not only signs but rather sacraments (i.e. containing an inward grace), "insomuch that to such as rightly receive," &c. [Art. XXVIII.].

And that the phrase ex opere operato denotes instrumentality is confirmed by the authority of accredited theologians. Peronne writes [Prælectiones Theol. vii. p. 252], in treating of this Tridentine Canon, "Deus gratiam et sanctificationem communicat per sacramenta velut per signa practica aut instrumenta." Liebermann [Instit. Theolog. ii. p. 402], on the same topic, writes, "Ritus sacramentalis . . . tanquam causa instrumentalis," &c.

Further, Peronne [p. 249] explains ex opere operato by ex virtute sibi insita et propria. This is what has been noticed already, that the opus is the transaction of a sacrament which contains grace. The inward and spiritual grace is added to the outward sign to form the sacrament: it is of the very essence and definition of a sacrament. The virtus, therefore, is insita and propria.

There are, then, as regards the present question, the following modes in which the Sacraments may be regarded:—

[1.] That of certain Schoolmen before alluded to, who taught that the Sacraments work ex opere operato, without any restriction. These denied altogether the opus operantis.

[2.] That of certain Protestants, who taught (and teach) that the Sacraments are merely adjuncts and assistants to the mind in its operations; that the mind so assisted makes an immediate approach to God, and receives immediately from God the grace which the Sacrament denotes and has aided the mind to conceive and desire. These deny the opus operatum, and make the whole work an opus operantis.

[3.] That of the Catholic Church, lying between these two extremes. It teaches that the Sacraments are mediate agencies, i.e. instruments, without which God does not ordinarily work the special grace, and through which He always does work the grace when man does not interpose a barrier. It holds the opus operatum in the instrumentality of the Sacraments. It holds the opus operantis in the state of mind required to make man a recipient of the grace.

The error of the Schoolmen which has been spoken of was condemned in Article xiii. of the Augustan Confession, A.D. 1531 [Sylloge Confess. 127], "Damnant igitur illos, qui docent, quod sacramenta ex opere operato justificent, nec docent fidem requiri in usu sacramentorum, quæ credat remitti peccata." And in 1540 [ibid. 174] the opinion is described, "quæ fingit homines justos esse propter usum sacramentorum ex opere operato, et quidem sine bono motu utentium." The Church of England wisely abstained from the use of words with which such errors had been connected. The Church of Rome vindicated itself from the charge (if the words of the Augsburg Confession are to be taken as a charge against the whole of that Church) by the decrees of Trent. Nevertheless, the charge was still urged by controversialists. Alphonsus and Bellarmine replied to it; and J. Fabricius [Consideratio Controversiarum, Helmstadii, A.D. 1705; art. De Sacramentorum efficientia ex opere operato] confesses that after their declaration the phrase might be admitted, and that there remained no further controversy about it. [From Perrone, Prælect. Theol. vii. p. 257, who names also Grotius and Leibnitz as acquitting the Church of Rome of the calumny.] After this, it is painful to find the charge repeated, as it often is. Hartwell Horne, e.g., wrote, "The Romish Church asserts that the Sacraments produce justification in their recipients, as a matter of course, ex opere operato." [Encycl. Metrop.; art. Sacrament.] It may be asked also whether a divine of very much higher order has not drawn an erroneous distinction in the following words:—"When the Fathers explained themselves accurately, it always appeared that the Sacrament did not work ex opere operato; but that the effect was to be attributed to God's Spirit, acting according to covenant on the soul, when the soul did not harden itself against His grace." [Bishop Browne On the Articles, art. xxvii. p. 642.] For in the opus operatum is included, as has been shewn, that very covenant-working of God's Spirit which is here not only distinguished, but set in opposition to it. God works invisibly in us by the effectual signs; and we cannot, without overthrowing the nature of a sacrament, take from it the agency of the Holy Spirit, or represent that agency as external to the transaction of the sacrament. St. Peter's words, "Baptism doth now save us," are a statement of the opus operatum: for St. Peter's definition of the Sacrament was not the outward working alone, but with it the answer of a good conscience to God, Who works through the Sacrament.

We may now turn to the object of our inquiries. What effects follow from the use of the instruments by which God so wonderfully enables us to call His Holy Spirit into action, as distinguished from the effects attributable to the mind of the recipient; that recipient, when worthy, being also aided by a distinct working of the same Spirit? or, in other words, what results from the opus operatum, as distinguished from the results of the opus operantis?

The external change of state and relationship in the society of the Church is ex opere operato. On this point there can be no doubt. Again, there is in every case, ex opere operato, a sufficient tender of the grace of the Sacrament; sufficient, so that there can be no failure of reception of the grace owing to a withdrawal or hiding of it on the part of Almighty God; and effectual to all who do not interpose a barrier. Next, with reference to the state of the recipient, the cases which present themselves are three—first, of a worthy recipient; second, of an unconscious recipient; third, of an unworthy recipient.

I. There being no bar, grace is conveyed by the Sacrament, as by an instrument: the sacramental grace is ex opere operato; the instrument of the Sacrament, and the mean of faith [Art. XXVIII.] in the recipient, concurring.

II. There being no bar, and the mean of faith being impossible, the instrument, by God's promise, is effectual. The regeneration of an infant in baptism is ex opere operato.

III. In [1] the Sacrament of Holy Baptism. The universal and unalterable rule against rebaptizing [REBAPTISM] must have for its foundation an indelible character impressed in baptism. If the baptism of an unworthy recipient were merely an admission into an outward society, it might be repeated; if it were merely a "sacramentum militare," the oath might be taken again. Further, this indelible character must be something of the nature of a dormant principle which can be awakened, of a gift in abeyance which can be brought into energy and use. Otherwise, how could subsequent repentance obtain that remission of sins which was not obtained at baptism, or how could the penitent be admitted, as a child of God, to the Holy Eucharist? This indelible character then must necessarily be ex opere operato.

[2.] In the Sacrament of the Holy Eucharist.

Regarding this it must be observed, that while there is a sufficient offer of the Body and Blood of Christ, the doctrine of the True Presence does not necessarily lead to the assertion that the wicked are partakers of Christ. Our reasoning will be aided by a consideration of the natural Body of Christ. That Body was incorruptible: yet it does not follow that whatever having been part of the Body, when it had passed out of the sphere and organism of the Body still retained the quality of incorruptibility; that the blood shed, whether rightfully as at the circumcision, or wrongfully as by the soldiers, or from the strength of agony as at Gethsemane, continued to be the incorruptible Blood of Christ. It had passed out of His Body. Now, the sphere of the sacramental Body of Christ is His Mystical Body, the faithful; and an unworthy recipient is out of that sphere. While, then, the true Body and Blood is tendered him, he cannot be partaker of it. Receiving the Sacrament he does violence to the Body of Christ, and it is no longer that which was offered to him. Considering this, and seeing that the Holy Eucharist is of constant use, there is no necessity for asserting that an indelible character is in this case the effect of the instrument. There follows, therefore, ex opere operato, only the sufficient offer of the grace.

Lastly, the principles thus worked out will be easily applied to the other sacraments, or sacramental ordinances, in which there is a special grace annexed by promise, if not to an element, yet to a sign. Confirmation and Holy Orders cannot be repeated, but Absolution is of constant use.

ORDERS, HOLY. The estate of a Christian man, ordained and taken out of the rank of laymen, to be attached to the sacred ministry of the Church, and to exercise holy functions for the service of God and the salvation of souls. The three major orders are the priesthood, the diaconate, and subdiaconate, and are called "holy" as immediately concerned with the service of the altar. Grace to administer the duties efficiently is conveyed in all these, but the indelible character in the soul is impressed upon priests and deacons only. Every order is a degree, βαθμὸς [1 Tim. iii. 13], but every degree is not an order. A degree signifies superiority although devoid of power, order has power for a special act. For instance, an archbishop has no power for a special act; if he be not already a bishop he is ordained by three bishops, and, as an archbishop, is not necessary in giving episcopal ordination, for three bishops together give consecration [Council of Nicæa, c. iv.] Bellarmine says the episcopate and presbyterate form one order, not in genus but species; they are two species of the priesthood; one order, but different degrees [Recognit. Op. i. p. 9]. The term χειροτονία is used by Theodoret and St. Chrysostom, and "ordinatio" by Tertullian, St. Jerome, and Hilary the deacon, when speaking of the ordination of a bishop. But the English Church rightly calls the office "the ordaining or consecrating of bishops," for the episcopate is a distinct order from the priesthood, having two separate acts peculiar to itself, the power of confirmation and of ordination. In the Apostolical times, although the orders and offices of the bishop, the priest, and deacon were essentially distinct, yet the names were used in common, until, in order to avoid confusion, the several titles were allotted to the individual orders. The episcopate embraces the priesthood and diaconate. Corresponding to the Jewish hierarchy of the sons of Aaron, priests and Levites, there have been bishops, priests, and deacons in the Church of Christ throughout all antiquity, receiving a grace of a spiritual and sacred function [Rom. xii. 3; Eph. iii. 7] from the Holy Ghost, whereby they are sacred and made "persons public," "and their acts authentical;" so that by them saving grace is conveyed to souls for the remission of sins.

The "matter" of Ordination, so far as it can be called such, the laying on of hands [1 Tim. vi. 14], is given in lieu of the incommunicable breathing with which it was conferred by our Lord. Thus Ordination is not properly a sacrament, as the matter ordained by Christ in a sacrament cannot be changed. The imposition of hands signifies the overshadowing of God's protection or of His Spirit, which it procures upon the promise of Christ's presence with His Church when it prays to Him, but it is not generally necessary to salvation, and is limited to a particular effect of ministering to the Church the ordinances of God, according to the trust reposed in the office. "Yet that breath," says Bishop Andrewes, "though not into them for themselves, yet goeth into and through every act of their office and ministry, and by them conveyeth His saving grace unto us all." In a large sense orders have a sacramental form. [André's Droit Canon. ii. 701. Bishop Andrewes' Respons. ad Epist. i. Petri Molinæi.]

ORDERS, MINOR, are not sacred or holy. There are four, those of the Acolyth, Exorcist, Reader, and Porter. Their names and functions may be traced back to the earliest date in the Western Church.

I. The Porter, "ostiarius," πυλωρός. His duty was to open and close the church-doors, to prevent the entry of unbelievers, and guard the approach to the altar at the time of the celebration of the Holy Eucharist. Porters also took care that the division of the sexes was observed in church time, and kept order and silence. They formerly, by the fourth Council of Carthage, A.D. 398, c. ix., received the church keys from the archdeacon [Delect. Actorum, i. p. 131], but, in later times, they were made to touch the bell-rope to signify their duties as bellringers. Sometimes they were promoted to be acolyths, but ordinarily laymen executed the office.

II. The Reader, "lector," ἀναγνώστης or ψάλτης. The book of lessons, or lectionary, is presented to Readers at ordination [fourth Council of Carthage, c. viii.]. They originally read out the lessons from the Old and New Testaments with a loud voice in the night office, and the passage from Holy Scripture which the bishop was about to expound; they guarded the church books, and blessed the bread and new fruits. They were often younger than porters, and had charge of the sacristies. Their ancient duty of chanting the lessons is now discharged by all clerks indiscriminately. Children who were entered among the clergy were first admitted to this order.

III. The Exorcist [ἐξορκιστής] received a book of forms of exorcisms when ordained, as his original office was to exorcise devils from the bodies of the possessed. They now warn non-communicants to give place to those who are approaching the altar, and furnish water for the celebrant. Their power of exorcism is now transferred to the priesthood only [fourth Council of Carthage, c. vii. ibid.].

IV. Acolyth [ἀκόλουθος], "ceroferarius," the lighter of the church lamps and taper-bearer. A candlestick containing a lighted taper, and an empty cruet, are placed in his hands at ordination; his duty being to furnish the cruets of wine and water to the celebrant [fourth Council of Carthage, c. vi. ibid.].

Pope Cornelius [martyred A.D. 252] says that in his time there were at Rome forty-six priests, seven deacons, as many subdeacons, forty-two acolyths, fifty-two porters, exorcists, and readers [Ap. Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. VI. c. xliii.; ed. Migne, tom. ii. p. 621]; and the Pseudo-Ignatius mentions these orders [Epist. ad Antiochen. sec. xii. Patrologia, ed. Migne, tom. v. p. 908]. Abbots in priests' orders, and cardinal priests, having received episcopal benediction, may give the minor orders. [André, Droit Canon. ii. 702. Maillane, Du Droit Canon. iv. 236.]

ORDINARY. An ecclesiastical superior in possession of ordinary jurisdiction, but more particularly a bishop, who has ordinary jurisdiction within his diocese; although others by custom or privilege enjoy the same name. Roman canonists call the Pope Ordinary of Ordinaries.

The judge ordinary, Lyndewood says, is the prelate or judge of the place within whose jurisdiction a person is. In matters of jurisdiction, he that hath ordinary jurisdiction is the ordinary, but in matters of order or special dispensation the bishop alone is understood under this designation, as the perpetual and natural ordinary of common right over those under his charge.

The word ordinary embraces also those who by right, privilege, or custom, exercise authority and jurisdiction, as a chapter over canons; a dean in cases of morals or excesses correcting or reforming the capitular members; an archbishop in visitation. An abbot or prior within the cloister also exercised similar powers. Archdeacons are also local ordinaries; as are vicars-general, chancellors of dioceses, and officials, who, although acting only by commission, are yet ordinaries in their capacity of ecclesiastical judges.

ORIGENISM. There were two sects of Origenists in the early ages of Christianity, one which professed to be followers of the great Origen, ἀδαμάντινος, and the other founded by a Syrian of the same name, a sect of an immoral character, and hence stigmatized as "Origeniani turpes" by some heresiologists. It is the school of thought, or the sect, that followed in the wake of the famous Alexandrian, which is always intended in modern times under the above name. [Alexandria, School of.]

Origen himself was so far an eclectic that he made it a principal object of his life to effect an harmonious union between sound philosophy and Christianity; and to present the latter in such a form to the intellectual classes of all religions that they should be ready to accept it as the most reasonable of all. He may also be said to have been almost the founder of Mystical Theology; and he carried the principle of allegorical interpretation to an extremely bold length, enunciating speculations which seemed to come into conflict with the traditional belief of the Church. His vast intellectual power, however, gathered around him most of the leaders of thought among the Christians of Alexandria, and some of his distinctive speculations were exaggerated by his pupils in the succeeding generation. Even in his lifetime this exaggeration had reached such an extent as to draw complaints from him. His works also were corrupted and interpolated at a very early date; and his very high authority led heretics like the Arians to make great efforts at enlisting such learned writings on their side. It is altogether improbable that Origen himself ever held heretical views, but extremely probable that his bold speculations became heretical in the hands of others, whose minds were not fortified by the same stupendous learning, scriptural knowledge, and earnest practical Christianity.

Among the disciples of Origen, Pierius and Gregory Thaumaturgus were charged with errors respecting the Blessed Trinity, amounting almost to Sabellianism [Dorner, Person of Christ, I. ii. 172, Clarke's transl.]. But the better established tenets of the Origenian school may be said to be those of the pre-existence of souls, and the final redemption and restoration of the lost.

The soul being of a spiritual nature is considered to be naturally indestructible, its eternal existence being dependent solely on the will of God. But all things exist as emanations from the exuberant life of God, and it is a necessary law of His unbounded love that His life should pour itself forth into all possible forms of being as so many receptacles. Hence the existence of the soul is, in a sense, a necessary existence,—necessary that is to the Love of God. But if its existence is thus necessary, then it must have a kind of co-eternity with the Divine Nature itself, and thus a pre-existence through an indefinite period is a natural condition of the soul. The Origenist philosophy further considers that souls are condemned to inhabit bodies as a punishment for sins committed during their pre-existent state. Made happy by God's love, they could only lose their perfect happiness by their own acts and shortcomings; but these brought unhappiness upon them, giving them a capacity for corporeal existence. The resurrection of the body so received is not altogether denied, but the resurrection body is assumed to be a pure ethereal vehicle capable of assisting, though not of hindering, the holiness of the soul. [PRE-EXISTENCE OF SOULS.]

The opinion of Origen's followers respecting the punishment of hell, and perhaps of Origen himself [DAMNATION], was, that it will consist of intense mental torture, the sting of conscience; and further, that a time will come, when even this will pass away, and those who have suffered under it, perhaps for ages, will be restored to the favour of God. These doctrines are dealt with elsewhere. [EVERLASTING PUNISHMENT. UNIVERSALISM.]

ORIGINAL SIN. The doctrine of original sin lies at the foundation of the Christian faith. It is a scriptural doctrine, and apparently one that was known to the people of God from of old. It was a maxim among the Jews that "the whole world sinned in the same sin whereby the first man transgressed; for he was the whole world" [Carpzov in Rom. v. 12]. It was probably the basis of the rite of circumcision. "Who can bring a clean thing out of the unclean?" says Job [xiv. 4] in speaking of man's frailty. Similarly, "What is man, that he should be clean? and he that is born of a woman, that he should be righteous?" [xv. 14]. "Behold, I was shapen in iniquity; in sin hath my mother conceived me," is the language of the Psalmist [li. 5]. Man must be cleansed from this sin before he can advance in his way towards heaven. St. Paul, therefore, in treating of man's justification, speaks first of the incidence of original sin, and of its removal. "As by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned" [Rom. v. 12]: "even upon them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression" [ver. 14]; "through the offence of one many be dead" [ver. 15]; "for judgment was by one to condemnation" [ver. 16]; "by one man's offence death reigned by one" [ver. 17]; "by the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation" [ver. 18]; "by one man's disobedience many were made sinners" [ver. 19]. [See Müller, Chr. Lehre, v. d. Sünde, ii. 472.] "We were by nature children of wrath" [Eph. ii. 3]. "Sinful flesh" is the Apostle's synonym for "human nature;" hence, speaking in the person of universal humanity, he says, "I know that in me (that is, in my flesh) dwelleth no good thing" [Rom. vii. 19]. It is "the old man," as contrasted with the new man in Christ purified from primeval taint [Eph. iv. 22-24]. Hence, also, the thoughts of man's heart are declared to be only evil continually, as being that φρόνημα σαρκός, the "carnal mind" which is enmity against God [Rom. viii. 7; Syr.]. These statements of doctrine have guided the teaching of the Church from the earliest period; although only casual references to birth sin are found in the earlier writings of the Fathers, and more rarely in the Greek than in the Latin writers.

The theology of the East and of the West have each their own peculiar features; while the former was compelled by circumstances to define accurately the Trinity and Christology of the Catholic faith, the latter was performing a work of equal importance in vindicating the doctrines of redemption and grace.

The Greek Fathers declare that a perverted will and sin are co-ordinate with the human race, and that death has dominion over it by reason of its origination from Adam after the Fall. The same fatal cause has interrupted man's communion with heaven. Sin, they say, is the natural outworking of man's free-will; it is a following of Adam as well as the natural result of man's aboriginal taint. The text so frequently quoted by them from the LXX. Version shews that this doctrine was firmly held in the Eastern Church. Our English Version expresses faithfully the Hebrew text in Job xiv. 4. The LXX. has τίς γὰρ καθαρὸς ἔσται ἀπὸ ῥύπου; ἀλλ' οὐθείς, ἐὰν καὶ μία ἡμέρα ὁ βίος αὐτοῦ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς. The Vulgate Version by its greater explicitness marks the sense in which the Church had accepted that rendering, "Quis facere potest mundum de immundo conceptum semine." Justin Martyr says that the entire race of men from Adam had become "subject to death and the transgression of the serpent, as well as guilty of individual sins" [Tryph. ed. Par. A. 316]; where the generic taint is distinguished from personal sinfulness. Again, "Being by nature the children of fate and ignorance, we become through the regeneration of baptism the children of free-will and intelligence, although evil has a ready ally in the perverse and varied concupiscence of our nature" [Ap. i. 58, E.]. Tatian, the disciple of Justin Martyr, identifies the likeness of God in which man was created with the gift of the Spirit. This was lost to him through sin [Coh. c. Gr. sec. 13], and he became subject to death [7], and from a state of liberty he fell under the slavery of evil [11]. Irenæus says that at the Fall man lost the image and likeness of God in which he was created, that the whole race having become transgressors in Adam, became subject to death, and were led captive by the devil; that the gift forfeited was the robe of righteousness in the Spirit; which is restored through Christ as the corrective of fleshly concupiscence, and of death [Iren. Cambr. ed. iii. 19, 32, 33, 35, v. 12, 16, 19, 21, 35]. Similarly, Athanasius and Cyril of Jerusalem speak of Adam's loss as the withdrawal of the indwelling Logos; and one and all of the Greek Fathers are careful to assert the free-will of man in opposition to the fatalism of the Manichæan. Concupiscence is defined by Methodius as an involuntary instinct of the mind; "we have no option as regards τὸ ἐνθυμεῖσθαι ἢ μή, but it does depend upon ourselves whether or no we are led away by our lusts." Origen describes man as born with depraved appetites [Huet, Origeniana, ii.], but his Platonic notion of the pre-existence of the soul, and of its penal relegation to earth, lessens the value of his authority. In the converse way he held that human reason had its glimpses of the divine and godlike from its memory of better things in a former state of existence. Both evil and good varied in degree in different individuals according to their antecedents in a former world. Origen was neither Traducianist nor Creationist in his views; the former system was too gross; the latter he could not reconcile with God's even-handed justice and impartial love for all His creatures. Thus he speaks of man's innate corruption, his sin-stained birth, and the consequent necessity for infant baptism [Hom. viii. and xii. in Lev. in Luc. xiv. in Rom. lib. v.]. He indicated, in fact, the faith of the Church, though he travestied it with his philosophy. The voice was the voice of Jacob, but the hands were the hands of Esau. Macarius, Athanasius, Cyril of Jerusalem, and Gregory of Nazianzum, as cited by Augustine [Contr. Jul. i. but see Ullmann as regards Greg. Naz. p. 428-430], speak as one man, in saying that the sin of Adam was extended over the whole human race. "Blooming as is the rose," says Basil, "thought saddens as it contemplates it. As often as I see this flower, I am reminded of the sin whereby earth was condemned to bring forth thorns and thistles" [Hom. de Parad.; see also Bas. in Psa. xxx. 12, xxxiii. 5, li. 5; Greg. Naz. Or. xxv. ed. Morel. p. 436, Or. iii. de Pace, p. 221, Or. ii. in Pasch. 684]. Chrysostom speaks distinctly of the moral taint brought in by Adam's sin [see on Rom. vi. 14]. "A whole swarm, ἔσμος," he says, "of passions were introduced by it as well as death. Human nature has been driven wild by them as a restive horse, ἵππος δυσήνεος"—testimony which is the more valuable as being pre-Pelagian. Similarly, on Rom. vii. 6, "Adam's sin depraved man's nature, and [ver. 14] it brought in concupiscence, that, without being in itself sin, when unchecked leadeth straight to evil." Augustine, in writing against Pelagianism, is scarcely more precise. These testimonies from the Greek Fathers before the appearance of Pelagius may suffice.

On this doctrine the Latin Fathers are more explicit. Tertullian says that death was introduced by the Fall, and condemnation was transmitted through the seed of the first man to the whole perishing race. It is the first trace of Traducianism, which holds that the soul is generated as well as the body, "ex traduce" [de An. 36], and was a natural corollary upon Tertullian's notion of the materiality of the soul [de An. 7]. Creationism is the correlative opinion, which ascribes the origin of each individual soul to a direct act of creation. Evil being innate in man through the corruption of his origin, was not unmitigated evil; the inner light of the soul was obscured rather than extinguished. The worst have their good points, the best are tainted with evil. The soul regenerated in baptism is no longer cut off from the light as by a thick veil, but is wholly illuminated. The original state of Adam was righteousness, with which he was invested as with a robe; that righteousness was the gift of the Spirit; it was lost to him by his transgression, and his offspring inherit his condemnation. If at a later period Tertullian's Montanist notions led him to counsel delay in the baptism of infants, it was caused by his deviation from Catholic doctrine in other particulars, and has no dogmatical import. In all other respects, he might have subscribed the statements of Augustine as regards original sin. The Latin Fathers followed in his steps so far as he was Catholic. Cyprian only differs from him in advising that infants should be speedily baptized and so freed from the "contagio mortis antiquæ" [ad. Fid.]. Ambrose pronounces the race of man in its unity to be guilty of sin through the propagation of infection from Adam, and speaks decidedly on the evil nature of concupiscence. Hilary of Poitiers expresses the same doctrine, and all agree in claiming for man freedom of will, without attempting to explain its antagonism with birth sin and the corrective operation of grace. Lactantius stands alone in asserting the Manichæan notion that the sinfulness of man is a matter of necessity, and that the body is the matrix of evil. Pelagius at length boldly cut the knot that none could hope to untie. He claimed for man an unbounded liberty of action, but denied his inherent sinfulness. He was aware, however, that his notions thwarted the stream of popular theological opinion and apostolical traditions. Jerome also asserts that his followers were afraid of uttering their heresy openly lest the people should stone them [Dial. iii.]. Pelagius declared that the only evil inherited from our first parent was a proneness to follow in the path of disobedience; but all, if they would, might render a faultless obedience to the Law of God. No change whatever in human nature was brought about by the Fall. Death, he said, was a part of man's original constitution. Concupiscence also was no result of the Fall, but inseparable from man's moral being. In opposition to him, Augustine asserted, as the Catholic teaching of the Church, that Adam's transgression tainted the entire race of man with sin; that concupiscence is its distinctive form, whereby the sensual appetites and passions lust against the Spirit, and without God's grace, obtain the mastery, by concupiscence being meant the first devious inclination of man's mind to move in lines that are oblique or contrary to the direction of God's will. It is φρόνημα σαρκὸς, the "carnal mind" or "fleshly idea," that is, as such, at enmity with God, and cannot be subject to His Law so long as it remains uncorrected by grace. Death was brought into the world by Adam's sin. Man's free-will, the reflex of the Divine Will, was lost to him by the Fall as regards good; there remained only spontaneity, the negation of outward constraint, and free-will as regards evil. Men differ in their individual character solely by their varying grades of evil. Guilt, as the correlative of sin, involves judicial damnation, wherefore the removal of guilt by baptism is necessary also for infants. In fact the primitive practice of infant baptism was a sure voucher for the loyalty of Augustine's appeal to antiquity with reference to the doctrine of original sin; as was also the rite of exsufflation and exorcism of the spirit of evil, which was of old a highly significant part of the ordinance of baptism. [See Aug. De Pecc. Mer. et Rem. i.

Original Sin

23, 63; De Nupt. et Concup. ii. 18; Conc. Constant. Can. ult.] The original taint of our nature, and liability to death, is communicated from father to son by generation; though Augustine neither expresses the Traducianism of Tertullian, nor the Creationism of the Greek Church, Scripture and the Church being silent upon the subject. "Certa fide tenendum esse," he says, "contagium propagari, licet quomodo traducatur nunquam noverimus" [Ep. 167], and again, "Libentius disco quam dico: nec audeo docere quod nescio" [Contr. Jul. v. 3]. He declares simply that the soul is the breath of God, though no part of the Divine Substance, as the Manichæan taught; but that the intimate union subsisting between the soul and the body causes the former to be a close participator in the taint of the latter. If it be evil God is not the Author of that evil. Augustine identifies the whole human race with our first progenitor, in whose loins we existed "ratione seminis." He was the impersonation of the whole human race, and the whole race was Adam. His sin therefore infected the entire stock. Its guilt and penal consequences were shared by all. The ills of life prove the existence of original sin; "Quid igitur restat, nisi ut causa illorum malorum sit aut iniquitas vel impotentia Dei, aut pœna primi veterisque peccati; sed quia nec justus nec impotens est Deus, restat, quod non vis sed cogeris fateri, quod grave jugum super filios Adam, a die exitus de ventre matris eorum usque in diem sepulturæ in matrem omnium non fuisset, nisi delicti originalis meritum præcessisset" [Contr. Jul. iv. 16]. In truth original sin may be a mystery, but it is a mystery that helps us to resolve the still greater difficulties that would otherwise beset the idea of a moral Governor of the world. The condemnation of Pelagius by twenty-four councils in less than as many years, from that held at Carthage, A.D. 412, to the Council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, did not put an end to the controversy; but it became modified as Semi-Pelagianism, called by Prosper "Reliquiæ Pelagii" [Ep. ad Aug.]. This allowed that death and a taint of corruption were derived from Adam; but the taint consisted only in a weakening of man's nature as by disease; he was still a free agent, and had no need of preventing grace; he had as full natural power to rise to excellence by his own endeavours, as to sink into greater depths of vice by his wickedness. John Cassian of Marseilles was at the head of this party, which was condemned by the synods of Orange in Provence and of Valence in the Dauphiny, A.D. 529; but it was allowed still to be of the Church Catholic. Thus matters continued until the ninth century, when John Scotus Erigena gave a fresh impulse to discussions concerning original sin. The necessary existence of sin in every human being, which Augustine referred to the infection of man's nature, was held by Scotus, in an absolute sense, to be a result of the original constitution of man's nature. He argued upon Platonic principles that human nature, like every other form of positive existence, has its being in God; but evil cannot be derived from God: it had no real substance therefore, but was a mere negation of good, neither had it any being in the knowledge of God. Man's nature was never absolutely perfect: he was never purely free from evil. There was concupiscence before the forbidden fruit was plucked, and sin existed in an inchoate condition before the overt act of transgression. Concupiscence, he said, formed no part of original sin, which wholly consists of our loss of original righteousness, and the debt due to God by the void. It was "carentia justitiæ, ut formale; et debitum habendi, ut materiale" [So Scotus, Lib. Sent. ii. dist. 32]; and again, "Peccatum originale non potest esse aliud quam ista privatio, non enim est concupiscentia" [ib. dist. 30]. Calixtus, among the most distinguished of the Lutheran divines, advocates the same opinion [Epitome Theol. ed. Titius, p. 66-71], though he hardens the scholastic term "languor" into "malitia."

This righteousness was given to Adam as a superadded grace or ornament of his nature, not quâ individual, but as an embodiment of the entire human race. Its loss was owing to Adam's wilfulness, and original sin is a sin of the will; not of each individual, for babes have it who have no will: but the universal will sinned in Adam, in whom all men already had a rudimental existence [Schleiermacher, Glaubenslehre, secs. 71, 72].

Original sin was not imputed, but derived by bodily propagation [compare Pet. Lomb. Lib. Sentent. ii. dist. 30, Durand, qu. 2, on this passage; Nic. de Orb. on the same; Thom. Aq. Sum. Theolog. Prima. Sec. qu. 81, art. 1-3, qu. 85, art. 2-4; also the Summa c. Gentiles, lib. iv. c. 50-52; Christlieb, Leben und Lehre d. J. Scot. Erig.]; though Occam, the doctor of the Schools whom Melanchthon especially admired, "deliciæ quondam nostræ," lays down that Adam's sin is ours not by propagation, but by imputation, a view followed by the Romanist writers, Catharinus and Pighius, but combated by Bellarmine [De Amiss. Gr. I. v. 16]. The doctrine of original sin was from its mystery an especially favourite subject for discussion with the Schoolmen. The three doctors who chiefly served as a guide to the rest were St. Anselm, Peter Lombard, and St. Thomas Aquinas. They taught that Christ died in order that He might restore to man this superadded grace of original righteousness. With regard to concupiscence the Schools looked upon it as the penal consequence of original sin and the incentive (fomes) of actual sin; later doctors represented it as a poison instilled into man's nature at the Fall, whether by some deleterious property of the forbidden fruit, or by the venomous breath of the serpent; and it may be noted that the Master of the Sentences had also compared original sin to the action of a poison. It was not sin, but a lower condition of health; and as such it remained after baptism, which, however, removed every taint of sin and left the soul pure as in its first origination from the breath of God in paradise. It was held that none were damned everlastingly on account of original sin. Its punishment consisted in the milder sentence of exclusion from the beatific vision [Scot. in Lib. Sent. ii. dist. 33]; an opinion which was also held by earlier doctors of the Church [Voss, Hist. Pelag. II. iii. 4]. According to Anselm, the individual first corrupted nature, but ever after nature corrupted the individual, "Persona corrupit naturam—natura corrumpit personam." The first was "peccatum originale originans," and became "peccatum originale originatum." With Anselm, original sin was a bodily taint communicated by propagation, and by reason of its close union with it the soul became defiled. While Peter Lombard and Thomas of Aquino defined original sin to be concupiscence, Anselm agreed with Scotus in making it the privation of original righteousness, and all three agreed that it involved guilt and condemnation. Man's freedom of action, they said, was unlimited in the direction of evil, but crippled to a certain extent as regards good. Abelard and Duns Scotus, however, denied that man's freedom was at all affected by the Fall, and affirmed that it was as free for him to rise towards heaven as to sink into lower depths of degradation; that he underwent no change of nature, but only lost the superadded grace of righteousness. Thus original sin was a negative not a positive deterioration; it was a loss and not a taint.

Pelagian notions with respect to original sin were revived at different periods by various sects; by the Albigenses in the thirteenth century, the Anabaptists at the time of the Reformation, and also by the Socinians. The Reformers objected to the Schoolmen that they were tainted with Pelagian notions. At the period of the Reformation the Scholastic theory with respect to original sin was universally received in the Western Church, and the Reformers combated Roman doctrine as one with the teaching of the Schools. In the Council of Trent the great authority on this point was that of Thomas Aquinas [Pallavic. Istor. d. Conc. d. Trento, vii. 8]. Hence it was decided that Adam, by transgression, lost the original righteousness in which he was created for himself and for us; and transmitted to us the penal consequence of sin, which is the death of the soul; that the sin of Adam became our own, not by imitation, but by propagation; and that it could only be remitted by the merit of the death of Christ. Baptism is the instrument of remission, whereby the whole of that which has "veram et propriam peccati rationem" is removed; and all were anathematized who should say that sin is only shorn, "radi" (radersi), and no longer imputed to the baptized. It would seem that in the unbaptized concupiscence was considered by the Tridentine Fathers to have a more positive character. Further, it was asserted that concupiscence, the fomes of sin, remains even in the baptized for trial (in agonem), but it works no harm in those who yield not to it, but struggle manfully against it with the grace of Christ.

If, then, the Fathers of the Council of Trent allowed that the Apostle terms concupiscence sin, they still denied that the Church had ever so understood it. The words are remarkable, and as they supplied the text for wording our own article on original sin, they are now quoted. "Manere autem in baptizatis concupiscentiam vel fomitem hæc S. Synodus fatetur et sentit, quæ cum ad agonem relicta sit, nocere non consentientibus, sed viriliter per Christi Jesu gratiam repugnantibus, non valet: quinimo qui legitime certaverit coronabitur. Hanc concupiscentiam quam aliquando Apostolus peccatum appellat, S. Synodus declarat Ecclesiam Catholicam nunquam intellexisse peccatum appellari, quod vere et proprie in renatis peccatum sit, sed quia ex peccato est, et ad peccatum inclinat" [Sessio quinta, 1546; Pallavic. VII. x.]. Our Article, closely following up this decree, says, "Manet autem in renatis hæc naturæ depravatio;" where the alterations are significant; for the term "concupiscentia" being ambiguous, as applying either to that which the Schoolmen termed "fomes," and also to the vicious lusting after that which is forbidden, and therefore actual sin, is exchanged for a term that can only involve the former rudimental kind of concupiscence; viz. "naturæ depravatio;" for so the Saxon Confession [A.D. 1551] justifies the change of terms. "Vitandæ sunt in Ecclesia ambiguitates. Ideo expresse nominamus hæc mala depravationem, quæ sæpe ab antiquis scriptoribus nominatur mala concupiscentia" [Art. de Pecca. Or.]. In the next year the same alteration was adopted in the Article of King Edward VI. Again, it is not declared that this "depravation of nature" is "truly and properly" sin, or that actual sin accompanies it, as Melanchthon said, "Semper cum peccato originali simul sunt peccata actualia," but that it merely has "the nature of sin;" the words of the Tridentine Council, "veram et propriam peccati rationem," bearing upon the Augsburg definition, "quod vitium originis vere sit peccatum," are softened down in our Article to "peccati tamen in sese rationem habere concupiscentiam." Roman theology therefore denies that this "fault of our nature" is actual sin. That of the Reformers says only that it hath the nature of sin. Is it altogether impossible to harmonize these two statements? [Bp. Harold Browne on the Articles. Archb. Lawrence, Bampt. Lect. Pallavicino, Istoria d. Conc. d. Trento, vii. Paul Sarpi, Hist. Conc. Trid. ed. 1621, 195. Herzog, Sünde. Müller's Chr. Lehre. v. d. Sünde, b. IV. c. iii. iv. Gieseler, Dogm. Gesch. sec. 72.]

ORTHODOX. Holding true doctrine, the standard being the doctrine acknowledged and received by the Church Catholic.

The doctrine implicitly held by the Church from the beginning was unfolded and explicitly declared by degrees; as heresies, springing up one after another, gave occasion for fuller creeds, for explications of the articles of the creeds, for denials by accredited councils of the several specific heresies. Also, out of the growing Christian literature there was marked out by common consent a line of doctors acknowledged to be true representatives of Catholic theology.

Consequently, the meaning of the term "ortho dox" became gradually more and more defined. "The faith of Christians did at first consist in few points, those which were professed in baptism, whereof we have divers summaries in the ancients —by analogy whereto all other propositions were expounded, and, according to agreement whereto sound doctrines were distinguished from false: so that he was accounted orthodox who did not violate them. So he that holds that immovable rule of truth which he received at his baptism, will know the words and sayings and parables which are taken out of the Scriptures, &c. Iren. i. 1." [Barrow, Unity of the Church, i.]

From this early state the requirements of orthodoxy soon increased; and the term can now be strictly applied only to one who holds, besides the baptismal creed, the Constantinopolitan Creed, and (in the Western Church) the Athanasian Creed, the explications of the creed, and the denials of heresies set forth by the six Œcumenical Councils.

The term is often applied, however, more loosely: dissenters from the Church of England (e.g.) who separate on account of Church government, not on account of Church doctrine, being called by many "orthodox dissenters."

'ΟΥΣΙΆ. This term was used in ancient philosophy, from whence it was indirectly imported into the nomenclature of theology. It was first applied by Plato to denote the true nature and "essence" of a thing [Phæd. 78, c.].[1] With the Peripatetics it signified material substance. Thus Aristotle says οὐσίαι δὲ μάλιστ εἶναι δόκουσι τὰ σώματα [de An. ii. 1]; and λέγω δ' οὐσίας μὲν τά τε ἁπλᾶ σώματα, οἷον πῦρ καὶ γῆν [de Cœl. iii. 1].[2] Hence, according to Hippolytus, the word expressed not only genus, species and individual, but also matter, form, and space. [Philos. vii. 19.] The Stoic school made the term simply synonymous with ὕλη. These conflicting definitions led to heretical confusion. The school of Alexandria introduced the term into ecclesiastical literature; but it was long considered to be a synonym for ὑπόστασις, a word of barbarous origin [Socr. H. E. iii. 7], and more especially in the Western Church, where "substantia" was the rendering of the philosophical expression οὐσία, though it was identified rather with ὑπόστασις, quâ theological terminology. Thus Damasus, Bishop of Rome [Ep. Synod. ad Episc. Illyr. de Syn. Arim.; Theod. Hist. Eccl. ii. 22], defines the Holy Trinity to be τῆς ἀυτῆς ὑποστάσεως καὶ οὐσίας, where the former term is the exact equivalent for "substantia" quâ etymology, and the second term in all probability came in from the margin as the explanation of a later hand.

Before the Council of Nice the two terms were used indifferently to express the same notion of spiritual substance, as Photius declares [Bibl. 119]; and the council fell into the same mode of expression when it anathematized all who should affirm that the Son is ἐξ ἑτέρας ὑποστάσεως ἢ οὐσίας, the two terms being treated as synonymous. [See Petav. Dogm. Theol. II. iv.] Even Athanasius not unfrequently uses the two terms as convertible, in deference possibly to the dogmatic phraseology of the Latin Church, which used "persona" for the Greek hypostasis, and rendered both οὐσία and ὑπόστασις by the homogeneous term "substantia." [See Or. iii. c. Ar. 65.] The same peculiarity may be observed in the language of the Councils of Dedication, Antioch [A.D. 341], Sardica [A.D. 347], and Sirmium [A.D. 351. Socr. H. E. ii. 30]. The Council of Ariminum [A.D. 359] upheld the semi-Arian creed of Sirmium, and proscribed the use of the term οὐσία as being nowhere found in Scripture [Socr. H. E. ii. 30, 37]; possibly also from the fear that the Peripatetic and Stoical acceptation of οὐσία having become popularized, material notions might attach to the Deity. For this reason its decision was branded by the Catholic Fathers as ὅρος ἄθεος [Libell. Synod.]. At the Council of Alexandria [A.D. 362], the application of these two terms was discussed, the subject having been brought up by Hosius, Bishop of Cordova [Socr. H. E. iii. 7]; but nothing was definitely settled [Newman's Arians, v. 2; Bishop Kaye's Athanas. 139]. Basil at length draws an accurate distinction between the two terms, οὐσία καὶ ὑπόστασις ταυτὴν ἔχει τὴν διαφοράν, ἣν ἔχει τὸ κοινὸν πρὸς τὸ καθ' ἕκαστον. Substance and hypostasis are distinguished as the universal and the particular [Ep. 391]; the first was thenceforth limited to "substance," the latter to "person." [HYPOSTASIS.]

The meaning of the term οὐσία is best reached through the scriptural term ὁ ὤν [Ex. iii. 14, and elsewhere], from the ἀεὶ ὤν and τὸ ὄν of Plato [Phædo and Timæus]; for the word is not found in the LXX. in any theological sense; but, viewed in that relation, no more suitable term could be devised to convey to the mind some idea of the Ineffable; for it involved no limit of time, past, present, or future; and it embodied at the same time, the force of the revealed Name I AM, while it was a standing witness against the Pagan notion of a passive unintelligent "anima mundi." Still this abstract term was felt to be inadequate, by philosophizing divines, such as the pseudo-Dionysius, the father of scholastic mysticism, who, with a refinement of scruple, termed the Deity ὑπερούσιος, κυρίως οὐσία ἐπὶ θεοῦ οὐκ ἂν λέγοιτο, ἔστι γὰρ ὑπερούσιος. He possibly borrowed his expression from the words of Plato οὐκ οὐσίας ὄντος τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ, ἀλλ' ἔτι ἐπέκεινα τῆς οὐσίας. [Pol. vi. Plotin. Enn. vi. 4, 9, 15, 18.]

Probably it was for a similar cause that the heretic Basilides, with a reckless audacity, termed the Supreme non-existent; i.e. according to any mode of existence of which the human intellect can have cognizance; λέγω εἶναι θεὸν οὐκ ὄντα, πεποιημένον κόσμον ἐξ οὐκ ὄντων, οὐκ ὄντα οὐκ ὤν. [Hippol. Philosoph. x. 4]. Similarly also the Marcosians affirmed that the Supreme was ἀνούσιος [Iren. c. Hær. I. viii. 1, Cambr. ed.; Hippol. Phil. vi. 42]. But the Cabbala of the

[1] Bishop Kaye's Athanas. p. 42, n. 4: "By the essence of a thing I understand that by which it is what it is."

[2] Yet he speaks of the Deity as ἀκίνητος οὐσία.

Jews was the authority followed by these heretics, where the Supreme or "Boundless" Ein Soph, before the evolution of the Sephiroth, wherein the Deity revealed himself, was simply "Ein," negation, or "Mî," who? [CABBALA.] Such too was the Hindu Brahm, the universal spirit, which only became the creative Brahma through union with the ideal Máyá; but in his previous condition could only be expressed as Tad, "that." [Rowland Williams' Christianity and Hinduism, p. 91. Hardwick, Christ and other Masters, 33, n. 1, 40, 46.]

In more modern days Hegel has reproduced the notion: "Dieses reine Seyn ist nun die reine Abstraction, damit das Absolut-Negativ, welches gleichfalls unmittelbar genommen das Nichts ist" [Encycl. d. Sci. Phil. 86, 87]. It is an exact parallel to the ὅλως οὐκ ὄντα of Basilides [Hipp. Philos. vii. 20, 21]. These analogies from ancient and modern philosophy serve to mark strongly the peculiar excellence of revealed religion in setting forth a practical and therefore a sufficiently adequate idea of God the Supreme Governor of the world. Natural religion harmonizes altogether with revelation, and assures us that the God with Whom we have to do has a personal subsistence. The natural and moral world is made up of instances of design, that design must have a designer, that designer must be a Person, and that Person is God [Paley]. He is not a mere mundane soul, like the Gnostic Demiurge, nor as the "vis vitæ" of Pantheism; but an Intelligent Disposer of the whole course of the universe; preserving in their orderly progression the countless worlds that people space; and descending to the daily and hourly wants of each individual soul of life; whether by a continuous providential care, or by the operation of general laws framed in the eternal counsels from all eternity. Οὐσία then, as the generalization of ὁ ὤν, implies a real individual self-existent Being. As Suidas says, it is that which exists in itself, without depending upon anything else for its subsistence, in the way of accident; οὐσία ἐστὶ τὸ ἐν ἑαυτῷ ὂν καὶ μὴ ἐν ἑτερῷ ἔχον τὴν ὕπαρξιν, ὡς τὸ συμβεβηκός.

When Paul of Samosata, and after him Marcellus [Epiphan. Hær. 73], explained away the true Divinity of Christ by saying that He existed merely ὡς ῥῆμα ἐκ στόματος, the ancient belief was enounced that the Divine Nature pertained to the Son as truly as to the Father, and that He was ὁμοούσιος [Platonic γενουστής]; hence from the union of the two natures in one Christ, the term οὐσία, which designated the Divine Nature, came to be applied also to the human, and through the Manhood of Christ to our own nature. Thus Athanasius on Gen. vi. 7 says that the totality of mankind is called "man," διὰ τὸ κοινὸν τῆς οὐσίας. So also the Council of Chalcedon, in its definition of Faith, declares that the Son is of one substance [ὁμοούσιος] with the Father according to the Godhead, and of one substance with us according to the Manhood. [Routh, Opusc. 426.] Οὐσίαι is also applied to the celestial hierarchy, with the epithets "supercelestial" and "celestial" by the pseudo-Dionysius [c. iv. 5]; they are termed ἀσωμάτοι by Chrysostom [Hom. i., ad Stager.]; and νοεροὶ, or intelligent, by John of Damascus. PAGANISM. The relation of the early Church to the various forms of Polytheism which it sought to supplant is a subject of great importance to the modern student of ecclesiastical history.

I. The Pagan State and Christianity. For the contest between Christianity and Paganism, so far as the circumstances of it are known, was almost as much a contest between the civil authorities of the Roman Empire and the new religion, as between Christianity and the old religions of the civilized world. Of all that took place with respect to conflicts between the new and old religions in countries external to the Roman Empire, such as the Parthian Empire in the West, and the Germanic nations in the North, we know next to nothing. But within the bounds of the Roman Empire, Christianity was a standing enemy of many existing institutions in every country, and these institutions being upheld by the state, Christians came to be looked upon, in respect of their religion, as national enemies wherever they existed.

It was part of the policy of the Roman Empire, as is well known, to tolerate all national religions within the boundaries of the nations which professed them, but this toleration did not extend to those religions when they began to exercise a proselytizing influence beyond those boundaries. Now, it was an essential characteristic of Christianity that it was a proselytizing religion. Its teachers acted under the especial commission, "Go ye into all the world, and make disciples of every creature," and no other religion ever shewed such an aggressive character. Thus Christianity was, in limine, a foe to the existing religious institutions of the world as they were looked at from a statesman's point of view.

But, more than this, Christianity refused to become a peaceable member of any eclectic system. The scepticism of the Academies was superseded during the early spread of Christianity by an eclecticism originating with Ammonius Saccas and his disciples the Neo-Platonists. This system became extremely fashionable among the intellectual classes in the more learned regions of the Roman Empire. It was an attempt, a last attempt of heathenism to work itself into an alliance with a foe of whom an inner conviction seemed to say that he would, in the end, prove too strong for it. But Christianity would not come to terms. It would not even consent to the drawing up of preliminaries for a treaty of peace. The words of its Master were being continually illustrated by all Christian missionaries, "I came not to send peace but a sword." Christianity sought not toleration, not compromise, but universal supremacy. Thus, theoretically at least, the contest between Christianity and Paganism was a war which could only end by the extermination of one or the other, and the process of resistance to extermination on the part of Paganism was that which constituted the substance of the struggle between it and Christianity.

But, apart from this general antagonism between the two religious systems, there was a special institution of the Empire, its official religion, with which Christians came into fatal conflict almost by accident. This official religion had more of the rising eclecticism in it than of the old and decaying Polytheism, but it was little concerned with moral or theological principles, its one prominent requirement being the recognition of the emperor as an object of worship. The sacrifice of a few grains of incense to him was the test of religious obedience. To frequent the temples, to offer sacrifices to the gods, to take part in the mysteries, might be parts of religious practice, and every one was at liberty to adopt them or not to adopt them as they pleased. But public piety, that which established a citizen as, quâ religion, a good citizen, was the religious veneration of the emperor, neither more nor less. Thus the religion of Christians when tried by this test was necessarily open to misconstruction. To burn incense to the emperor was idolatry, not to burn it seemed to be disloyalty and rebellion. They who would gladly have taken an oath of allegiance if it had been offered to them simply as such, refused, with an unyielding firmness, to do so when it was presented to them under the form of an idolatrous rite. It seems strange that the astute statesmanship of the Empire did not devise some means by which men so really loyal to it as the early Christians were, might be permitted to live in peace; but, perhaps, the explanation is to be found in the fact that the kingship and kingdom of Christ were ideas which entered largely into their religious teaching, and formed a prominent feature in the popular theology of the multitude. Such an idea would look like rebellious rivalry to the mind of a Roman statesman—one who would never be able to appreciate the force of such words as "My kingdom is not of this world;"—and thus his only antidote to that worship of Christ which recognised Him as the King of the Christians, though an invisible one, would be the repudiation of Him by adoption of the visible Emperor as their "numen." If the novel rite of deifying the living Emperor had not been invented, the Christians could have declared their allegiance to him without any hesitation, as is shewn by the Apologies:[1] and in such a case it is not improbable that they might, so far as public authority was concerned, have been tolerated in their religion, provided its proselytizing principles had not caused any disturbance of public order.

II. Popular Paganism and Christianity. At the same time that Christianity was thus opposed to the state religion of the empire, it was also in a position of strongly aggressive opposition to the popular religion of every country within its boundaries, that of the Jews alone being, and that only for a short time, an exception. Whether the popular religion was Polytheism, or some one of the many varieties of Fetichism, it was certain to be denounced as false by Christian teachers, and as so entirely false that nothing would satisfy Christianity except the entire abolition of what was denounced. Thus Christians arrayed against themselves a large class, in those whose personal interest it was that the old religions should be maintained, and in the bulk of the ignorant among the people at large, whom stolid habit and unreasoning prejudice would enlist against innovators to whom no old religion was sacred. Such a position of antagonism to the old religions was as essential to Christianity as uncompromising opposition to Baal was essential to Elijah: and even where Christians were not aggressive by positive opposition, their negative opposition was necessarily conspicuous. For the rites of Polytheism were not confined to the temples, they pervaded all the customs of public and social life. They were prevented from attending the public games by the association of idolatrous rites with them, "the many images, the long line of statues, the chariots of all sorts, the thrones, the crowns, the dresses," by the preceding sacrifices, and the procession. "It may be grand or mean," says Tertullian, "no matter, any circus procession whatever is offensive to God. Though there be few images to grace it, there is idolatry in one; though there be no more than a single sacred car, it is a chariot of Jupiter: and anything whatever of idolatry, whether meanly arrayed or modestly rich and gorgeous, taints it in its origin" [Tertull. de Spectac. vii.]. The theatres were equally forbidden, for "its services of voice, and song, and lute, and pipe, belong to Apollos and Muses and Minervas and Mercuries, . . . and the arts are consecrated to the honour of the beings who dwell in the names of their founders" [ibid. x.]. Even in the intercourse of private life, the Lares and Penates of the hall, the libations of the dinner table, the very phraseology with which ordinary conversation was largely decorated, all partook of the nature of idolatry [Tertull. de Idol. xv. xvii. xxi. xxii.], and the necessities of their anti-idolatrous principles thus secluded Christians from the social assemblies of their heathen acquaintances, and made them, in many respects, a separate community.

Above all, Christianity was the deadly foe of a widespread immorality, the extent of which is almost inconceivable. Polytheism was always a religion of mere ceremony, unassociated, as a religion, with any moral law. Hence the most religious man in the sense of Polytheism might be a shameless profligate, emulating the gods to whom he sacrificed in their reputed licentiousness, and guilty (as was Socrates) of crimes against which even nature revolts [Tertull. Apol. xlvi.]. Vices of this class were terribly common among the Romans of early Imperial times, and are exposed with scornful indignation by Tertullian in his Apology. Something of the extent to which profligacy was carried may also be seen by his denunciation of infanticide, in one bold sentence of which he says, "How many, think you, of those crowding around and gaping for Christian blood, how many even of your rulers, notable for their justice to you and for their severe measures against us, may I charge in their own consciences with the sin of putting their offspring to death?" [ibid. ix.]. Against the class of crimes thus indicated Christianity protested by word and example, Tertullian fearlessly declaring in respect to the latter that Christians were conspicuous for "a persevering and steadfast chastity."

Popular habits and customs being thus so contrary to the spirit of Christianity, it could not fail that a very strong opposition must have been offered to its progress: and although vast multitudes were quickly gathered to the standard of the Cross, there was still a large and influential mass of the population, in every country of the Empire, who looked upon it as the sign of an institution which sought the abolition of their cherished customs and habits, which made its disciples bad citizens and bad neighbours, and which was therefore to be hated, and, if possible, extinguished.

III. Pagan Philosophy and Christianity. Apart from the ruling powers of the Empire, and from those classes which formed the bulk of the nations composing it, there was also a considerable class of highly educated men, especially in Rome and Alexandria, on whom old-fashioned Polytheism had no hold, but who yet set themselves against Christianity. Among such were the Epicurean Celsus, who wrote a comprehensive work, The Word of Truth (now known only through Origen's refutation of it), against the new faith; the cynic Crescens—φιλοψόφος καὶ φιλοκόμπος—the boasting braggadocio of Justin Martyr's apology [Just. Mart. Apol. ii. 3; Euseb. iv. 6]; Trypho the Jew, against whom the same apologist wrote an important work, his Dialogue

[1] "Though we decline to swear by the genii of the Cæsars, we swear by their safety, which is worth more than all your 'genii.' . . . Do you not know that these 'genii' are called demons? . . . We respect in the emperors the ordinance of God, Who has set them over the nations. . . . But as for demons, that is, your 'genii,' we have been in the habit of exorcising them, not of swearing by them" [Tertull. Apol. 32].

Paganism

with Trypho; and Lucian the satirist, who opposed Christianity as a superstition unworthy of intellectual men [Lucian, de Morte Peregrin, xi.-xvi]. Indeed, the contemptuous tone in which grave writers like Pliny, Tacitus, and Suetonius, mention the new faith seems to shew that the literary class in general was opposed to it, and did not even think it worth while to make any effective inquiry as to its real principles. That they gradually learned to feel more respect for it is shewn by the rise of the Eclectic school of the Neo-Platonists, but even among these there were bitter opponents of Christianity, though there were indeed others who theoretically adopted a large portion of its principles. [Eclecticism. Neo-Platonism.]

IV. Persecutions of Christians by Pagans. The broadest and most evident form of the struggle for life and for supremacy between Paganism and Christianity was that of the continuous attempt of the former to suppress the latter by force. In this the state and the populace always co-operated, and there is no reason to think that the intellectual classes and philosophers held aloof.

The first approach to a general persecution was that begun at Rome under Nero [Tertull. Apol. 5]. St. Paul's account of his own sufferings [2 Cor. vi. 23-27], his reference to the Amphitheatre at Ephesus [1 Cor. xv. 32], to actual persecution of Christians [1 Cor. iv. 9, and perhaps in Heb. xi. 35-38], to the position of the Apostles as the "offscouring of the earth," to the "much tribulation" through which the faithful entered into rest, to his deliverance "out of the mouth of the lion," all seem to shew that the struggle between Paganism and Christianity had begun even in Apostolic times. But it is probable that persecution was then of a local kind, arising out of charges made by Jews against Christians for whom they entertained a deadly hatred. Suetonius mentions, indeed, that the Jews were driven out of Rome by Claudius on account of an insurrection raised by one "Chrestus," and Christians who were not Jews may have been expelled with them, though anything like a Christian insurrection (as the historian's words are sometimes interpreted) was so alien to the spirit of the early Christians as to be beyond probability.[1] After the great fire of Rome, in the year 64, Nero however (who is said by Dion and Suetonius to have been himself the incendiary) accused the Christians of causing it, and brought upon them a terrible stream of indignation from the excited Romans. Tacitus wrote his Annals about thirty years afterwards, and he describes their sufferings in a few graphic words. Nero invited the citizens to festivals in the Imperial gardens (now the Vatican), and the chief spectacle which he there offered them was the martyrdom of their hated neighbours. Some were sewn in the skins of wild beasts and torn to pieces by dogs; some were crucified; some burned to death; some smeared over with inflammable substances and used as torches or bonfires to light up the gardens after dark.[2] This persecution lasted for four years, and there can be no doubt that it was carried on in other cities as well as at Rome.[3] During the course of it St. Peter was one of those who were crucified in the gardens of Nero, and St. Paul was beheaded a short distance out of Rome. How many others went to make up this great vanguard of the army of martyrs it is impossible to say, but the words of the heathen historian point to a great multitude rather than to any inconsiderable number.

It is usual to reckon ten periods of persecution, at intervals spreading over the latter half of the first, the second, the third, and the early years of the fourth century. But this enumeration is arbitrary and cannot be supported by historical evidence. During the whole of that time there was persecution going on in some part of the Empire, although emperors like Hadrian, Vespasian, Titus, Nerva and Trajan [Tertull. Apol. 5] were unlikely to give it any encouragement. Yet Pliny's famous letter to Trajan [Plinii Epp. x. 96] shews that it was difficult to save Christians from the popular cry for their extermination, and the martyrdom of St. Cyprian is another illustration of the same fact. The last and most terrible of the general persecutions was that which immediately preceded the accession of Constantine, when it seemed as if Diocletian had nearly accomplished his object of destroying the very name of Christian. It is not the purpose of this article, however, to go into any details respecting these periods of persecution, and the subject may be dismissed with the following table, which represents the conclusions that may be arrived at from a full examination of historical data:—

Chronological Table of Persecutions.

[1] The words of Suetonius are "Judæos impulsore Chresto assidue tumultuantes Roma expulit" [Sueton. Claud. xxv. 12]. It is possible that his "Chrestus" was one of the many "false Christs" of the day, such as Theudas, Judas of Galilee [Acts v. 36, 37], and Bar Cochebas.

[2] "Et pereuntibus addita ludibria, ut ferarum tergis contecti, laniatu canum interirent, aut crucibus affixi, aut flammandi, atque ubi defecisset dies in usum nocturni luminis urerentur. . . . Hortos suos ei spectaculo Nero obtulerat" [Tacit. Annal. xv. 44].

[3] St. Mark was martyred at Alexandria at this time, St. Gervase and St. Protase at Milan.

V. THE DECLINE OF PAGANISM. The long and bitter struggle between the Paganism and the Christianity of the Roman Empire came to a close with Constantine's victory over Maxentius. As early as A.D. 311, Galerius had been terrified by a shocking and mortal disease to issue a decree in which he, with the Emperors Constantine and Licinius, directed that persecution should cease, that churches should be rebuilt, and that the Christians should be allowed to worship in peace [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. viii. 17]. But the execution of this decree was much hindered by Maximinus and Maxentius, and it was only on their defeat by Licinius and Constantine that a real toleration began. After that event [A.D. 313] the Emperors immediately published the famous Edict of Milan [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. x. 5; Lactant. de Mort. Persecut. xlviii.], in which the previous decree was rigidly enforced and all persecution entirely suppressed. In the year 321 a severe blow was given to expiring Paganism by an edict in which the Emperor established the Lord's Day as a public festival, and a day of abstinence from labour. When he became sole Emperor in A.D. 324, he issued one of a still more decided tone, in which he exhorted all his subjects throughout the Empire to forsake Paganism and worship Christ only; and from that time he and his successors ruled the Empire as Christian emperors.

Before the end of the fourth century Paganism had become so much weakened, and the Christian population so decidedly predominant, that the emperors were able to take measures towards its final suppression. Theodosius [A.D. 381] forbad apostasy to Paganism, and suppressed its sacrifices, though still tolerating its minor rites [Cod. Theodos. xvi. 7], the Western Emperors Gratian and Valentinian following his example. When Theodosius became sole Emperor [A.D. 392] he forbad all kinds of idolatry under severe penalties[1] [ibid. 10, 12]. The last traces of Paganism died out in the Eastern Empire in the first quarter of the fifth century [ibid. 10, 22], and its final extinction in the West was at the same time effected by the supremacy of the Northern invaders. If, since that age, Christianity has lost ground, it has not been to the old Paganism, but to its Eastern successor Mahometanism. The former never revived after the time of its last great effort to regain supremacy in the Diocletian persecution, and for nearly three centuries the Empire was wholly Christian.

PANDECTS. [LAW, ECCLESIASTICAL.]

PANIS BENEDICTUS. [ANTIDORON.]

PANTHEISM. The term Pantheism is of yesterday. It was known formerly as "Atheism." Cudworth's Hylozoic and Eleatic schools of philosophy were not atheistical, as believing in no divine principle, but Pantheistic, as holding that the universe, of which we have an idea through the senses, is the Deity, and that the Deity is the universe; substantially, it was the same thing as Spinoza's "Eins ist Alles, und Alles ist Eins," unity is the universe, and the universe is unity. Pantheism was a term first used by Fay, in his answer [A.D. 1709] to the English Deist Toland's "Socinianism truly stated, being an example of fair dealing in theological controversies, to which is prefixed indifference in disputers, recommended by a Pantheist to an orthodox friend:" London, 1705. Again [A.D. 1720], appeared his Pantheisticum sive Formula Societatis Socraticæ; from which time the term came into general use.

Pantheism runs together the distinct ideas of the Creator and the creature; it deifies the universe, and amalgamates together the notions of the finite and Infinite, unity and universal substance.

The system is a necessary result of the negation of the two received points of Christian faith; that the world is create, and that truth has been revealed to man from heaven. The old crux "ex nihilo nil fit," is repeated. The universe as it is now is stated to have existed from all eternity; if then the world has had a necessary existence without beginning, it is a necessary condition of the Divine Substance as being co-eternal with it. Again, a direct revelation of truth is denied. It is not questioned that man may possess the truth, but that he can gain a knowledge of it from any other source than the energy of human reason. He works it out for himself. Therefore the Divine Substance and Divine Truth are identified with the spirit of man. Moreover, since human reason is a variable changeful element, self-consistent at one while, self-contradicting at another, it is therefore a finite intelligence, but the Divine Intelligence is infinite; nevertheless the finite and Infinite are also one, of which latter the finite is only a particular mode. And, further, since a divinely revealed system of truth is denied, and human reason is declared to be the only source of truth; since, also, there is no such thing for man as absolute truth, but only such modes of it as are discoverable by his finite intelligence—therefore all opinions stand on the same level: whether they affect religion, philosophy or political principle, they may be expected to wax and wane, to ebb and flow like everything else in this world. Truth, like time, is in a state of perpetual flux.

The history of Pantheism is fully treated in the "DICTIONARY of Sects, Heresies, and Schools of Thought." It may be sufficient, here, to observe that Pantheism has occupied the thoughts of men from a very early period of our race; when the marks of a designing Mind, which are everywhere present in the visible world, were considered to be so many proofs that the world itself was the source of the intelligence which it indicates, and men acknowledging that intelligence worshipped and served the creature and not the Creator. From Central Asia possibly it passed with the Aryan race into India along the course of the Indus and Ganges; but however that may be, it is India which yields the earliest proof of a pantheistic religious faith, in the emanation system which underlies the religious philosophy of the Vedas, and of the Manû code, or Manava Dharma Sastra, the most ancient of written authorities. Brahm, the Absolute, is the spirit from whence all things emanate, and to whom all things return. He is all things. Shaking off his sleep that never had a beginning, he gives birth to Máyá, illusion, matter that seems, but is not; and then proceeds forth the Brahminic Trinity, of Brahma, Vishnû, and Siva; the creator, the preserver, the destroyer, who restores all things to the primeval substance Brahm. By the union of Brahm and Máyá, this world of illusive appearance and the various forms of immaterial matter were engendered; the mundane system is temporal, and when its destiny is accomplished, it will be destroyed by Siva, to be succeeded by another manifestation of Brahma and a new universe. The progression is infinite. The universe is Brahm, and Brahm is the universe.

The Valentinian scheme, as given by Irenæus, Hippolytus, and Tertullian, was borrowed from the Isiacal theology of Egypt, placing at the head of its emanational scheme abysmal substance; the sleeping Brahm. From thence are evolved Mind and Silence, the correlatives of Osiris and Isis in the Egyptian scheme; Isis representing material substance, Osiris the vital principle and active intellect. From this pair all other things emanate. The "ogdoad decad and dodecad" of Valentinus were derived from the parallel Egyptian scheme. [Harvey's Introd. to Irenæus, Cambr. ed. I. xxiv.] In Persia we find a dualistic theory, of good and evil, light and darkness, the pure and impure, personified in Ormuzd and Ahriman; both, however, emanated from Indefinite Time, a Platonic ἀπειρία, Zeruane Akerene, as the Avesta terms it; but a yet earlier Persian creed bore the broad stamp of Pantheism. Thus Crœsus [Xen. Cyrop. VIII. vii. 27] seems to doubt whether he shall hereafter have an individual existence, or whether his individuality is destined to be merged again in the divine principle, when he expresses the hope that after this life he may suffer no more evil, whether he be with the Deity, or whether he be no longer anything [μήτε ἦν μετὰ τοῦ θείου γένωμαι, μήτε ἦν μηδὲν ἔτι ᾖ]. According to Herodotus, the Persians considered the entire vault of heaven to be God [τὸν κύκλον πάντα τοῦ οὐρανοῦ Διὰ καλέοντες, i. 132], possibly also the earth; for Diogenes Laertius says of the Magians that they deified the elements [οὕς καὶ πῦρ εἶναι καὶ γῆν καὶ ὕδωρ]; Herodotus also records that the ancient Persians did sacrifice to the sun and moon, to earth, fire, water, and air [i. 131]. The ancient religion of Persia was far more closely connected with the Pantheism of the Brahmin than with the Polytheism of the Greek; and it was from this source possibly that Thales and the Ionic school of philosophy borrowed their principles, and believed that a divine life existed in the elementary forms of matter. The earlier religious belief of Greece knew nothing of any theogonia of gods and goddesses [Euseb. Præp. Evang. I. ix. 13]; thus the Hesiodic Muses hymn Earth and Heaven as the source of all [Theogon. 44]. The first traces of a θρησκεία, or religious system, were sketched out in the time of Joshua and the Judges by the Thracian theologic, i.e. theogonic poet Orpheus. But Jupiter is represented by him as the principle and the mean, the substance and the end of all things, the universal spirit [De Gérando, Hist. Comp. des Syst. de Phil. i. 300; from Apuleius]. And his preceptor Linus is responsible, according to Stobæus, for the pantheistic formula, "One sole energy governs all things; all things are of all, and all is of all things; all things are unity, and every part is all; for of old all things were generated by one, and in the end of time all things again shall be unity; unity and multiplicity together."

These primitive notions of Greece disappeared and were altogether unknown to the many when Gnosticism, which stood in the same relation to theosophical notions as eclecticism to philosophy, revived a knowledge of them. [Gnosticism.] But they had never been lost to philosophy. Philosophy had never been able to conceive a pure notion of the Deity. It was always somehow or other entangled with matter. Pythagoras introduced the emanation system into Greece from the East, and taught it under his theory of numbers [Harvey, Introd. to Irenæus, Cambr. ed. p. xlii.]. Timæus of Locri and Ocellus of Lucania were eminently pantheistical. The writings attributed to them may be spurious, but they undoubtedly give utterance to true Pythagorean notions [De Gérando, Sur la Nature de l'Univ. i. 424, 425]. Xenophanes, contemporary with Pythagoras, and founder of the metaphysical school of Elea, was essentially a Pantheist as were his followers Parmenides and Zeno. Pantheism had never been lost to the schools, and the large infusion of the Pythagorean element into Neo-Platonism caused the Eclectic system of Alexandria, and in consequence, Gnosticism, to be deeply tinctured with Pantheism. Pantheism again disappeared to emerge again in the writings of J. Scotus Erigena; his work De divisione Naturæ is eminently Pantheistic. The titles of the four sections into which the work is divided are—I. The substance that creates and is not created; II. That which creates, and is created; III. That which is created and creates not; IV. That which is neither created nor creates. I. Representing the cause of all things, whether positively or negatively considered. II. Prototypal causes, as Platonic ideas. III. Generated matter, under the conditions of time and space. IV. is to the first as II. is to III. In I. the create in its negative aspect, or non-being, means that which Erigena comprehends under the name of apparent being; all the phenomena of existence as accidents of the supreme substance, which alone has real existence. All is God, he says, and God is all, God is the only true substantive Being. The divine progression in all things is termed "resolution;" the return of all to their source is deification [De Gérando, iv. 363]. The age, however, had no taste for his philosophy; Erigena attracted no following, and no more is heard of Pantheism until A.D. 1200, when Amalric of Bena and his pupil, David of Dinanto, developed it in a flagrant form from the teaching of William of Champeaux [THEOLOGY, SCHOLASTIC], who affirmed that individuals, identical in substance, only differ by the variety of accidents and passing forms. Gerson gives the following as Amalric's notion: "All is God and God is All. The Creator and the creature are one Being. Ideas are at once creative and create. God is the end of all things, in such a sense that all things must return into His Being, to constitute with Him an immutable individuality. As Abraham and Isaac are humanity individualized, so all beings are but individual forms of one sole Substance" [Concord. Metaph. et Log. 18]. The Arab philosophers of Spain in the Middle Ages extracted their Pantheism from Neo-Platonic writings, as Judaism did from the Cabbala. Passing over Jordano Bruno, who was a pronounced Pantheist, and burnt for his profession at the close of the sixteenth century, we next come to Spinoza. His principles in the barest possible form were these:—There is but one sole reality, one sole substance; this substance is God. This eternal and infinite substance has a necessary development by its own inherent energy, and shews itself in the two essential modes of being, viz. extension and thought. These modes comprise the infinite attributes of infinite substance. The development of substance produces all the phenomena of life. But these phenomena as being finite have only an apparent existence; in their real being they are the Deity itself, and are identically one. The distinction of thought and extension, of mind and matter, disappears by fusion in this common identity or divine unity. All is God, God is all; there is no personal existence in God. There is no freedom of will in man; but the mind is determined in its volition by causes which are themselves determined by antecedent causes, and so back in serial infinity. Human will is identical with the divine idea. Will and intelligence are one. There is nothing in all this that had not been said by Pantheists in preceding ages. It started into life at once as a complete system in the Vedas. Substitute unity for substance, and Spinozism was taught on the banks of the Ganges many ages before the Christian era. [SPINOZISM.]

Spinoza, like Erigena, formed no school during his lifetime; but he struck a chord that unfortunately has never ceased to vibrate. Fichte, Schelling and Hegel, though immediately disciples of the school of Kant, were as pantheistic as Spinoza. Subject and object were a primitive dualism in Kant's system. Subject is the principle of the form of our conceptions; furnishing as the percipient faculty the conditions of perception; and as the faculty of knowledge the conditions of judgment. Object is the principle of the matter of our conceptions, and conveys to us all our phenomenal intuitions. The objective was made so completely subordinate to the subjective in this "critique of pure reason," that it was not difficult for the next thinker to dispense with it altogether, and to make subjective substance the one existent principle. This was effected by Fichte in his transcendental idealism. Ego = ego, was his equation, the terms of which must be interpreted by the dictum of Descartes "cogito, ergo sum," expressing the notion that subjective thought is the only real substance, that the thinking being and the object of its thought are identical. It was a revival of the old Neo-Platonic notion of Plotinus with a strain of Buddhism. The idea of an external world was wholly annihilated. The opening of one of his lectures is blasphemy that cannot be repeated. Schelling made another step in advance, and got rid of the notion of subject altogether, denying to it the real and transcendental existence of the Fichtean scheme. Ego was no longer ego; it was a non-reality. Reality is only to be attributed to absolute existence. "There is only one existence, eternal and immutable." Yet there is an antithesis in this existence, the antithesis of unity and plurality, and in that plurality form is wholly one with matter. The universe and the Deity are one. Real and absolute existence is the copula which unites unity and plurality. Unity quâ unity and plurality quâ plurality have no existence properly so called; the finite is an illusion—the Brahminic Máyá. There is but one existence pure and simple, Reason is the Deity. He followed the Eclectic and Neo-Platonic lead. The theory of Hegel is very similar. He aims at unity as the very soul of truth. He finds this unity in the identity of existence and thought, "Cogito, ergo sum" once more; and in the unity of substance, and in oneness of subject and object of thought; it is Neo-Platonism again. This substance is the Deity who develops himself and reveals himself in infinite form; the Absolute including within itself the Spinozist notions of extension and thought. The Absolute is not absolute life, for it is eternal flux, perpetual development; "Gott ist in werden," θεὸς ἐν τῷ γενέσθαι, i.e. the progressional condition is continuous. It is thus that the sole connecting link of thought that unites the present with the very dawning period of man's glimmering reason is the monstrous theory of Pantheism; that the universe and its Creator are inseparably and immutably one.

PARABLE. In its gospel signification a parable is the narration of some real or imaginary event which is intended to be interpreted with a heavenly meaning. Derived from the Greek παραβολή, a placing beside, the primary meaning would be a simple figure, comparison, or illustration; in which sense the word is used in classical Greek, Aristotle expressly distinguishing παραβολή, an illustration, from λόγος, the parable of Scripture. A parable, says Jerome, is a similitude, "quæ ab eo vocatur, quod alteri παραβάλλεται, hoc est assimilatur, et quasi umbra prævia veritatis" [Hieron. Ep. cxxi. 6]. These last few words point out the difference between the gospel parable and the earlier apologues. The New Testament use of the word is confined to those teachings of our Lord which convey a Divine lesson in human shape: a method which is strictly Oriental: the sages of the East employing a sententious form of teaching, which our Lord adopted and sanctified by applying it to His own sacred purpose. In the parables of the Old Testament we have this difference, that no spiritual end was designed. The three most striking are Judg. ix. 8 15; 2 Sam. xii. 1-4, xiv. 2-7; but the prophets frequently used a similar form [Isa. vi. 9]. "Nulli enim dubium," says Jerome again, "ænigma ut parabolam, aliud proferre in verbis, aliud tenere in sensibus" [Hieron. in Ezech. v. 17; see also Prov. xxvi. 7]. Josephus speaks of a triple interpretation of the law among the Hebrews:—[1] Auditio; a simple unfolding of the Scripture, "Ye have heard that it was said by them of old:" [2] Extensio; when the history was expounded by a mystical extension: [3] Parabolica; when what was to be said was involved in parables [Joseph. Ant. xiv. 17]. Augustine calls a parable "similitudo de aliquo," even in such a passage as Rom. viii. 3. He also divides all our Lord's parables into two classes, "parabolas Dominus aut secundum similitudinem aliquam ponit, . . . aut ex ipsa dissimilitudine aliquid probat" [August. in Psa. lxviii. 12; and Quæst. Evang. ii. 45]. Of the former sort are those of the man and his two sons, the man and the two debtors, and very many more; of the latter, those of the unjust steward, the man in bed and the loaves, and the like.

In the introductory essay to Trench's Parables is an exhaustive treatise on the origin and nature of scriptural and other parables, with abundant authorities and illustrations; where the following digest is given of the distinction between a parable and other kindred compositions: "To sum up all, then, the parable differs from the fable, moving as it does in a spiritual world, and never transgressing the actual order of things natural—from the mythus, there being an unconscious blending of the deeper meaning with the outward symbol, the two remaining separate and separable in the parable—from the proverb, inasmuch as it is longer carried out, and not merely accidentally and occasionally, but necessarily figurative—from the allegory, comparing as it does one thing with another, but, at the same time, preserving them apart as an inner and an outer, and not transferring, as does the allegory, the properties and qualities and relations of one to the other" [Trench's Parables, p. 10, 4th ed.].

The word παραβολὴ only occurs twice in the New Testament elsewhere than in the Gospels, viz. in Heb. ix. 9 and xi. 19. In the former, the reference is to the sacrifices of the Mosaic law, as being a type of good things to come, παραβολὴ εἰς τὸν καιρὸν τὸν ἐνεστηκότα, "a figure for the time then present:" in the latter, to the sacrifice of Isaac, as a type of Christ. St. John uses the word παροιμία four times, and never παραβολή, but when the former word is translated "proverb" in the text of the Authorized Version the margin adds "or parable."

PARACLETE. [ὁ Παράκλητος.] The normal sense of this word is that of an "Advocate," and so it is rendered both in the Vulgate and in the English Version in St. John's first Epistle, "If any man sin we have an Advocate [παράκλητος] with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous" [1 John ii. 1]. This is the classical use of the word, which follows its derivation from παρακαλέω, to call another to aid as pleader of one's cause. The word seems, however, to mean something more in the only other places of Holy Scripture in which it is used. Our Lord had been speaking to the Apostles of His own office as their Advocate with the Father, and of the prevailing power of prayer through Him, when, He adds, "I will pray [ἐρωτήσω] the Father, and He shall give you another Comforter [ἄλλον παράκλητον], that He may abide with you for ever; even the Spirit of truth" [John xiv. 16]. "But the Comforter [ὁ παράκλητος], the Holy Ghost, Whom the Father shall send in My Name, He shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you" [John xiv. 26]. "When the Comforter is come Whom I will send unto you from the Father, the Spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the Father, He shall testify of Me" [John xv. 26]. "If I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send Him unto you. And when He is come, He will reprove the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment. . . . When He, the Spirit of truth is come, He will guide you into all truth, for He shall not speak of Himself; but whatsoever He shall hear, that shall He speak; and He will shew you things to come. He shall glorify Me: for He shall receive of Mine, and shall shew it unto you" [John xvi. 7-14]. In the first of these passages only will the word bear the meaning of "Advocate," the others referring to "witness" and "instruction;" a Witness of Christ for the rebuke of the world: an Instructor for the Apostles by "bringing all things" respecting Christ "to their remembrance," by "guiding them into all truth," by revealing to them "things to come," by bringing back to them [ἀναγγελεῖ ὑμεῖν] that which He should receive from Christ in Heaven.

The idea of "Consolator" was, therefore, associated with the title ὁ Παράκλητος by some of the Fathers. St. Chrysostom says that the Holy Spirit was called by this name, because of the afflictions under which the Apostles were then suffering [Chrys. Homil. in Joan. lxxv.]. St. Cyril of Jerusalem gives the same interpretation [Cyril. Hier. Catech. xvi.]. St. Augustine admits the sense of Consolator, as well as that of Advocatus [Aug. Homil. in. Joan. xciv.]. Origen explains that the Holy Spirit is called Paraclete, because consolation is the gift which every one must receive who receives the gifts of the Holy Ghost worthily [Origen, de Princip. ii. 7]. But that there has always been some doubt as to the true sense of the word is shewn by the fact that St. Isidore identifies it in one place with advocatus, and in another very shortly afterwards with consolator. St. John Damascene (who is followed by Hesychius) defines the name as belonging to the Holy Spirit, because He receives the supplications and prayers of mankind [Damascen. De Orthod. Fid. i. 10].

In the Anglo-Saxon Gospels, the Latin Paracletus is rendered "Fre-friend;" but "Comforter" is found in the early English versions of the fourteenth century. It must, however, be remembered that "comfort" did not mean "consolation" in early English. The fourteenth century version reads, "And he comfortide hym with nailes, that it shulde not be moued" [Isa. xli. 7]; and "I may alle thingis in him that comfortith me" [Philip. iv. 13]. When the word "Comforter" was first used as the English form of Paraclete it was used, therefore, in the sense of Strengthener, or Supporter, rather than in that of Consoler; and such a meaning seems to agree well with that derived from the use of the word made by our Lord. Παράκλησις is, however, often used in the sense of consolation in the New Testament, and παρακλήτωρ is used in the sense of "consoler" in the Septuagint.

The title of "Paraclete" was blasphemously assumed by the heretic Manes, his name being associated with this act of maniacal folly by both Eusebius and St. Chrysostom. [Euseb. Hist. Ecc. vii. 31. Socrat. Hist. Ecc. i. 22. Epiphan. Hær. 65.]

PARADISE. An Old Testament word adopted by our Blessed Lord in the supreme hour of His Passion, when He said to the penitent thief upon the Cross, "To-day shalt thou be with Me in Paradise"[ἐν τῷ παραδείσῳ, Luke xxiii. 43]. It is also used by St. Paul, who appears to identify it with "the third heaven" [2 Cor. xii. 2, 4] of Jewish theology. [Heaven.] It is also used a second time by our Lord, in His message to the Church of Ephesus, "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of Paradise of God" [Rev. ii. 7].

The Old Testament sense of Paradise was a literal one, the word signifying in its original Persian form, from which it was taken into the Hebrew language, a pleasure-park largely planted with fruit trees. It seems generally to look to "the garden of the Lord" [Gen. xiii. 10], which was planted "eastward in Eden" [Gen. ii. 8], as the abode of our first parents in their state of innocency. The idea of a pleasure place planted with trees, like what we call a "park," as distinguished from a garden planted with flowers, is plainly associated with the refreshment and repose so much needed in the hot climate of the East. In a similar way, the "shadow of a great rock in a weary land" [Isa. xxv. 4, xxxii. 2] is spoken of by the prophet, and more than once associated with the protecting Providence and Presence of God.

This literal sense of the word, thus combined with the illustration afforded by prophetic language, may serve to give us an idea of the sense in which our Lord would use it while He was upon the Cross. He was referring, undoubtedly, to a place in which His Presence would be manifested after His death, and while His Body was still on the Cross, or in the tomb, "to-day." If, however, that place had been Heaven, it is most improbable that He would not have used the word "Heaven," which He so often did use, and which He used especially on one occasion in association with His Human Nature, "The Son of Man which is in Heaven" [John iii. 13]. Nor may we venture to speculate on the possibility of Christ being (in any way to which He would have referred at that time) in Heaven between His Death and His Resurrection, since, even after the latter, He said, "I am not yet ascended to My Father" [John xx. 17]. The rational conclusion is, therefore, that our Lord spoke of an intermediate state, in which His soul, and the soul of the penitent thief, would be in company, when separate from their mangled bodies, and that such an intermediate state or place, neither Heaven nor earth, our Lord was pleased to call "Paradise." Thus the Liturgy of Chrysostom says of our Lord, "In the grave bodily, in Hades spiritually as God, with the thief in Paradise as on a throne [ἐν παραδείσῳ δὲ μετὰ λῃστοῦ, ὡς ἐν θρόνῳ], wert Thou O Christ, with the Father and the Holy Ghost, Who art incircumscript, and fillest all things."

Hence the idea of Paradise is associated with the Intermediate State of the souls of the blessed in the interval between Death and the general Resurrection. It is a place where there is peace and refreshment, as in the garden of the Lord, whose trees afford shelter from the wind, and shadow from the scorching sun, and tranquillity from the storms that beset a life in the world without. It is a place where God Himself condescends to "walk in the cool of the day" [Gen. iii. 8], and to bless with a sense of His Presence those whom He takes to rest and refreshment even from such excruciating agonies as those of the penitent thief. It is a place which is "the third heaven" in comparison with any experiences of previous existence; where the "Tree of Life" is restored to those who are received there; and which is so truly a restoration of the first Paradise, that no blessedness lies beyond except that of the full Beatific Vision of the Resurrection Kingdom. [Rev. xxii. 4.]

PARDON. [Absolution.]

PARDONS. [Indulgences.]

PARISH [παροικία]. "A parish is that circuit of ground which is committed to the charge of one parson, or vicar, or other minister, having cure of souls therein." [Blackstone's Comm. Introd. iv.] The word originally referred not to the parish of the priest, but to the diocese of the bishop. Its meaning is [1] "living in a place as πάροικος, sojourning;" and [2] "an ecclesiastical district, much like διόικησις." These two words were for three hundred years at least of the same import, "denoting not what we now call a parish church, but a city, with its adjacent town or country region." [Bingham's Antiq. IX. viii. 1.]

The earliest instance of a city divided into ecclesiastical districts is the city of Alexandria. These several districts were known by the name of laura [λαυρα, i.e. a street,[1] vide St. Epiph. Hæres. lxix.; Arian, c. 1]. In each of them was a church and a presbyter appointed to serve it—to one of them we find the heretic Arius presented by the Bishop Achillas [A.D. 311]. But all these districts formed the one παροικία of the bishop. In other large cities the clergy were usually attached to the cathedral or mother church, and from that served other churches in town and country. As time went on and numbers increased, what is called the parochial system became a necessity. "Rural presbyters" (ἐπιχώριοι πρεσβύτεροι), i.e. persons appointed by the bishop to the charge of rural districts, are mentioned by St. Epiphanius as belonging to Carchara in Mesopotamia in the middle of the third century [Hæres. lxvi. n. 11]. They are also alluded to by Dionysius of Alexandria, by St. Athanasius, and by the Councils of Illiberis [circa A.D. 305] and Neocæsarea [A.D. 315]. The latter council, in its thirteenth canon, forbade them to officiate in the city churches, save in the absence of the bishop and city presbyters. About this time the smaller divisions began gradually to take the name of parishes. The Council of Chalcedon [A.D. 451] speaks of the country parishes as belonging to the bishop (τὰς καθ' ἑκάστην ἐκκλησίαν ἀγροικικὰς παροικίας ἢ ἐγχωρίους), and to the Council of Vaison [A.D. 442] it seemed good "ut non solum in civitatibus, sed etiam in omnibus parochiis verbum faciendi daremus presbyteris potestatem" [can. ii.]. For a long time, however, according to Thomassin [part i. bk. ii. c. 21], such offices as those for public baptism, the reconciliation of penitents, and the consecration of the Eucharist, were confined to the mother Church, and were not permitted in the tituli or lesser churches. Even in the fifth century the presbyters of these churches in Rome received every Sunday the Blessed Sacrament, consecrated by the bishop, and did not themselves consecrate.

There was also no special appropriation of ecclesiastical revenues to particular places. The clergy were provided for out of the revenues of the great or mother Church, where the tithes and oblations of the faithful formed a common fund, which was in the hands of the bishop, and managed by an officer called œconomus, or guardian. In England it must have been a considerable time before this community of possessions between bishop and clergy was discontinued. Bede [Eccl. Hist. bk. iv. c. 27] mentions how it existed in the time of St. Cuthbert at Lindisfarne [A.D. 664], and how St. Gregory had instructed St. Augustine to "establish that course of life which was among our ancestors in the Primitive Church, among whom none called anything that he possessed his own; but all things were in common to them."

There is great uncertainty about the date of the first division of parishes in England. No record remains of their existence in the ancient British Church. Many writers (e.g. Godwin, Dugdale, Camden) ascribe their institution to Archbishop Honorius [A.D. 640], but it probably took place not before, if so soon as, the end of that century. The law of King Edgar [A.D. 970] provided "ut dentur omnes decimæ, primariæ ecclesiæ ad quam parochia pertinet." This proves that parishes were then in existence. No doubt, as the laity began to build and endow churches, parishes increased in number and became settled in boundary, and thus too the laity acquired their rights of patronage.

The boundaries of parishes depend not on title-deeds or parliamentary enactments, but "on ancient and immemorial custom." At first they were generally conterminous with the manors, as it was frequently by the piety of the lords of the manors that churches were erected. The ancient ceremony (happily not wholly disused) of "beating the bounds" has preserved the just rights of parishes as settled by ancient custom.

In the time of Cardinal Wolsey the number of parish churches was reckoned at 9,407. Camden enumerates 9,284. In the population abstract of 1831, the number of parishes and parochial chapelries in England and Wales is estimated at 10,700. Since that date the number has increased considerably. The Legislature made partial provision for such increase in the Acts 6 & 7 Vict. cap. 37, and 7 & 8 Vict. cap. 94 (Sir Robert Peel's Acts), and also in 19 & 20 Vict. cap. 104 (the Marquis of Blandford's Act). [Thomassin, Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discipl., pars I. lib. ii. et iii. Bingham's Antiq. ix. 8. For legal questions see Burn's Ecclesiastical Law, Phillimore's ed., and Stephen's Blackstone, vol. i. pp. 116-122, and vol. iii. pp. 116-121.]

PARSON ["persona ecclesiæ"]. "One that hath full possession of all the rights of a parochial church. He is called parson, persona, because by his person the Church, which is an invisible body, is represented. . . . He is sometimes called the rector or governor of the church; but the appellation of parson (however it may be depreciated by familiar, clownish, and indiscriminate use) is the most legal, most beneficial, and most honourable title that a parish priest can enjoy; because such a one (Sir Edward Coke observes), and he only, is said 'vicem seu personam ecclesiæ gerere'" [Blackstone's Comm. I. xi. 5]. By law, the freehold of the parsonage house, glebe, church, and churchyard, are in the parson, save in the case of a lay rector, who holds the freehold of the chancel. The tithes and dues also belong to him, unless appropriated. The repairs of the body of the church and churchyard fall upon the parishioners, those of the chancel on the parson, or on that anomalous person who is not a "persona," the lay rector.

Blackstone mentions four requisites as necessary to becoming a parson:—

1. Holy Orders. Formerly a deacon could be inducted to a benefice, though, if he did not take priest's orders within one year, he was ipso facto deprived; but now, by 13 and 14 Car. II. c. 14, sec. 14, only those in priest's orders are capable of admission to a living.

2. Presentation. The patron may present a layman, but the latter must take priest's orders before institution. If the person presented be not objected to by the bishop, either [1] because of his own, or [2] because of the patron's unfitness,[1] there next follows—

[1] For the reasons on which a bishop may object, see Stephen's Blackstone, iii. p. 28.

Paschal Controversy

3. Institution, i.e. "investiture of the spiritual part of the benefice; for by institution the care of the souls of the parish is committed to the charge of the clerk." This is the most important part of all the stages by which a clergyman becomes rector or vicar of a parish; for by it the bishop gives over to the parson a portion of his own pastoral charge, with a solemn invocation of the Blessed Trinity. [Mission. Cure of Souls.] After institution he can enter on the parsonage house and glebe, and receive tithes, but cannot grant or let them, &c., until

4. Induction. This is "investiture of the temporal part of the benefice." It is performed by mandate from the bishop, and by it the clerk receives "corporal possession of the church," usually tolling a bell as a sign thereof.

After all these ceremonies the clerk becomes a "parson imparsonée," or "persona impersonata," the only further requisite to the full validity of his title being that he should "read himself in" by saying Divine Service, reading the Thirty-nine Articles, and publicly declaring his assent to both.

The word "persona" was also applied to certain offices in cathedral and collegiate churches, the dignitaries of which were called "personæ ecclesiæ, personæ principales, and personæ privilegiati." By the Hereford Statutes, the bishop, dean, precentor, treasurer, and chancellor, were "personæ in dignitatibus constitutæ." At York, chantry priests of St. William's College were called "sacerdotes personæ," and at Beverley the "rectores chorales" were known as "personæ." In various foreign churches the inferior cathedral clergy were called "personats."

PASCHAL CONTROVERSY. Various difficulties have surrounded the reckoning of Easter from the first origin of the Christian Church. The three synoptical Gospels are unanimous [Matt. xxvi. 17-19; Mark xiv. 12-16; Luke xxii. 17-19] in their statement that our Lord instituted the Holy Eucharist at His last Paschal Supper. St. John is equally precise in saying that the Jews would not enter the judgment-hall "lest they should be defiled" through blood pollution, and be precluded from eating the Passover in the evening [John xviii. 28]. How came it then that our Lord should have celebrated the Passover on one evening, and that the Jews should have deferred the memorial feast till the corresponding period of the next day? This is a real difficulty, but the following is probably the solution.

Since the appearance of the new moon determined the Jewish calendar, an assembly was held in the Temple, on the closing day of each month, to receive intelligence respecting the first φάσις of the new moon. If nothing was announced, a day was intercalated; yet if the appearance of the moon was afterwards authenticated the intercalation was cancelled. This naturally caused much confusion, especially in the critical month of Nisan. Hence [Talmud, Rosh. Hashanah Gem. 1] it was permitted that in doubtful cases the Passover might be observed on two consecutive days. For the intercalation of a day at Jerusalem could hardly be known in Galilee; and according to Maimonides [קדש החדש], in these more distant parts of Judæa, the Passover was in some years kept on one day, at Jerusalem on another. Our Lord coming in from the country followed the letter of the law; but the main body of the Jews observing rather the "tradition of the elders," sacrificed the Passover on the following day, in consequence of the intercalation of a day in the preceding month. Thus our Lord ate the Passover on the evening of the 14th Nisan, and was upon the same day the "very Paschal Lamb" by the death of the Cross [Harvey, Creeds, 328].

Easter has been the high festival of the Church from the days of the Apostles; though the primitive ritual, like the primitive creeds, followed no invariable rule. Thus while the churches in a large majority celebrated Easter Sunday on the first Lord's day after the 14th of Nisan on which our Lord suffered; others, such as the Asiatic churches, commemorated our Lord's death on the 14th of Nisan, as being the very day of the Saviour's Cross and Passion. This they did irrespectively of the day of the week on which it might fall. The Paschal fast also was variously observed. Tertullian speaks of it as extending over the Holy Week [de Jejun. xiv.]; Epiphanius says "the Catholic Church solemnizes not only the 14th Nisan but the entire week" [Hær. L. 3]; drawing a distinction between the orthodox and the Ebionite Quartodeciman, who kept fast only on the 14th of Nisan. The Western and more Catholic rule was to observe the Friday preceding Easter Sunday as a rigid fast, the Church identifying the Apostles' sorrowing with their own; and the fast was not resolved till Easter morn; while the Asiatic Quartodeciman party regarded the 14th Nisan, from a doctrinal point of view, as the commemoration day of man's redemption; and at the hour in which our Lord said "It is finished," i.e. at three o'clock in the afternoon, the fast was brought to an end [Eus. H. E. v. 23], and the day closed with the collective agape and celebration of the Lord's Supper. Whether the fast was resumed and maintained till Easter Day does not appear, neither is it certainly known whether these churches celebrated Easter on the Lord's Day next following, or on the next day but one to the 14th Nisan, on whatever day of the week that might fall. The latter, however, would seem to have been the practice, from the decree of an early synod [Eus. H. E. v. 23] convened to consider the case, which ordained that the Feast of the Resurrection should be celebrated on the Lord's Day, and on no other, and that the Paschal Fast should then be brought to a close; for the ordinance would not have been needed if there had been nothing in this particular to amend. Hefele, however, sees in this decree a proof that the Asiatic Easter was always celebrated on the Lord's Day. The Council of Arles, A.D. 314, at which British bishops were present, similarly decreed that Easter should only be celebrated on the Lord's Day.

Irenæus declares that with respect to the Paschal Fast there was great divergence of practice: some churches fasting for one day, as the Ebionites, some for two, and some for the forty hours, day and night, that immediately preceded the dawn of Easter; and he speaks of it as an old standing discrepancy; οὐ νῦν ἐφ ἡμῶν γεγονυῖα, ἀλλὰ καὶ πολὺ πρότερον ἐπὶ τῶν πρὸ ἡμῶν. [Ep. ad Victor. Fragm. iii. Cambr. ed.] The Primitive Church, therefore, knew no fixed rule for the universal observance of the Paschal Fast.

With respect to the precise day on which the Lord's death should be commemorated there was a threefold difference of practice. [1.] The Catholic Church affirmed that our Lord suffered on the 14th of Nisan; but seeing that the new creation dates from Easter morning, the Lord's day next following was the πάσχα ἀναστάσιμον, and the Friday preceding was the πάσχα σταυρώσιμον. Thus the rule was fixed according to the day of the week on which our Lord suffered, and was declared to be the truer ordinance, τάξις ἀληθεστέρα. This was the practice of the Church of Rome, and of the generality of churches throughout Christendom, and was said to have been derived from the Apostles St. Peter and St. Paul [Eus. H. E. v. 23; Socr. H. E. v. 22]. [2.] The Asiatic rule was professedly based upon the authority of St. John the Evangelist and of St. Philip, and was adopted by the Churches of Proconsular Asia [Eus. H. E. v. 23], and those of neighbouring provinces; by Mesopotamia, Syria, Cilicia [Athanas. ad Afr. c. 2, de Synod. Arim. et Sel.]; and, as Chrysostom says, Antioch [In eos qui Orat. in Pascha jej., ed. Bened. i. 608]. It was the belief of all the Churches, that our Lord was put to death on the 14th of Nisan, the day on which the paschal lamb was slain. But many denied that the Last Supper was instituted at the Paschal Feast, or that our Lord celebrated the Passover at all in the last year of His ministry, the statements of the synoptical Gospels notwithstanding [see Chron. Pasch. i. 10-16]. The Asiatics commemorated the Lord's death on the 14th of Nisan, being guided by the day of the Jewish month, as the more general practice followed the day of the week on which Christ died. They were taunted for their Judaizing practice; though the Church of Rome in its ritual and liturgy had more perhaps in common with the Synagogue than the Churches of Asia. The Quartodecimans were but a small party in the Church. Still fewer in number were [3] the Ebionite or Judaizing Quartodecimans, who held by the observances of the Mosaic Law, and engrafted on them the Christian celebration, making the 14th of Nisan a day of hybrid ceremonial, in which type and antitype, shadow and substance, law and gospel were hopelessly confused. These three varying rules created a plentiful source of dissension; the Church was long unconscious of the coming evil, but while men slept the tares were sown. At first the bond of charity was known to be stronger than all, and difference of calendar made no alteration in the gospel law of love. Thus Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna, having had occasion to visit Rome [A.D. 160] to confer with Pope Anicetus on other matters, found that the Asiatic rule differed essentially from that of Rome. Both could claim Apostolical authority, and therefore each reverently forbore from pressing a rival claim; while Anicetus assigned to his guest as his senior the privilege of consecrating the holy elements. But immediately afterwards a change came over the spirit of Rome. For the heretical Quartodeciman rule had been introduced there by Blastus, "his omnibus [Marcioni sc. Tatiano, &c.] etiam Blastus accedens, qui latenter Judaismum vult introducere" [Pseudo-Tert. de Præscr. Hær. 53], and with it the whole sweep of Ebionite perversion. Victor, therefore, Bishop of Rome, knew the Quartodeciman practice only in conjunction with a pestilential error, and never again dissociated the two in his mind. With a keen perception of the truth of his own position, he was blind to all that might be advanced by others, and threatened with excommunication [A.D. 180] all those churches which commemorated their Lord's death on the day of the month, and not with him on the day of the week. It was the first germ of that system of aggression which reached its climax in the Hildebrandine theory and practice of the Papacy. Synods were immediately held by his order [Eus. H. E. v. 23] in Palestine, Pontus, Gaul, Alexandria, Corinth and Rome, and the more Catholic rule was everywhere pronounced to be binding. It was also determined that the Feast of the Resurrection was the true close of the Paschal Fast, and that the Lord's day and no other should be the day for its celebration. The Asiatics remained unconverted and unconvinced, and continued to observe the 14th of Nisan as a day of mixed character, fasting till the ninth hour, and then rejoicing for the achieved work of man's redemption. In opposition to a somewhat crushing array of names, not of individuals but of churches, Polycrates, Bishop of Ephesus, and a friend of Polycarp, put forth a writing in the name of the Asiatic bishops, claiming the authority of St. John and St. Philip, whose tombs were still at Ephesus and Hierapolis, and urging the precedent of Polycarp, Melito, and other venerable bishops, in favour of their own Apostolical tradition. Still Victor pronounced them "heterodox," and not only essayed to cut them off from communion, ἀποτέμνειν τῆς ἑνωσέως πειρᾶται, as Hefele limits the words of Eusebius, but authoritatively pronounced them excommunicate, στηλιτεύει διὰ γραμμάτων, ἀκοινωνήτους ἅρδην πάντας τοὺς ἐκεῖσε ἀνακηρύττων ἀδελφούς [Eus. H. E. v. 24]. The violent decree, however, was a mere "brutum fulmen," for none of the other Churches assented to it, and Irenæus, Bishop of Lyons, wrote a letter of expostulation to Victor on the subject of his intemperance; the result was that Rome stood alone in its extreme antagonism to the Churches of Ephesine communion.

Hitherto the Paschal controversy had turned upon two points; [1] the proper day for the memorial of our Lord's death, and [2] the day on which the Paschal Fast should be resolved in the joyful commemoration of Easter. A third difficulty, of an Ebionite complexion, arose [A.D. 170] at Laodicea, the capital of Phrygia Pacatiana in Asia Minor; it was stated that our Lord instituted the Holy Eucharist on the 14th, and was put to death on the 15th of Nisan, the Jewish method of computing the commencement of the day from sunset having been apparently ignored [Eus. H. E. iv. 26]. The Paschal Feast of these schismatics combined the Eucharistic with the Paschal rite, and was essentially of a Jewish east; for these Quartodecimans held that our Lord, by the significant rite of the Last Supper, had perpetuated the Jewish ordinance. The Church, of course, affirmed that the Passover, like any other typical observance, had only a temporary character, and that it was merged in the Christian commemoration of the sacrifice of the death of Christ upon the Cross. It was an entirely new phase of the Quartodeciman theory, and caused an evil report of Judaizing notions to be attached to the orthodox following of St. John and St. Philip and St. Polycarp. But the writers of the Asiatic Church at once denounced it as wholly inconsistent with Christian principle; and fragments still exist of writings that were put forth against it by Melito, Bishop of Sardis, and Apollinaris, Bishop of Hierapolis, both of whom followed the more orthodox Asiatic rule. "They err," says this latter writer, "who affirm that our Lord ate the Passover on the 14th Nisan with His disciples, and that He died on the great day of unleavened bread (i.e. 15th Nisan[1]). They maintain that Matthew records the event as they have imagined it; but their notion agrees not with the Law, and thereby the Gospels are made to wear a contradictory appearance" [Chronicon Paschale, i. 13; in Dindorf's Byzant. Hist. Script. xvi.]. This was the phase of Quartodeciman opinion which was introduced into Rome by Blastus, and was denounced at once by Irenæus [Eus. H. E. v. 20] in his treatise "de Schismate." His follower, Hippolytus, took an active part against it [Fragm. in Chron. Paschal. i. 12, 13; and Philosoph. vii. 18]; and Clement of Alexandria was induced by the treatise of Melito to refute the same error in his work on Easter, a few fragments of which are preserved in the Chronicon Paschale [ib. 14]. The Laodicean Quartodecimans closely followed the Jewish custom, whereby in a backward season as regards barley harvest, or whenever the solar cycle required it, an entire month was intercalated at the vernal equinox. Hence in some years there was with them a double Paschal celebration, and in others a total omission. These notions died out again before the end of the third century, but they caused an evil name to be attached to the orthodox Quartodeciman practice, and greatly embittered the differences that already existed between some of the Asiatic churches and the rest of the Christian world.[2]

Further, the more Catholic practice, like the Eastern, divaricated into two branches, and the Churches were unable to settle down upon one uniform rule. It was a question of astronomy; for the Jewish calendar ceased to be any reliable guide after the destruction of Jerusalem.[3] The equinox was then taken as the fixed date from whence Easter should be calculated. But astronomers differed as to the precise incidence of the equinox. At Rome it was March 18th, at Alexandria it was the 21st, according to the Macedonian calendar. The Asiatics, retaining their old custom, commemorated the death of our Lord on the full moon after March 21st. The rest of the world celebrated Easter on the first Sunday after the equinoctial full moon; but if the moon was at the full on Sunday, then on the succeeding Sunday, for the plain reason that the full moon in such a case coincided with the lunar age on the day of our Lord's death and not of the Resurrection. Hence those churches which followed the earlier equinox, occasionally found themselves rejoicing in Easter festivities, while the other churches were still practising the mortifications of Lent. And worse still; when the full moon fell on March 19th, Western churches celebrated their Easter accordingly; but the Alexandrian Church of necessity deferred their Easter till the next full moon, as being the first after the equinox of March 21st.

To obviate this difficulty various recurring cycles were devised, wherein the return of the full moon to the same solar position coincided after a certain number of years with the same day of the week and the same day of the year. But they were more or less inaccurate. The earliest was that of Hippolytus, Bishop of Portus. As a rare waif of time this was discovered incised on the right face of the pedestal of a marble statue of Hippolytus seated on his episcopal throne, which was dug up [A.D. 1551] between Rome and Tivoli, near the Church of St. Lawrence, and is now preserved in the Vatican. Eusebius [H. E. vi. 22] attributes to Hippolytus the discovery of the cycle of sixteen years; and here it was found displayed for one hundred and twelve years [A.D. 222-333]; Easter Sunday on each of

[1] The 15th Nisan was the first day of unleavened bread [Lev. xxiii. 5; Num. xxviii. 16]; but in order that it might be certain that no leaven remained in the house, diligent search was made, and all leaven put away before mid-day on the 14th. This is the meaning of יום הראשון, "the previous day" in Ex. xii. 15, i.e. previous to the day on which there was a total abstinence from leaven. On this day also the Paschal Lamb was slain, after the "Tamid" or perpetual sacrifice of the afternoon, when all leaven had been put away [Ex. xxxiv. 25]; and was eaten at the vesper commencement of the 15th. The Passover, though sacrificed before the Tamid, would still have been valid as an ordinance. Hence the 14th Nisan was introductory only to the true feast of the 15th, and therefore generally the day of preparation. In Matt. xxvi. 17, πρώτη τῶν ἀζύμων refers evidently to this day of preparation, and not to the first entire day of unleavened observance.

[2] Thus Athanasius in his epistle to Epiphanius, as quoted in the Chron. Paschale [i. p. 9, B.], accuses the entire Quartodeciman party of Judaizing, ἐξ ἡμῶν εἶναι δοκοῦντες καὶ Χριστιανοὶ αὐχοῦντες λέγεσθαι, ζηλοῦσι τὰ τῶν προδεδωκότων Ἰουδαίων.

[3] See Chron. Pasch. i. 9, 10.

these years being given on the left face of the pedestal. But the cycle of sixteen years only shewed the recurrence of the Paschal day with regard to the day of the year, and not of the week. The same ancient authority also shews that the Paschal Fast was continued till Easter Sunday; the 18th of March being assumed always as the vernal equinox. Dionysius, Bishop of Alexandria [A.D. 246-265], set forth an eight-year cycle, κανόνα ὀκταετηρίδος [Eus. H. E. vii. 20]. Twelve years after his death [A.D. 277], Anatolius, an Alexandrian by birth and education, but Bishop of Laodicea in Syria, drew out the famous nineteen-years' cycle, originally the observation of Meton, the astronomer. The ancient Jews could only have celebrated the Passover after the vernal equinox; therefore this, with him March 19th, was made the basis of computation. The cycle was adopted at Alexandria, the equinox, however, being advanced two days to March 21st; and whenever the full moon happened on a Saturday, the next day, contrary to the Roman custom, was declared to be Easter Sunday. The Asiatics still followed the Jewish computation as harmonizing with the Saviour's practice, and cared nothing for the equinox, which their Easter occasionally anticipated; and for this reason the term Protopaschitæ was applied to them.

The confusion caused by these differences must have been very great, and especially in conterminous Churches, where one custom ended and another began; but it was not till A.D. 314, that an attempt was made to produce uniformity by synodal action. In that year the Council of Arles in its first canon decreed that Easter should be solemnized "uno die et uno tempore per omnem orbem;" and the Bishop of Rome sent forth an encyclical letter to enforce the desired harmony of action [Mansi, Coll. Conc. ii. 471; Hard. i. 263]. But a provincial council could speak with no authority to the Church Catholic; neither was the Roman bishop as yet the Supreme Pontiff, and practice continued to be discordant. It then became one of the two principal subjects for discussion and arrangement in the Council of Nice. No decree on the subject appears in its canons, and it is difficult to see any reason for the omission, unless it be that the Fathers were unable to make up their minds upon a point that could only be settled by the astronomical expert. Thus they delegated to Eusebius of Cæsarea the duty of determining the right rule of Easter, and of recommending the most accurate cycle to be adopted in framing the calendar. The Epistle of Constantine to the Churches shews clearly the general points on which the Nicene Fathers were agreed, viz. 1. That from henceforth the vernal equinox, and not the Jewish calendar, should determine the incidence of Easter. 2. That when the equinoctial full moon fell on a Sunday, Easter should be celebrated on the Sunday following; both for the reason already given and because the Jewish festival would have been celebrated and over. Also by making Easter of necessity subsequent to the vernal equinox, there was no longer danger of a double observance in the same year. But which equinoctial day was adopted, the Roman or the Alexandrian? The Latin translation of the Prologus Paschalis of Cyril of Alexandria, says that the Alexandrian Church, as representing the astronomical science of the day, was ordered to announce to the Church of Rome the true incidence of Easter in each year, and that it should be notified from Rome throughout the Churches [Petavius, Doct. Temp. II. App.; Hefele, Conc. i. 313; Ideler, Handb. d. Chron. ii. 258]. Leo I. repeats the account [Ep. 121 al. 94]; and Ambrose virtually says the same thing: the Nicene Council having, according to his statement, adopted the cycle of nineteen years, which, as has been shewn, was the Alexandrian computation [Ambr. Ep. ad. Epis. cop. Æm.]. But independently of the equinox, the Paschal difficulties were not yet foreclosed. The Roman Church still clung to its faulty cycle of eighty-four years, the Alexandrian to that of nineteen, and it still continued to be a matter of reproach that the two principal Churches of Christendom were often found to celebrate Easter on different days. The Council of Sardica therefore, as seen by the lately discovered Festal Letters of Athanasius [Cureton, from the Nitrian Syr. MS. A.D. 343], endeavoured to compose the difference by drawing out a Paschal scheme for half a century. But it only defined the lunations, and [A.D. 387] matters shewed worse than ever when Rome celebrated Easter on the 21st of March, but the Alexandrian Church, since the 21st was its equinox, postponed the celebration till after the next full moon, or till late in April. The Quartodeciman party also still survived, the Nicene injunctions notwithstanding, as may be seen by the anathemas against the τεσσαρεσκαιδεκατῖται of the Councils of Antioch [A.D. 341], can. 1; Conc. Laodic. [A.D. 364] can. 7; Conc. Constantinopol. [A.D. 381] can. 7. It may be observed here that the Jews learned from the Christian Church to frame a Paschal cycle, which was first adopted in the presidency of Hillel II. at Tiberias, A.D. 358. The Paschal difference thus continued to cause more or less inconvenience and heart-burning for another century and a half, till Dionysius Exiguus did good service to chronology by first dating events from the Christian era, and by giving fixity to the cycle of nineteen years for determining Easter. This he did by adopting the Alexandrian method of calculation, and reforming the Roman calendar accordingly, in which the Churches of Italy readily acquiesced; while those of Gaul and Britain still held by their "old style." When the Heptarchy became Romanized, the Dionysian method was accepted in Britain, though in Wales and in the northern parts of the island, the old eighty-four year cycle of Rome was still retained. A council was held on the subject, A.D. 664, at Streaneshaleh (Whitby), King Oswy having found that his queen and her ladies were fasting in Lent while he indulged in the festivities of Easter. The Roman order was then fully confirmed in Britain. As Montalembert has justly observed, this difference had nothing to do with Quartodeciman practice, which in fact had died away in the sixth century [Moines de l'Occid. iv. 159]. In our present calendar the Prime or Golden Number marks the particular year of the nineteen-years' cycle; and these Golden Numbers added in the margin from March 21st to April 18th, indicate the days of the plenilunium on which Easter for each particular year depends, and which is the Sunday next following; unless Sunday should be the day of full moon, in which case Easter falls on the following Sunday. [Hefele, Concilien, i. Ideler, Handb. d. Chronol. Chronicon. Paschale in Dindorf's Byzant. Hist. Scr. xvi. xvii. Gieseler, H. E. i. PASSION OF CHRIST. The true and real suffering, even to death, of the Body and Soul of our Lord Jesus Christ, God and Man.

It has been truly said that the suffering life of the Saviour began with His conception in the womb of the Blessed Virgin, for such an act of unbounded humiliation must needs be reckoned one of suffering. So also in the first shedding of His blood at circumcision; in His subjection to His parents for many long years; in the poverty of His birth, and the lowness of His station in life; in all that whereby He humbled Himself to become like the lowest of ourselves, we must account that He suffered for our sakes. And when His ministry was about to begin, He added yet to these a more bitter trial, the forty days' fast and the strong temptation. From that time at least He became a "Man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief." But the term "Passion" belongs more properly to that which He underwent during the fifteen or more hours that elapsed between the night of the Last Supper and three o'clock on the following afternoon; beginning with His agony in the garden of Gethsemane, and ending with His death upon the Cross.

The idea of a good man suffering was familiar enough to the Jews, who had the example of Job before them. It was so far familiar to the heathen that the wisest among them had predicted for a perfectly good man a fate almost exactly similar to that which actually befell our Lord.[1] But the suffering of One Who was not only the best among men, but God as well as man, involved ideas to which the world was not soon or easily reconciled. In the first ages, when the idea was not familiarized, men could not be brought to entertain it. A crucified God and Saviour was to many a contradiction of terms, "to the Jews a stumbling-block," even as when they cried, "If Thou be the Christ, save Thyself and come down from the Cross;" "to the Greeks foolishness"—beyond the compass of their ordinary philosophy. For a little time, even the chosen disciples looked doubtingly upon the death of their Master. They "trusted that it had been He Which should have redeemed Israel," and behold, their expected Redeemer had died the death of one accursed by the law. But when we thus call to mind the unbelief of the Jews and Gentiles, and how "slow of heart," even the chosen ones of Christ were "to believe" in His sufferings; let us also remember that our belief in them is formed upon the tradition of eighteen centuries, upon the coincidence of prophecy and narrative, upon the knowledge of what a crucified Saviour can do for us; and that, therefore, the incredulity of the first ages was far less unreasonable than any such incredulity would be in our own day.

Some of the early heretics endeavoured to set aside the idea of a suffering God-Man by absurd theories which were generally resolvable into the unhistorical fancy of a phantom figure upon the Cross instead of an actual person [DOCETÆ], anticipating the grotesque perverseness of unbelief which characterizes some modern Rationalists. But a true appreciation of the one great fact of the Incarnation will give a key to the doctrine of our Lord's Passion, and shew that it was the orderly sequel of the great mystery by which it had been preceded. It was no such marvel that when He had taken human nature in its entirety, with its capacities for ordinary human life, He should experience those capacities to the extent of suffering; the true marvel is in the original condescension of becoming man, and so opening out the way to that experience: that He, being God, should inseparably unite His impassible Godhead with a nature of which suffering and death were the foreordained and customary lot.

But the suffering death of Christ was not the ordinary sequel of human life, nor merely such a sequel accompanied by great sorrow and pain, nor merely the heroic resignation of an unparalleled martyrdom. It might have been all these, it might have lived in the loving memory of Christians, and have been worthy to be set forth throughout subsequent ages as a marvellous example, and yet if it had not been something more it would not have been enough to fulfil the object for which it was undergone. But it was a great deal more, for it was the Passion of that Person in Whom the Divine Nature was united with the Human Nature: and although the Divine Nature itself did not and could not suffer, but only the human, yet in this, as in all other circumstances of our Lord's Life and Work, the union of the higher with the lower nature gave to the latter a power and force which it would not by itself have possessed, infinitely extending the virtue of its acts through all ages and over all human beings. Hence the Passion of Christ, God and Man, the sufferings of His Body and the sufferings of His Soul, gave to His Blood that redeeming power which is so often predicated of it in Holy Scripture, a power of atonement as a sacrifice, of purification, and of spiritual nutriment by its sacramental administration. His sufferings had a vicarious operation, so that "the Just suffered for the unjust" [1 Pet. iii. 18]; and they also flowed out like a stream of life through the ages that were to come, and became an ever enduring power, to be pleaded in Litanies and Liturgies, and used in Sacraments.

[1] "He shall be scourged, he shall be tormented, he shall be bound, he shall have his eyes burnt out, and after suffering every evil, he shall be crucified at a stake." [Plato, Repub. ii. p. 361, E.]

In dwelling upon the Passion of Christ, therefore, it will give but an imperfect view of its power, and of what it effected, if the human aspect of His sufferings is alone, or in undue proportion, set forth. So also in estimating the force of Scriptural and Patristic language respecting it, the Person of Whom such language is used must be fully kept in mind, or it may seem exaggerated in tone and overclouded as to fact. But if it is duly kept in mind that it was the Sufferer's Divine Personality which made His sufferings different from mere human sufferings, such as those of dying heroes or of martyrs, then the intensity of their character, their value as a sacrifice, their everlasting power as the treasure of the Church, will be more clearly appreciated, and the true reason why such exalted language is used respecting them will be better understood.

PASSIVE OBEDIENCE. [NONJURORS.]

PASSOVER. So called from the action of the destroying angel in passing over the threshold of the Israelites, red with the blood of the Paschal Lamb, when all the first-born of Egypt were smitten [Exod. xii. 13]. The Hebrew term is Pesach, from "pasach," to pass over, with an idea of condonation also involved in it [Isa. xxxi. 5]; the Aramaic form of which, "Pischa," gives πασχὰ in the Greek and Latin. It was the first of the three solemn feasts at which every male was bound to present himself before the Lord, all of which exhibit in one form or other thanksgiving for the fruits of the earth. Thus at the Passover the first ripened grain was offered in a wave-sheaf of barley; at Pentecost thanksgiving was made for the wheat harvest; and at the Feast of Tabernacles the ingathering of the vintage and of the oil olive was celebrated [Exod. xxiii. 15, 16, xxiv. 22]. The maintenance of the people doubtless was the reason why the exodus took place at the beginning of the harvest; and the greatness of the event caused the more ancient subject of the thanksgiving to recede into the background, though not wholly to vanish, and the Passover was chiefly known as the celebration of Jewish deliverance from the house of bondage. The Paschal week, the first and last days of which were sabbatical, began on the fourteenth day of the first month, Abib [Exod. xxiii. 15], afterwards termed Nisan [Esth. iii. 7], the Macedonian Xanthicus "ripener;" and therefore when the moon was at the full. The Paschal solemnity is mentioned less frequently than might be expected in the Old Testament. After the first celebration in the exodus from Egypt, the institution is reaffirmed in the first month of the second year [Numb. ix. 1]. At Gilgal the manna ceased on the second day of the Paschal feast [Josh. v. 10], corresponding with the day of our Lord's Resurrection; angels' food was superseded by the bread of life; and direct revelation from Heaven was foreclosed when the promised Comforter was about to be sent. In the reign of Hezekiah, the festival was restored after a period of neglect [2 Chron. xxx.]. After the Captivity it was duly kept under Zorobabel [Ezra vi. 20], according to the warning of prophecy [Ezek. xlv. 21]. Elsewhere it is not mentioned. The season, however, is indicated in Ruth, who returned to Bethlehem in the first days of barley harvest [Ruth i. 22]; and in the sanguinary vengeance of the Gibeonites upon the sons of Saul, which David permitted to be executed at the same holy season [2 Sam. xxi. 9].

The Karaite sect doubtless preserved the ancient method of determining the Paschal moon. If between the "birth" of the new moon and the fourteenth, the growing barley rubbed out freely and showed fitness for the harvest, it was a customary year; but if it was unripe and milky, a month was intercalated. As this, in ordinary seasons, depended on the lunar period, a cycle was formed after the Captivity for the determination of the Paschal moon with something like regularity; and taunts were plentiful among the Karaites when in a particular year the Passover was kept by the Talmudical Jews according to these tables, but with the old moon still visible in the heavens. [Makrisi, in De Sacy, Chrestom. Arab.] In older times the new moon was determined by observation, and a reward was given to the first person who announced the "birth" of the moon to a conclave which sat for the purpose of receiving intelligence in a chamber of the Temple. The Talmud records an instance when, in consequence of the uncertainty of the lunar phase, the Passover was observed on two consecutive days. [Gemara in Rosh. Hashanah.]

The time of the Paschal Sacrifice was originally in the evening twilight, "bein 'ar 'vayin" [Exod. xii. 6], "between the two occultations" of the sun beneath the horizon, and of the twilight in the darkness of night; but afterwards the time was changed to the afternoon of the 14th, immediately after the evening daily sacrifice [Jos. de. Bell. Jud. vi. 9, 3; Mishna, Pesach, v. 3], i.e. between three and five o'clock. The locality was the fore-court of the Temple, where each householder, assisted by the Levites [2 Chron. xxxv. 11; Ezra vi. 20], slew his lamb. The Babylonian Talmud [Joma, fol. 12, A] says that strangers coming up to Jerusalem had the loan of an apartment rent free, and they left for the host the lamb's skin and the earthenware that was used by way of acknowledgment. The Jerusalem Talmud in the treatise Pesach gives very interesting particulars with respect to the observance of the Passover. On the 15th of Adar preparation was made for the influx of strangers by repairing ways and bridges, cleansing water-courses and "garnishing" the tombs. A few days before the feast all household utensils of silver, tin, and brass, were brightened up, and plunged in scalding water, heated in a cauldron only used for this purpose; iron articles were made red-hot, and then quenched in it. Earthenware vessels must be new, and purified by triple immersion in the running stream [Vaihinger in Herzog, Pascha]. Paschal lambs were offered for sale in the outer court of the Temple. On the 13th of Nisan water was drawn from the living stream by the master of each house, and brought home in a covered vessel [Mark xiv. 13; Luke xxii. 10], for the purpose of preparing the unleavened bread on the morning of the 14th from the meal of wheat, barley, oat, rye, or spelt, a cake of which was offered in the Temple. On the 14th of Nisan personal purification, descending to the most trifling particulars, was enjoined, and search was made through every house for leaven; which gives a curious instance of the Talmudic application of Scripture: for it is written, "No leaven shall be found in your houses" [Exod. xii. 19]; but "to find" is the correlative of "to search," therefore search must be made diligently. Moreover, it is written, "I will search Jerusalem with candles" [Zeph. i. 12], therefore the search for leaven must be made with candles. Any leaven that was found was burnt in a fire kindled after mid-day in the open air. St. Paul [1 Cor. v. 7] makes evident allusion to this putting away of leaven. If the 14th fell on the Sabbath, all these preparations were made on the 13th, and sufficient leavened bread was reserved for use on the day of unleavened bread [14th Nisan, Luke xxii. 7], on which day it was still allowed until the unleavened bread was baked. It would seem, therefore, that the Eastern rule was more strictly in accordance with our Lord's Institution of the Eucharist, than that of the Latin Church, and that the Bread of Blessing was leavened. [FILIOQUE.] In the afternoon the feast was ushered in with the blowing of trumpets. The lambs were taken to the Temple, and at the time of the evening sacrifice the multitude was divided into three bands; when the first detachment had filled the outer court the gates were closed. The priests standing in double line received the blood of each lamb as it was slain in a gold or silver bowl, which was then passed from hand to hand, and the blood was poured upon the base of the altar before it coagulated. The full bowls passed along one line, and were returned empty by the other. But the gold and silver vessels each had their respective line of priests. The vessels also had no footstands, that they might not be set down, and so cause the blood to coagulate [Pesach, v. 5]. The Levites hung the lamb upon the hooks with which the wall and pillars were studded. They then stripped off the skin, disembowelled it, and the fat and kidneys having been placed on a dish were conveyed to the priest, who sprinkled salt upon the contents, and consumed them with incense in the altar fire [ibid. 9, and Tosaphtah, iii. 7]; the altar having an area of twenty-eight cubits. The lamb was then wrapped up in the fleece and carried home. During all this process the Hallel Psalms were chanted by Levites from a raised platform [HALLEL]; the same process was repeated with the second and the third detachments; only the numbers of the third, who as later comers were called "the band of laggards" [Tosaphtah], were considerably diminished, and Rabbi Jehudah says that their Hallel never reached the text, "I am well pleased that the Lord hath heard the voice of my prayer" [Psa. cxvi. 1]. The tradition, therefore, of the Tosaphtah [iv. 8, Supplement to the Mishna] is entirely apocryphal, which says that in the time of Agrippa the crowd of householders was so great that a kidney having been set apart from each sacrifice, in obedience to his order, there were found to be six hundred thousand pairs of kidneys; or there were then twice as many householders as there were males of full age at the numbering in the desert [Numb. xxvi. 2, 51]. Each Israelite slaughtered his own lamb; "Maetat Israelita," says the Mishna [Pesach, v. 6], and Philo bears out the assertion [v. Mos. iii. and de Decalog.]. As in the Roman Church a want of intention on the part of the celebrant vitiates the Sacrament, so in the Paschal Sacrifice, if the lamb was not slain "ratione Paschatis," the act was void so far as a due celebration was concerned [Gemara, Hieros. Const. ii. in Pesach. v. 2]; though the act of dipping the bitter herbs in the "pulmentum" made the intention good [Gemara in Pesach, x. 3]. The last band having retired, the outlet of the water-courses was stopped, and the whole area flushed with water, it being the glory of the priests on this occasion to wade in blood up to the knees [Mishna, Pesach, v. 8; Tosaphtah, iv. 7]; the court thus became once more "as clean as milk," and ready for the thank-offerings of the midnight service.

These things having been done in the Temple the lamb at home was trussed upon a cruciform broach of pomegranate wood, as best resisting fire, one length being thrust through longitudinally, the other crosswise through the brisket [Pesach, vii. 1, 2], and, without touching the sides, cooked in an oven. When the table was lighted and all prepared, a cup was filled with red wine, and after prayer and blessing by the master of the house, it was handed round to those present. Then each of the guests dipped the bitter herb, whether lettuce, endive, or chicory, into a mess of figs, dates, almonds, and various fruits with wine; while it was being eaten the householder, in accordance with Exod. xii. 26, declared to the younger celebrants the meaning of the feast, and the cup was a second time filled and passed round. The lamb was then apportioned, and a third time the "cup of blessing" כסא דברכה [1 Cor. x. 26], was received. The Hallel Psalms were commenced between the second and third cups, and continued up to Psa. cxiv. 8, as the school of Hillel directed, but including ver. 9, according to the followers of Shammai. [HILLEL.] Maimonides sides with the former. After the cup had been filled a second time, unleavened bread and an acetous confection were placed on the table; the master of the house then broke the bread, blessed it, and having dipped portions into the dish gave them to his guests. The remainder of the Hallel canticles was finished before the fourth and last cup of wine was completed; it being a matter of religious necessity that four cups should be passed round; the expense of which was defrayed to the poor from the Temple treasury [Pesach, x. 1]. If the Hallel had not been completed when the last cup was finished the remainder was repeated in private, and not of necessity in the banquet-room. After the last cup of the Paschal Feast it was unlawful to use any more wine on that day. Between the first and third cup wine might be used, but not between the third and fourth [Pesach, x. 8]. The essential elements of a true observance were the bitter herbs, unleavened bread, and the Paschal Lamb [Gemara, viii. a. in Pesach.; cf. Tosaphtah, ii. 5], a portion of which no larger than an olive satisfied the "religio" of the feast. It was the duty of the paterfamilias to lead the younger members in such parts of the Hallel as were of an antiphonal character, which were "Blessed is he that cometh," Ans. "In the name of the Lord" [Psa. cxviii. 26]. and "We have blessed you," Ans. "out of the house of the Lord" [ibid.]. The former of these suffrages will be remembered as being used by the people as a popular refrain in our Lord's final entry into Jerusalem. It has been shewn, however, that the whole of the 118th Psalm had an antiphonal character [HOSANNA]. Persons absent on a journey, or incapacitated by legal impurity, were allowed to keep the Passover on the 14th of the second month Jyar, when leaven was tolerated in the house, and the Hallel hymn might be omitted [Pesach, ix. 3]. At midnight the Temple was again thrown open, and the people, who on that night never thought of sleep, carried their thank-offerings to the Temple, none coming empty-handed. These were dressed in the women's court, and the families of the people feasted upon them in the chambers of the Temple, or took their portion home. But it was forbidden to take any part of it without the walls of the city. At the vesper commencement of 16th Nisan the sheaf of first-fruits was severed with all due religious ceremony. A part of it was rubbed out, parched, ground, and bolted thirteen times; a homer of the meal was then delivered to the priest to offer for the people, with the remainder of the sheaf of first-fruits as a wave-offering.

The Talmudical account supplies many points of comparison with the close of our Lord's ministry that are of interest; some of which may be found under HALLEL and HOSANNA. It is certain that the Mishna, though compiled by Jehuda A.D. 219 [TARGUM], describes with sufficient exactness the Temple Service in our Lord's time. Hence it is an extremely valuable aid for the right understanding of evangelical archæology. In the usual course, the daily sacrifice was slain at half-past two in the afternoon of our time, and offered at half-past three. On the vigil of the Sabbath, it was slain and offered an hour earlier; and an hour earlier still, if the vigil of the Passover fell upon a Friday. Hence the darkness that covered the earth when our Lord hung upon the cross, from the sixth to the ninth hour [Matt. xxvii. 45], must have interrupted the daily sacrifice; "Christ our Passover" having been offered, the more shadowy sacrifice was no longer required. The wave sheaf also of the morning of the Resurrection [Jos. Ant. iii. 10, 5; Lev. xxiii. 10, 11] must have been offered in face of the rent veil of the Holy of Holies. The fact that first the bitter herbs were dipped in the dish by the guests, and afterwards that the master of the feast gave a sop of the unleavened bread to each person present, harmonizes the accounts of St. Matthew, who refers to the bitter herbs [xxvi. 23], "He that dippeth his hand in the dish with Me, the same shall betray Me," and of St. John, who speaks of the intinction of the bread [xiii. 26], "He it is to whom I shall give a sop, when I have dipped it." The custom of all at table dipping into the same dish was so completely national that in Rabbinical Hebrew "Tabal," to dip, is a synonym of "Acal," to eat [Buxtorf, Lex. Rabb.]. The second instance was a peculiar Paschal rite. That two similar warnings should have been given to Judas at the Last Supper is only in keeping with the many indications of his guilt that our Lord had already in his mercy vouchsafed, but they were of increasing intensity. "He who dippeth his hand with Me in the dish" might be said of all who were present; the personal delivery of the sop was beyond the possibility of mistake.

The Passover determined the proper time for the other moveable feasts; the second day of the feast of unleavened bread being the starting-point; whence the first week was ἕβδομας δευτεροπρώτη, and the Sabbath of that week σάββατον δευτερόπρωτον, as being defined by the second day of the Paschal Week. PASTOR. Literally, "a shepherd," and hence a title applied to the priests, and more especially to the bishops of the Church or "flock" of Christ [Acts xx. 28; 1 Peter v. 2]. In its highest sense it is applicable to our Lord alone. As He is the Priest for ever, the "High Priest of our profession" [Heb. iii. 1], so is He the "Good Shepherd" [ὁ ποιμὴν ὁ καλός, St. John x. 11], and the "Shepherd and Bishop of souls" [1 Peter ii. 25]. And as His earthly representatives minister by His commission and authority, so they are called by His names of priest and pastor.

The pastoral office of our Lord was predicted by Isaiah xl. 11: "He shall feed His flock like a shepherd: He shall gather the lambs with His arm, and carry them in His bosom, and shall gently lead those that are with young." Similar allusions are to be found in other parts of the Old Testament, but the word pastor, as applied to men in a sacred sense, does not occur until we come to the writers after the Captivity. Ezekiel, for example, is bidden to "prophesy against the shepherds of Israel, that feed themselves and not the flock" [xxxiv. 2]. Zechariah is told to "take the instruments of a foolish shepherd," for there is to be raised up "a shepherd which shall not visit those that be cut off, neither shall seek the young one," &c. [xi. 15, 16].

In the New Testament, though ever lovingly recorded as a precious title of our Blessed Lord, it is only once distinctly used as relating to an ecclesiastical or spiritual order of men, viz. in

Eph. iv. 11: "And He gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers" (ποιμένας καὶ διδασκάλους). The ποιμένες here spoken of were clearly the assistants of the apostles in pastoral, as the evangelists were in missionary, work. Hence ποιμαίνω is frequently used of tending the flock of Christ. Our Lord Himself had given the command to the prince of the apostles ποίμαινε τα πρόβατά μου [John xxi. 16], and that apostle, in his first epistle, exhorts, as their co-presbyter (συμπρεσβύτερος), the presbyters of Asia-Minor (ποιμάνατε τὸ ἐν ὑμῖν ποίμνιον τοῦ Θεοῦ, κ. τ. λ.) [v. 2-4], so that when the Chief Shepherd ('Αρχιποίμενος) should appear they might receive the crown of glory. In this passage, too, we see the different κλήροι of the Church as intrusted to individual ποιμένες. Their distinctive work was the training of those who were made disciples by others.

The word pastor is rarely used in the Prayer Book, but is in the first Ember Collect (probably composed by Bishop Cosin), in the opening prayer at the consecration of bishops, and in the collects for the feasts of St. Matthias and St. Peter. The clause of the Litany which mentions "bishops, priests, and deacons," was for a time altered to "bishops, pastors, and ministers of the Church," but it was restored to its present form in 1661.

The one requisite for a faithful pastor, as St. Chrysostom observes, is love—love to the one Pattern and Exemplar, the Good Shepherd. And this love, as our Lord's charge to St. Peter shews, is to be proved and tested by "feeding the flock," even "the sheep of Christ which He bought with His Death, and for whom He shed His Blood."

PATRIARCH. A title derived from Acts vii. 8, implying a father of churches, and first used in the East. There were originally three great patriarchates, Rome for Europe, Alexandria for Africa, and Antioch for Asia, besides Jerusalem, next to them in position but far inferior in power, and Constantinople. The privileges of the first three, as of ancient custom, were settled in the Council of Nicæa [can. vi.]; the Council of Chalcedon constituted Jerusalem [A.D. 451, act vii.]; Rome and Constantinople were made patriarchal as the seats of the Emperors. [Ibid. Conc. Const. 381, c. iii.] Rome, Antioch, Alexandria, and Jerusalem were called Apostolical Churches; the Emperors raised Constantinople to be the second patriarchate, equal in dignity to Rome; Cæsarea, before the Council of Chalcedon, took precedence of Jerusalem; Alexandria ranked before Antioch, and to Rome was given primacy, simply to conform the ecclesiastical to the civil and political arrangement, the primate or patriarch being established in every province where there was an imperial exarch. The Emperor Justinian elevated Carthage and Justiniana Prima into patriarchates, as Henry I. subjected the archiepiscopal see of St. David's to that of Canterbury, after St. Anselm, at the Council of Bari, had been distinguished by Urban II. as "Pope of the other orb." The ancient British Church, until St. Augustine accepted the pall from Rome, was independent of the Roman patriarch, and subject only to the Bishop of Caerleon. William of Malmesbury, however, distinctly says that the Archbishop of Canterbury is regarded as Primate and Patriarch of England, and the Council of Winchester affirmed him to be Primate of all Britain, which is a synonym of patriarch. The canonists class primates as patriarchs inferior in distinction to the five greater patriarchs, including Canterbury, Toledo, Venice, Aquileia, Lyons, Vienne. A protarch, a primate, or patriarch, in the language of the ancient Church, signified one and the same thing; where pre-eminence was more of order and care than of single jurisdiction and power. [Apost. Const. c. xxxiii.] Their authority consisted in ordaining metropolitans, confirming them or imposing of hands; in giving the pall; in convening patriarchal synods, and presiding in them; in pronouncing sentence according to the plurality of votes, when metropolitical synods were insufficient to decide some important difference; and in some honorary privileges, such as the acclamation of the bishops to them at the end of a general council.

Patriarchal jurisdiction being of human institution, must proceed either from some canon or decree of a general council, or of such a provincial council as possessed power to compel obedience, or from the grant or concession of a sovereign prince, or the voluntary submission of a free people, or, lastly, from custom and prescription, or the grandeur of a particular city—Bourges, Magdeburg, and Gran, and some add Pisa. Venice was created in place of Gran, when that city was laid desolate by Nicolas V.; the patriarchate of the Indies by Paul III., from whence Lisbon claims to be patriarchal. In fact, in the case of this class, the distinction between primate and patriarch is purely verbal, being the title of an archbishop with an accession of dignity and powers of jurisdiction. Aquileia became patriarchal in the sixth century, and the bishops of Lyons, Bourges, and Toledo were raised to the same rank when their sees were capitals of kingdoms. In 1354 Pope Innocent declared the Archbishop of Canterbury to be Primate of all England and Metropolitan, and the Archbishop of York Primate of England. They have the common right of convening their suffragans and proctors of chapters and dioceses in convocation, presiding, proroguing, and dissolving it at the direction of the Crown, of visitation of their provinces, of appointing coadjutors to infirm or disabled suffragans, and committing the ecclesiastical jurisdiction to persons named in the commission during the vacancy of a see, of receiving appeals from the courts of suffragans and archdeacons, and of administering probates of wills. But the Archbishop of Canterbury has the power of dispensations where they are not contrary to God's Word, and of admitting persons to be ordained before the canonical age throughout England; he is the sacerdotal head of the English Church, the first peer of England, is a Lord of the Privy Council, and crowns the sovereign, who is regarded as his parishioner. Until A.D. 1152 Ireland belonged to his province, as York was metropolitan of Scotland until A.D. 1466. The Archbishop of Armagh is Primate of all Ireland, and the Archbishop of Dublin Primate of Ireland. The English bishops replied to the Pope, when he sent over Guy, Archbishop of Vienne, as his legate, that England had never acknowledged any apostolical power in any man but only the Bishop of Canterbury [ap. Twysden, Hist Anglic. Script. x. col. 1663], and the English law recognised no legate à latere except the Archbishop. [Selelstrate. Le Quien. Dr. Neale's Essays. Bingham's Origines, b. ii. c. xvii. sec. 12, 19. PATRIPASSIANISM. This was a development of the heresy of MONARCHIANISM, made necessary by the manifest fact that the Person who suffered upon the Cross manifested attributes of the Divine Nature. The Monarchians had avoided dealing with the subject of Christ's work until the necessity was forced upon them, and then Praxeas invented the theory that it was the Divine Person called "the Father" by Trinitarians who had thus suffered. Praxeas was originally a Montanist, of Phrygia; but after forsaking the Montanists he lived at Rome, where he eventually became a disciple of the second Theodotus. His heresy was an attempt to reconcile the Unitarianism of the Monarchians with the decision of the Church against Artemon and others respecting the Divinity of Christ, and was refuted by the well-known treatise of Tertullian [Tertull. Adv. Praxeam], in which he shews that the Trinity of Persons is consistent with the MONARCHIA of God. Praxeas was followed by Noëtus, whom Hippolytus calls a native of Smyrna, and who is said also by other writers to have taught philosophy at Ephesus. The heretical opinions of Noëtus are very clearly stated by Hippolytus. "He makes his statement thus. When indeed, then, the Father had not been born, He (yet) was justly styled Father; and when it pleased Him to undergo generation, having been begotten, He Himself became His own Son, not another's. For in this manner he thinks to establish the monarchia, alleging that Father and Son so-called are one and the same, not one individual produced from a different one, but Himself from Himself; and that He is styled by name Father and Son, according to vicissitude of times. But that He is one who has appeared amongst us, both having submitted to generation from a virgin, and as a man having held converse among men. And on account of the birth that had taken place, He confessed Himself to those beholding Him a Son, no doubt; yet He made no secret to those who could comprehend Him of His being a Father. That this Person suffered by being fastened to the accursed tree, and that He commended His Spirit unto Himself, having died (to all appearance) and not being (in reality) dead. And He raised Himself up the third day, after having been interred in a sepulchre, and wounded with a spear, and perforated with nails" [Hippol. Contr. Hæres. ix. 5]. These opinions of Praxeas had not any continued independent existence, nor did either of them form a sect outside of the Church, being too much tolerated, perhaps, by Popes Zephyrinus and Callixtus, whom Hippolytus alleges to have been seduced by them. They soon developed into the more subtle heresy of Sabellius, with which they were, for a few years, contemporary. [SABELLIANISM.]

PAULIANISTS. The Paulianists were the followers of Paul of Samosata [COUNCILS, p. 160; HERESY, p. 309], and were confounded by Balsamon with the PAULICIANS. They appear to have rejected the Catholic formula for Baptism, and to have baptized with some Unitarian form of words, for the Council of Nice in its nineteenth Canon directs that they should be baptized as heathen, when desirous of admission into the Church. This at least is the suggestion of Augustine: "Istos sane Paulianos baptizandos esse in Ecclesia Catholica Nicæno Concilio constitutum est. Unde credendum est eos regulam baptismatis non tenere, quam secum multi hæretici cum de Catholica discederent abstulerunt, eamque custodiunt" [Hæres. 44]. So also Innocent I.: "Paulianistæ in nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti minime baptizabant" [Ep. xxii. ad Episc. Maced. 5]. Their party was broken up by the edict against heretics put forth by Constantine [A.D. 330], when many of them were baptized after due probation, some sincerely penitent, others as dissemblers; these latter, after a time, formed a fresh nucleus for Paulianism, but the party became extinct in the fifth century.

PAULICIANISM. A heresy which had its origin among the Manichees of Armenia in the seventh century, and was, in effect, a kind of Reformation of MANICHEEISM. In a history of the latter heresy that was written by Petrus Siculus about A.D. 870, it is stated that the sect of the Paulicians was founded by an Armenian named Constantine, who dwelt, about A.D. 660, in a village not far from Samosata named Mananalis. Through the visit of an orthodox deacon, who was for a time his guest, Constantine became acquainted with the writings of St. Paul, and with the true Evangelical history. These opened his eyes to some of the abominations of Manicheeism, and he conceived the idea of reforming it on Pauline principles, from which, probably, the sect took its name. According to Photius, Constantine took the name of Silvanus, and those who assumed his position after his death called themselves by the names of Titus, Timothy, and others of St. Paul's companions. Their towns and sacred places also received the scriptural names of Macedonia and Achaia, Corinth, Colosse, and Ephesus.

The characteristic principles of the Paulicians were [1] dualism, and [2] the negation of Sacraments. They were as free from ritual and as impulsive as modern dissenters; they were spiritual, and all others were carnal; themselves were Christian, all else Jews and heathens. The soul, they said, was from the good principle, the Supreme arbiter of its future condition; the body was the creation of the evil principle, who, like the Valentinian Demiurge, was the tyrannical ruler of this nether world. Hence they held that the Fall was a first step in the right direction, as being an act of rebellion against the principle of evil. Their Christology was wholly Docetic. Christ was their "all in all," and with Him the soul alone can have communion either here or hereafter. His human nature was created in heaven, and had only an ideal existence; it was His mission to redeem mankind from the dominion of evil. They had nothing in common with Manichæan fatalism, but allowed that salvation was free for all to accept or reject, and that the very worst men are capable of redemption; yet no man can save himself, Christ alone being able to save. Their scriptures were limited to those of the New Testament, the Old Testament being ascribed to the evil principle, who thereby sought to enthral the souls of men. But the Epistles of St. Peter, the Apostle of circumcision, the denier of Christ, and the antagonist of St. Paul, were wholly rejected; the Apocalypse also was ignored by them. Especial veneration was paid to the Gospel of St. Luke as the work of St. Paul's companion; and to the "corpus epistolarum" they added a fifteenth to the Laodiceans. The Sacraments, so far as any outward and visible sign or form is concerned, were rejected. It was enough that Christ was the living water, no other sacramental element was required. The Word was the Bread of Life, the soul's only nourishment. To be born into the world, ὡς διὰ σωλῆνος, was all that Christ owed to His Mother, whose worship was denounced as idolatrous; the heavenly Jerusalem being the true Theotokos and not the Blessed Virgin Mary. To pay reverence to the Cross was a gross heathen superstition. Christ Himself, with outstretched arms, was the only true life-giving Cross of Salvation, like Horus in the Valentinian system, who was also "Stauros" [Iren. c. Hær. i. p. 18, 32, 62, Cambr. ed.].

The history of the sect was chequered with every variety of fortune. Constantine the founder was stoned to death by order of the Emperor Justinian II., A.D. 687. Simeon the envoy, who was charged to carry the sentence into execution, afterwards joined the Paulicians, and was burned as a Manichæan, A.D. 690. Persecution, as is usual, only caused the heresy to spread far and wide in the seventh and eighth centuries. In 740, the Emperor Leo the Isaurian brought the chief of the sect, Genesius, to Constantinople for examination by the metropolitan, but the patriarch was defeated by the subtlety of the heretic. The judge questioned from his own point of view, the accused answered from one widely different. If Genesius anathematized all who apostatized from the true faith, he held his own opinion to be the only true and saving belief. If challenged on the score of not worshipping the Cross, "Cursed be he," he said, "who refuses worship to the Holy Cross;" but Christ was the Cross that he meant. If asked why he refused to adore the Mother of God; "Anathema be he, it was answered, who refuses worship to Her on whose breast the Saviour lay;" but the heavenly Jerusalem was the Mother that he meant. Similarly with respect to the Sacraments, he anathematized all who received not the Body and Blood of Christ, but the Word was to him as the flesh of Christ and the stream of life. He maintained his belief also in the Communion of Saints, and the one holy Catholic Church, with the mental reservation of that title to members of his own communion only. The farce ended by his acquittal upon every point, and he obtained a safe convoy in the Emperor's suite back to Mananalis. The patriarch was evidently more tolerant in spirit than keen of sight. A.D. 844, the fanatical Theodora, relict of the Emperor Theophilus, put 100,000 of this sect to death in Western Armenia. The leader of the expedition went over to the side of the persecuted, and fled with several thousand Paulicians to the hill country of the Argæus, where he took up a strong position, and acquired for the sect a political and military importance; training the people to the use of arms and building fortresses that became a standing menace to the Byzantine territory. The Saracens had now become fully developed in their strength, and made common cause with them against their old oppressors the Greeks.

Our knowledge of the Paulicians is chiefly derived from the work previously mentioned, written by Peter a monk of Sicily, who was sent by the Emperor Basil the Macedonian to negotiate an exchange of prisoners after a successful foray that had been made upon Ephesus and the neighbourhood [A.D. 867]; when the cathedral was converted into a stable for their horses and mules by the Paulicians and their Moslem allies. A nine months' sojourn gave him an insight into the history and tenets of the people. We see from this account that the connection of Paulicians with Europe may be traced back to the strong colony which the Emperor Constantine Copronymus deported from Armenia to the Thracian and Byzantine district in the middle of the eighth century; knowing that he could not have a better breastwork against the incursion of barbarians from the North and from the West than this hardy race of mountaineers, inured to war and the rougher phases of life. They thus obtained a locus standi, which has enabled them to influence the religious destinies of Europe. Already men had begun to draw a contrast in their minds between patriarchal luxury and apostolical poverty. By a natural process of Eclecticism the Paulician simplicity of worship was separated from dualistic heresy, and a desire soon grew up to engraft it on the orthodox faith of the Church. First the sect overran the whole of Macedonia and of the Epirus, and penetrated into the Byzantine provinces of Italy and Sicily. They journeyed unsuspected as pilgrims returning from the Holy Land up the course of the Danube; and entered Italy with the Levant trade through Venice. Hence the leaven spread from family to family, and from district to district; while men slept the enemy sowed his tares. Little more is heard of the Paulicians in Church history, but their work was effectually done. A.D. 1118, the Emperor Alexis I. Comnenus set his heart on reclaiming the Paulicians to the orthodox faith, and loaded with favours those who listened to the voice of persuasion, building for them the town of Alexiopolis; while those who held out were exterminated with fire and the sword. The lesson taught by the Moors at Cordova was repeated in Armenia. The Paulicians are said by a modern Greek writer to have still a local habitation and a name in the neighbouring city of Philippopolis. [Constantine, Ἐγχειρίδιον περὶ τῆς ἐπαρχίας Φιλιππουπολέως. Vienna, 1819, p. 27.] When the Crusaders took Constantinople, A.D. 1204, the Paulicians were in sufficient numbers to attract attention; and their European congeners were termed from them Poplicanes or Publicans, from the hard provincial pronunciation of the diphthongal sound.[1] The Vaudois and Albigeois sects came from this stock; and thus was heralded the extensive defection from the Catholic Church in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Towards the end of the twelfth century the Anglican Church, which from the time of Augustin had been remarkably free from heresy, took action against these "Publicans," who were condemned in a council held at Oxford A.D. 1160, according to Spelman, though Hody places it six years later. The account given of them by William of Newbridge [ii. 13], shews the same features as of old in their rejection of Sacraments and of all Church authority and principle. To threats of extermination they only answered "Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake." They were branded on the forehead, and their leader Gerard also on the chin; they were proscribed from all social communion, and being thus cut off from the means of subsistence, hunted down within the country, and denied all means of escaping from it, they came to a miserable end. The sect then abounded in France, Spain, Germany and Italy, and at about the same time seven who professed these opinions were burned at Vezelai in Burgundy. A.D. 1176, St. Galdin was struck with death in the pulpit while preaching against that which was now termed Albigeois and Catharist error.

PELAGIANISM. In contending for the faith against the errors of the five first centuries, the attention of the Church was fixed upon three principal subjects; the Christology of revealed religion; Church authority and discipline; and Anthropology, or human nature, as viewed in its relation with Divine Grace. The first of these subjects was determined by the universal Church with unanimity; the same may be said of the second, if we except the questions of heretical baptism and the Paschal difference; but the third received a peculiar treatment in the West that we do not trace in writers of the Eastern communion. The even balance of dogmatic statement has scarcely been maintained as regards this group of doctrines. Various causes have produced divergence. Difference of mental constitution in the people of the West and of the East has influenced the Latin and Greek Theology. In the West more practical views have always prevailed. The Roman Empire was built up on principles developed by present emergencies, and in no way philosophically reasoned out. The Roman laws were an elaboration of hard common sense; and the "juris consulti" in Rome formed a large element of the population. Africa, the nursing mother of Latin Christianity, was also "Nutricula caussidicorum" [Juv. Sat. vii. 148]. Many of the Latin Fathers received legal training, and by a natural effect such men were led to trace back everything to first principles, and to seek in the past their clue to unravel present mysteries. Tertullian was accurately versed in Roman law, τοὺς Ῥωμαίων νόμους ἠκριβωκώς [Euseb. H. E. ii. 2], and his writings in every page betray the legal mind. His authority of prescription was an application of legal principle and precedent; his arguments against heresy and error are logical deductions from data that were to the Christian what the maxims and decisions of the law were to the jurisconsult. The origin of evil, a question that lay at the root of Gnosticism, and of almost every other early heresy, was referred by him scripturally to the transgression of our first parents, but from them it descended, inbred in the very blood and bone of our nature; as the attaint of slavery attaches to the offspring of endless generations, and can only be removed by manumission. In the Latin Church, before the time of Augustine, the punishment of Adam's sin was stated to consist in bodily infirmity and death; ill-regulated passion, and a greater power of Satan over the soul to injure; the pains of childbirth, and a curse upon the earth. Guilt was scarcely held to be a result of original sin, and certainly no limitation of human freedom of will was involved in the idea. These were the evils that descend to us from Adam's sin, and the only remedy for them was the grace of Christ. From these data, individual guilt having been added to original sin, was developed the entire Augustinian system, every part of which was a logical deduction from previously established premiss. There was nothing in it of philosophical speculation; it was a consistent chain of consecutive reasoning.

The Eastern type of mind, on the other hand, was theoretical rather than practical. The schools of Alexandria and Antioch initiated each successive generation of theologians in Platonic speculations, and the dialectics of Aristotle. The hopes of the future rather than the losses of the past occupied them. "Forgetting those things which are behind," they reached forward rather "to those things which are before." Agreeing with the Western Church in the main, as regards the effects of Adam's Fall, they attained a point of divergence when the freedom of man's will was seen to antagonize the doctrine of God's ordinary and preventing grace. Eastern divines, one and all, claimed for man full liberty of action, whether it impelled him to rise to a closer life with God, or to sink into greater depths of sin. As Augustine would have said, they confused spontaneity with freedom. Man's movements are spontaneous and unchecked by any external power, but they proceed from the action of the will; and he is morally free, or held under thraldom, in proportion as that will is made free by the good gift of God's grace, or still held under the dominion of evil. Free, however, the Greek Fathers held man to be, irrespective of all moral considerations, and that freedom was the gauge of innocence or sin; for the free alone are responsible, and man's hope for the future lay in a proper use of his freedom. The Syrian Church agreed rather with the Latin view, and was thoroughly penetrated by a sense of man's sinfulness, inbred in his very nature by reason of Adam's sin, and of the necessity for guidance by Divine Grace, as may be seen in the volumes of Ephrem Syrus. Considerations of importance helped to draw aside the attention of the Greek Church to other matters. Heresies affecting the Christology of the Catholic Faith gave its writers neither rest nor time to think of anything but this phase of truth. The positive side of their doctrinal statements was made up of refutations of those errors. If its literature had been more full, we should, perhaps, have had less opportunity for noting points of difference between the East and the West. But as it is, we see in it little that is responsive to the teaching of Augustinian doctrine; and further still, while the Greek Fathers have incidentally guarded their statements against the Manichæan, by claiming for man under the system of grace the fullest liberty of action, they have at times let fall expressions of which Pelagius first, and in after ages certain of the Schoolmen, have availed themselves, in opposing the notion of man's utter insufficiency in himself to lead a life well-pleasing to God and profitable to man. They held that the image of God in which man was created, though greatly defaced by the Fall, is not wholly lost; his moral nature has remained the same afterwards as before. He can resist evil if he will, and sin is the result of free-will wrongly directed. [Original Sin.] Such for instance were the opinions of Origen. In Alexandria his office of catechetical instructor secured for him attention; his plain and grammatical method of scriptural exegesis, and his services in Biblical criticism gave to his opinions high authority in the school of Antioch. These were the two great centres of Eastern Christianity, representing the Greek and Syrian nationalities; and if he strained the doctrine of free-will beyond its due bearings, and pushed other doctrinal statements in advance of the position of the Church, many would follow them as accredited expositions of the truth. From Palestine, where Origenian notions had obtained a wide currency, the error since known as Pelagianism was first imported into Rome. But, in the meantime, in the West a severer theology had been gradually growing up. The generalizing spirit of the Latin mind had been brought to bear upon theology. Augustine pushing to their utmost logical limits the statements of St. Paul, had already laid the first lines of a system of doctrine with respect to the grace of Christ that the Western Communion has always accepted as the true voice of the Church, while the Eastern Church has as universally treated it with a guarded silence. Though the system is termed Augustinian, it does not follow that the Bishop of Hippo was the founder of it; but he gave consistency to religious opinion that had floated loosely and in a disengaged form in the Latin Church from the days of Tertullian; and his teaching was accepted at once as familiar to Latin ears, and as harmonizing altogether with the traditional teaching of that communion.

It was in the beginning of the fifth century that Ruffinus, a monk from Palestine, taught in Rome a novel set of opinions, that if not identical with those of Origen, were at least wholly congenial with them. Man, he said, had full power in his own unassisted nature to perform the will of God; and that the only ill inherited from Adam was freedom to follow in his steps. A brother monk from Britain was indoctrinated by him in these errors, whose name, Morgan, became Marigena in Latin, and Pelagius in Greek. His knowledge of Greek was owing perhaps to the close connection that subsisted between the British and the Oriental Churches [Neander, K. Gesch.]. He was born as it was said on the selfsame day as Augustine. It was now heard for the first time that no sin or guilt attaches to the soul upon its entrance into the world. Sin, or opposition to the holy and pure will of God, is entirely a result of man's free-will; man has still the same nature in which Adam was created, the Fall having wrought no change in it. Concupiscence, from whence, if it be unchecked by right reason, sin is begotten, is no consequence of Adam's sin, but in its origin it is natural to man; mortality from the beginning was his inevitable lot. Further, the only relation that subsists between the sin of Adam and his posterity, is in the way of example and imitation; and the only permanent power that sin has over mankind is the power of consuetude. Sin is no infirmity of human nature but of the will, and for that reason could not be inherited. The Redeemer's office is to raise and dignify human nature in his followers; as Julian said, "Christus, qui est sui operis Redemptor, auget circa imaginem suam continua largitate beneficia, et quos fecerat condendo bonos, facit innovando adoptandoque meliores" [Aug. C. Julian, iii. 8].

Among the earliest teachers of this doctrine, beside the two already mentioned, were Cœlestius, a Roman advocate, afterwards monk, and Julian, Bishop of Eclanum in Campania. They protested against the Augustinian theory as opposed to the interests of morality, and maintained that all earnestness in the way of godly living was discouraged by teaching the necessity for divine grace. They rejected the doctrine of original sin as a pernicious error, and insisted on the sufficiency of man's unassisted power, and on his absolute freedom to choose for himself either good or bad. Conscience they affirmed was the standing witness of man's innate goodness, by its unerring testimony against sin. There is this difference, however, to be observed between the opinions of Pelagius and Cœlestius; the latter affirmed that the sin of Adam hurt himself only and not his posterity; and that from the first he was created mortal. Whereas Pelagius at the Council of Diospolis allowed that death was brought in by Adam's sin; but whether he meant bodily or spiritual death does not clearly appear, and before that council of friendly bishops he was made up of evasion and subterfuge. Otherwise the whole Pelagian party mantained that Adam was by nature subject to death; that every child was born into the world in the same state of innocence as Adam was when first he received the breath of life; and that it depended entirely upon a man's own strength of character to live a life of virtue. Theodore, Bishop of Mopsuestia in Cilicia, gave great encouragement to the error and helped to set it on its feet; but afterwards when it had met with universal condemnation, he himself also summoned a Council of Cilician bishops, by whom it was anathematized [A.D. 421].

The Latin Church from the time of Tertullian taught that sin is derived to us from Adam, but was silent with respect to the guilt of this sinfulness. Hilary calls it "originis vitium," from which not even the holy Apostles were free; that "to continue in faith is the gift of God, its origination is in ourselves" [Psa. cxviii.] and that "Dives by the exercise of his own free will might have been in Abraham's bosom" [Psa. li.]. The Latin version of Rom. v. 12, "in quo omnes peccaverunt," led him to interpret Matt. xviii. 6 of the whole human race in Adam; "The one sheep is to be understood as man, and one man is to be considered as a universal term; for the whole race of man sinned in the transgression of Adam alone" [Comm. in Matt.], and "Men sin instinctively, "ad hæc nos vitia naturæ nostræ propellit instinctus" [Psa. i. sec. 4]. As regards these questions he exhibits distinctive features of the theology both of the East and of the West [Neander, K. Gesch. ii. 1054]. Ambrose says: "Before our birth we are tainted with contagion, and before the enjoyment of light we receive injury in our very origin, and are conceived in sin . . . the mother generates each human being in iniquity . . . the babe of a single day is not without sin" [Apol. Pr. David 11]. But it is only sin as an abstract idea, not individual guilt, "reatus peccati" in Augustinian language; for he says, [ibid.] "We have all sinned in the first man, and by natural succession there is a succession also of faultiness (culpæ) transmitted from one to all;" and elsewhere he makes original sin to consist rather in proneness to sin, "lubricum delinquendi," than in guilt attaching to the individual, "reatus nostri delicti" [Psa. xlviii. sec. 9]. With respect to the universality of this taint he says, "Wherefore it is manifest that in Adam we all sinned, so to speak, in a mass, for he having been contaminated with sin, all whom he engendered have been born under sin. From him therefore we are all sinners, because we are all from him" [Rom. v.]—"Fuit Adam, et in illo fuimus omnes. Periit Adam, et in illo perierunt omnes" [in Luc. i. 7, sec. 234]. But all, infants included, are reclaimed from evil and restored to original purity by baptism [in Luc. i. 17]. Elsewhere, in speaking of divine grace, he declares with Augustinian force of expression, "Deus quos dignatur vocat, et quem vult religiosum facit" [Luc. l. vii. 27], and "a Deo præparatur voluntas hominum" [ibid. l. i. 10]; yet he places a limit to the action of grace in man's will, and knows nothing of constraining grace, nor of absolute decrees of individual predestination and election. In the same way he explains Psa. li. 5 of original sin. But this ascription of sinfulness in no way interferes with freedom of action in man. Man has an inherent power of doing good [Neander, K. Gesch. ii. 1060, 2d ed. Hamb.]. It is worthy of remark that synodal action on the Pelagian question was first taken at Carthage [A.D. 412] at the instance of Paulinus, a deacon of Milan, the biographer of Ambrose. Before the time of Augustine, therefore, it was the doctrine of the Church both in the East and in the West, that the will of man was altogether free, that it depended upon himself to resist the allurements of sin or to give way to them. The fatalism of the Manichæan and the Gnostic compelled writers to claim for man the fullest liberty of action as the only basis of his responsibility before God. Even Augustine in those earlier writings that were directed against Manichæan error had adopted the general view of original sin, as consisting in weakened power, in ignorance, and proneness to sin; but claiming at the same time for man complete freedom of will. He had even gone so far as to assert that man by his own energy might master those hindrances of goodness and live virtuously if he would: "Homo enim ipse, in quantum homo est, aliquod bonum est, recte vivere homo cum vult potest" [De lib. art. ii. 1]; and again "quoniam sine illa [libera sc. voluntate] homo recte non potest vivere" [ibid.]. Pelagius was not slow to urge the "argumentum ad homiem" supplied by such statements, and when Augustine in his Retractations [I. xi. 37] shewed that they implied a will set free by divine grace, "ope adjuvante divina," and in any case that they were made before Pelagian error was known, the explanation may serve to harmonize many similar statements of preceding writers. It may be observed, however, that Augustine, having adopted Hilary's statement with respect to the origination of faith, afterwards condemned it in unqualified terms [De Præd. Sanct. 3].

But the doctrine of Augustine had been gradually assuming a more severe tone before the appearance of Pelagius upon the scene. That very severity in fact called forth antagonizing error; although Pelagian error in its turn may have stimulated in some degree the after-development of Augustinian doctrine. The display of indignation made by Pelagius when he turned his back upon a bishop who used the words of Augustine, "Da quod jubes, et jube quod vis," marks the priority of the Bishop of Hippo's view of sovereign grace. Pelagius, indeed, directly charged Augustine with the invention of his theory of original sin [Aug. de Nupt. et Concup. ii. 12], to which the Father made answer that it was the teaching of the Church Catholic, and had descended from primitive times. We may accept his statements, then, in part as the traditional faith of the Church, and in part as logical deductions from that faith which were of a necessary supplemental character, so soon as Pelagian error made its appearance. Ritschl says, indeed, that Augustine reproduced the evangelical doctrine of St. Paul; "auf diesem Wege war Augustin so gar im Stande, die Paulinische Lehre von der Gnade in ursprünglicher Weise im Schoose der Katholischen Kirche zu reproduciren" [Entsteh. d. a. Kath. K. p. 354]; but only negative evidence of its loss is supplied by the reticence of writers engaged upon other subjects. The epistle to Diognetus [Op. Just. M.] at least shews that it had a living power in the Primitive Church. According to Augustine, man was created in the image of God; in an earlier treatise [De Genesi ad lit. vi. 27, 28] he had stated that on the Fall this image was wholly lost; he now modified this statement and said, in accordance with the Greek Fathers, that the likeness of God was not lost, but defaced. By virtue of this likeness Adam was created perfectly free, so that he might either maintain his innocence, or commit sin. By the Fall human nature became physically and morally debased; on the positive side it resulted in death; concupiscence, or desire of whatever kind that is contrary to the holy and pure will of God, the reaction of the flesh against the spirit, the "law of the members" as the Apostle calls it [Rom. vii. 23], and the "carnal mind" [Rom. viii. 6, 7]. The throes of labour were another direct result of the Fall; the sweat of toil; and the thorns and thistles that spring with a spontaneous growth from the earth. On the negative side the Fall entailed a loss of that instinctive choice of good from the love of God, which alone is true freedom of will [Civ. D. xiv. 11]; and from that time man became the slave of sensual appetites; spontaneity replaced his freedom, but he could only exercise it in the direction of evil; his will was hemmed in on every side by thoughts of evil, and the brightest heathen virtues are only splendid sins. This condition of ingrained sinfulness was inherited from Adam by his offspring, so that even the new-born babe is tainted with it, and is charged with guilt, the correlative of sin. Thus the entire human race having forfeited the gift of God, became the bondmen of Satan, a "mass of perdition." The foundation of this whole edifice of doctrine was the text [Rom. v. 12], "As by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, and so death passed upon all men, in that all have sinned;" ἐφ' ᾧ having been rendered by the Latin version "in quo," i.e. "in whom all have sinned;" whereas "eo quod" is the force given to the words by the best versions from the Peschito down to our own. The whole human race was rudimentally contained in Adam; it sinned in him, and has shared his guilt [Serm. 294; Op. Imperf. c. Jul. i. 48, iv. 104]. Augustine, never afraid of following to its remotest results a principle that seemed to him sound, affirmed that ancestral sins also, as well as the first forefather's, may be imputed to after generations; and so far as temporal consequences are concerned, the Nemesis of Greek tragedy may not have been altogether a fable. In contending with the Pelagians, Augustine urged the strong argument from infant baptism, and the exorcism of evil, which from the very days of the Apostles had been an integral portion of the office of baptism, and which implied congenital sin in infants. It proved more forcibly than the dictum of any doctor of the Church, however orthodox and however holy, that the Church from the beginning had continuously ascribed to the Fall worse consequences than a mere proneness to follow in the steps of Adam; and that there was some innate principle of evil to be purged away if man was to be regenerated to God by the grace of Christ. In answer to these points Pelagius declared that the words of the Apostle [Rom. v. 12] apply to sin, by way of imitation of Adam's sin; and he evaded the argument from baptism by saying that there were two conditions of blessedness in the world to come; there was eternal life, to which even the unbaptized were raised, and there was the Beatific Vision, or kingdom of heaven, into which none but the baptized could be admitted; and therefore that it was necessary that infants should be baptized to qualify them for that higher good. He further argued that, if baptism removes original sin, then the child of baptized parents must needs be free from taint. To this Augustine replied by shewing that there are two elements in original sin, concupiscence, (which is its substance,) and guilt; the latter is wholly remitted on receiving the grace of Christ in baptism, the former remains as an abiding element of trial and discipline, and is entailed by the parents on their children; and he instanced the wild olive tree made serviceable by grafting, whose seed springs up again as wild as before. With respect to the future world the only two states known to the Church were heaven and hell, and without baptism there was no admission to the former, no salvation from the latter [Serm. 294]. Other objections of Pelagius may be arranged under the three heads of [1] the metaphysical impossibility of original sin; [2] its impugnment of divine holiness; and [3] the discredit that it casts upon marriage.

[1] Sin, he declared, is not of the body but of the soul; and to talk of sin being propagated with the body, is as absurd as to say that the soul is generated with the body; but if the soul be not propagated with the body, it is no true descendant of Adam, and another's sin is imputed to it. He termed his opponents, therefore, "Traduciani," as though they must of necessity hold a

"tradux animæ" as well as a "tradux peccati;" i.e. that the soul as well as sin is propagated by generation from sire to son. [TRADUCIANISM. CREATIONISM.] Again, sin, he said, is the result of depraved volition; but they who maintain the existence of original sin, make it a "vitium naturæ;" and sin that is communicated in natural course, "peccatum naturale" as he termed original sin, is a confusion of terms and a metaphysical impossibility. Further [2] he declared that the Augustinian scheme impugned the divine holiness, with which the idea of punishing the sin of one individual by sin in another was altogether incongruous; this would be to make God the author of sin. And as regarded the penal consequences of Adam's sin, Julian, Bishop of Eclanum, strenuously denied that the bodily ills, to which this penal character was usually assigned, were to be regarded as such. Neither the death of the body, nor the mother's throes, nor the sweat of toil, were to be thus regarded. Moreover, it is wholly derogatory to divine justice to affirm that God, who forgives men their individual trespasses, should lay upon them the trespasses of another. Lastly, [3] Pelagius objected to the Traducians, as he called his opponents, that a slur was cast by them on the holy estate of matrimony; for they declared that concupiscence, if not actually sin, stood in close connection with it, and that the offspring of marriage were the children of Satan. Also that it was a palpable contradiction to say that the estate of matrimony was holy and innocent, and yet to maintain that there was something very like sin in concupiscence. With respect to this first point [a], Augustine appears never to have been able to account for the soul's origination; whether it were a result of procreation, or of direct creation and subsequent union with the body. Hence he guarded his statements so as to suit either hypothesis. In the former case the soul, if propagated, might well share the debasement of the body; in the latter case it would contract defilement from the body as from a tainted vessel. Then he wholly repudiated the term "naturale peccatum;" for human nature, he said, is in itself good, though marred by sin; also, allowing that sin arises from volition, he added that original sin had its rise in the will of the first man, and thereby in the aggregate will of humanity. [b] To the second class of objections he made answer in his Opus Imperf. c. Julianum; shewing that the sin of Adam was no remote or alien sin, but our own, inasmuch as we had our embryonic existence in him; and his transgression is inseparable from us by reason of our bodily descent from him. He retorts upon Julian the charge of impugning the Divine Justice; for young infants are often subject to extreme misery: and to affirm their sinlessness is to arraign the Divine Justice for permitting so much innocent suffering. [c] These objections gave rise to a treatise [de Nupt. et Conc.], in which Augustine replies that marriage is a holy estate; that it is of Divine institution, to which the evil of concupiscence only attaches by the Fall; hence the better attributes of marriage ("bona nuptialia") issue. A loyal faith and sacramental virtue are to be carefully distinguished from concupiscence. The evil character of the latter quality can never alter; though it be venial when it results in issue to be brought up in the fear and nurture of the Lord. It is still evil, for a sense of shame attaches to it. It is no essential co-ordinate of matrimony; for the human race might have developed itself in Paradise according to present natural laws, but without concupiscence and without shame; with nothing also of the present warfare between the flesh and the spirit.

The above will have shewn the relation in which the doctrine of Augustine and Pelagianism stood towards the teaching of the Primitive Church with respect to original sin and its results. The Pelagians denied all evil effects of the Fall. Man without it was mortal; and obedience was in no sense rendered more difficult to the race of Adam by his transgression. But the doctrine of the Church from the beginning had been that death entered into the world by sin [Rom. v. 12]; that man's bad passions had acquired a fatal increase of strength from that first sin; and that Satan had, in proportion, gained power over him. The points that we do not find in earlier documents are these: that guilt attaches to the whole race of man by reason of Adam's sin; that the whole race is by nature "perditionis massa;" and that man has no freedom of action in the direction of good. This system of doctrines also had a bearing upon the Manichæan tenets. Augustine, from early association, knew the weakest points of Manichæan error, and he expresses his conviction more than once that it was only by the doctrine of grace that it could be met [Op. Imperf. c. Jul. v. 54, vi. 6]. Certain it is that whereas in his earlier years he opposed this system by asserting the entire freedom of man's will, in later life he used as the more serviceable weapon the doctrine of God's free unmerited grace. Attempts have been made to associate the doctrine of Augustine with Manichæism, but there is no affinity between the two. Evil with him had no substantial existence, it was the negation of good. With the Manichæan it was inherent in matter, the work of a second evil principle. Yet there was this analogy between the two, that both systems exaggerated more or less the presence of evil in human nature, and assumed the paramount dominion of sin over man. Both arrived at the same conclusion by different data; the Manichæan by affirming the substantive existence of evil; Augustine by following out to its remote consequences the Church doctrine that sin is an hereditary taint engendered by the free act of our first parent.

The external history of Pelagianism may be briefly told. Cœlestius was condemned at the Council of Carthage [A.D. 412], the first of a series of twenty-four councils affecting the Pelagian question between this year and the Council of Ephesus [A.D. 431]. It was at this time that Augustine put forth his treatise De Peccator. mer. et rem. Cœlestius betook himself to Ephesus, and the controversy also was transferred to the East; for Pelagius having passed into Palestine, was received with a friendly welcome by John, Bishop of Jerusalem; and in a very different manner by Jerome, who wrote against him his Dialogi adv. Pelag., full of his customary invective. A council of fourteen bishops was held at Diospolis, the Scriptural Lydda [A.D. 415], under the friendly presidency of John, which synod was called by Jerome "Synodus miserabilis." Here Pelagius gave such answers to the several points of indictment from his writings—for those of Cœlestius he would not be responsible—as to persuade his judges that he held all Catholic doctrine; though he furnished at the same time historical proof of his own self-condemnation, as Augustine has noted in his treatise De Gestis Pelagii. In the customary provincial council held at Carthage [A.D. 416], and at another council in the same year at Milevium, the Pelagian notions were condemned, and a full account was sent to Pope Innocent I. of the proceedings; Pelagius having been well-known and generally respected in Rome. Zosimus succeeded to the pontificate in the next year, and Cœlestius having been ordained presbyter at Ephesus, and journeying to Rome, offered to submit himself and his teaching to the decision of the Roman See. He presented a confession, in which, always open and undisguised [Cœlestius apertior, Pelagius occultior; Aug. De Pecc. Or. 13], he still avowed his opinions unchanged: "In remissionem autem peccatorum baptizandos infantes non idcirco diximus, ut peccatum ex traduce firmare videamur, quod longe a Catholicorum sensu alienum est, quia peccatum non cum homine nascitur quod postmodum exercetur ab homine; quia non naturæ delictum, sed voluntatis esse monstratur. Et illud ergo confiteri congruum, ne diversa baptismatis genera facere videamur." Pelagius sent in a similar confession, and adhered to his former notion with respect to unbaptized infants; "I know," said he, "where baptized infants go who die, but where unbaptized infants go I know not." Zosimus pronounced both of them to be of a pure faith, and wrote to the African bishops to express as much; at the same time cautioning them how they gave credence to the detractors of good men. In Nov. A.D. 417, another council of two hundred and fourteen bishops was held at Carthage, in which the former condemnation of Pelagian notions was confirmed, and again on the 1st of May in the next year a plenary council was held at Carthage, in which the eight famous canons were framed against these errors; the two first canons being on original sin, the three next on the aid of grace, and the three last on sinlessness. A ninth canon is mentioned by Photius, to which Augustine evidently alluded in the next year, but which is omitted in the most ancient copies of these canons. It occupied the third place, and condemned those who held that there was a middle state between heaven and hell for unbaptized infants. These canons have been generally ascribed to the pen of Augustine. In the meantime, Zosimus, partly from finding that he had been deceived, partly from seeing how strong a tide of opinion set in at Rome against the Pelagian notions, partly also because the Emperor Honorius had issued a rescript against them, formally condemned them, and wrote a letter to that effect to the African Church. Nothing more is known of Pelagius after he was driven from Jerusalem, upon his condemnation by a synod held at Antioch under Theodotus [A.D. 421]. But his party survived, and continually demanded a general synod until the time of the Council of Ephesus, in which Cœlestius was at length condemned by the voice of the universal Church. For the subsequent modification of this error see SEMI-PELAGIANISM. [Fleury, H. Eccl. xxiii. xxiv. Neander, Chr. K. Geschichte, zweite Period. Gieseler, *Dogm. PENANCE. The penitential system of Church Discipline arose in the third century within the Churches of the Greek Communion, as may be seen by the Greek classification of penitents. It was at once adopted by the North African Church; its terms being either literally translated as "audientes" [Tert. de Pœn. 6; Cypr. Ep. xxix.], "ad veniam stare" [Cyp. Ep. lv. med.], "in vestibulo" [Tert. de Pœn. 7, see 9], "fletus" [de An. xxxiv.]; or penitential phraseology was adopted without translation, as in the more severe and public ordeal of the "exomologesis." This had nothing to do with auricular or private confession, at least in the sub-Apostolic Church. Tertullian describes its several elements. "Exomologesis," he says, "is the discipline of prostrate humiliation, enjoining such a course as may move Divine pity; the substitution of sackcloth and ashes for a man's usual habit and regimen; the defilement of the body with dust and dirt; the abasement of the spirit with grief; the alteration of every particular sin by afflictive treatment. And besides this, the use of the simplest food and drink, eating, not to pamper the appetite, but to maintain life. Especially to feed up prayer with fasting, to sigh, to weep, to groan whole days and nights before the Lord God; to prostrate one's self before the presbyters, and kneel before the altars of God; to bid all brethren to take upon them the mediation of intercession. Hæc omnia exomologesis . . . . in quantum non peperceris tibi, in tantum tibi Deus crede parcet" [de Pœn. 9]. The African Church evidently did not derive its disciplinal regimen from the Church of Rome, its demands having been much more severe. Tertullian gave to it its peculiar tone. The main classification of penitents was determined by the Greek Church, but the more minute development of the penitential system was of Latin origin. Μετανοία and μεταμελεία never acquired the double meaning of the Latin "pœnitentia," i.e. "repentance" generally, and "penance" specifically; for which we have these two terms in English, while in all other European languages there is but one. In the Churches of the West, confession was long made to the bishop [Paulin, Vit. S. Ambros.]; great sins alone, which were happily rare, being the subject-matter [Sozom. H. E. vii. 16]. In Lent a place was set apart for penitents, where they prostrated themselves with tears and every outward sign of sorrow; the congregation also joining in the lament, and using the seven penitential psalms. The bishop at length raised them from the ground, prayed over them, and dismissed them from the Church, as Adam was driven forth from Paradise, to fulfil their respective prescription of penance, the responsory for the occasion being "In sudore vultus tui vesceris pane tuo;" after a course of fasting, abstaining from the bath, and practising whatever bodily austerities might have been enjoined, absolution was conferred, and the penitent was received once more into communion [Conc. Agathens. A.D. 506]. It was with reference to this godly discipline of the Primitive Church that the address in our Commination Service was framed. If the difficulty of restoring it was great at the time of the Reformation, it is now impossible, and few, indeed, would think it desirable.

There were three kinds of penance, "solennis," at the beginning of Lent; "publica," before the Church, and at any time of the year; and "privata," as prescribed by the bishop after confession. Of the three necessary elements in a true repentance, CONTRITION, CONFESSION and SATISFACTION, the latter belongs more strictly to penance [see the decree of Eugenius IV. "ad Armenos," in the Council of Florence, and the Tridentine Council, sess. xiv. can. 4]. In the Primitive Church "satisfaction" included the whole work of penitence; "ut si peccata nostra confessi Deo satisfecerimus veniam consequamur" [Lactant.]. "Deo Patri et misericordi precibus suis satisfacere possunt." "Peccatum suum satisfactione humili et simplici confitentes" [Cypr. de Lapsis]. There was "a godly sorrowing," "satisfactionibus et lamentationibus peccata redimuntur" [Cypr. de Lapsis], the sorrowing satisfaction of penitence, "mæstam pœnitentiæ satisfactionem," as Maximus calls it. There was the earnest heartfelt prayer of a true contrition, "Jejuniis preces olere," as Tertullian says; prayer being always a main element of the "satisfaction" due to God. Thus Cyprian says of the prayer of the "three children" in the fiery furnace, "Domino satisfacere nec inter ipsa gloriosa virtutum suarum martyria destiterunt" [de Lapsis]. Fasting also is enjoined by Tertullian, according to our Lord's assurance that some forms of evil would only yield to "fasting and prayer." In all these essentials the discipline of penance must for ever be unaltered. There must be "satisfaction" also to man. "If I have wronged any man by false accusation," said Zacchæus, "I restore him fourfold;" it is a "judging ourselves that we be not judged of the Lord;" every uncharitable word must be recalled, every offence atoned, every injury must be repaired to the best of our ability, even as every step in a wrong direction must be retrod; every unlawful gain must be put away, and if no other channel be open—"the poor are always with you"—let the amount be given in alms. The Talmud makes a more near approach than usual to Christian ethics, when it says that the sacrifice of the Day of Atonement is applicable only to sins against God, but "with respect to sins against our neighbour satisfaction must first be made," and "in a money matter repentance profiteth not until such time as satisfaction hath been made to the injured party" [Berachoth, 19, A.]. In later times corporal austerities were largely introduced, and menial offices to break down the proud spirit of rebellion; solitude and silence, the endurance of heat and cold, hair shirts, and bodily chastisement. These, however, were commutable for a money payment, although this rule could not apply to the poor; "quando puniendi sunt inopes est hoc regulare, qui non luit in bursa luet in corpore" [Lyndw. Oxon. 321]. But money commutations were open to abuse. Penance was made so painful as to drive penitents to this easier method of satisfaction. Accordingly a Constitution of Stratford [A.D. 1342] checks excessive severity; "delinquentibus pœnitentias corporales graves et publicas non imponant adeo excessivas, ut causative et per obliquum cogantur redimere suas pœnitentias pecuniaria gravi summa. Sed . . . in posterum sic fiant modeste quod rapax non judicetur accipiens." Archdeacons also, the eyes of the bishop, put themselves forward as his hands; and several metropolitan constitutions restrain them from taking money commutations for penance under pain of being mulcted in double the amount received [Otho, A.D. 1237, de Archid.; Othobon, A.D. 1268, Summarium]. The "Reformatio Legum" [temp. Hen. VIII. and Edw. VI.], which, though of no authority, gives a clear insight into many ecclesiastical practices at the time of the Reformation, orders that these money payments in lieu of penance should not be permitted, "nisi aliqua gravis intercesserit et necessaria causa;" thus explained by the Lower House of Convocation, "either for some great value or dignity of the person, or for fear of some desperate event that will follow in the party that should be put to open shame;" and by an archiepiscopal gloss [21 James I.] in re Dr. Barker, official of Oxford, accused of peculation, that "such a thing," i.e. disgrace, "might not lie on their wives and children to their perpetual shame and blemish;" which sets the matter on a higher level. Such money payments after the Reformation are directed to be applied to the use of the poor; and so late as the reign of Queen Anne, Convocation made various regulations respecting them. [Visit. Par. and Gen. p. 143. INTERDICT, and cross-references under PENITENCE. Gibson's Codex, tit. xlvi. cap. 2.]

PENITENCE [μετανοία]. Penitence from the Latin "pœnitentia," is the older word for repentance used by the Vulgate, but replaced by "resipiscentia," μεταμελεία, when the penitential scheme of the Latin Church was developed; for "pœnitentia" then became restricted to the penances of the confessional. [PENANCE.] Penitence is an enduring and penal condition; for there is an evident etymological connection between "pœna" and "punio," both having their common origin in ποινή, a "fine," or "weregeld" for blood. The old form, in fact, of "punio" was "pœnio," and is so written by Cicero, "cum multi inimicos etiam mortuos pœniantur" [Tusc. i. 44, and MSS. in Mil. 31; also Aul. Gell. VII. iii. 54]. Thus "mœrus," whence "pomœrium," for "murus," from μοῖρα (quasi "allotment boundary"); "mœnio," for "munio;" pœniceus and puniceus, pœnicus and punicus. "Pœnitere" is explained as "pœnam tenere" by the ancient author of the treatise De vera et falsa Pœnitentia, in the works of Augustine, with direct reference to "punio:" "Pœnitere enim est pœnam tenere, ut semper puniat in se ulciscendo quod commisit peccando. Pœna enim proprie dicitur læsio quæ punit et vindicat quod quisque commisit" [c. xix.]. Isidore of Seville gives the same definition, "A punitione pœnitentia nomen accepit, quasi punitentia, cum ipse homo punit pœnitendo quod male admisit;" which is followed by the Schools: "Pœnitentia quasi punitentia" [Hugo a S. Vict. De Myst. Eccl. iii.]; Scotus slightly varies the definition, "quasi pœnæ tenentia." Hence the idea of penitence involves a lasting remorse for sin—"yea what revenge," as St. Paul expresses it; and in this it is distinguished from the initiative REPENTANCE that leads to conversion and baptism. Thus "penitence" may be said to be the correlative term of "repentance," as "renovation" is of "regeneration." [REPENTANCE. CONFESSION. DISCIPLINE, ECCLESIASTICAL. CONTRITION. PENANCE. ABSOLUTION. Marshall's Penitential Discipline.]

PENTECOST. So named from its celebration by Mosaic ordinance on the fiftieth day inclusive from the second day of the Paschal week, when the wave-sheaf of the first barley was offered in the Temple [EASTER. WAVE-OFFERING. PASSOVER]. It was more generally known to the Jews as the Feast of Weeks [Exod. xxxiv. 22; Deut. xvi. 10-16]. It was also called the Feast of Harvest [Exod. xxiii. 16], i.e. of the completion of wheat harvest, as the Paschal Feast became a thanksgiving for the first-fruits of the barley harvest, and as the Feast of Tabernacles commemorated the complete ingathering of the yearly crops, whether of corn, wine, or oil.

At each of these solemn feasts every male was bound to present himself before the Lord at the high altar of his race. The name "Pentecost," adopted by St. Luke [Acts ii. 1, xx. 16] and by St. Paul [1 Cor. xvi. 8], was taken from the Rabbinical term of the period, חַג חֲמִשִּׁים יוֹם. As the first Christian Pentecost, signalized by the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, fell on the first day of the week, so it has continued ever since; the Feast of the Resurrection on Easter Morn, the Paschal First-fruits, having always been celebrated by the Christian Church on the first day of the week. The German term "Pfingst" is a manifest corruption of "Fünfzigste," or of the old German, "Finfchustin." Upon this day, as the most essential element of the solemnity, two loaves of the new wheat were offered [Lev. xxiii. 17], whence the feast was also known as the "Day of First-fruits" [Numb. xxviii. 26]. They were of leavened dough, as a thank-offering for the bread of daily use. These loaves were made of "two tenth deals" of fine meal, as at the Feast of the Passover [Lev. xxiii. 13, 17]. There were offered also as a burnt-sacrifice, after the daily sacrifice, two young bullocks, one ram, and seven lambs of the first year, with one kid of the goats to make atonement [Numb. xxviii. 27]; or according to the account in Leviticus [xxiii. 18], seven lambs, one bullock, and two rams as a burnt-offering, with one kid of the goats as a sin-offering, and two lambs as a peace-offering. The varying statement existed before the LXX. Version was made, which agrees with the present Hebrew text in both places. It was treated as a cumulative prescription by the Jews [Maimonid. Tamidim, viii. 1], and the offering consisted of fourteen lambs, three bullocks, three rams as a burnt-offering, two goats as an atonement or sin-offering, and two more lambs as a peace-offering. There is no need, therefore, to imagine with Vaihinger in Herzog that a marginal gloss has crept into the text, or that the sacred account is in any way corrupt in its readings.

This feast is connected by the Jews[1] with the "giving of the Law" on Mount Sinai [Maim. More Nevoch. iii. 43], by which name it was also known; and the idea agrees with the Mosaic account, which states that the Law was given in the third month from the exodus [Exod. xix. 1], i.e. within little more than eight weeks according to the Jewish method of computing the part of a period of time for the entirety. Thus the first Passover having been celebrated at the commencement of the third week of the first month, a week of weeks, or fifty days from that feast, indicates the ninth week, or the beginning of the third month for the Feast of Pentecost. The year being determined by the Paschal week, the Feast of Weeks fell invariably on the sixth day of Sivan. Flowers and herbs were used to deck the houses and synagogues, and a night-long religious service ushered in the great day itself.

In the Christian Church the entire period between Easter and Pentecost was named from the latter [Tert. de Idol. 14, Bapt. 19; Can. Ap. 37; Can. Ant. 30; Cyr. Hieros. ad Const.]. It was the solemn season for administering baptism; and since the Catechumens received that Sacrament in white array, the custom which caused the Octave of Easter to be termed the "Dominica in Albis" in the Latin Church, gave the name of "Whit-Sunday," perhaps, to Pentecost in the English Church. The feast was observed as the Festival of the Holy Spirit [Greg. Naz. de Pent. Hom. 44] at a very early date, allusion being made to it by Tertullian, as shewn above, and by Origen [c. Cels. viii., ed. Cantab. 1677, p. 392]. All public games were interdicted by Theodosius the Younger during the Pentecostal as during the Paschal solemnity [Cod. Theod. xv. 5, de Spectac.]. During these weeks the Acts of the Apostles were read, as being most suitable for the period during which the risen Lord appeared to His disciples in the body "by many infallible proofs." Fasting was intermitted [Const. Ap. v. 33], and the prayers of the Church were offered, not in a kneeling position, but erect [Conc. Nic. can. 20], as symbolizing the jubilant attitude of the Church during her Lord's passage from the grave to glory. The entire octave was celebrated in early days, and followed by a week of fasting [Const. Ap. v. 33]. The feast was restricted to three days by papal decree, A.D. 745.

[1] Also by Augustine [c. Faust. xxxii. 12], who elsewhere makes the Christian festival of the outpouring of the first-fruits of the Spirit co-ordinate with the Jewish thanksgiving for the first-fruits of the earth [ad Jan. ii. or Ep. 55].

PERFECTI. [ΤΕΛΕΙΟΙ.]

PERPETUAL VIRGINITY of the Blessed Virgin Mary. That which was conceived in the womb of the Blessed Virgin Mary being Divine, and her virginity having been maintained for the purpose of that miraculous conception, it would be unreasonable and irreverent to imagine that children conceived in sin were afterwards tenants of that most holy tabernacle. The Fathers, and the best of later theologians, have therefore fixed it as a firm belief of the Church that the Mother of our Lord and God was not only a virgin at the time when He was born, but ever afterwards.

This belief was not called in question in the first ages. A denial of the virginity of the Blessed Virgin Mary at the time of her conception had indeed been consistently made by the Cerinthians and Ebionites, who, in the first and second centuries, asserted that Jesus was the son of Joseph and Mary by natural generation; but no doubt of her perpetual virginity was expressed by any who believed that our Lord was born of a virgin [Isa. vii. 14; Luke i. 47] until the fourth century. It was then, when Apollinaris had denied the Blessed Virgin to be the real mother of the Word Incarnate, that some were led on to the denial of her perpetual virginity. These were called Antidicomarians, and their heresy gave rise to another, that of the Collyridians, who made the Blessed Virgin the object of an idolatrous worship, which consisted in the offering of little cakes (collyrides), which were afterwards eaten as sacrificial food. Epiphanius, in his treatise against Heresies, severely condemned these two extremes. He denounced those who denied Christ's mother to be ever virgin as adversaries of Mary who deprived her of "honour due;" whilst he insisted that, according to the essential principles of Christianity, worship was due to the Trinity alone. St. Jerome wrote a tract against Helvidius, who maintained the view of the Antidicomarians; and this tract contains most of the arguments which have been brought by Bishop Pearson and other divines in support of the perpetual virginity of the Blessed Virgin. Helvidius denied it on the ground of St. Matthew's words that Joseph "knew her not till she had brought forth her first-born son" [Matt. i. 25]; as if it were implied that he knew her afterwards, and that a first-born son inferred a second-born. St. Jerome answered the first objection by citing other instances in which no such inference can be drawn from similar language. [Gen. xxviii. 15; Deut. xxxiv. 6; 1 Sam. xv. 35; 2 Sam. vi. 23; Matt. xxviii. 20.] It is said, for instance, that Samuel came no more to see Saul until the day of his death, from which the Antidicomarians must have inferred that he came to see him afterwards. Similarly, although it is stated that Joseph knew not the Blessed Virgin Mary until she had brought forth her son, no inference can be drawn from that expression that he knew her afterwards. Bengel, who treats the matter as an open question, says, "ἕως οὗ, non sequitur ergo post." The word "first-born," on which the Antidicomarians laid so much stress, does not occur in the Vatican MS., but, if its genuineness be admitted, no difficulty need thence arise; for our Lord is called the first-born, not with reference to any that succeeded, but for the reasons—

[1.] Because there were special rites attending the birth of a first-born son. These were not delayed until a second was born, but performed at once. The law was, "Sanctify unto Me all the first-born: whatsoever openeth the womb among the children of Israel, both of man and beast, it is Mine" [Exod. xiii. 2]. Joseph and the Blessed Virgin Mary, in obedience to this law, brought our Saviour to Jerusalem to present Him to the Lord, as it is written in the law of the Lord, "Every male that openeth the womb shall be called holy to the Lord" [Luke ii. 22, 23]. "First-born" is therefore equivalent to "one that openeth the womb." Bishop Pearson says "the Scripture notion of priority excludeth an antecedent, but inferreth not a consequent; it suffereth none to have gone before, but concludeth not any to follow after." [Pearson, On Creed, vol. i. p. 214. See also Hooker, Eccl. Pol. v. ch. xlv. sec. 2. Hieron. contra Helvid. ii. 7. August. Hær. lxxxiv. viii. 24. Whitby and Bishop Wordsworth in loco.]

[2.] The First-born was one of the titles of our Lord. In its classical sense, πρωτοτόκος never means the first-born, but has an active signification in relation to the mother who for the first time bears a child [Iliad, xvii. 5]; but in Holy Scripture it is used by the LXX. to signify [a] sometimes the first-born, [b] sometimes the privileges which belong to the elder son, and also [c] as a title of the Messiah.

[a] In the first sense it is used in Gen. xxvii. 19, xlviii. 18; Exod. xii. 29; Numb. xviii. 15, &c.

[b] There are other passages in which it is used metaphorically to express peculiar honour and dignity. "Israel is my son, even my first-born" [Exod. iv. 22]. "Ephraim is my first-born" [Jer. xxxi. 9]. This is also a Hebrew use which has been rendered by the translators of the Authorized Version "first-born" in Isa. xiv. 30, where the first-born of the poor means very poor; and Job xviii. 13, where the first-born of death means the most terrible form of death.

[c] It is used as a title of our Saviour without reference to priority of birth in Ps. lxxxix. 29. In the New Testament our Lord is called πρωτότοκος ἐν πολλοῖς ἀδελφοῖς, "the first-born among many brethren" [Rom. viii. 29], πρωτότοκος πάσης κτίσεως, "the first-born of every creature," signifying the dominion which He has received, who is made Head over all things. Πρωτότοκος ἐκ τῶν νεκρῶν [Col. i. 18; Rev. i. 5] means not the first who was raised, for that Christ was not, but He Who hath power over death, and Whose resurrection is an earnest of that of all His people.

Therefore the word πρωτότοκος, inserted in St. Matthew's Gospel, may be nothing more than a synonym of Christ. He was the "first-born," because He was the Second Adam, the Perfect Man, the Restorer and Redeemer of His brethren, the Lord of the Church, and the Heir of all things. The metaphor was borrowed from the dominion which the first-born exercised over his brethren; but, when the word is compared with other passages in which it occurs, it avails nothing for Helvidius' argument against the perpetual virginity of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

Another argument of the Antidicomarians was drawn from the mention made of the brethren of our Lord [John ii. 12; Matt. xii. 46], from which they inferred that these brethren were the children of our Lord's Mother by her marriage with Joseph; but

[1.] These brethren may have been the children of Joseph by a former wife. There is an old tradition preserved by Epiphanius, and followed by St. Hilary, St. Ambrose, St. Chrysostom, St. Cyril, Euthymius, Theophylact, Œcumenius, and Nicephorus, that Joseph had four sons and two daughters by a former wife named Escha. [See Eusebius, Ecc. Hist. ii. 1; Pearson On the Creed, vol. ii. 140.] St. Jerome was the first to confute this opinion, alleging that it rested only on a statement contained in an apocryphal writing.

[2.] It was held by St. Jerome, St. Augustine, and generally by the later commentators, that the brethren are not strictly the brethren, but the cousins of our Lord, in which sense the term is frequently used in Holy Scripture. [Gen. xiii. 8, xxix. 12; Lev. x. 4.]

Helvidius argued that there was proof from Scripture of James and John being not only the brethren of our Lord, but the sons of the Blessed Virgin Mary. Amongst the women at the Cross was Mary Magdalene and Mary the mother of James and Joses. That Mary, he thought, would be none other than the mother of our Lord, because she was found early at the sepulchre with Mary Magdalene and Salome, and it was improbable that any one should have greater care for the body of her Son than His mother.

The answer to this is clearly shewn by Bishop Pearson: "We read in St. John xix. 25 that 'there stood by the Cross of Jesus His mother and His mother's sister, Mary the wife of Cleophas and Mary Magdalene.' In the rest of the Evangelists we find at the same place 'Mary Magdalene and Mary the mother of James and Joses,' and again at the sepulchre, 'Mary Magdalene and the other Mary;' wherefore that other Mary by the conjunction of these testimonies appeareth to be Mary the wife of Cleophas and the mother of James and Joses; and consequently James and Joses, the brethren of our Lord, were not the sons of Mary His mother, but of the other Mary, and therefore called His brethren, according to the language of the Jews, because that the other Mary was the sister of His mother." [Pearson On the Creed, vol. i. 217.]

A fragment of Papias respecting the relationship of our Lord's brethren has been printed by Dr. Routh [Reliq. Sacr. i. 16], in which he distinguishes four Maries as follows:—

[1.] Mary the mother of our Lord.

[2.] Mary the wife of Cleophas or Alphæus, who was the mother of James the Bishop and Apostle, and of Simon and Thaddæus, and a certain Joseph.

[3.] Mary Salome, the wife of Zebedee, the mother of John the Evangelist and James. [Matt. xxvii. 56; Mark xv. 40, xvi. 1.]

[4.] Mary Magdalene.

These four are found in the Gospels. James and Judas and Joseph were the sons of the maternal aunt of our Lord. Mary the mother of James the Less and Joseph, wife of Alphæus, was sister of Mary the Lord's mother, whom John calls "of Cleophas" (ἡ τοῦ Κλωπᾶ, xix. 25), either from her father or her family, or from some other cause. Mary is called Salome either from her husband or her residence. She, too, some call "of Cleophas" because she had had two husbands.

In the Greek Church the Blessed Virgin has always been called ἀει πάρθενος. This term was used by St. Athanasius. She was so called at the Council of Chalcedon [A.D. 451], and in the Confession of Faith published by Justin II. in the sixth century.

If the gate of the sanctuary in the Prophet Ezekiel be understood of the Blessed Virgin—"This gate shall be shut, it shall not be opened, and no man shall enter by it: because the Lord God of Israel hath entered by it, therefore it shall be shut" [Ezek. xliv. 2]—the perpetual virginity of the Blessed Virgin will appear necessary to that honour which belongs to her Divine Son, as well as to that which, for His sake, the Church has always accorded to her. [MARY.]

PERSECUTION. True religion is essentially aggressive and intolerant of error. It would fain "compel" all to come into God's house. It "earnestly contends for the faith." It abhors indifferentism and syncretism, believing that their true source is not faith and charity, but the very contrary of these, Laodicean lukewarmness and tacit infidelity. Toleration of error on the part of the Church would render useless God's revelation of truth, would make God the abettor of error, would either destroy the Church as a society of believers, or contradict the divine order which establishes it as the way of salvation.

What, then, are the means of aggression upon the world of unbelief? What the arms of compulsion? What the mode of contending for the faith?

The Church, as such, uses only spiritual weapons—the earnestness of entreaty, the force of prayer, the terrors of conscience, the powers of the Gospel. Its punishments, too, are entirely spiritual censures, and the different degrees of excommunication.

This is shewn from the nature of religion in general, and the spirit of Christianity in particular: from the constitution of the Church as a spiritual body: from the tenor of Scripture, which explains the compulsion of Luke xiv. 23 as being spiritual compulsion only: from St. Paul's language to Timothy, as 2 Tim. ii. 24, &c. [see Samuel Clarke's Sermon against Persecution for Religion, Serm. i. p. 659], and from the Fathers [see Bp. Taylor's Liberty of Prophesying, sect. xiv.].

All temporal penalties, then, inflicted by the Church as a spiritual body, must be classed as persecution. It will be observed that such penalties can proceed only from a power either usurped or wrongfully given. The Church, a spiritual society, has no power over the body. Its capital punishment is deliverance to Satan. It may impose penance, it may enjoin restitution, it may arbitrate, but these sentences it can enforce only by spiritual inducements. Coercive jurisdiction it has none. And if any such jurisdiction be assigned it, it becomes, so far, a minister of the civil authority which makes the assignation: and so far, it leaves its own sphere and becomes a temporal power.

Temporal pains and penalties belong only to the temporal power, which moves in the external sphere of overt acts, and does not deal with the will and conscience. The cause of this is that, inasmuch as Almighty God has put man's life into man's keeping, and intrusted him with goods, the society which is to have power over life and goods is not formed without man's concurrence. The Church, on the other hand, is not formed by man's consultation, nor can it be modified at man's pleasure. Man joins it by voluntary submission, without any power of altering its constitution. The Church, therefore, has no power over life and goods, for the power over these, which God has once given, He will not take away.

The concurrence of men in the formation of civil society is properly considered by holding up the ideal of a social contract, a contract perpetually forming and modifying, as the mind of a nation expresses itself in law: and such ordinances of men are ratified by God's Providence, Which has worked also in their formation. Whence it is said, "Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake."

Such compact, then, according to the religious state of those who make it, may be [1] a complete identity of the members of the Church and State. This is the highest theory. [2] Or an established and preferred Church, with toleration in different degrees for other religious bodies. Jeremy Taylor, e.g., advocated toleration for all those who accept the Apostles' Creed. A tendency towards this limited toleration is observable in the law punishing a denial of the doctrine of the Trinity, 9 & 10 Will. III. cap. 32, sec. 1, repealed as regards the Holy Trinity by 53 Geo. III. cap. 160, sec. 2. [3] Or complete equality of all religious bodies. Any one of these positions the Church of Christ may hold. In any case it ought to retain distinctly its proper position as a society of divine institution, in the world but not of the world. Especially, it ought not to usurp in the name of religion the powers and aims of State law. There cannot be a greater mistake in statesmanship than to confound the temporal and spiritual estates and jurisdictions.

Toleration, then—forced obedience to a church—complete equality of religious bodies, are matters which belong entirely to a nation in its civil organization. The Church, as a spiritual body, has nothing to do with them. It continues its own course, neither intruding into the sphere of the State, nor refusing to aid the State, nor rejecting an alliance with the State.

To support that position of Church affairs, which the supposed civil compact has established, a civil power may use its own means. It may inflict temporal penalties on those who break the compact, and thus endeavour to suppress all dissent, to maintain peculiar privileges, or to assure equal rights. Such penalties are not persecution, they are lawful punishments; they are not immediately for the propagation or support of religion, they are for the maintenance of an established order of society which requires more or less a national observance of religion. Like temporal penalties in other cases they may be carried to excess, and are then called persecution (nor need we hesitate about the use of the word), but they are then an excess in degree, not a departure from principle.

The great consequence from the principles we have tried to establish, is that the temporal penalties spoken of can be inflicted only for overt acts. The compact of society does not profess to touch the mind. It leaves the will and conscience to the divine institution of the Church. Consequently for matters of opinion, for belief privately held, there can be no temporal penalty at all. The temporal penalty is outside the power of the Church, the private belief is outside the supervision of the State.

We may therefore define persecution thus—the infliction of temporal penalties by the spirituality as the spirituality, or by the civil power for other than overt acts.

It will be well to give some examples. From the reign of Elizabeth to that of James II., attempts were made to realize the high theory that all members of the State are members of the Church. Bacon writes, during that age, "There are two extremities in State concerning the causes of faith and religion; that is to say, the permission of the exercises of more religions than one, which is a dangerous indulgence and toleration; the other is the entering and sifting into men's consciences when no overt scandal is given, which is rigorous and strainable inquisition" [Observations on a Libel, Works, ed. 1824, iii. p. 58]. And regarding the proceedings against the pretended Catholics [p. 72], he finds "Her Majesty's proceedings to have been grounded on two principles; the one, that consciences are not to be forced, but to be won and reduced by the force of truth, by the aid of time, and the use of all good means of instruction and persuasion: the other, that causes of conscience when they exceed their bonds, and prove to be matter of faction, lose their nature; and that sovereign princes ought distinctly to punish the practice or contempt, though coloured with the pretences of conscience and religion."

Of the divisions in our Church, he writes [p. 59], "Certain men moved with an inconsiderate detestation of all ceremonies or orders which were in use in the time of the Roman religion . . . have sought by books and preaching, indiscreetly and sometimes undutifully, to bring in an alteration in the external rites and policy of the Church; but neither have the grounds of the controversies extended unto any point of faith; neither hath the pressing and prosecution exceeded, in the generality, the nature of some inferior contempts." In the judicial charge upon the Commission for the Verge [iv. 384-7], the laws against Romanists are declared to be "not the punishment of the error of conscience, but the repressing of the peril of the estate:" and the punishable offences against God and His Church are stated to be overt acts of profanation, contempt and breach of unity.

The second shall be Jeremy Taylor's Liberty of Prophesying, in which a toleration is claimed for all Christians who receive the Apostles' Creed. He shews the inefficacy of force in matters of opinion, how a resort to such measures derogates from the honour of the Christian religion, and that God alone has power over the soul of man so as to command a persuasion or to judge a disagreeing: he defines the nature of spiritual censures, but passing to the secular power, and premising that opinions as such are not subject to secular jurisdiction, he argues that heresy is a work of the flesh, and all heretics criminal persons, whose acts and doctrine have influence upon communities of men, whether ecclesiastical or civil; and that therefore the governors of the republic or Church respectively are to do their duties in restraining those mischiefs which may happen to their several charges: that all vices and every part of ill life are to be discountenanced and restrained, and therefore in relation to that opinions are to be dealt with: and [sect. xix.] that there may be no toleration of doctrine inconsistent with piety or the public good.

The third example shall be from Lord Stanhope's Speech upon Lord Sidmouth's Bill, 1811. "He hated the word toleration, it was a beggarly, narrow, worthless word: it did not go far enough. He hated toleration, because he loved liberty. . . . . Was not America religious? Yet there, there was no established religion—there, there were no tithes. In one particular state, that of Connecticut, he was informed there was a law, that if any man voluntarily gave a bond to a clergyman, no suit upon it could be entertained in a court of justice. And for a good reason, because it being the duty of the clergyman to instruct his flock, and to make them good and honest men, if he succeeded in doing so, no such suit would have been necessary: on the other hand, having failed to perform his duty, he could have no right to be rewarded. . . . To toleration, as it now existed in this country, he was a decided enemy, but to religious liberty a most decided friend, convinced that no restraint should be put on religion, unless in so far as it might seem to endanger the State" [from Chandler's History of Persecution, p. 470].

In Lord Bacon's statement the principle is intelligible, that the State, of its own motion and by its own officers, shall enforce the laws of the Church: in Taylor's the principle is absurdly impracticable, that the State shall judge of heresies, and restrain such as will have an ill effect: in Lord Stanhope's the principle is again intelligible, that there shall be no restraint whatever in religious matters, unless there be a direct attempt endangering the State. Taylor's celebrated treatise shews, in argument, what was observed from history, that toleration is only a short-lived step from a true union of Church and State to that indifferentism in which all religions are equal, and crime is estimated only politically. And what is meant in the school of indifferentism by religious equality, when a minister of religion is one of the parties, Lord Stanhope shews with perfect honesty.

Lastly, the doctrine of the Romish Church must be noticed. We have an authoritative declaration of Romish doctrine in the Bull of Pius VI., A.D. 1794, which condemns the reforming Synod of Ricci, Bishop of Pistoia. The synod had affirmed, "Abusum fore auctoritatis ecclesiæ transferendo illam ultra limites doctrinæ ac morum, et eam extendendo ad res exteriores, et per vim exigendo id quod pendet a persuasione et corde, tum etiam multo minus ad eam pertinere, exigere per vim exteriorem subjectionem suis decretis;" and this proposition is declared heretical as far as by the indeterminate words "extendendo ad res exteriores" is denoted an abuse of Church power; and, "Qua parte insinuat, ecclesiam non habere auctoritatem subjectionis suis decretis exigendæ aliter quæm per media quæ pendent a persuasione,—quatenus intendat ecclesiam 'non habere collatam sibi a Deo potestatem, non solum dirigendi per consilia et suasiones, sed etiam jubendi per leges, ac devios contumacesque exteriore judicio ac salubribus pœnis coercendi atque cogendi" [ex Bened. XIV. in brevi Ad Assiduas, anni 1755; primati, archiepiscopis, et episcopis regni Polon.]: Inducens in Systema alias damnatum ut Hæreticum." [Damnatio Synodi Pistoriensis, art. iv. v.; in Appendix to Canones Conc. Trident., Tauchnitz ed. p. 298.]

By this determination of two popes must be interpreted the oath taken by a bishop upon consecration: "Hæreticos, schismaticos, et rebelles eidem Domino nostro vel successoribus prædictis, pro posse persequar et impugnabo" [Pontificale Rom.].

The claim for the Church of the power of temporal punishment is distinct. The union of civil sovereignty over the papal states with the ecclesiastical primacy makes such a claim more natural to the head of the Romish Church; but as the history of the papal states does not recommend such a union of the temporal and civil powers, so neither does the history of the Romish obedience recommend a transfer of coercive jurisdiction from the civil to the ecclesiastical tribunals. And that there is no such power divinely given to the Church we have endeavoured to shew.

PERSECUTIONS OF THE CHURCH. [PAGANISM.]

PERSONALITY. The word person is derived from "persona," originally a term of the theatre, and signifying the mask worn of old by actors. Hence it signified a dramatic character; and in Cicero a personage; in Suetonius an individual, as also in law Latin. Tertullian seems to use the word in its original sense where he says "Persona Dei, Christus Dominus," for he immediately interprets the words by the Apostle's expression, "Qui est imago Dei;" i.e., Christ is the eternal manifestation of the Deity [Adv. Marc. v. 11]; he uses it also in its conventional meaning, "personam nominis," the personage to whom the name attaches [ib. iv. 14]; but elsewhere he applies the word in its true ecclesiastical sense of an intelligent individual Being, "videmus duplicem statum non confusum sed conjunctum in una persona Deum et Hominem Jesum" [Adv. Prax. xxviii.]. Similarly the adverb "personaliter" means with him relative individuality in contrast with absolute Being, "Hunc substantialiter quidem αἰῶνα τέλειον appellant; personaliter vero πρὸ αρχὴν et τὴν ἀρχήν," i.e. the first absolutely, the second in antecedent relation with every after emanation. It is important to ascertain the meaning of ecclesiastical Latin terms in Tertullian, for when he wrote the language of the Church at Rome was Greek; and the Latinity of the Western Church, as well as the barbarisms of its version of Scripture, were imported shortly afterwards from Africa. "Persona" in Latin bore the same relation to "substantia," as ὑπόστασις to οὐσία in Greek theology; but ὑπόστασις in the sense of person was an exact etymological equivalent for the very different theological idea of "substantia" in Latin; hence arose the confusion that has been noticed under the article HYPOSTASIS. Hilary first coined the term "essentia," to convey the meaning of οὐσία; "novo quidem nomine," as says Augustine, "quo usi non sunt veteres Latini auctores, sed jam nostris temporibus usitato, ne deesset etiam linguæ nostræ quod Græci appellant οὐσίαν" [Civ. D. XII. ii.], and "persona" was retained as the equivalent for ὑπόστασις.

The meaning of "person" in theology is as Locke has defined it in metaphysics: "A person is a thinking intelligent being, that has reason and reflection, and can consider itself as itself, the same thinking thing in different times and places." There must be a continuous intelligence, and a continuous identity, as well as individuality. The memorable axiom of Descartes, "Cogito, ergo sum," may be applied not only to the reality of thinking substance but also to the true personality of that intelligent being. "I am a conscious being, therefore in that consciousness I have a personal existence." But "personality," as applied to the Divine substance, involves a contradiction that defines in this direction, as Dr. Mansell has observed, the limits of human thought [Limits of Religious Thought, p. 59]. We are compelled to apply to the Absolute our own insufficient human terms of finite relation. The idea of personality must always involve limitation, one person is invested with accidents that another has not. Yet God, as the designer and creator of the universe, must have a personal existence; as Paley has well stated it, "The marks of design are too strong to be gotten over, and design must have had a designer; that designer must have been a person. That person is God." But how is substance thus affected with personality? Analogy in such a matter cannot lead us through the difficulty, for God is one, and such a test is an impossibility for want of any true mean of comparison. Yet thus much may be said; so far as it reaches, analogy shews that the personality of the Deity is very possible; for if beings of another world could watch the growing results of human civilization, without having the power of tracing out the individual efforts that produce it, they would find themselves in a somewhat similar difficulty. Humanity, they might reason, is certainly intelligent substance; but substance is something vague and undetermined; yet the intelligence that is developing all terrestrial works must be the result of personal design and personal skill: therefore this world-wide humanity must have a definite personal subsistence. Adam, in the first instance, was that personal subsistence. Christ in the end shall recapitulate [Irenæus] all humanity in Himself, we know not how. Therefore in some way that is a present mystery, but of certain future solution, God may be Substance that is All-wise and Absolute, and yet personality may attach to His Being, limiting the Unlimited, and defining the Indefinite [Mansell, Limits of Relig. Thought, 56-59. SUBSTANCE]. In the meantime the idea of personality is mixed up intimately with all man's highest and noblest notions of the Deity [Mansell, 57, 240], neither is it possible to form the faintest possible conception of a non-personal God. The religious idea revolts against the negation, which, in fact, would be its annihilation. The sense of personal individual responsibility to a personal God and Father of all would pass away, and a "caput mortuum" of Pantheism would be all that would remain—an illusive Máyá for the present, a hopeless Nirwáná for the future.[1]

Next, with respect to a plurality of persons in the Deity, Hooker excellently defines the properties that determine this phase of the Divine Nature [see p. 320, HYPOSTASIS]; and his generalization may serve to impress upon the mind the impossibility of expressing the mutual relations of three Hypostases in one substance by any adequate term that human language can supply. That which transcends thought can never find expression by the tongue. The Personality of the Father and Holy Spirit is affected by nothing without the Divine Nature; the Personality of the Son has been modified since the Incarnation by taking the Manhood into God; and a second definition by Locke exactly covers this modification; "Person," he says, "belongs only to intelligent agents, capable of a law and happiness and misery," all of which accidents of personality pertain to Christ, though not to the Person of the Son of God as pre-existing eternally in the mere glory of the Word. PESCHITO. [VERSIONS.]

[1] Madame de Staël observes, "L'école de Schelling suppose que l'individu perit en nous, mais que les qualités intimes que nous possédons rentrent dans le grand tout de la création eternelle. Cette immortalité la ressemble terriblement à la mort." [De l'Allem. iii. 7.]

PIETISM. A School of German Protestantism founded by Philip Jacob Spener [A.D. 1635-1705], a Lutheran preacher of Frankfort, in the latter half of the seventeenth century. The leading idea of Pietism is that of a Christian life independent of Christian theology.

Spener, the founder of this form of Lutheran Protestantism, began his career as a popular preacher at Strasburg, from whence he removed to Frankfort in A.D. 1666; afterwards becoming Court preacher at Dresden, and in A.D. 1691 being made Provost or Dean of St. Nicolas Church, Berlin, where he died. While at Frankfort he instituted societies which he named "Colleges of Piety," of a character not unlike the "Societies for the Reformation of Manners," which were being established at the same time in England. It was from these "Collegia Pietatis," the first of which met at Spener's house in A.D. 1670, that the name of the school was derived. By means of them he largely influenced the younger men of his day, and many of them were trained by him for the Lutheran ministry. In A.D. 1675, Spener published his principal work, Pia Desideria, in which he explained and developed his principles to the world at large. These were very much of the same character as those ultimately developed as the basis of METHODISM in England after the death of Wesley; giving the foremost place to subjective faith as the root of godly living, and attributing great value to lay-preaching. The principles of Spener spread very rapidly through the newly founded University of Halle, which was their stronghold, and although displaced by Rationalism there and in many of their original centres, are still very prevalent in Hesse and Wurtemburg, in Berlin and other parts of Prussia.

Pietism was a moral recoil from the gross profligacy into which Germany had fallen after the termination of the Thirty Years' War [A.D. 1618-1648]. That a revival of practical religion should be characterized by much enthusiasm, and a depreciation of doctrine, was only to be expected, such being the case with all revivals of the kind. But, in Lutheran Germany there was a special reason why a recoil from immorality should also be characterized by an aversion to theological dogmas. For Lutheranism had dried up into a mere religion of orthodoxy, its special orthodoxy (like that of Scottish Presbyterianism) consisting in an attitude of pugnacity towards other orthodoxies, and an unbalanced reliance upon certain comparatively unimportant and unpractical doctrines. "In the times succeeding the Reformation, the greater portion of the common people trusted that they should certainly be saved if they believed correct doctrines; if one is neither a Roman Catholic nor a Calvinist, and confesses his opposition, he cannot possibly miss heaven; holiness is not so necessary after all" [Auberlen, Die Göttliche Offenbarung, i. 278]. The modern relation of Pietism to Lutheranism is analogous to that of Evangelicalism to the "high and dry" party of the English Church in the first quarter of the present century. Like Evangelicalism it has lost ground through want of intellectuality, and has thus left the way open to Rationalism.

POLYGAMY. The custom of marrying more wives than one, common in many nations and in all ages of the world, and which we read of in Genesis [iv. 19] as existing from a very early period.

As regards the Jewish dispensation it is fully admitted that polygamy was not only allowed or tolerated, but even legally sanctioned. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were polygamists, and yet they are not censured in Scripture, nor is their conduct spoken of as immoral or contrary to the Divine Law; it had implicitly, at least, Divine permission. But polygamy was also in strict accordance with the Levitical Law. Thus we read in Deuteronomy [xxi. 15, 16], "If a man have two wives, one beloved, and another hated, and they have borne him children, both the beloved and the hated; and if the first-born son be her's that was hated: then it shall be, that when he maketh his sons to inherit that which he hath, that he may not make the son of the beloved first-born, before the son of the hated, which is indeed the first-born." Here we find that the marriage of both women is equally allowed: they are both wives. Again, Nathan says to David, "I (God) gave thee thy master's wives into thy bosom" [2 Sam. xii. 8], which cannot mean less than that God fully permitted or sanctioned David's polygamy. After Uriah's death, David, who had already many wives, married Bathsheba (without remonstrance from the prophet Gad); her son was Solomon, David's successor, who, unless polygamy was sanctioned and in the strictest sense legal, could have only been David's illegitimate son. We read moreover, that "Joash did that which was right in the sight of the Lord all the days of Jehoiada the priest. And Jehoiada took for him two wives: and he begat sons and daughters" [2 Chron. xxiv. 2, 3]. It must be admitted with these instances before us that polygamy was in full accordance with, and sanctioned by, the law which God gave to His chosen people.

But the important question arises whether polygamy is in itself immoral or sinful. It is impossible to answer affirmatively, since we could not then suppose that it would have been permitted at all. Polygamy is not per se immoral; it was not forbidden under the old dispensation; and as the Apostle says, "where there is no law there is no transgression" [Rom. iv. 15]. Thus patriarchs and holy men of old followed their own opinions or inclinations, or conformed to the ordinary usage or custom. Had a prohibitory law against polygamy been given, it must have been universally enforced, and the Jewish nation was not prepared for such an enactment. Admitting this, still it is difficult to understand why Abraham and other holy men should have availed themselves of this permitted usage: we might have supposed that, although polygamy was allowed, yet it was on account of generally prevailing moral corruption, and was assuredly incompatible with the original institution of marriage, and, at the best, morally considered, was a very imperfect and inferior state. It is a remarkable fact that when Almighty God selects three men from the mass of humanity as righteous before Him, two should have one wife only, and the third was probably unmarried. When God sends His four sore judgments upon a land, says Ezekiel [c. xiv.], "though Noah, Daniel, and Job were in it, they should deliver but their own souls by their righteousness." Noah had only one wife, Job only, it would appear, one of unhappy notoriety, and Daniel was probably unmarried.[1]

It is to be considered, also, that in the book of Proverbs written by Solomon, whose polygamy was so notorious, there is no recognition of, or even allusion to, polygamy; on the contrary, we read, "rejoice with the wife of thy youth: let her be as the loving hind and the pleasant roe: let her breasts satisfy thee at all times, and be thou ravished always with her love" [v. 18, 19; see also xxxi. 10-31]. And Solomon says in Ecclesiastes, "Live joyfully with the wife whom thou lovest all the days of the life of thy vanity" [ix. 9]. Solomon, whatever might be his own practice, was led by the Spirit of God to teach the Jews that there was a higher and better state than that of polygamy, and thus really, though only implicitly, to discountenance it. For though polygamy was not forbidden in early ages, the evils inseparable from the usage ought to have been sufficient to warn men against it. Though, as we have seen, it is fully allowed by the law, yet the custom is now almost unknown amongst the Jews, and had been so even before the time of our Lord. This is a fact which can only be accounted for by its inherent and inseparable evils as proved by long experience;[2] and a stronger argument against polygamy could hardly be desired.

Our Lord does not directly forbid polygamy, or even allude to the subject, since it had been almost universally given up. No case of polygamy amongst the Jews is presented in the Gospel narrative; and when a wife is mentioned, it is stated or implied in the account that she is the only wife. The special evil of Jewish society was the facility of divorce—men putting away their wives for any, often a trifling, cause. Our Lord, when the Pharisees asked Him [Matt. xix. 3-9], whether it was lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause, replied that God at the beginning made them a male and a female (ἄρσεν καὶ θῆλυ), thus indirectly condemning polygamy as contrary to the original institution of marriage: with a male and a female only polygamy was impossible. He then declares that the bond of marriage is indissoluble; the husband and wife are no more twain, but one flesh, and what God hath thus joined together, let not man put asunder; and afterwards replies to their question on divorce.

The teaching of St. Paul is worthy of most serious attention, as the subject of polygamy must have come immediately before him. The Christian converts in the Apostolic age may be divided into three classes—Jews, Romans, and Greeks. Polygamy, though not unknown amongst the Jews, had fallen, as we have said, into general disuse. It was positively forbidden by the Roman law, though divorce was even more frequent amongst the Romans than the Jews, but it undoubtedly was the common usage of the Greeks.[3] The Epistles of St. Paul generally were addressed to Grecian converts; let us see then how he dealt with the question, which must have come directly before him. Two ways were open to the Apostle, either a partial or temporary toleration, or an immediate and direct prohibition of the custom. The multitude of Greek converts were undoubtedly polygamists; it might seem a hard measure, and would produce much domestic discontent and misery to compel converts to abandon their wives legally married according to the Grecian law. Did then the Apostle permit the usage temporarily, either till that generation had passed away, or polygamists themselves had been willing to conform to the higher Christian standard? We most emphatically reply that the Apostle never for even the briefest period tolerated polygamy amongst baptized or Christian disciples, and that it never existed in the Christian Church at all! Had it been tolerated even temporarily, some notice or allusion to it would be found in the Apostolic Epistles. The sincerity of converts must have been put to a severe test: to give up their wives no doubt often involved a painful sacrifice to Christian duty, yet so emphatic and peremptory must have been the Apostle's prohibition, that not a murmur of opposition was heard from Corinth, Ephesus, Philippi, Thessalonica, and other Christian communities. The Apostle often censures Grecian converts for their violation of Christian duty, some of them having fallen from their regenerate state, and abandoned themselves to their old sins; but we find no

[1] We also read in the New Testament of a Jew and his wife (Zacharias and Elisabeth) whom the Holy Ghost speaks of as both righteous before God and walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless [Luke i. 6].

[2] See Allen's Modern Judaism, xxiii. [A.D. 1816].

[3] Thus Theodoret says: Πάλαι γὰρ εἰώθεισαν καὶ Ἕλληνες καὶ Ἰουδαῖοι καὶ δύω καὶ τρισὶ καὶ πλείοσι γυναιξὶ νόμῳ γάμου κατὰ ταυτὸν συνοικεῖν. [Com. in 1st Tim. iii. 2.]

allusion to polygamy in his Epistles, nothing which implies that it was continued or even known amongst them. There is no mention, however remote or indirect, of a believer's wives. This silence can only intimate the utter abandonment of the usage amongst Christians as clearly as the most emphatic statement. It could not have been tacitly allowed as indifferent, or permitted even for a brief period; since it must be remembered that the Apostle had expressly forbidden polygamy, and if it existed at all in the Christian communities he planted, it could only have been in defiance of his direct prohibition. No language can be plainer than that of the seventh chapter of the first Epistle to the Corinthians, "Let every man have his own wife, and every woman her own husband; let not the wife depart from her husband, let not a husband put away his wife." Again, the non-existence of polygamy in the Apostolic Churches is implied in the same Apostle's comparison of marriage to the union of Christ and His Church. The Apostle says, "the husband is the head of the wife even as Christ is the Head of the Church" [Ephes. v. 53]; but as Christ's Church, as St. Paul says, is one Body [Ephes. iv. 4], there would be no meaning in the comparison, no similarity in the things compared, if the husband might have a plurality of wives: the marriage union would not then have a typical representation of the union of Christ with the one Body, which is His Church.

Taking, again, the testimony of the Catholic Church, the evidence against polygamy will appear most positive and decisive. The mind of the Divine Legislator was so clearly and ineffaceably stamped on His followers, that the usage in early and later ages of the Church was utterly unknown: there is no instance on record of a baptized polygamist for fifteen hundred years after Christ. Catholic, schismatic, and heretic, amidst all their differences, agreed at least on this point. No professing Christian, however erroneous his belief or scandalous his life, ever ventured to revive the interdicted usage. The practice of the whole world was strictly uniform until, in the sixteenth century, Luther unhappily gave permission to one of his followers to marry a second wife during the lifetime of the first: the Landgrave of Hesse was the first polygamist in the Christian Church.

The testimony of the Church, clearly brought before us by the consentient practice of Christians in all ages, is too explicit to leave room for further controversy, or any real doubt of the teaching of the New Testament on the subject; but unhappily in modern times the question of polygamy has re-opened and has assumed great importance. Bishop Colenso in Africa, and missionaries of several denominations in India, allow heathen polygamists to retain their wives after baptism; though, on becoming Christians, they are forbidden to add to the number of them. Polygamist converts are not allowed, as being it is supposed in an inferior state, to bear office in the Church.[1] Now this view of the subject and corresponding practice can only be founded on an opinion or theory, which, if true, would render polygamy universally allowable amongst Christians. Let us ask ourselves the question, Is polygamy, according to the new dispensation, allowable, or indifferent, or sinful? If allowable or indifferent, why should it only be partially conceded and not permitted at all times? If it be wrong or sinful, how can we be justified in allowing it even during the shortest period. Its temporary permission amongst heathen converts rests on no authority, scriptural or patristic, or any valid plea whatever: no primitive precedent can be quoted, though it is obvious that the same reasons for it might have been alleged in the apostolic age, and also, it may be added, by missionaries in any subsequent period, as in modern times. In truth, its permission under any circumstances can only by logical sequence lead to its full sanction, as in the foul and degraded system of Mormonism.

But the defenders of modern polygamy will perhaps say that their strongest argument in its defence has not yet been examined; they lay especial stress on the examples of the Old Testament saints, which is probably the real reason why they venture to allow it, maintaining that God would not have permitted it for many ages had it been necessarily immoral or sinful. But are they prepared to say, which is the real question at issue, that in the New Testament there is no precept on the subject of marriage. If there be, the argument derived from the permitted usage of the old dispensation is of no value whatever, and may thus be stated: there was no positive law on the subject in the old dispensation, and hence many of the Jews were polygamists; there is a direct law or precept in the New Testament, and as such binding on believers, by which the Christian is limited to one wife. But should it be asserted that there is no positive precept on marriage in the New Testament, we shall thus have to fall back upon the old dispensation for instruction and guidance; in which case, why should we permit polygamy only for a time or in the case of heathen converts, instead of allowing Christians universally to follow, if they please, the example of the patriarchs and saints of the 1 "In 1834 the conference of missionaries of various denominations in Calcutta, including those of the Baptist, the London and the Church Missionary Societies, of the Church of Scotland, and the American Presbyterian Board, after having had the whole subject frequently under discussion, and after much and serious deliberation, unanimously agreed on the following propositions, though there had previously been much diversity of opinion among them on various points. . . . If a convert before becoming a Christian has married more wives than one in accordance with the practice of the Jewish and early Christian Churches, he shall be permitted to keep them all; but such a person is not eligible to any office in the Church. In no other case is polygamy to be tolerated amongst Christians." [Dr. W. Brown's History of Missions, vol. iii. pp. 365-6, A.D. 1864]. If proof had been given that polygamy was allowed in the early Church, all controversy on the subject would have been at an end; its permission in modern times to converts from heathenism might have been allowed, or even in many cases be desirable; but the statement itself has no support whatever either from Scripture or the writings of the Fathers, or ecclesiastical history.

Jewish Church. If polygamy be permitted to converts from heathenism, on the ground that there is no positive precept on the subject in the New Testament, and that we may have recourse to the permission of the Jewish law, no reason most assuredly can be given why Christians generally may not be permitted to avail themselves of the sanction given to polygamy in the old dispensation, and by the example of its patriarchs and saints.

POLYTHEISM. The belief in, and the worship of, a plurality of gods.

I. Its origin and relation to Monotheism. Whether we approach the subject of Polytheism from the side of revelation and consider it in the light afforded us by the Mosaic record of early human history, or whether we follow the guidance of modern historical inquiry, the result arrived at is substantially the same. In both cases we are led alike to the conclusion that Polytheism is under no circumstances a primary form of human belief. There is strong reason for thinking that the earliest religious system constructed by any given race of men must have been a Monotheistic one, and that the later Polytheistic forms which the religions of some races have assumed have been in every case the result of a debasement or degeneration of their original belief.

The sense of personal dependence, into which most philosophers have agreed in resolving the earliest elements of natural religious feeling, could not, in the first instance, lead mankind to the notion of a plurality of gods. The undefined power which man feels to be around and above him—the "something" which is independent of him, and stronger than he—did not primarily present itself to his mind except under a form of unity. His earliest religion, therefore, is Monotheistic in its character (inasmuch as the sense of dependence does not necessarily postulate more than one unseen Power on which it feels itself to depend); but it is, at the same time, a Monotheism of a highly unstable nature, and one eminently liable, amongst races of rude faculties and with little power of abstraction, to assume a Polytheistic form. It was far from attaining the level of a dogmatic Monotheism—a religion, i. e., which not only possesses the conception of God as one, but a conception including the negation of the existence of more gods than one—a negation which is only possible after the conception, real or imaginary, of more than one God.

The degeneration of the original Monotheistic idea may be explained in two ways, according as we conjecture it to have arisen from infirmity of thought or deficiency of language. According to the former theory, the change to Polytheism would be the result of the dominion exercised at all times (but most of all in a rude age) by the senses over the reflective faculty. The idea of one Supreme Spirit which would exist in the best minds of an undeveloped age (and perhaps in all minds at their best and most reflective moments), would be always liable to be obscured by the multiplicity of the visible operations of that Spirit on earth. The tiller of the soil, in simple times, waiting anxiously for the sun or rain, would, in his joy at their arrival or in his despair at their absence, be too prone to attribute his good or ill-fortune to some individual power, for whose benefits he must be grateful, whose wrath he must propitiate—and a worship containing both the elements of prayer and thanksgiving would soon spring up between man and those supposed powers who governed the earthly phenomena upon which man is so dependent. The other theory is the one adopted by that school of inquirers who rely so much upon philological research for the elucidation of early historical problems. According to this view, the corruption of the ordinary Monotheistic idea was the result of a deficiency of language. The inability of mankind either to ascend to the conception of abstract being, or (in a rude age) to adapt language to such a conception, prevented man from giving the Unseen Being a name connoting merely that existence which they were conscious of as one; and they were therefore compelled to designate him by names connoting those acts and attributes which they were conscious of as many. Those who could not give the Supreme Power the name of God, as signifying mere "being," could conceive of him more readily as the Power who awakens the thunder or outspreads the heavens, and could name him accordingly "The Thunderer" or "The Bright One;" and so long as they kept distinctly before their minds the essential unity of the Being who performs these various acts, and looked upon their words as merely different names of one Existence, all was well. But in the course of time this distinction would vanish from the minds of worshippers; it would be thought that different names must needs imply different beings; the powers and attributes in right of which the names were given originally to one God become appropriated to the imaginary beings whom these names are supposed to represent, and a complete system of Polytheism is evolved.

It is probable that both these causes may have operated; one amongst some races, the other amongst others. The early Jewish lapses into Polytheism are a remarkable proof that the former cause is, at least occasionally, an efficient one. Nothing can better illustrate the inability of the human mind, in certain stages of its development, to rest upon the notion of an invisible God than the conduct of the Jews in the desert. The race which, of all others, should have been able, by the Divine assistance they were favoured with, to grasp the notion of one Supreme God, were no sooner deprived of the visible officer of the Deity—Moses, with his miraculous powers—than they relapsed into the idolatry of the nation they had left. They, to whom God had shewn His very guiding hand in the pillars of cloud and fire, called upon Aaron to make them a golden calf to lead them out of the wilderness. And their whole history shews a constant tendency to lapse into image-worship; not, as it for the most part appears, to the exclusion of the worship of God, but in addition to it. If such were the state of a race whose Monotheism was, it may be thought, secured by peculiar safeguards, it may be imagined what would be the case with less favoured peoples. It is, indeed, not until a comparatively high state of intellectual and moral development is reached, that a Monotheistic religion, if unsupported by a revelation, ceases to be in any danger of degenerating into Polytheism.

II. Its relation to the moral and religious life. The most striking characteristic of Polytheism, and that which most surely marks it as the offspring of the degradation of Monotheism, is to be found in its effect on the relation which should exist between religion and morality. Although it is undoubtedly true that a morality of by no means a low order can, and occasionally does, co-exist with a Polytheistic system of religion, yet they exist independently of each other. The more comprehensive and elaborate the Polytheism of a nation, the more complete is the separation established between the religious and the moral sphere of duties. History has, it is true, permitted us, in only one or two instances, to study the condition of a race which has combined a Polytheistic system with a morality of any pretensions; but these instances are of so crucial a nature as to afford ground for an induction: and it may safely be affirmed that whatever Polytheistic nation has taken anything like an advanced position in point of morals, has done so in spite, and not by virtue of, its religion. The level of morality, for example, to which the Athenians reached, they were enabled to attain from a variety of causes with which religion had nothing to do, and in which the chief share must be attributed to a political system well calculated to develope the civic and, with certain limitations, the family virtues, and to an intellectual culture and refinement producing their usual beneficial result on the moral state. But to their religion they owed nothing of all this. There may be traces in their language of a moral influence exercised by religion, but it is in their language only. Examined more nearly, their religion is found to have been a bare cultus, and nothing more—a matter of superstitious reverence, of pious observances, of prayers and offerings, perhaps, for national blessings, but in no respect of moral duties. Their gods were the givers or withholders of good, the bringers or averters of evil—and that was all. In the most spiritualized conception of their deities to which they could attain, those deities were merely the arbiters of human destinies, and arbiters themselves subjected to an inexorable preceding necessity superior to Zeus himself. If, as the arbiters of such destinies, they struck down guilty houses, it was in obedience to an eternal law, and not as a mark of moral reprobation; for an equally inevitable vengeance pursued the merely prosperous. Even the loftier moralities which their philosophers constructed owed nothing to their religion, or nothing at least to their national religion. Either, as Epicurus, they separated the gods finally and completely from any concern in human affairs, and therefore in human morals; or else, like Plato, when attempting to ally morals with religion, and give his precepts the sanction of a Divine approval, they use, more often than not, the language of Monotheism. But the consequences of this divorce of morality from religion are very disastrous to the general condition of a nation. It follows from it that the moral teachers of a race are compelled to make their appeals under the greatest disadvantage, for they have lost the most efficacious means of bringing about that alliance between the emotions and the reason, without which a code of morals appears to the mind as nothing more than a barren set of axioms. They have lost that powerful appeal to man's hopes and fears of an unknown future which is afforded by the doctrine of a moral government of the world; they cannot call man's gratitude for temporal blessings to the aid of his morality by shewing him that the God of the Commandments is also the Author and Giver of all good things; and, above all, they cannot invest moral actions with the force of a habit by connecting moral duties with habitual religious observances. The result is inevitable: that the morality of a Polytheistic nation cannot outlive the decay of the social and political institutions on which alone it depends for its morality. Thus, the most slavish period of the Roman Empire was also the period of its deepest moral degradation; and Christianity appearing on the scene, with its lofty morality and its pure Theism, found the old religion ready to be dethroned. POPERY. [ROMANISM. ULTRAMONTANISM.]

POPES, CATALOGUE OF. The succession of the bishops of Rome holds so important a place in historical theology, that it is here given (a few notes of important circumstances being associated with some of the names), from the Apostolic age to the present time.

In the middle of the second century, between A.D. 162 and A.D. 168, Irenæus wrote his work against Heresies, in one part of which he founds an argument against the heretics of his day on the fact that a perpetual succession of bishops had been kept up in the various churches. To reckon up these successions in all the churches, he says, would be very tedious, therefore he will support his argument "by indicating that tradition derived from the Apostles, of the very great, very ancient, and universally known Church founded and organized at Rome by the two most glorious Apostles, Peter and Paul" [Iren. adv. Hæres. iii. 3; cf. Tertull. adv. Marc. iv. 5]. He then goes on to say that "the blessed Apostles having founded and built up the Church, committed into the hands of Linus the office of the episcopate," and afterwards he enumerates in order all the successors of Linus down to "Eleutherius, who, now, in the twelfth place from the Apostles, holds the inheritance of the episcopate." This information is the earliest, and probably the most authentic, that we have respecting the early bishops of Rome, and is adopted in the following catalogue.

1. Linus [A.D. 68—80]. It is of him, says Irenæus, that St. Paul makes mention when writing to Timothy from Rome [2 Tim. iv. 21]. Eusebius says that he was bishop for twelve years, down to the second year of the Emperor Titus, and was the first in order "after Paul and Peter." The martyrologies state that he was crowned with martyrdom on Sept. 23rd, his day in the Roman Calendar [Iren. adv. Hær. iii. 3; Euseb. Hist. Ecc. iii. 13, 21].
2. Anacletus, Anencletus, or Cletus, [A.D. 80—93] is said to have been martyred on April 26th, in the year 93, and is commemorated on that day. He is named as second in order by Eusebius [Iren. adv. Hær. iii. 3; Euseb. Ecc. Hist. iii. 13, 21].
3. Clement [A.D. 93—100] is said by Irenæus to have been "in the third place from the Apostles," and is identified by Eusebius with the Clement named as his "fellow-labourer" by St. Paul [Phil. iv. 3] when writing from Rome.

   In the preface of Rufinus [A.D. 390] to his translation of the Clementine Recognitions, he speaks of the Epistle in which Clement announces to St. James the death of St. Peter, announcing also that the Apostle had left Clement to be his successor. Some will ask, he says, "Since Linus and Cletus were bishops in the city of Rome before this Clement, how could Clement himself, writing to James, say that the chair of teaching was handed over to him by Peter? Now, of this," he adds, "we have heard this explanation, that Linus and Cletus were indeed bishops in the city of Rome before Clement, but during the lifetime of Peter, that is, that they undertook the care of the episcopate, and that he fulfilled the office of the apostleship: as is found also to have been the case of Cæsarea, where, when he himself was present, he yet had Zaccheus, ordained by himself, as bishop. And in this way both statements will appear to be true, both that these bishops are reckoned before Clement, and yet that Clement received the teacher's seat on the death of Peter." Eusebius dates the death of Clement in the second year of Trajan, after an episcopate of nine years. He is the earliest Christian writer extant after St. John. [Fathers, Apostolic.] St. Clement is named as "the third that held the Episcopate at Rome after Paul and Peter" [Iren. adv. Hær. iii. 3; Euseb. Hist. Ecc. iii. 4, 115].

   [A second Anencletus is here inserted in Roman catalogues, but he is unnoticed by Irenæus and Eusebius.]
4. Evarestus [A.D. 100—109. Iren. adv. Hær. iii. 3; Euseb. Hist. Ecc. iii. 34, iv. 1].
5. Alexander I. [A.D. 109—119. Iren. adv. Hær. iii. 3; Euseb. Hist. Ecc. iv. 1, 4.]
6. Sixtus or Xystus I. [A.D. 119—128 or 129. Iren. adv. Hær. iii. 3; Euseb. Hist. Ecc. iv. 4, 5].
7. Telesphorus [A.D. 128 or 129—139]. Irenæus says that he "was gloriously martyred." He is remembered as having first introduced the Gloria in Excelsis into the Liturgy [Iren. adv. Hær. iii. 3; Euseb. Hist. Ecc. iv. 5, 10].
8. Hyginus [A.D. 139—142. Iren. adv. Hær. iii. 3, 4; Euseb. Hist. Ecc. iv. 10, 11].
9. Pius I. [A.D. 142—157. Iren. adv. Hær. iii. 3; Euseb. Hist. Ecc. iv. 11].
10. Anicetus [A.D. 157—168]. He was contemporary with Polycarp, who came to confer with him respecting the Paschal Controversy. [Iren. adv. Hær. iii. 3, 4; Euseb. Hist. Ecc. iv. 11, 14, 19.]
11. Soter [A.D. 168—176. Iren. adv. Hær. iii. 3; Euseb. Hist. Ecc. iv. 19, 23, v. præf.]
12. Eleutherus [A.D. 176—190], said to have been a Greek by birth, and associated with England by the tradition of King Lucius. [Iren. adv. Hær. iii. 3; Euseb. Hist. Ecc. v. præf. 4, 5, 22].
13. Victor [A.D. 190—c. 201]. In his time the controversy respecting Easter was continued with much bitterness, and Victor excommunicated the Eastern Churches. Irenæus wrote a synodal letter to the Bishop of Rome, rebuking him for his violence, and urging him not to interfere with the practice of the Eastern Churches [Euseb. Hist. Ecc. v. 22, 24, 28].
14. Zephyrinus [A.D. c. 201—218. Euseb. Hist. Ecc. v. 28; vi. 14, 21; Hippol. adv. Hær. ix. 6].
15. Callistus or Calixtus I. [A.D. 218—223. Euseb. Hist. Ecc. vi. 21]. Hippolytus [adv. Hær. ix. 6, 7, 8] gives much information about Callistus and Zephyrinus, and accuses them both of have countenanced Noëtus in his heresy. [Patripassianism.]
16. Urban [A.D. 223—230. Euseb. Hist. Ecc. vi. 21, 23].
17. Pontianus [A.D. 230—235. Euseb. Hist. Ecc. vi. 23, 29].
18. Anterus [A.D. 235, Nov. 21st—236, Jan. 3rd]. He occupied the see for one month only. [Euseb. Hist. Ecc. vi. 29.]
19. Fabian [A.D. 236—250, Jan. 21st]. He suffered martyrdom in the Decian persecution. [Euseb. Hist. Ecc. vi. 39.]
20. Cornelius [A.D. 251—252, Sept. 14th]. In his short episcopate arose the schism of Novatus [Antipopes], which led to much correspondence between him and St. Cyprian. In an epistle of the latter to his successor he speaks of Cornelius as a "blessed martyr." [Euseb. Hist. Ecc. vii. 2; Cypr. Ep. lvii. al. lxi.; Socrat. Hist. Ecc. iv. 28.]

    Novatian, Antipope [A.D. 251—268]. Martyred under Valerian. [Socrat. Ecc. Hist. iv. 28].
21. Lucius [A.D. 252—253, March]. Martyred after an episcopate of but a few months. [Euseb. Hist. Ecc. vii. 2.]
22. Stephen I. [A.D. 253—257, Aug.]. During his episcopate a controversy arose between the Bishop of Rome and the Bishops of Asia and Africa on the subject of the Lapsed; and two of St. Cyprian's epistles were written to Stephen, who broke off communion with him and the other African bishops, treating them with some of that arrogance which became so characteristic of later popes. He is said by Socrates to have been martyred [Euseb. Hist. Ecc. vii. 2, 5; Cypr. Epp.; Soerat. Hist. Ecc. iv. 28].

23. Sixtus or Xystus II. [A.D. 257—258, Aug. 6th.] said to have been an Athenian, martyred under Valerian, Eusebius erroneously says that he held the episcopate for eleven years instead of eleven months. [Euseb. Hist. Ecc. vii. 5, 14, 27.]
24. Dionysius [A.D. 259, July 22nd—269, Dec. 26th. Euseb. Hist. Ecc. vii. 27, 30].
25. Felix I. [A.D. 270—274. Euseb. Hist. Ecc. vii. 30, 32; Soerat. Hist. Ecc. ii. 37; Theodor. Hist. Ecc. ii. 17].
26. Eutychian [A.D. 274—283, Dec. 7th]. He appears to have occupied the see nearly nine years; Eusebius erroneously describes him as having been bishop for less than ten months. [Euseb. Hist. Ecc. vii. 32.]
27. Caius [A.D. 283—296, April 22nd. Euseb. Hist. Ecc. vii. 32].
28. Marcellinus [A.D. 296—304, Oct. Euseb. Hist. Ecc. vii. 32].
29. Marcellus [A.D. 308—310, Jan. 16th]. The see appears to have been vacant for four years; but some writers represent Marcellus as having succeeded immediately on the death of Marcellinus.
30. Eusebius [A.D. 310—310, Sept. 26th]. Bishop only for a few months.
31. Melchiades or Miltiades [A.D. 311, July 2nd—314, Jan. 11th]. This bishop held a council at Rome, by command of the Emperor Constantine, to settle the differences between the African bishops and Cœcilian, Bishop of Carthage, respecting the re-admission of the Lapsed to communion. It was the first council with which the civil authority had anything to do. [Euseb. Hist. Ecc. x. 5; Theodor. Hist. Ecc. i. 3.]
32. Sylvester [A.D. 314, Jan. 31st—335, Dec. 31st]. He was bishop during the Council of Nicæa, where he appeared by deputy. [Sozom. Hist. Ecc. i. 2; Theodor. Hist. Ecc. i. 3; Clinton, Fasti Romani, Tables, 539.]
33. Mark. [A.D. 336, Jan. 18th—Oct. 7th]
34. Julius [A.D. 337, Feb. 6th—352, April 12th]. During his pontificate the Council of Sardica was held [A.D. 347], at which the first step was taken towards the establishment of the papal supremacy, by allowing an appellate jurisdiction to the popes from all parts of the world. [Soerat. Hist. Ecc. i. 17, ii. 34; Sozom. Hist. Ecc. iii. 10.]
35. Liberius [A.D. 352, May 22nd. Expelled by the Arians in 355, returned upon submitting to the Arian Emperor Constantius, and was restored Aug. 2nd, 358; deceased, Sept. 24th, 366.]
36. Felix II. [A.D. 355. Expelled in 358; died Nov. 22nd 365.] Anti-pope consecrated by the Arian party.
37. Damasus [A.D. 366, Oct. 1st—384, Dec. 10th].
    Ursinus, anti-pope; [elected in Sept. 366; banished in Nov. 367.]
38. Siricius [A.D. 384, Dec.—398, Feb. 22nd al. Nov. 26th. Clinton, Fasti Romani, Tables, 539; Jaffé, Reg. Pontiff. p. 21].
39. Anastasius I. [A.D. 398—402].
40. Innocent I. [A.D. 402—417, March 12th?]
41. Zosimus [A.D. 417—418]. Zosimus was the first pope who claimed to "inherit from St. Peter a Divine authority equal to that of St. Peter" [Mansi, Conc. iv. 366].
    Eulalius, anti-pope [A.D. 418, Dec.] Expelled by the Emperor Honorius in March, A.D. 419.
42. Boniface I. [A.D. 418, Dec. 29th—422, Sept. 4th].
43. Cœlestine I. [A.D. 422—432]. The Council of Ephesus was held in the time of Cœlestine [A.D. 431], St. Cyril of Alexandria acting as his representative.
44. Sixtus III. [A.D. 432, July—440, Aug.] Accused in 434 by one Bassus, but acquitted by a council of fifty-six bishops. See vacant for more than forty days [Prosp. Chron.].
45. Leo I. a deacon [440, Sept.—461, Nov. 10th].
46. Hilarus [A.D. 461, Nov. 12th—468, Feb. 21st; Clinton, Fasti Rom., Tables, 671].
47. Simplicius [A.D. 468, Feb. 23rd or 24th—483, buried March 2nd. The day of death and that of burial were often the same. Ibid.]
48. Felix III. [A.D. 483, March 7th or 8th—492, Feb. 24th or 25th].
49. Gelasius [A.D. 492, Mar. 2nd—496, Nov. 19th].
50. Anastasius II. [A.D. 496, Nov. 24th or 25th—498, Nov. 16th or 17th: Clinton, Fasti Rom., Tables, 713; Jaffé, Reg. Pontiff. 61.]
51. Symmachus [A.D. 498, Nov. 22nd—514, buried July 19th].
    Laurence, anti-pope [A.D. 498, Nov. 22nd—exiled about 505].
52. Hormisdas [A.D. 514, July 20th—523; buried Aug. 6th or 7th].
53. John I. [A.D. 523, Aug. 13th—526]; died in May, at Ravenna, and in prison, whither he had been sent by the Arian king Theoderic.
54. Felix IV. [A.D. 526, July 12th—530, Sept.]
55. Boniface II. [A.D. 530, Sept. 22nd—532; buried Oct. 17th].
    Dioscorus, anti-pope [A.D. 530, Sept. 22nd; died Oct. 14th].
56. John II. [A.D. 532, Dec. 31st, or 533, Jan. 1st (Clinton, Fasti Rom. 755)—535, buried May 27th.]
57. Agapetus [A.D. 535, June 3rd—536, April 22nd]; died at Constantinople while on an embassy to the Emperor Justinian from King Theodatus, or Theodahadus.
58. Silverius [appointed, without election, by Theodatus, June 536—deposed by Belisarius in March 537, (Jaffé, Regesta Pontiff. 75,) died in exile 538, June 20th, ibid. 76; May 21st, Clinton, Fasti Rom. p. 769].
59. Vigilius [A.D. 537, March 29th (Jaffé, 76. Clinton, 803, fixes the commencement of his episcopate at Nov. 22nd)—555, Jan. 7th, or June 7th]. Died while on his return from banishment.
60. Pelagius I. [A.D. 555, April or June—560, March 1st.]
61. John III. [A.D. 560, July 18th—573, buried July 13th. Clinton, Fasti Rom., Tables, 831.]
62. Benedict I. [A.D. 574, June 3rd—578, buried July 31st.]
63. Pelagius II. [A.D. 578, Nov. 27th or 30th—590, Feb. 6th or 8th.]

64. GREGORY I. the Great [A.D. 590, Sept. 3rd—604, March 12th]. During his reign the mission of St. Augustine to Britain took place, and the foundation of the great See of Canterbury.
65. SABINIANUS [A.D. 604, Sept. 13th—606, Feb. 22nd]. His name is associated with the earliest use of church bells.
66. BONIFACE III. [A.D. 607, Feb. 19th—607, Nov. 10th or 12th]. The supremacy of the pope was formally usurped to its full extent by Boniface II. in the case of an appeal from the Archbishop of Larissa against the Patriarch of Constantinople [Mansi, Concil. 739].
67. BONIFACE IV. [A.D. 608, Aug. 25th or Sept. 15th—615, May 7th or 25th.]
68. DEUSDEDIT [A.D. 615, Oct. 19th—618, Nov. 8th].
69. BONIFACE V. [A.D. 619, Dec. 23rd—625, Oct. 22d or 25th].
70. HONORIUS I. [A.D. 625, Oct. 27th or Nov. 3rd—638; buried Oct. 12th]. Honorius was condemned as a Monothelite heretic by the sixth Œcumenical Council, that of Constantinople, on March 28th, 681 [MONOTHELITISM. Renouf's Condemnation of Pope Honorius, 1868].
71. SEVERINUS [elected A.D. 638-9, consecrated 640, May 28th—640, buried Aug. 2nd].
72. JOHN IV. [A.D. 640, Dec. 24th—642, Oct. 11th.]
73. THEODORE I. [A.D. 642, Nov. 24th—649, buried May 14th].
74. MARTIN I. [A.D. 649, July 5th—carried into exile from Rome, 653, June 19th, died 655, Sept. 16th.]
75. EUGENIUS I. [A.D. 654, Aug. 10th or 11th—657, June 1st].
76. VITALIAN [657, July 30th—672, buried Jan. 27th].
77. ADEODATUS [A.D. 672, April 11th—676, buried June 16th, Jaffé. Reg. Pontiff. p. 166].
78. DONUS [A.D. 676, Nov. 2nd—678, buried April 11th].
79. AGATHO [A.D. 678, June 27th—681 or 682, buried Jan. 10th]. This Pope sent John, precentor of St. Peter's, into England, to supplant the Ephesine by the Roman use in the northern monasteries [Bede, Hist. Ecc. iv. 18].
80. LEO II. [A.D. 682, Aug. 17th—683, buried July 3rd].
81. BENEDICT II. [A.D. 684, June 26th—685, buried May 8th].
82. JOHN V. [A.D. 685, July 23rd—686, buried Aug. 2nd].
83. CONON [A.D. 686, Oct. 21st—687, buried Sept. 22nd].
84. SERGIUS I. [A.D. 687, Dec. 15th—701, buried Sept. 8th.] Elected in order to terminate a contest between two rivals for the see, Theodore the Arch-priest, and Paschal the Archdeacon.
85. JOHN VI. [A.D. 701, Oct. 28th or 30th—705, buried Jan. 10th].
86. JOHN VII. [A.D. 705, March 1st—707, buried Oct. 18th].
87. SISINNIUS [A.D. 708, Jan. 18th—708, buried Feb. 7th].

88. CONSTANTINE I. [A.D. 708, March 25th—715, buried April 9th]. In his time the Iconoclast controversy began. [ICONOCLASM.]
89. GREGORY II. [A.D. 715, May 19th—731, Feb. 11th].
90. GREGORY III. [A.D. 731, March 18th—741, buried Nov. 29th].
91. ZACHARY [A.D. 741, Dec. 3rd—752, buried March 15th].

    STEPHEN, sometimes called STEPHEN II., was elected as Zachary's successor, but died four days afterwards, before consecration.

92. STEPHEN II. (III.) [A.D. 752, March 26th—757, buried about April 26th].
93. PAUL I. (brother of the preceding) [A.D. 757, May 29th—767, June 28th].
94. CONSTANTINE II. [A.D. 767, July 5th—768, deposed Aug. 6th.]

    PHILIP, elected July 31st, 768, but returned the same day to his monastery, being deposed by the partizans of Stephen III.

95. STEPHEN III. (IV.) [A.D. 768, Aug. 7th—772, Feb. 1st].
96. HADRIAN I. [A.D. 772, Feb. 9th—795, buried Dec. 26th].
97. LEO III. [A.D. 795, Dec. 27th—816, buried June 12th].
98. STEPHEN IV. (V.) [A.D. 816, June 22nd—817, Jan. 24th].
99. PASCAL I. [A.D. 817, Jan. 25th—824, between Feb. and May.]

    Pagi observes in his notice of this Pope that from this time until about the middle of the eleventh century, nothing can be said with certainty as to the days and months of the commencement and ending of the pontificates, and that the most which can be hoped for is the avoiding error with respect to the years [Crit. in Ann. Baronii, 1705, iii. 514]. The days generally given in this Table for the commencement are those of consecration and coronation, which ceremonies (as stated in the Roman Pontifical) were usually celebrated on the same day; where this date is not known, or where a lengthened interval elapsed between election and consecration, the day of election is mentioned in the place of or in addition to the other.

100. EUGENIUS II. [A.D. 824, May (?)—827, Aug.]
101. VALENTINE [A.D. 827—827, deceased forty days after his consecration].
102. GREGORY IV. [A.D. 827—844, Jan. 25th (?)]
103. SERGIUS II. [A.D. 844, Feb. 10th (?)—847, Jan. 27th]. John the Deacon attempted to seize the papal chair on the death of Gregory, but was expelled.
104. LEO IV. [A.D. 847, April 10th—855, July 17th.]
105. BENEDICT III. [A.D. 855, Sept. 29th—858, April 7th]. It is to this Bishop that the story of Pope Joan refers.

    ANASTASIUS, a rival candidate, expelled by the Imperial Legates.

106. NICOLAS I. [A.D. 858, April 24th—867, Nov. 13th.]
107. ADRIAN II. [A.D. 867, Dec. 14th—872, Nov.-Dec.]

108. JOHN VIII. [A.D. 872, Dec. 14th—882, Dec. 15th or 16th].
109. MARINUS I. [A.D. 882, Dec.—884, May].
110. HADRIAN III. [A.D. 884, May—885, Sept].
111. STEPHEN V. (VI.) [A.D. 885, Sept.—891, Sept.?]
112. FORMOSUS [A.D. 891, Sept.?—896, May?]. "Ann. Fuldenses, 896, p. 412. At Romæ Formosus papa defunctus est die sancto Paschæ (die iv. m. Apr.); pro quo scribendum fuisse puto, die S. Pentecostes (die xxiii. m. Maii), quum ex iis quæ præcedunt Formosum satis constet in vivis etiam die i. m. Maii fuisse." [Jaffé, Reg. Pontiff. 301.]
113. BONIFACE VI. [A.D. 896, May?—896]. Died from gout fifteen days after consecration.
114. STEPHEN VI. (VII.) [A.D. 896, June?—897, Aug.?] Expelled from the see, and strangled in prison.
115. ROMANUS [A.D. 897, before Aug. 20th?—897, Nov.?]
116. THEODORE II. [A.D. 897, Nov., Dec.?—897, Dec.?] Appears to have deceased about twenty days after consecration.
117. JOHN IX. [A.D. 898, June or July—900, July].
118. BENEDICT IV. [A.D. 900, July—903, Aug.?]
119. LEO V. [A.D. 903, Aug.?—903, Sept.?] Deposed, and died in prison.
120. CHRISTOPHER [A.D. 903, Oct.?—904, Jan. Jaffé, Reg. Pontiff. 307]. Deposed, and died in prison.
121. SERGIUS III. [A.D. 904, Jan. 29th?—911, beg. of Sept.]. Had been previously elected in A.D. 898 upon the death of Theodore II., but was driven out before consecration by the friends of John IX.
122. ANASTASIUS III. [A.D. 911—914, Oct., Nov.]
123. LANDO [A.D. 913—914, beg. of May?].
124. JOHN X. [A.D. 914, May 15th?—928]. Deposed in July, and died in prison, probably by murder.
125. LEO VI. [A.D. 928—929, Feb.].
126. STEPHEN VII. (VIII.) [A.D. 929, Feb.—931, March].
127. JOHN XI. [A.D. 931, March—936, Jan.].
128. LEO VII. [A.D. 936, before Jan. 9th—939, July].
129. STEPHEN VIII. (IX.) [A.D. 939, before July 19th—942, Nov.].
130. MARINUS II. [A.D. 942, before Nov. 11th—946, April?].
131. AGAPETUS II. [A.D. 946, before June 15th—955, Nov.?].
132. JOHN XII. [A.D. 955, Nov.?—963, deposed in Dec.; died May 14th, 964.] By this pope the custom was first introduced of changing the name on succeeding to the papal see; his name being originally Octavian. [Pagi, iii. 590.] Respecting the doubtful date of the commencement of his pontificate (fixed by Pagi after Aug. A.D. 956), see Jaffé, Reg. Pontiff. 321.
133. LEO VIII. [A.D. 963, Dec. 6th—965, March]. Sometimes called an anti-pope.
134. BENEDICT V. [A.D. 964, May 15th—964, deposed by the Emperor in favour of Leo VIII., June 23rd; died at Hamburg, July 4th, 965].
135. JOHN XIII. [A.D. 965, Oct. 1st—972, Sept. 6th].
136. BENEDICT VI. [A.D. 972, elected about Nov.; 973, consecrated Jan. 19th—974, July?]. Murdered in prison.
    BONIFACE VII. [A.D. 974, July], expelled after one month, and fled to Constantinople.
    DONUS II. [A.D. 974]. This name is inserted among those of the popes by Pagi, who thinks he held the see for a few months, and consequently places the accession and death of Boniface VII. in 975 and 984; others (e.g. Sismondi) suppose that Donus or Domnus is merely a contraction of the title of the next bishop, Dominus Benedictus. [See Milman's Latin Christianity, sub anno, and Jaffé, Reg. Pontiff. 331, who says that the non-existence of a pope Donus has been fully demonstrated by W. Giesebrecht].
137. BENEDICT VII. [A.D. 974, Oct.—983, Oct.[1]].
138. JOHN XIV. [A.D. 983—984]. Deposed by Boniface (who returned to Rome about April), and murdered in prison Aug. 20th.
139. BONIFACE VII. [A.D. 984—985, July].
    JOHN (XV.), son of Robert. Said by some to have been elected and to have held the see for four months without consecration; on which account he is not reckoned as the fifteenth pope of his name.
140. JOHN XV. [A.D. 985, before Oct. 19th—996, April].
141. GREGORY V. [A.D. 996, May 3rd—999, Feb. 18th]. Expelled from Rome in 997, but restored in 998.
    JOHN XVI., anti-pope [A.D. 997, about May—998, March]. Deposed, and cruelly mutilated.
142. SILVESTER II. [A.D. 999, April—1003, May 12th]. A French pope, and very learned, especially in mathematical science; whence he was accounted a magician by ignorant writers of the period.
143. JOHN XVII. [A.D. 1003, June 13th—1003, Dec. 7th].
144. JOHN XVIII. [A.D. 1003, Dec. 25th—1009, June?].
145. SERGIUS IV. [A.D. 1009, after June 20th and before Aug. 24th—1012, between June 17th and 22d].
146. BENEDICT VIII. [A.D. 1012, June 22d—1024, April 7th].
    GREGORY, anti-pope, elected in June 1012, but expelled.
147. JOHN XIX., brother of Benedict VIII., a layman [A.D. 1024, between June 24th and July 15th—1033, Jan?].
148. BENEDICT IX., nephew of the preceding, a boy little more than ten years old [A.D. 1033—1045; resigned in May, selling the papacy to John the archpriest (Gregory IX.); deposed Dec. 20th, 1046].

[1] Not July 10th, as in his epitaph. Jaffé, Reg. Pontiff. 335.

Silvester (III.), anti-pope, elected by the people of Rome [A.D. 1044, Feb. 22nd—1044, April. Driven out by Benedict IX.; deposed Dec. 20th, 1046].

149. Gregory VI. bought the papacy of Benedict IX. [A.D. 1045, May—1046, Dec. 20th. Compelled to resign for his simony.]

150. Clement II. [A.D. 1046, Dec. 25th—1047, Oct. 9th].

Benedict IX. again obtained the pontificate, and held it from Nov. 8, 1047 to July 7, 1048, when he was finally expelled by Emperor.

151. Damasus II. [A.D. 1047, appointed by the Emperor Dec. 25th; 1048, consecrated July 17th—1048, Aug. 9th].

152. Leo IX. [A.D. 1049, Feb. 12th (Jaffé, Reg. Pontiff. 367)—1054, April 19th.]

153. Victor II. [A.D. 1054, elected; 1055, consecrated April 13th—1057, July 28th].

154. Stephen IX. (X.) [A.D. 1057, Aug. 3rd—1058, March 29th].

Benedict X., anti-pope, seized the chair, and held it without canonical consecration from April 5th, 1058 to Jan. 1059, when he was driven from Rome; deposed in council in April 1059.

155. Nicolas II. [A.D. 1059, Jan. 24th—1061, July 27th].

156. Alexander II. [A.D. 1061, Oct. 1st—1073, April 21st].

Cadalus, or Honorius II., anti-pope, appointed by the Emperor at Basle [Oct. 28th, 1061; deposed in a council at Mantua, May 31st, 1064].

157. Gregory VII. (Hildebrand) [A.D. 1073, elected April 22nd; consecrated June 30th—1085, May 25th].

Clement III., or Wibert, anti-pope, elected June 25th, 1080, upon the excommunication of the Emperor Henry by Gregory; enthroned at Rome March 22nd, 1084, and consecrated March 24th; died in Sept. 1100.

158. Victor III. [elected A.D. 1086, May 24th; consecrated 1087, May 9th—1087, Sept. 16th].

159. Urban II. [A.D. 1088, March 12th—1099, July 29th].

160. Pascal II. [A.D. 1099, Aug. 14th—1118, Jan. 21st].

On the death of the anti-pope Clement III., Theodoric, or Theodore, was chosen in his room, who was captured and confined after the lapse of 105 days, about Dec. 1100. After him was chosen one Albert, who was also seized and "dispoped" the same day by Paschal's supporters. Next was chosen, on Nov. 18th, 1105, the Archipresbyter Maginolf, who assumed the name of Silvester IV.; he is said to have been soon expelled by the Romans, and was deposed by the Emperor in April 1111.

161. Gelasius II. [A.D. 1118, March 10th, at Gaeta—1119, Jan. 29th].

Burdinus, Archbishop of Braga, anti-pope, styled Gregory VIII. [A.D. 1118, March 8th, at Rome—1121, deposed and imprisoned in April].

162. Calixtus II. [A.D. 1119, Feb. 9th—1124, Dec. 13th or 14th].

163. Honorius II. [A.D. 1124, Dec. 21st—1130, Feb. 14th].

164. Innocent II. [A.D. 1130, Feb. 23rd—1143, Sept. 24th], elected first by a minority of the cardinals on Feb. 14th.

Anacletus II., anti-pope, elected afterwards by a majority [A.D. 1130, Feb. 23rd—1138, Jan. 25th].

Victor IV. elected on the death of Anacletus in March 1138, but resigned his pretensions on May 29th, and the schism ceased.

165. Cœlestine II. [A.D. 1143, Sept. 26th—1144, March 8th].

166. Lucius II. [A.D. 1144, March 12th—1145, Feb. 15th].

167. Eugenius III. [A.D. 1145, Feb. 18th (March 4th, Pagi)—1153, July 7th or 8th].

168. Anastasius IV. [A.D. 1153, July 12th?—1154, Dec. 2rd or 3rd].

169. Hadrian IV. [A.D. 1154, Dec. 5th—1159, Sept. 1st]. Nicholas Breakspeare, of St. Alban's, the solitary English Pope.

170. Alexander III. [A.D. 1159, Sept. 20th—1181, Aug. 30th].

Calixtus III. [A.D. 1168, Sept.—1178, Aug. 29th], submitted to Pope Alexander III. and resigned his pontificate.

Innocent III. [A.D. 1178, Sept. 29th—1180, Jan.], taken prisoner and banished.

171. Lucius III. [A.D. 1181, Sept. 6th—1185, Nov. 24th or 25th].

172. Urban III. [A.D. 1185, Dec. 1st—1187, Oct. 20th].

173. Gregory VIII. [A.D. 1187, Oct. 25th—1187, Dec. 17th].

174. Clement III. [A.D. 1187, Dec. 20th—1191, about March 28th].

175. Cœlestine III. [A.D. 1191, April 14th—1198, Jan. 8th].

176. Innocent III. [A.D. 1198, Feb. 22nd—1216, July 16th or 17th]. He excommunicated and deposed King John, (making the French king a present of the kingdom and people of England,) for maintaining the independence of the English Church in electing to the archbishopric of Canterbury without the interference of popes. He also held the fourth Council of Lateran [A.D. 1215] in which the distinctive doctrines of Romanism were officially engrafted upon the ancient Catholic Theology of the Church.

177. Honorius III. [A.D. 1216, July 24th—1227, March 18th].

178. Gregory IX. [A.D. 1227, March 21st—1241, Aug. 21st].

POSITIVISM. A school of thought founded on the principle that nothing is to be accepted as truth which can merely be proved to be the highest probability, but only that which can be positively demonstrated beyond room for doubt. It deals with the whole range of knowledge, and its practical object is that of developing the true system of social life.

This school of thought was doubtless an outcome of the French philosophy which was made fashionable by Voltaire and the Encyclopædists, and of the revolutionary socialism which found its extreme theoretical development in Saint Simonianism. But the founder of the school, as it now exists, was a young pupil of St. Simon named Augustus Comte [A.D. 1797-1857], who was employed to write an exposition of the "Politique Positive" of the Saint Simonian Society, when he was not much over twenty years of age. He had already made himself conspicuous by the boldness of his speculations, and when he separated from the Saint Simonians on the death of St. Simon in the year 1825, he at once began to think out those speculations into a system. The marvellous rapidity with which he did this brought on madness, just as he had announced a course of lectures in which his new philosophy was to be expounded. From 1826 until 1831 he was more or less insane, but was gradually nursed and soothed into sanity again by a lady who had been living with him as his wife, and whose friends took advantage of his condition to have the marriage ceremony performed between her and Comte, even while he was uttering blasphemous criticisms on its folly. In the year 1832 Comte had sufficiently recovered to be appointed Professor of Mathematics at the Polytechnic School, a post which he retained for twenty years, and which he was obliged to resign (living his remaining five years on the charity of friends), on account of his quarrels with other professors. He separated from his wife, and associated with a married woman, who died before himself; his own death taking place in Paris in September 1857.

Positivism is defined by its exponents as a philosophy and a polity, the two being necessarily inseparable, because they constitute the basis and aim of a system wherein intellect and sociability are intimately connected. A social doctrine is its aim, a scientific doctrine the means by which that aim is to be attained. Its principal function, in its earlier stage of progress, is to collect facts and laws, not investigating the causes of things, but building up knowledge by a continuous system of progressive inductions, and professing to hold deduction in abeyance until induction has been carried to the point of exhaustive completeness.

The view which the disciples of Comte take of his religious system is that it is the culmination of all previous phases of religion, and that as such it is the only system which is reconcilable with high intellectual development. There have been three stages of intellectual evolution, the Theological or Supernatural, the Metaphysical, and the Positive. [1.] In the first or Supernatural stage, the mind seeks for causes, and aspires to know the essences of things. It regards all effects as the results of supernatural agencies, and seeks to know the How and the Why of their operation. The only explanation it can give of the ultimate cause of all things is that there is some Deity above all, and unusual phenomena are interpreted as signs of His pleasure or displeasure. This theological or supernatural stage of intellectual evolution becomes weaker as it becomes more systematic. In its less developed phase it is Fetichism, after that it becomes Polytheism, later still Monotheism, and last of all Christianity. [2.] In the second, or Metaphysical stage of intellectual evolution, a modification of the theological phase ensues. Supernatural agencies are set aside as unworthy of being believed in: and in their place are substituted abstract forces, or entities, which are supposed to inhere in various substances, and to be capable of engendering phenomena. [3.] In the third, or Positive stage of intellectual evolution, the mind, convinced of the futility of all inquiries into causes and essences, restricts itself to the observation and classification of phenomena, and to the discovery of the invariable relations of succession and similitude which things bear to each other: that is, to the discovery of the laws of phenomena. This historical theory of religious development is supplemented by the statement that religion was at first spontaneous, then "inspired," after that "revealed," and is now in its complete and perfect form, in course of becoming "demonstrated." Theology and metaphysics have had their day, have become worn out, and now they are to be superseded by the "Religion of Humanity."

But when we have reached this sublime climax, and begin to inquire what this "Religion of Humanity" is, the rapid descent from sublimity is very striking. Every religion, it is said, must consist of an intellectual or objective, and a moral, or subjective part. The first constitutes the creed, the second the practice of the creed, which may be dismissed with the statement that the moral or subjective part of the religion of humanity is "Sociology," whereby the moral laws of all other religions are to be superseded! To return to the creed, or objective part, of Positivism,—it results from the demonstrated truths of Positive Science, which have furnished precise and coherent views of physical phenomena, and thus furnished a basis for religion. The first logical erection on this basis is the Deity of Positivism, which is Humanity. This is "the great Collective Life of which human beings are the individuals: it must be conceived as having an existence apart from human beings, just as we conceive each human being to have an existence apart from, though dependent on, the individual cells of which his organism is composed. This Collective Life is, in Comte's system, the Etre Suprême: the only one we can know, therefore the only one we can worship" [Lewes' Princip. of Posit. Philos. p. 342, ed. 1853]. Concrete humanity having been thus idealized into Deity, a Trinity is contrived out of Humanity, Earth, and Space. For prayer Positivism substitutes "effusion" or "reverie." For Resurrection it substitutes "living in the remembrance" of survivors.

The "Religion of Humanity" is, therefore, so far as it is not a mere bundle of negations, an overpowering Egoism. It is expounded as simply the relations in which we stand towards one another and to Humanity, but it practically restricts its view of those relations to their bearing on each individual person in each individual person's own conception of them. For the "Humanity" of which it makes a Deity is something which can be known to demonstration as far as each person is concerned only in himself, and so, on "positive" principles, the worship of Humanity is the worship of "Ego," each one being to himself the "Etre Suprême" of his religion. The sphere of the Infinite is altogether left out of the system as belonging to the unknown, because not demonstrable within the range of experience. But the experience of one person is not demonstrative proof to another person, and hence the range of knowledge and belief must be still further contracted, until by just and honest logic only each one's own experience can be, for him, the truth.

It is not to be wondered at that such a creed as that of Positivism soon comes down from its transcendental heights to old fashioned Fatalism and Materialism. It is its principle to "take things as they are, because they are" without considering cause or consequence; and however much its disciples may disclaim the charge, this is undoubtedly Fatalism. So also, "As a matter of fact the leading Positivists," says Lecky, "have been avowed Materialists, the negation of the existence of Metaphysics as a science distinct from physiology, which is one of their cardinal doctrines, implies, or all but implies, materialism; and the tendency of their school has, I think, of late years been steadily to substitute direct negations for scepticism" [Lecky's Hist. of Ration. ii. 408, n.]. As an attempt to form a philosophy of the physical sciences, Positivism may be doing a useful work, especially by checking the wild speculativeness and credulity by which students of natural science are often led away: but in dealing with religion it has gone far beyond its legitimate range, and its extreme form is that of a very irrational Atheism. [Comte's Cours de Philosophie positive. Lewes' Exposition of the principles of Positive Philosophy. Lewes' History of Philosophy. Stirling's Annot. to Schwegler's Hist. of Philosophy, 1868. RATIONALISM.]

POSTIL. This was originally a name given to the "gloss" or exposition which followed the words of the text that it expounded in commentaries on the Holy Bible, and which was hence called the gloss "post illa verba." Afterwards it came to be applied to short expositions which were preached, as well as to those which were written in the form of a commentary. But its most common use was as the name for sermons on the Gospels of the day; and as most of those Gospels were prefaced with "In illo tempore," or "In diebus illis," as some of our English Gospels are prefaced with "Jesus said to His disciples" [fourth Sunday after Easter, Whitsun-day], it is not unlikely that there was an association between the constantly recurring "illo" or "illis," and the name of the expository sermons on the passages of Scripture so ushered in.

There were many collections of such "postils" in mediæval times, some still found in MS. in our great libraries. One such also was made by Taverner, clerk of the signet to Henry VIII. (who printed a peculiar translation of the Bible about the same time), in A.D. 1540. It was compiled under the patronage of Cromwell the vicar-general, and the Postils for Good Friday and Easter Day were afterwards transferred to the Book of Homilies printed in Queen Elizabeth's reign. A collection of Postils was also printed by Reginald Wolfe in A.D. 1550.

POVERTY. [COUNSELS OF PERFECTION.]

PRAGMATIC SANCTION. An edict in which a prince, with the consent of his council, replies to the request, remonstrance, or suggestion of the authorities of the law or of the Church.

Of the former kind is the Pragmatic Sanction of the Emperor Charles VI., with which, as political, we are not concerned. Of the latter kind are the edicts of French monarchs, designed to secure the liberties of the French Church against the encroachments of the papacy.

The Church has the right of advice and spiritual direction: Christian princes bear the sword (so at least it used to be thought) to oblige their subjects to a due observance of the laws divine, natural and canonical. Regarding the French State, De Marca lays down the rule that the deliberations of the Gallican Church are to be looked upon as counsel given to the king, and that they cannot be put in execution without his consent and confirmation, that the king may preside in councils as head: that with the advice of his council he may by his edicts decree that the canons be observed, and may add such modes or circumstances as are necessary for the better execution of them, and for accommodating them to the interest of the State [De Concordia, l. vi. c. 34, 2, and c. 36, 1].

There were two principal Pragmatic Sanctions, by Louis IX.[1] in 1268-9, and by Charles VII. in 1438. The occasion of Louis' edict was the interference of the popes in the election of prelates, and their taxing benefices [Gloss quoted in Pinsson's S. Ludovici . . . Pragmatica Sanctio, p. 86]. It was published against these encroachments during the vacancy of the papal chair after the death of Clement IV. In it Louis proceeds on the idea of building up a national church in strict alliance with the civil power. It has six Articles: I. declares the full liberty of ordinary collations to benefices; II. the liberty of canonical elections; III. is for the extirpation of Simony; IV. recurs to the subject of I. and II. and ordains that dispensations of prelacies and collations to benefices shall be according to the common law; V. is against all exactions of the Court of Rome, allowing taxation only on an urgent cause, with the consent of the crown and the Church; VI. preserves all privileges and immunities formerly granted [Pinsson, p. 79, Sismondi, viii. 104, gives a translation of the Sanction]. The sixth article, it is to be observed, shews that there had been former edicts of a similar kind; that the liberties and franchises now guaranteed had before been granted to the Church, and to religious places and persons, but through want of discipline among themselves, and through the usurpations of the Court of Rome, had been in great measure lost. And Pinsson states that articles I. II. III. V. were parts of a constitution of A.D. 1228, the second year of St. Louis. The sixth article refers to grants made by our predecessors, "et successive per nos." This must be borne in mind when the remark of Sismondi [viii. 106-7] is quoted, that this Sanction can be considered as a check upon the usurpations of Rome solely on account of the vagueness of its expressions, which permitted interpretations almost "ad libitum:" for the interpretation would be fixed by reference to former grants, and the sense in which they had been accepted.

Richerius [Historia Conciliorum, iii. 190] states that after the publication of this edict the Pope offered to invest the king with the power of instituting pastors in every diocese, which it is plain from the very articles of the Sanction the king disclaimed as not belonging to him. The Pope hoped by this to provide for the easier resumption of the right at some future time, but the king refused the power offered him.

Between this edict and that of Charles VII. the anti-papal feeling had grown strong. There were three causes of this, a sense of crushed and outraged nationality, the extortions of the Popes (which were not lessened by their residence at Avignon), and the desire of the bishops to recover their authority, which had long been over-ridden by the papacy. These feelings, as well as the desire of reformation, found expression in the Councils of Constance and Basle, and this latter council gave occasion to the Pragmatic Sanction of Charles VII.

The Council of Constance [A.D. 1414-18] convened for reformation, and for healing the papal schism, had set aside the three rival popes, and had chosen Otto Colonna, Martin V. Martin dissolved the council without redressing the scandalous grievances on which Roman despotism was fed. But the council had decreed that another council should be held in five years, a second in seven years, and then one every ten years. The first was called, but effected nothing. The second was convoked to Basle, but Eugene IV., who had succeeded Martin, attempted to transfer it to Italy, where the papal strength lay. After several years' contest, in the course of which the first breach between the Pope and the council was made up by the interposition of the Emperor Sigismund, Eugene removed the council to Ferrara, and thence to Florence. But the anti-papal party still sat at Basle; and being excommunicated by Eugene, proceeded so far as to depose him, and elect Amadeus, first Duke of Savoy, in his stead. They then went on with the work of reformation. Few states concurred in the council's assumption of power in deposing Eugene, and the council sought the protection of Charles VII. He summoned the estates of his kingdom to Bourges. This assembly would not determine anything proposed by the deputies of the council before the legates of Eugene were heard; after which they passed the Pragmatic Sanction. The articles of this sanction are for the most part taken from the acts of Constance and Basle.

[1] The genuineness of this edict has been questioned; but as the authors of L'Art de vérifier les Dates [i. 585] consider the genuineness to be established, and as Sismondi [Histoire, viii. 104] relates the edict without hesitation, its genuineness is here assumed.

Art. I. (Session 1 of Basle) asserts the authority of general councils, which are to be held every ten years; the Pope by the advice of the outgoing council naming the place.

II. (2 of Basle) asserts the authority of the Council of Basle, that it is superior to the Pope, who is punishable if he resists it.

III. (12 and 23 of Basle, the latter modified) that a bishop elect shall be confirmed by his own metropolitan, that upon a faulty election the Pope, by advice of his cardinals, may order a fresh election. It is declared "Ecclesia jure communi prælatum sibi eligit." Fees upon elections are condemned.

IV. (23 of Basle) abolishes reservations (the appropriations of benefices to the use of the Pope or his nominees.)

V. (31 of Basle) condemns "Gratiæ expectativæ," the survivances of bishoprics and other benefices. If a bishop had ten benefices in his gift, the Pope might name to one; if fifty, to two; but to no more.

VI. (31 of Basle) condemns appeals except to the immediate superior. When the appeal through all intermediate steps comes to the Pope, it is to be judged by delegates appointed to sit in the place where the cause lay. Only the causes marked in the law as "greater causes" are reserved to the Pope.

VII. is against frivolous appeals.

X. (21 of Basle) condemns Annates, a late device of Boniface IX., (then of fifty years' standing,) who pretended to carry on a war against the Turks by the aid of these taxes.

XI. orders that the ritual of France be observed. [Commentaire de M. Dupuy, Sur le Traité des Libertes de M. Pithou. De la Pr. Sanc. et des Concordats, p. 50.]

The disciplinary articles need not be here named.

This edict was the great bulwark of the liberties of the French Church; and remained in force, although Louis XI. for diplomatic reasons attempted to repeal it, until A.D. 1516. The Parliament of Paris refused to register Louis' Act of repeal, and the Sanction kept its ground until supplanted by the Concordat of Francis I. Louis XII. [A.D. 1498] determined that the Sanction should be observed; and to defeat it, Julius II. convened [A.D. 1512] the fifth Lateran Council. In its fourth Session Louis XI.'s letters of abrogation of the Sanction were read, and a demand was made for its abrogation by the Council; when Julius issued a monition that its defenders should appear. Leo X. continued these measures; and Francis I., succeeding to the throne in 1514, proposed a concordat. "The truth was [writes Burnet, Hist. of Reform. vol. iii. book i. p. 8] that Francis was young; and was so set on pursuing his designs in Italy, in which he saw the advantage of having the pope on his side, that he sacrificed all other considerations to that, and made the best bargain he could." Notwithstanding a vigorous protest from the University of Paris, a Bull revoking the Pragmatic Sanction was issued, and the Concordat established, in 1516. By this Concordat the crown was a gainer at the expense of the chapters.

I. When a bishopric became vacant, the king was, within six months, to name to it a doctor or licentiate of theology of the age of twenty-seven: if the Pope did not approve of the nomination, the king was to nominate another within three months, failing which the Pope was to provide for the see. To the Pope were reserved all that became vacant in the Court of Rome. Abbeys and priories followed the same rule. Elections to the prejudice of the treaty to be null.

II. Gratiæ Expectativæ were abolished.

III. In case of an infraction by the ordinary of the established order of appointment to prebends, the appointment devolves to the See of Rome.

IV. One benefice reserved from a collator of ten, and two from one of fifty benefices. In all bulls that were obtained the true value of the benefice to be stated, otherwise the grace to be null and void.

V. Appeal causes to be judged in partibus, i.e. in the parts where the matters lay, excepting important, or RESERVED CASES. In other particulars the articles of the Sanction were continued, except that not a word was said about Annates. The opposition to this impost was thus withdrawn, and by a bull which followed the Concordat the payment was claimed [Dupuy, p. 68].

The Concordat was strongly opposed in the Parliament, as it was also by the king's council; but in 1518 the Parliament published it with a protest. Towards the end of the century the clergy, who had struggled for the freedom of elections, appear to have acquiesced in the usurped rights of the sovereign rather than submit to the evil of yielding to the claims of the papacy. Thus the Concordat restored Annates and some other privileges to Leo, and secured to Francis the nomination to bishoprics and the higher benefices. With some slight modifications this Concordat remained in force until the Revolution.

The Pragmatic Sanction, (or rather the Councils of Constance and Basle,) was the foundation of the "Gallican Liberties" declared by the assembly of clergy in 1682. The assembly was called by Louis XIV., when Innocent XI. interposed in a contest between the king and those of his bishops who opposed his claim to administer the revenues and present to the benefices of vacant sees. [REGALE.] Thirty-five bishops, and as many proctors of the clergy, allowed the king's claim: and extended it to dioceses in which it had not been received, publishing four propositions, which are commonly called "The Gallican Liberties," because they are declaratory of the ancient liberties of the Church. Those liberties, stated in a great number of particulars by the Canonists, are referred by Pithou to two fundamental maxims.

I. That the Pope can ordain or command nothing, whether general or particular, touching that which concerns the temporal matters of countries and lands under the obedience and sovereignty of the most Christian king: and that if he make any such command the king's subjects, although they be clerks, are not bound to obey him in this respect.

II. That although the Pope is recognised as paramount in spiritual matters, yet in France his absolute and unlimited power has no place, but his power is restrained and bounded by the canons and rules of the ancient councils of the Church received in this kingdom. "Et in hoc maxime consistit libertas Ecclesiæ Gallicanæ," as the University of Paris caused to be said in the full Court of Parliament, when it opposed the verification of the Bulls of the Cardinal of Amboise's legation [Dupuy, pp. 13 and 20]. In accordance with these fundamental maxims the assembly proposed its four Articles, to the following effect:—

I. That neither St. Peter nor his successors received from God any power to interfere, directly or indirectly, in what concerns the temporal interests of states: that kings cannot be deposed by them, nor their subjects freed from allegiance.

II. That in the popes the full power over spiritual things is in such sort vested as that the decrees of Constance concerning the authority of general councils are at the same time in full force and remain unshaken.

III. That the exercise of the Apostolic power is to be regulated by the canons of general councils: and that the usages of the Gallican Church are to remain unshaken.

IV. That although in questions of faith the chief place belongs to the Pope, and his decrees extend to all particular churches, yet his judgment is not unalterable,[1] unless it have the concurrence of the Church universal.

The Parliament and the universities registered these articles in all their extent, and a royal edict forbade that they should be called in question.

The controversy respecting the Gallican liberties was several times revived during the reign of Louis XIV. Bossuet's defence was published in 1730. Its late publication was owing to the prospect of a reconciliation between the Courts of France and Rome after the death of Innocent, which reconciliation actually took place, and engaged Louis to prohibit the publication of the book [Note to Maclaine's Mosheim, v. 156]. After the storm of the Revolution a Concordat between Pius VII. and Bonaparte re-established the French Church. The terms of this Concordat were a general resignation of bishops, both of those who had acknowledged the Revolution and those who had emigrated; presentation to the sees by the first Consul, and confirmation by the Pope; parish ministers appointed by the bishops and prefects conjointly; the recognition of the Catholic religion, as that of the majority of the French; ministers to have salaries, and the sale of ecclesiastical property to be sanctioned; the clergy to promise fidelity to the French Republic [Annual Register, 1801, p. 281]. This Concordat was carried into effect in April 1802.

Concurrently with this Concordat, the Government of the Consulate established Regulations or Organic Articles of the Gallican Church, the first of which is that no bull or missive shall be received and put in force without the authority of the Government. In 1810 a decree was issued by Bonaparte confirming the declaration of 1682. On the restoration of the Bourbons this Concordat was annulled, and the Concordat between Leo and Francis was again re-established. PRAISE. [RITUAL.]

PRAYER. The act and habit of petitioning God for spiritual or physical benefits which we cannot obtain without divine co-operation. The term, as extended (in popular language) to other acts of devotion, is treated of elsewhere. [ADORATION. WORSHIP.]

I. THE ORIGIN OF PRAYER. This is to be traced partly to a law of our nature, partly to the growth of human experience, and partly to direct injunctions given by God.

[1.] As asking for what we want is an instinctive impulse of our nature in respect to things obtainable from our fellow-men, so it may be safely alleged that an instinct moving us to ask God for what we want from Him is co-extensive with the idea of Providence, that is with the idea that things are obtainable from God which are not otherwise obtainable. But this latter idea is universal in mankind, lying at the root of even the most degraded Fetichism (which is an appeal to qualities untruly predicated of God), animating all deprecations of God's anger by propitiatory rites, and forming a large element in all conceptions of, or appeals to, His Love. From the lowest to the highest stages of human cultivation we find evidence of the use of prayer in some form; and whether that form be the perverted one of idolatry, the primeval one of a sacrificial system, or the etherealized one of mental aspiration, every form of it bears witness to a universal sense of dependence on God. If there were no other way of accounting for the use of prayer, this would do so.

[2.] But the human nature which thus instinctively petitions God for good, or for the removal of evil, has also gathered up a vast experience as to the value of prayer which has confirmed successive generations in the use of it. Men have prayed, and have believed that their prayers have been heard and answered. Multitudes of men have lived and died in this conviction, and have handed on the conviction to others. And while there are, doubtless, large numbers, in every generation, of those who use prayer without perceiving any subsequent events that they can definitely associate with their petitions, yet the number has never been large of those who would entirely deny that such associations exist. It is easy to say that such impressions are mistaken, but the great bulk of mankind has always believed otherwise; and the belief has been as strong among the highly cultivated as among the ignorant. Hence one generation after another has used prayer, not only from an impulse to seek some Helper in their necessities, but because they inherited the tradition of previous experience, or of a belief equivalent to experience in its practical force, and have gone to that Helper in the conviction that they would not go in vain.

[3.] Divine injunctions on the subject of prayer, especially addressed to Christians, are to be found in the New Testament; but there are also many in the Old Testament which Christians take as directly or indirectly enforcing the duty upon them and illustrating its position in the sphere of Divine Providence.

From the beginning it would seem that the idea of prayer had been impressed upon the mind of man by his Creator as much as the idea of sacrifice. Such an inference may legitimately be drawn from the words spoken by God to Cain, "shalt thou not be accepted" [Gen. iv. 7; cf. Job xlii. 8], especially when associated with a subsequent statement respecting the days of Seth, that "then men began to call upon the Name of the Lord" [ibid. 26]. A more certain illustration of the subject is found in the importunate intercession of Abraham for Sodom and Gomorrah [ibid. xviii.], and in Jacob's petition for deliverance from Esau on his return to Canaan [ibid. xxxii. 9-12].

In the early patriarchal age, too, we find a direct statement made by God when He said to Abimelech, respecting Abraham's wife, "Now therefore restore the man his wife; for he is a prophet, and he shall pray for thee, and thou shalt live," which is followed by the further statement, "So Abraham prayed unto God: and God healed Abimelech" [Gen. xx. 7, 17]. So, in an age probably not very distant from that of Abraham, God said to the three friends of Job, "Go to My servant Job, and offer up for yourselves a burnt-offering, and My servant Job shall pray for you, for him will I accept" [Job xlii. 8]. In later times prayer is so constantly referred to as to shew that it formed part of the public and private religious system of the Jews in every age. We have, for example, the ritual prayer of Deut. xxvi. 5-15; the intercessions of Moses, of whom it is often said that he "prayed for" the people, or for deliverance from calamity [Numb. xi. 12; Deut. ix. 26]; the prayer of Hannah [1 Sam. i. 10]: the touching words of Samuel, "Moreover, as for me God forbid that I should sin against the Lord in ceasing to pray for you" [ibid. xii. 23]; the frequent reference to prayer by David in his psalms; the public prayer of Solomon at the dedication of the Temple [1 Kings viii. 23-53]; the intercessions of Elijah [ibid. xvii. 21, xviii. 36], and Elisha [2 Kings vi. 17-20]; the prayers of Jonah out of the deep [Jonah ii. 1-9, iv. 2, 3]; that of Daniel in Babylon [Dan. vi. 10, 11]; and that of Nehemiah after the return from captivity [Neh. ix. 5-38].

In the New Testament the primary law of Christian prayer is to be found in our Lord's answer to the request of His disciples, "Lord, teach us to pray" [LORD'S PRAYER]; in the great example given by our Lord's own habit of frequent, long-continued, and repeated prayer [Mark i. 35; Luke v. 16, vi. 12, ix. 29, xxii. 44]; in His special commands, "Pray for them that despitefully use you" [Matt. v. 44], "pray to thy Father Who is in secret" [ibid. vi. 6], watch and pray that ye enter not into temptation" [ibid. xxvi. 41]; in His promises as to the fulfilment of prayer [Matt. vi. 6; Mark xi. 24; Luke xi. 9]; and in His parable of the Pharisee and the publican, which was spoken with the express object of teaching "that men ought always to pray, and not to faint" [Luke xviii. 1]; and, lastly, in the general command which He gave among His latest words, "Watch ye therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of Man" [Luke xxi. 36].

How those who first followed Christ carried out His teaching in their own practice, and handed it on to succeeding generations in their writings, is shewn in many places of the New Testament. It is enough to instance the Apostles and others continuing "in prayer and supplication" during the interval between our Lord's Ascension and the day of Pentecost [Acts i. 16]; their supplications on occasion of the first outburst of persecution [ibid. iv. 24, 30]; the "prayer without ceasing" that "was made to God for" St. Peter during his imprisonment [ibid. xii. 5]; the prayer of Paul and Silas in prison [ibid. xvi. 25]; the kneeling down and praying on the seashore at Miletus when Paul was parting from the Church of Ephesus [ibid. xx. 36]; and, lastly, such direct apostolic injunctions as "continuing instant in prayer" [Rom. xii. 12]; "continue in prayer, and watch in the same" [Coloss. iv. 2]; "watch unto prayer" [1 Peter iv. 7]; "in everything, by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God" [Phil. iv. 6]; "I will, therefore, that men pray everywhere" [1 Tim. ii. 8]; "Is any among you afflicted? let him pray" [James v. 13]; "pray without ceasing" [1 Thess. v. 17].

II. THE EFFECT OF PRAYER. Such multiplied examples of praying persons, comprehending some among the greatest and wisest of men, and culminating in the example of our Lord Jesus, bear strong witness to the value of prayer, as well as to its general applicability to mankind; to great and lowly, wise and simple, educated and ignorant. Such testimony is corroborated by the decided character of the injunctions given by God and His authorized servants; which could not possibly have been given unless prayer be a great reality, having an important place in the relations which exist between God and man. Such solemn words respecting it are quite irreconcileable with the idea that the habit of prayer is a mere superstition; nor is such an idea consistent with the continuous, persistent, and universal adoption of it which is found among mankind. Men have prayed, and do pray, because they think that prayer is of use to them, and that there is an eternal law of God's Providence, "Ask and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you" [Matt. vii. 7].

It is so generally allowed that a habit of prayer has a reflex moral action for good on the mind of the person using it, that nothing need be said in support of such an opinion. Perhaps, indeed, too much importance is attached to this idea, of which there is little or no trace in Holy Scripture. But it may be said, in passing, that the admission of such a reflex action is also an admission (to no small extent) that prayer is not a mere fiction but a great reality, for no moral good could be expected to result, or could result, from the constant use of what, if it is not a reality, must be mere Fetichism.

But the testimony of Holy Scripture as to the efficacy of prayer goes much further than to its efficacy by reflex action. Some of the passages already quoted point very decidedly to a relation between the reception or non-reception of benefits, and the prayer or non-prayer for them; but there are many other, and even more decided, illustrations of this relation. Abraham prayed for children, and God gave him Ishmael [Gen. xv. 3]; he prayed that Ishmael might "live before" God, even though he was not the seed of promise, and God said, "As for Ishmael, I have heard thee" [ibid. xvii. 18, 20]; Isaac "intreated the Lord for his wife . . . and the Lord was intreated of him" [ibid. xxv. 21]; a plague of fire came upon Israel, "and when Moses prayed unto the Lord the fire was quenched" [Numb. xi. 2], even as he entreated for the removal of plagues sent on Pharaoh and the Egyptians, and his prayers were heard [Exod. ix. 27, 33, x. 16, 19]; David prayed for the removal of the pestilence, and the Lord said to the angel, "It is enough: stay now thine hand" [2 Sam. xxiv. 15, 17]; Solomon prayed for God's blessing on Israel, and the Lord said unto him, "I have heard thy prayer" [2 Chron. vii. 12]; Elijah "prayed earnestly that it might not rain, and it rained not on the earth by the space of three years and six months. And he prayed again, and the heaven gave rain, and the earth brought forth her fruit" [James v. 17, 18]; Hezekiah prayed for recovery from sickness, and even for the postponement of death, and was answered by restoration to health and fifteen more years of life, God saying "I have heard thy prayer, I have seen thy tears, behold, I will heal thee" [2 Kings xx. 5]. It is, however, unnecessary to multiply such examples, for it is quite clear that Holy Scripture constantly represents God as "hearkening to the prayer" of His servants, as often giving them what they desired, and as sometimes withholding it even though "besought thrice" [2 Cor. xii. 8]; and in either case shewing that there is a definite relation between the "asking" and the "receiving," between the prayer of man and the Providence of God. Under a conviction that such is the case mankind has acted age after age in the spirit of David's words, "O Thou that hearest prayer, unto Thee shall all flesh come" [Psa. lxv. 2].

Against the testimony and experience of so many ages of mankind the objections of a small minority, who rate their own speculations at a far higher value, are not of much importance, but they must not pass unnoticed. Such objections are generally resolvable into two propositions: [1] First, that if God has foreordained all events, no prayer can alter His Will; and [2] secondly, that if God is Omniscient, it is useless to inform Him of our wants.

To the first of these difficulties it may be answered that the Will of God and the foreknowledge of God are not truly represented when they are spoken of as if they were an unalterable Destiny. It is part of the Image of God in man that the latter possesses free-will, and how can it be supposed that does not exist in the Divine Person the likeness of which is so conspicuous in the human person? It is most illogical to set up our speculations about a foreordaining Will in opposition to plain revelations about the working of that Will, such as are contained in the many scriptural records of answers to prayer. But it is still more illogical to leave out of sight the consideration that answers to prayer are themselves to be taken as a part of the foreordained course of events, and that prayers themselves are among the circumstances which God's Will has foreordained. The difficulty is, in reality, not to understand how answers to prayer can be reconciled with a foreordained course of circumstances and events, but why God has ordained that they should form part of that course. But this difficulty is simply one of those mysteries which encompass the great question of free-will; and it is no unfairness to ourselves as intellectual beings to say that there is little or no hope of ever coming to a perfect understanding of such mysteries without a further revelation from God, or a further exaltation of man's mental powers.

The second objection follows in the same groove. It is certain, by God's own revelation of Himself, that He is Omniscient; and it is also certain, by His own revelations of His Will, that He requires men to petition Him as well as to offer Him a pure service of adoration. Our blessed Lord said to His Apostles, "your Heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things"—food, drink, and clothing [Matt. vi. 32]; and yet He taught them also to say "Give us this day our daily bread" [ibid. 11], and enjoined prayer in the words, "Ask and it shall be given you, seek and ye shall find, knock and it shall be opened unto you" [ibid. vii. 7], in the very same discourse. How shall we reconcile these two opposite, or apparently opposite, facts, that a beneficent God knows our wants before we can name them, and is loving enough to satisfy them without being asked to do so, and yet requires us to put those wants before Him in prayer, and to ask Him to satisfy them? We cannot reconcile them. They are facts that depend for their explanation on mysteries of God's nature, which He permits to remain mysteries. But it is quite as certain that He has imposed the law of prayer, as it is that He has revealed Himself to be Omniscient; and while it would be very illogical to accept the revelation as true and to reject the law as false, it would also be folly to accept both as true, and yet to refuse to act on the law because we cannot reconcile it with the revelation. But although it is not within the reach of our knowledge to reconcile these seemingly opposed facts, it is within our knowledge that God is infinitely good and loving as well as Omniscient, and that He would neither have given men an instinctive impulse to pray if prayer had been a mere mockery, nor have imposed upon them a law that they should pray unless such a law had been necessary for their welfare.

Difficulties respecting prayer do not, however, occur to a devotional intellect, for such an intellect, though it may as incessantly crave after knowledge as an undevotional one, has less confidence in its powers as an ultimate court of appeal from the decision of which nothing is exempt. A devotional intellect recognises the existence of mysteries, and especially that greatest of all mysteries, the Nature of God. The resting-point for such an intellect, in respect to theories of prayer, will be found in the example and words of Christ Who prayed, "Father, if Thou be willing, remove this cup from Me," and added, "Nevertheless, not My will, but Thine be done" [Luke xxii. 42]. It will know that God's will must be the ultimate law of all events, yet will dare to follow the example of Christ, and ask that "if it be possible" such and such things may be granted. Even if that which is asked for be not granted, there will always be one answer to such a prayer, that of strength from heaven which earth cannot give.

PRAYER FOR THE DEAD. A custom which has prevailed in many nations, and may be regarded as founded on the instincts of human nature; for when the soul departs into the unseen world it is natural for survivors to pray for its welfare on the same principle that we pray for each other's wellbeing and happiness in this world.

The doctrine and practice came, however, to the Christian Church through the Jews. Christianity, it must be remembered, is not a new religion or the primary revelation of the Divine Will. God revealed Himself to mankind from an early period, and though especially to one nation only, still a revelation of His will had been made, the leading particulars of which were necessarily unchangeable, though, as regards certain unessential points, suited to the Jews only. Christianity, it might therefore be supposed à priori, would not essentially differ from Judaism, each proceeding from the same unchangeable Author. But the connexion of the two religions is still closer and more intimate: one was the type and the other the antitype, and thus Christianity may be said to be Judaism in its complete and perfect form and development: signs and types changed into corresponding realities, and the teaching of the Law and Prophets imposed in their full significance and meaning [Matt. v. 17-19]. We cannot therefore expect to find in Christianity what may be called a new revelation of the Divine Will or a complete system of truth, nor can we doubt that the Apostles taught the doctrines or usages of existing Judaism (which generally they were commanded by our Lord to receive, see Matt. xxiii. 2, 3), unless they were manifest corruptions of the Divine Law. But by the fact of their teaching them, such doctrines or usages were stamped with Divine authority or sanction.

This explains the fact, that although prayer for the dead prevailed in the Church from the earliest period, and is at least indirectly confirmed by the teaching of the New Testament, yet we do not find that it was expressly commanded by our Lord and His Apostles. Prayer for the dead was a Jewish custom for many ages before our Lord's coming, and it was incorporated by Apostles and inspired teachers into the practical system of the Christian Church. That it was the usage of the Jewish Church more than one hundred years before Christ is clear from the well-known passage in Maccabees, where Judas, offering a sin-offering, "made a reconciliation for the dead that they might be delivered from sin" [2 Macc. xii. 43-45]—a statement, from which the belief of the Jews may clearly be inferred, that certain sins committed in this world and now unrepented of, may be forgiven in the world to come. If this be denied the offering of Judas was useless or unprofitable, and the belief that the dead can be benefited by prayer, on which the practice is founded, necessarily falls to the ground.

But the efficacy of prayer for the pardon of the sins of the departed, is clearly intimated by our Lord's teaching in the Gospels: He implies that some, though not all, sins which are here committed, may be forgiven in the world to come; and thus teaches that prayer for the dead rests on a true and certain foundation, and there can be no doubt that He thus, implicitly at least, sanctions the usage. View together these truths—that sin committed in this world may be forgiven in the world to come, and the efficacy of prayer is all-prevailing, since our Lord assures us that whatsoever we ask the Father in His name, He will grant to us—and the inference is undeniable. The love of survivors indeed will not ask for a positive command to pray for departed relatives; natural affection alone will complete the argument and irresistibly enjoin the precept.

Our Lord says that "whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world nor in the world to come" [Matt. xii. 32], whence, by only excluding from forgiveness in the world to come the sin against the Holy Ghost, He may be understood to imply that less offences may be forgiven: such is the interpretation of ancient, and also of some eminent modern, commentators. We are also told to agree with our adversary whilst we are in the way with him (i.e. during the present life), since otherwise we shall be cast into prison, and not come forth till we have paid the last farthing [Matt. v. 27], where it is obviously implied, that when, but not until, the debt is discharged, we shall be delivered from prison—a "prison" never signifying according to Scriptural usage the place of eternal punishment.[1]

Again, St. Peter in his first epistle, speaking of our Lord's descent to Hades, says that He preached the Gospel [iii. 19, 20, iv. 6] to the Antediluvians who were then in prison (φυλακή). They had been disobedient in the days of Noah, and perished at the Deluge, God bringing the Flood upon the world of the ungodly [2 Pet. ii. 5]. Our Lord announced the glad tidings of redemption to them, and thus fulfilled the prophecy of Zechariah [ix. 11], that Messiah by the Blood of His covenant would deliver the prisoners out of the pit where there is no water,—a kind of prison often used in the East. It cannot be supposed, with the teaching of our Lord and His Apostles before us, that prayer for the dead is necessarily fruitless or unavailing; or that imperfect Christians, or those to whom the Gospel has not been preached, are altogether beyond the hope of mercy and forgiveness.

The first Christian writer who mentions prayer for the dead is Tertullian: but he speaks of the usage as well-known and long established in the Church: thus he says that prayers were annually offered on the birth-day of the martyrs or the day of their martyrdom:[2] he explains "paying the last farthing" that the soul pays something in the delay of the resurrection,[3] and speaks of a widow praying for the soul of her husband.[4] St. Augustine often alludes to the universal usage of the Church to pray for all regenerated in Christ (i.e. the baptized), though whether, or in what degree, prayer would be profitable and availing, depended upon the present life.[5] And St. Chrysostom says that it was not in vain enjoined as a law by the Apostles (ἐνομοθετήθη ὑπὸ τῶν Ἀποστόλων) that a memorial of the dead should be made in the solemn mysteries, as knowing that great gain resulteth to them and great assistance.[6] Aërius, a heretic of the fourth century, first alleged that the practice was useless. It is only in the present life, he argued, that a man can do anything, as pray and give alms; and such prayers set aside the necessity for a holy life, since, if the prayer and almsgiving of others can avail for the departed, their own good works whilst on earth are not really needed. The reasonings of Aërius were answered by St. Epiphanius[7] and St. Augustine,[8] who vindicated the apostolicity of the universal usage of the Church.

Prayer for the dead was especially, though not exclusively, connected with the offering of the Eucharistic sacrifice, the names of the living, and also of the dead who were commemorated, being read from what were called DIPTYCHS by the deacon, when the Eucharistic sacrifice was offered.[9] We find in all extant liturgies prayers for the pardon of the sins and the rest of the departed; there being no liturgy in use for fifteen hundred years after Christ, in which the immemorial usage of the Church was not recognised. It was first laid aside in the sixteenth century by Calvin and others, (though allowing that it was the usage of the Primitive Church,) mainly for subjective reasons, as they are called, such as that if a man died in a state of grace he had no need of prayer for his soul's welfare, or if he died in sin prayer could not benefit him, but must necessarily be unprofitable and useless; and also in opposition to the doctrine of purgatory. The Church of England recognizes the doctrine of prayer for the dead,[10] which, though fallen into popular desuetude, has not at any time, since the Reformation, been wholly lost or forgotten. The reasons why the dead should be prayed for, the benefit supposed to be derived from such prayers, and the general teaching of the Church on the subject, will be found in the article PURGATORY.

PRAXEANISM. [PATRIPASSIANISM.]

PREACHING. The office of preacher, or proclaimer of the truth of God, dates back almost to the first ages of the world. Noah, "the eighth

[1] "Non autem omnes veniunt in sempiternas pœnas quæ post illum judicium sunt futuræ, qui post mortem sustinent temporales. Nam quibusdam, quod in isto non remittitur, remitti in futuro sæculo [Matt. xii. 32], i.e. ne futuri sæculi æterno supplicio puniantur, jam supra diximus" [St. Augustine, De Civitate, lib. xxi. c. 13]. Olshausen thus comments on Matt. v. 26: "That we are not to understand eternal punishment under 'not come out of prison till he has paid the last farthing,' but only a transition state is shewn, first by φυλακή (prison), which never denotes the place of eternal punishment, and also by ἕως ἂν (until), which points to a definite limit." And more fully in his note on Matt. xviii. 34, where he says, "The formula 'deliver into prison till he has paid all that is due,' still demands here our especial consideration in its connexion with the creditor. Already at Matt. v. 26, we remarked that it would not denote everlasting punishment; in the words ἕως οὗ (until) it is implied obviously that a limit is fixed. . . . The φυλακή (prison) here is thus (Ἅδης) Hades, the general assembling-place of the dead who did not die in the Lord, but all of whom it does by no means follow shall sink into eternal condemnation." Woolfrey,' 'it is a holy and wholesome thought to pray for the dead' [2 Macc. xii. 46] . . . was not illegal, as by no canon or authority of the Church in these realms had the practice of praying for the dead been expressly prohibited." Vide Stephen's Book of Common Prayer with Notes, where Sir H. Jenner's judgment on the above case, of which the summary is quoted is given at full length. Preaching person," was "a preacher (κήρυξ) of righteousness" [2 Pet. ii. 5] to "the world of the ungodly." The prophets were not only foretellers of the future, but preachers, warning of God's judgments, denouncing the wickedness of His rebellious people, and delivering what "the Lord spake by them" [2 Sam. xxiii. 2]. St. John the Baptist was the preacher of the coming Messiah, and his message was repentance. Our Lord went with the twelve "throughout every city and village, preaching and shewing the glad tidings of the kingdom of God" [Luke viii. 1]. The Apostles "preached through Jesus the resurrection of the dead" [Acts iv. 2]. They that were scattered abroad after the martyrdom of St. Stephen, "went everywhere preaching the word" [Acts viii. 4]. St. Paul bids his son in the faith, the Bishop of Ephesus, "preach the word" [2 Tim. iv. 2].

God has been pleased to send His message through man to his fellow-man, and the prophet, foreseeing with joy the blessings of gospel times could say, "How beautiful are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace!" [Isa. lii. 7.]

Hence, in the ancient Church preaching held a deservedly important place. The sermon formed a part of the "missa catechumenorum," that all might receive instruction from it. St. Justin Martyr, in his early account of Christian worship [A.D. 140], says, "When the reader has finished, he who presides (προεστὼς, the bishop or president) admonishes and exhorts by word of mouth (διὰ λόγου) to the imitation of their noble deeds," i.e. what they had just heard of the apostles and prophets from Holy Writ.

In ancient times preaching was a duty which belonged of right to the bishop alone. St. Justin Martyr, as we have seen, names the προεστὼς as preacher. In Africa, St. Augustine was the first presbyter who preached in the presence of the bishop [Possid. Vit. Aug. 5]. This was about A.D. 391. The Council of Laodicea [A.D. 366] bears witness to the same custom, and the Council in Trullo [A.D. 691] speaks of preaching as the bishop's duty every day, and especially on the Lord's-day. [Labbe's Concil. iv., 1151.] But in time, as was needful, priests were more commonly allowed to preach. The Council of Vaison [A.D. 529] orders that "for the edification of all the churches, and the greater benefit of the whole people, presbyters should have power to preach, not only in the cities, but in all parishes" [ibid. iv., 1680]. Deacons, though not allowed to preach, might read homilies in case of necessity, as the same council provides, "Si presbyter, aliqua infirmitate prohibente, per se ipsum non potuerit prædicare, sanctorum patrum homiliæ a diaconibus recitentur." [Ibid.]

In certain special cases these strict regulations as to preaching were not observed. We find Origen, while yet a layman, not only expounding privately in the catechetical school at Alexandria, by the appointment of the bishop, but also preaching in church. This was during his visit to the Holy Land in A.D. 215, and by desire of Alexander, Bishop of Jerusalem, and Theoctistus, Bishop of Cæsarea. When Demetrius, Bishop of Alexandria, remonstrated, Alexander quoted various precedents for the course he had taken [Euseb. Ecc. Hist. vi. 19]. The fourth Council of Carthage [A.D. 398] ordains "Laicus præsentibus clericis, nisi ipsi jubentibus, docere non audeat," which implies that laymen might so teach if requested. The same council [Labbe, ii. 1207] expressly forbade women, even though learned and holy, to speak in the churches, in accordance with St. Paul's teaching [1 Cor. xiv. 34], and with the universal custom of the Church; and heretics only were accustomed to contravene this order of the Church. [St. Epiphan. Hæres. xlix. lxxviii. &c.] It is clear that any cases of lay preaching were exceptional. St. Leo forbids monks to undertake this duty [Epp. cxviii. 2, cxix. 6]; and St. Jerome says "it was an usurpation of an office which did not belong to them." [De Scriptor. xxxvi., contra Vigilant. ii. 400.]

In some places there were frequent short sermons or addresses at one service. The Apostolic Constitutions say, "Let the presbyters, but not all, exhort the people; and last of all, the bishop, who is like unto the governor of the ship" [ii. 57]. Instances of the same custom are recorded in St. Chrysostom [Hom. ii., de verb. Isaiæ], and St. Augustine [Serm. in Psalm. cxxxi. &c.]. At certain seasons there were sermons daily, e.g. St. Chrysostom's homilies on Genesis and those De Statuis were so preached in Lent. Origen too used to preach almost daily, as Pamphilus records. [Apol. pro Origen., Origen, Opp. i. 756.]

Extempore preaching was frequent. Origen's homilies were thus delivered, and it was not until the age of sixty that he allowed them to be taken down in writing [Euseb. vi. 36]. St. Chrysostom too sometimes delivered extempore discourses [Sozomen, viii. c. 18], as did St. Gregory [Hom. xl. in Evv.].

The sermons were frequently very short,[1] the whole service lasting, according to St. Chrysostom [Hom. xlviii. de Inscript. Altaris], not more than two hours. The salutation, "Pax vobis," which usually preceded holy offices, also preceded sermons, and the people replied, "And with thy spirit" [St. Chrys. Hom. iii. in Coloss., &c.] They concluded with the ascription to the Blessed Trinity. The usual custom at one time was for the preacher to sit (the position of an authorized teacher), and for the people to stand as reverent disciples. So St. Augustine says [Hom. xlix. de Diversis], "Ut ergo vos non diu teneam, præsertim quia ego sedens loquor, vos stando laboratis." And Eusebius records of Constantine that when he was solicited to sit down on his throne during the delivery of a discourse at the palace, he refused, saying, that "it was fit that men should stand to hear discourses of things divine." [Euseb. De Vit. Constant. iv. c. 33.]

But this custom was not universal, for St. Justin Martyr says, "that as soon as the bishop's sermon was ended they all rose up in prayer together" [Apol. i. 67]. The Apostolical Constitutions also mention that the people sat during the sermon [ii. c. 58].

[1] See instances quoted by Bingham, bk. xiv. c. 4, sec. 21, from St. Augustine, St. Chrysostom, and others.

The sermons were often received with expressions of applause and acclamation, such as clapping of hands, stamping of feet, and such cries as "orthodox," "thirteenth apostle," &c. This St. Chrysostom, St. Augustine, and St. Jerome earnestly endeavoured to restrain, the latter, e.g., saying, "When thou art teaching in church, let not the applause of the people but their groans be excited, and let the tears of thy listeners be thy commendation" [Jerom. ad Nepot. ii.].

In the Book of Common Prayer the sermon is appointed to come after the Nicene Creed. It thus forms a part of the Church's most solemn service, though of course usage has sanctioned preaching at other times. A "form of prayer to be used by all preachers before their sermons" is appointed in the fifty-fifth canon. The marriage service, by providing a short homily for use, "if there be no sermon," implies that it is considered suitable to have one; and up to A.D. 1661 the rubric expressly provided for the celebration of Holy Communion, with a sermon "wherein ordinarily . . . the office of a man and wife shall be declared, according to Holy Scripture." The various "exhortations" which are to be found in the Book of Common Prayer are also short homilies of a similar character, which were placed where they are at a time when preaching had fallen into very general disuse, and when homiletic instruction was considered to be especially necessary.

PREBENDARY, one who holds a benefice called a prebend in a cathedral or collegiate church.

Among the Romans "Præbenda" was fuel and salt provided by a town for a royal envoy [Hor. Serm. i. 5], and in canon law it designates a stated income derived from land, tithes, a church, and crops, offerings at an altar, endowment by a founder, or some fixed source. A prebend is the right of receiving certain revenues in a cathedral or collegiate church, attached to certain duties, for the performance of which a stipend is allotted; and tenable without a canonry; the latter being a spiritual and incorporeal title, independent of any stipend, and embracing reception into a brotherhood; the right of a stall in choir, and a vote in chapter: sometimes the former is called a prebend simple, and the latter a prebend canonical. A prebend may be held by a layman. A clerical prebendary is of necessity also a canon, and the Council of Lateran [A.D. 1179] allowed in consequence no presentation to a canonry, except when it was vacant. In the cathedrals of the new foundation the prebend is a share in the commune, a yearly dividend.

At Bangor, the præcentor, chancellor, and three canons held "nihil prebends," that is, their stalls were unendowed and maintained by means of corrodies, pensions, and oblations. The bishops at Lincoln, Lichfield, Chichester, Lincoln, and Salisbury, held prebends, as did dignitaries like the deans of Chichester, Wells, and Lichfield, the præcentors of Chichester, Lincoln, Lichfield, York, and St. Asaph, the chancellors of Lincoln, Salisbury, Lichfield, Llandaff, and St. David's, the treasurers of York, St. Asaph, and Lichfield, the subdean of Lincoln, and certain abbots at Chichester, York, Wells, and Salisbury. The bishop usually has the sole collation to a prebend, but at Chichester two attached to offices are in the gift of the dean and chapter, and at Lincoln one is held with the vicarage of Gainsborough. Six prebends at St. Asaph are said to be "cursal" either cura salutis with cure of souls, or, as at St. David's, as preachers within certain circuits. The late Cathedral Act, although it dispossessed prebendaries of their income, left their duties and privileges untouched; it also changed the previous title of prebendary into that of canon in the new foundations.

A prebend is a benefice which took its origin in the distribution of the commune in equal portions in the eleventh century. As it is the duty of canons to act with the bishop as his brethren in council, they were required to be in holy orders, and certain prebends out of the church-revenues were assigned to them. The inferior clergy were often called portionists or demi-prebendaries, Quartanarians or Tertians, according to the rate of their stipends. A prebend is not of the substance of a canonry, except it is "born of a canonry, tanquam filia a matre," according to the canonists, whereas honorary canons are said to have "nomen sine re," and an empty title, having neither a stall in choir nor a vote in chapter, although of custom or by concession of a chapter they may have a stall and place in choir, being neither bound to residence nor restricted with regard to tenure of benefices as the true canon is. The "commune" or "massa," formerly devoted to the support of the bishop and chapter, was at length divided among the several members of the latter in proportionate portions for their maintenance. This took place definitely at Lichfield in the time of Adelwald [c. 847, Angl. Sacr. ii. 431], or of Bishop Peche in the twelfth century [Browne Willis, i. 425], and at York by Archbishop Thomas [Stubs, 1708]. The earliest prebend with a distinct title was that of Neauflé at Rouen, founded in 1095; at St. Paul's the apportionment of prebends began, if it was not completed, before the arrival of William I. Robert Bloet [A.D. 1092-1123] at Lincoln added twenty-one prebends to an equal number founded by his predecessor [A.D. 1070-92; Ang. Sacr. i. 515, Godwin, 232]. Bishop Hilary endowed one at Chichester; but it was not until about the time of Edward I. that distinctly named prebends can be traced in England. At the close of the tenth century, however, Reginald of Durham mentions that "the clergy of Lindisfarne, like secular canons, as they are now called," held prebends from the Church, and discharged their monastic duties in ecclesiastical offices [c. xvi.]; and at Lichfield, Ethelwald in 822 allotted distinct prebends to the secular clergy and set over them a provost [Ang. Sacr. i. 463]; at Wells, Bishop Robert [A.D. 1136-59] severed the prebends which had hitherto been in common [Ang. Sac. i. 561].

On the first constitution of cathedrals prebendaries were divided into three grades, priests, deacons, and sub-deacons; so many of each attending in quarterly courses for duty in the choir: but at length the division into simplices, or non-residentes, and residentiarii, stagiarii, or stationarii canonici, took effect, many preferring to reside at their prebends, substituting vicars in their places as deputies in choir, and paying a certain fine by way of composition to the residentiary canons. PREDESTINATION. [Election.]

PRE-EXISTENCE OF CHRIST. The Eternity of the Second Person in the Blessed Trinity —that He was in the beginning, and is from the beginning, before all worlds—is asserted by the Church under the term "Pre-existence" [Word], against all who assign a commencement to the existence of Christ. First, and most properly, against the Photinians,[1] who taught that Christ did not exist before His birth of the Virgin; the Word named by St. John being, in their heretical scheme, not a Person, but an emanation only from the Godhead, which descended upon the Son of Mary and constituted Him the Son of God. Second, against the Arians, who allowed indeed that Christ was before the foundation of the world, but asserted that His existence had a beginning,[2] that He was created out of nothing. [Eternal Generation.]

PRE-EXISTENCE OF MATTER. This heretical tenet supposes matter to be coeval with the Deity, whose creative work was what may be called the secondary act of creation, not creation in its proper and peculiar sense of production out of nothing. Scripture is clear against this tenet. For St. Paul's words [Heb. xi. 3], though their construction is disputed [see Alford's note], must ultimately yield the sense given them by Chrysostom, ἐξ οὐκ ὄντων τὰ ὄντα ἐποίησεν ὁ Θεὸς [see also Hom. iii. in Gen.], in accordance with the belief of the Jews [2 Macc. vii. 28].

The tenet of the pre-existence of matter is, in its consequences, the worst form of heresy. If matter be coeval with the Deity,[3] it must be self-existing and eternal. But that which is self-existing and eternal is none other than God. [Matter.]

PRE-EXISTENCE OF SOULS. The simple tenet of the pre-existence of souls is that at the creation of man the souls of the whole human race were formed, and that in God's keeping they await the creation of the bodies they are to inhabit. To this may be added the further position, that these souls are capable of action, of obedience, and of sin, before their joining their bodies: and there may be added further the doctrine of Metempsychosis.

The advocates of this doctrine of the pre-existence quote from the Old Testament, Deut. xxix. 14, 15 (upon which text Grotius writes that the generality of the Jews allege it for the προϋπαρξις of souls); also Jer. i. 5; Job. xxxviii. 19-21, LXX. version; from the Wisdom of Solomon the more express text, viii. 19, 20; from the New Testament, John ix. 1, 2, where they say that our Lord admits the doctrine. Further, although it cannot be a necessary inference, they do not shrink from adding that, at the time of the supposed production of all souls, our Lord assumed a human soul, and became as it were the Messiah elect, waiting for His Incarnation: that thenceforward until the Incarnation He dwelt with God, One Person in two natures, the Divine Nature and the reasonable human soul.[4] This, they assert, explains more readily the theophanies of the Old Testament, and such passages of the New Testament as Phil. ii. 6, 7, 8 (where they say it is difficult to conceive how an exinanition of Himself can belong to the Eternal and Immutable God by becoming man, whereas it is easier to conceive this of the soul of the Messiah united, as has been said, to the Godhead), and such passages also [John iii. 13] as speak of the Son of Man as coming down from heaven. Other arguments are that the daily creation of souls is inconsistent with the Father's resting from the work of creation: and that it is hateful to think of God's assisting by a special act of creation the sins of adultery and incest from which there is offspring.

On the other hand is one great argument, which seems to be decisive, namely, that the Mosaic account of the creation of man, which represents the body of man as first formed and the soul as then inbreathed into it from God, is not only an account of the creation of Adam, but, in its essentials, declaratory of the creation of every human being. The Mosaic record is treated in the New Testament as both fact and symbol,

So also Lardner, Credibility, pt. ii. ch. lxxxix., where are brought together the several statements of the ancients regarding Photinus. He was also condemned in the Council at Milan, A.D. 347 [Harduin, Concil. i. p. 683-4], and again at Rome, by Julius, A.D. 349 [ibid. i. p. 689-90]. He was finally deposed by a Council of Eastern bishops at Sirmium, A.D. 357 [ibid. i. p. 701-2; Newman's Arians, p. 334].

Et materia enim Deus, secundum formam divinitatis; innata scilicet, et infecta, et æterna." As the conception of two Gods is impossible, the necessary result is the identification of the Creator with the universe. [See Mill On Panthcistic Principles, pt. i. sec. 1, p. 21 et seq.]

[4] Origen, see De Princip. ii. 6, 3. Henry More, see Mystery of Godliness, b. i. c. viii. On this "strangely heretical notion, into which even Dr. Isaac Watts was led by the difficulty of conceiving the eternal generation of the Son," see Mill's note on the Pantheism of the Cabbala in Pantheistic Principles, pt. i. p. 154. The heresy appears to lie in the supposition that the Word assumed that pre-existent human soul, not in the supposition that the soul pre-existed to which the Word in fulness of time was to be united.

Adam being the representative man [Matt. xix. 4; 1 Cor. xv. 22; Rom. v. 12; James i. 15]. The formation of a child in the womb is as truly an act of creation as the creation of Adam.[1] Man is still formed of the dust of the ground, through the intermediate agencies of the plants which draw their substance from the ground and minister it to animals. The second part of the record is also repeated in each man's becoming a living soul.

Returning, then, to the arguments for the pre-existence of souls, it is sufficient to observe, regarding the quotations from the Old Testament, that they by no means necessarily imply that pre-existence, and are generally interpreted otherwise: regarding the quotation from Wisdom, that it may be allowed to stand as one among other proofs that the Alexandrian[2] school received the doctrine: regarding the dream of the union of the Word to a human soul before the Incarnation that it will be found to involve greater theological difficulties than it professes to remove, and that the scriptures it professes to make more easy are sufficiently explained by Catholic commentators. There remains then, of scriptural authorities, only John ix. 1, 2. This is indeed the only passage of Scripture which requires a special consideration.

The question of the disciples is to be interpreted, it appears to us, according to their belief. If we knew that they did not hold the pre-existence of souls, we might interpret their question as an elliptical mode of expressing an impossibility, "It is impossible that this man can have brought the chastisement on himself: is he suffering for his parents' sins?" But, knowing that the Alexandrians and the Rabbis held the doctrine in question, it is more natural to suppose that the disciples had heard it, and proceeded on the supposition of its truth. Does our Lord then in his reply give any sanction to the doctrine? Our Lord neither affirms it nor denies it. "The disciples were speculating about final causes. They would not have understood what any one meant who had told them they were doing so; they were doing it nevertheless. Jesus met them with the most final cause. 'I can give you a better reason for this man's blindness than those you have imagined. His blindness will be a means of shewing forth the power and purpose of God. He will learn himself, he will be a teacher to the world through this blindness, whence light comes, who is the Father of light.'" [Mauriee, Discourses on St. John, p. 263.] This scripture, therefore, decides nothing regarding the truth of the doctrine. But the possibility of sinning in a pre-existent state, which appears to be contemplated in the question of the disciples, is decisively rejected by St. Paul in Rom. ix. 11, 12.

The other two arguments which are used need not detain us long. God rested from the primary act of creation: He works hitherto, as in the governing of the world He made, so in that secondary act of creation which is the continuance of the species. God has ordained that certain powers and agencies, both physical and spiritual, shall be called into exercise by human acts; and He does not alter His ordinance if those acts are performed sinfully. This is neither sanction nor assistance of the sin. It might be as fairly said that God aids and abets sin when a child of fornication is brought to holy baptism, or when parents, for the sake of a bribe, bring their child to the font. It is God's good pleasure to inbreathe the living soul to the offspring of man and woman; and He has given the law of matrimony. That He does not alter His original ordinance when that law is broken cannot without blasphemy be represented as assisting the sin.

In conclusion, there is no reason to denounce the simple doctrine of the pre-existence of souls as heretical, but the Church does not hold it, nor can it be considered a pious and probable opinion. The additions to the doctrine are heretical.

PRESENCE OF CHRIST. [Real Presence. Eucharist.]

PRIEST. The doctrine of the priesthood in the Church of Christ bears intimate relation to the mediation of our Lord, for as a priest is a mediator in action, so our Lord, being the one Mediator, is the only Priest by nature; but this does not exclude the extension of His Priesthood to others any more than the fact that He is the only-begotten Son of the Father is inconsistent with that other fact, which is equally true, that through Him all Christians are God's adopted children. To the Church, which is the Body of Christ, all that pertains to our Blessed Lord is extended, and therefore, because He is the Priest and King, His people are "a royal priesthood." There are vital principles which belong to the whole body, but there are particular organs through which these principles act, and thus the extension of our Saviour's Priesthood to the whole body of His people is not inconsistent with His appointment of an official priesthood to carry on His work of mediation upon earth. [Bishop Hamilton's Charge, p. 39.] Our Blessed Lord, having gone up to Heaven there to exercise His Priestly functions on our behalf, has delegated His office below to those whom He had chosen. It was just before His Ascension that He said to His Apostles, "As My Father hath sent Me, even so send I you. And when He had said this, He breathed on them, and said unto them, Receive ye the Holy Ghost" [John xx. 21; cf. Luke iii. 22, ix. 35].

[1] The proper and peculiar sense of "creation" is production out of nothing, when there is no antecedent material out of which the created thing is made. Man was not so called into being. His creation was the organizing of matter that already existed, and imparting to it a principle of life. The creation of every man is the same, only the process occupies, it may be, a longer time, and the operating powers are in some degree made known to us. [Body. Creation.]

[2] The Alexandrian school derived the doctrine from the Greeks, among whom it was held by the Pythagoreans and Platonists: though Coleridge says that Plato never meant or taught it. Tertullian writes: "Consequens enim est, ut ex Dei flatu animam professi, initium ei deputemus. Hoc Plato excludit, innatam et infectam animam volens: et natam autem docemus et factam, ex initii constitutione." [De Anim. iv. edit. 1641, p. 307.] From the same source came Origen's metempsychosis. [See De Princip. iii. 5.]

To understand the nature of the priestly office, we must look back to the Jewish dispensation, for its types and shadows would have been unmeaning if they had not signified the realities which should exist in the Church of Christ. If the high priest was the representative of Christ, the subordinate priests were also representatives of the subordinate priests who, under Him and acting by His commission, should stand between His people and their God. The priesthood was changed, but not abolished, when the Levitical tribe was succeeded by the Christian ministry [Heb. vii. 12]. In the continuance and expansion of the priesthood was fulfilled the propheey of Isaiah that God would take of the Gentiles for priests and Levites [Isa. lxvi. 21], and that of Jeremiah, "As the host of heaven cannot be numbered, neither the sand of the sea measured, so will I multiply the seed of David my servant, and the Levites that minister unto me" [Jer. xxiii. 22].

I. The existence of a priesthood was common to all ages and all religions. We can trace from the earliest times the institution of a class of men ordained to stand between God and their brethren, and to offer for them sacrifices and prayers. In the patriarchal age the head of the family was its priest, and the sacrifices which he offered were not for himself alone, but for the members of his household. So we find Abraham, Lot, Noah, and Job exercising the office of priests. Heathen religions have preserved so much of the primitive tradition, and their universal agreement proves that they derived it from a common source. In some nations the king, as representative of his people, was the priest. In others, as in Egypt, a family caste was set apart for the office; whilst in others the most learned men were initiated by solemn rites into the mysteries of their religion. Under the Mosaie dispensation one tribe was substituted for the firstborn of each household; and in this tribe were duly ordained ranks, high priests, priests, and Levites. Their office exhibited the two sides of the prineiple of mediation. On behalf of the people they offered sacrifice, and in God's name they blessed the people. The blessing which God bestowed on His people passed through human media, and a divinely organized priesthood was in exact harmony with the mode of God's dealings, since He employs men to be fellow-workers with Himself in the production of the fruits of the earth and in earrying out the works of His providence.

II. When our Blessed Lord was on earth, He indicated by many acts the continuance of this principle of the intervention of human media. When He raised Lazarus from the grave, one who stood by must first roll away the stone from the tomb before the dead could come forth, and others must loose him before he could be free. When He multiplied the loaves and fishes, He did not Himself distribute them to the people, but this He commissioned His Apostles to do. When He sent forth the twelve and the seventy, He not only gave them commandment to preach the Gospel, but power to do the works whieh He Himself performed. And when He delivered the final eommission to the Apostles, He said, "All power is given unto Me in heaven and in earth. . . . As My Father hath sent Me, even so send I you." Thus He was preparing His people for the delegation of His Priestly power to an official priesthood; and if acting for Him they could heal the sick, it was no greater marvel that they should have power on earth to forgive sins.

III. Whatever authority was given by our Lord to His Apostles was not given to them as individuals, but as the first of an order of men through whom it was to be transmitted from one age to another. Our Lord indicated the permanence of the commission in the words, "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." He could not have been with the Apostles individually to the end of the world in any sense which would agree with the circumstances under which these words were spoken, and therefore it must be understood of the Apostolic order of which they were under Him the founders. Whatever authority was given to them was to be transmitted to some successors. And, therefore, we find that no sooner had our Lord ascended than the eleven, instructed by all that He had spoken during the great forty days of the things pertaining to the Kingdom of God, i.e. the government of the Church, supplied the place from which Judas had fallen by the election of Matthias to take part in their Apostleship.

IV. Our blessed Lord breathed upon His Apostles when He invested them with His authority. This was an action proper to its first delegation, and to Him from whom their power was derived; but the manner in which it was transmitted by the Apostles to other men was by taking up into the system of the Christian Church a well-known rite of the Jewish Church. Any ordained transference, such as the substitution of the victim for the offerer had always been made by the laying on of hands, and the Apostles ordained their successors by the same outward means [Bishop Hamilton's Charge, p. 40]. That their successors receive no less authority than was delivered to the Apostles the Church has always believed, for our Saviour's own words of consecration are still repeated by the bishop at the ordination of every priest.

V. Although, considered as a matter of order, there are three ranks in the Christian ministry, the priesthood is but one. Quoad Sacramentum bishops and priests possess the same priestly authority, but the bishop has the power of transmitting it to others, which an ordinary priest can not do, while the deacon, although the assistant of the priest, ean perform no sacerdotal function.

VI. The chief sacerdotal function [1] of the Christian priest is to offer up on behalf of the people the Eucharistic Sacrifice. This sacrificial action is the counterpart on earth of Christ's perpetual pleading and presentation of Himself in heaven, and is consummated when the bread and wine are made the Sacrament of our Lord's Body and Blood. It is the μνημόσυνον, or shewing forth of the Lord's death, as a plea for our pardon.

2. Baptism is properly a priestly aet in its eon-nection with the remission of sins. In the washing of regeneration a fulfilment of the promise is found, "Whosesoever sins ye forgive, they are forgiven." The minister of baptism is the representative of Christ when he takes the child in his arms and pours the healing waters on his head. When, however, the priest is not present, baptism may be delegated to the deacon, and LAY BAPTISM in cases of necessity is admitted to be valid.

3. The ministry of reconciliation includes also that power and commandment, which Christ hath given to His ministers, to declare unto His people, being penitent, the absolution and remission of their sins. The principle of absolution may be seen under the Jewish dispensation, where leprosy was viewed as a type of sin, and the leper was excluded from the congregation of God's people; but when the leprosy was healed it was appointed that he should go to the priest, who was to examine him, and pronounce him clean, if he found that he was healed; and then the leper might enter without fear into the courts of the Lord. So in the Christian Church, those who are troubled in conscience are invited to come to the priest, that "by the ministry of God's Holy Word they may receive the benefit of absolution, together with ghostly counsel and advice, to the quieting of their consciences and avoiding of all scruple and doubtfulness." The friend to whom the penitent unburdens his griefs is one who has received the commission, "Whosesoever sins ye remit, they are remitted." The public confession of sins in the ancient Church was succeeded by private confession, but the exercise of the priestly office of absolution remained unchanged. Care was taken that the delegative power of the priest was not confounded with the autocratic power of Him who alone could forgive sins by His own act, just as the Apostles were careful to explain that their miracles were wrought not by their own power, but in the Name of Christ. [NAME.] Since the truly penitent alone could benefit by this ministration, penances were used as tests applied to the hearts and minds of those who professed to be repentant, and as the Jewish priest examined the body of the leper, so did the priest search the heart of the penitent to the best of his ability, that he might not pronounce him clean whilst he remained in his sins. And since the efficacy of absolution depended on the repentance of the sinner, and his heart was open to God alone, it must be proclaimed that God would only ratify those sentences, and confirm those exercises of delegated power, which approve themselves to His judgment. The exercise of absolution is public and private. In the daily order of morning and evening prayer, the priest declares to those who are truly penitent the absolution and remission of their sins, and to those who truly repent these words will come as Christ's message, even as the words which Nathan was commissioned to pronounce to David; "The Lord hath put away thy sin." But there are other special occasions where a more direct form of absolution is needed, as when the sorrows of a doubting heart are unburdened, or when the Christian on his deathbed desires to hear the message of pardon from God's appointed ambassador.

4. In public worship, generally, the priest, on the people's part, collects and offers up their prayers. For them he intercedes as an appointed intercessor with God, and in God's name he blesses them with the blessing of peace.

VII. The objections made to the doctrine of the priesthood are:—

Obj. 1. That it interferes with the mediation of Christ. Rightly viewed, it brings the mediation of Christ into greater prominence, for it leads us through sacraments and ordinances directly up to Him who has sent His earthly priests as His ambassadors to men. The very title of "High" Priest which we give to Him implies the existence of lower priests under Him, and acting by His commission.

Obj. 2. That it interferes with the priesthood of His people. The family of Christ are a royal priesthood, but the Jews likewise were a kingdom of priests and an holy nation; yet under the Jewish dispensation an official priesthood was established, and therefore the existence of an official priesthood in the Christian Church is not more inconsistent with the privileges of the people of Christ. [LAY PRIESTHOOD.]

Obj. 3. That if the commission was given to the Apostles, such powers could not be intended for their successors. The power granted to the Apostles was given, not for the glorification of themselves, but for the edification of the people; and those powers which were necessary for all times we must expect would be continued. There were some powers, such as the gift of bodily healing, which were given temporarily, and not to the Apostles exclusively, as signs and wonders which should direct attention to their preaching; but such a power as the forgiveness of sins must be as needful for men in the nineteenth century as in the first, and therefore it would be unreasonable to suppose that if Christ gave this power to His Apostles, it would be withheld from their successors.

Obj. 4. That the name of priest is not given to Christ's ministers in the New Testament. No argument can be founded on this, because there is considerable confusion in the titles which are given to Christ's ministers. Three orders are discernible, but it was only after the Apostolic age that their nomenclature assumed a permanent form. It is significant, no doubt, that while priestly functions are often spoken of, the name of priest does not occur in the New Testament: but the omission is to be thus accounted for. "Christianity arose, not as the antagonist of the Mosaic system, but as its inner life gradually developed under the covering of its external forms." The infant-community of Christians even used, as far as might be, the Jewish institutions, amongst which none was more prominent than the priesthood. To have assumed at once the name of priests would have been to erect a rival institution, and to place the Gospel in immediate antagonism with the Jewish religion; and while the Christian converts frequented the Temple services, and received certain ordinances at the hands of the Jewish priest, the existence of two orders of priests, each so-called, would have caused confusion in the minds of both communities. No such objection attached to the use of the word presbyter or elder, which was used indifferently for all offices of reverence or authority.

Another object was to be attained, and that was to wean the mind of the Jew from the external associations of his ancient faith. The temporary disuse of the term was providentially ordered for this purpose to facilitate the progress of the Jewish mind to a clearer view of the spiritual realities of the new kingdom [Carter's Doctrine of the Priesthood, pp. 120, 121].

Obj. 5. That since the priest is the representative of the people, his power must be claimed, not from a divine commission, but from the people. The Jews were a nation of priests, and yet Aaron was chosen not by them, but by God. "No man taketh this honour unto himself but he that is called of God, as was Aaron" [Heb. vi. 4]. The several titles given to the ministers of God in Holy Scripture, prove that their authority comes not from below, but from above. They are called ambassadors, but an ambassador's commission comes from the king who sent him, and not from the people to whom he is sent. They are called stewards, but a steward is appointed by the owner of the soil, not by the tenants. They are called shepherds, and a shepherd is not chosen by the sheep, but by their owner. And yet because they are representatives of the people, the voice of the people assents to their choice. A bishop is elected, but his consecration, and not his election, constitutes him a bishop. A priest must, before his ordination, receive the implied consent, at least, of the people, and for this purpose the "Si quis" must be publicly proclaimed in the congregation.

Obj. 6. That the etymology of priest is not from ἱερεύς, but from πρεσβύτερος. The answer to this objection is contained in that to the fourth. We are dealing not with words, but with living realities, and it is the priestly functions, not the titles given to those who were commissioned to perform them, that we have to deal with. PRIESTHOOD OF THE LAITY. [Lay Priesthood.]

PRISCILLIANISTS. A sect of Spanish heretics taking their name from their founder, a Spaniard of noble birth, who lived about A.D. 380. Their tenets were an admixture of Gnostic and Manichæan doctrines, and much licentiousness was acknowledged by their leaders, notwithstanding a profession of asceticism in some particulars. The heresy spread very much among the women of Spain; and though it was formally condemned by a Council at Saragossa in A.D. 381, obtained much influence at the court of the Emperor Gratian. His successor Maximus, however, put Priscillian and six others to death (contrary to the earnest remonstrance of St. Martin), in A.D. 385, and persecuted the sect with great severity. In consequence of this cruelty, St. Ambrose refused to communicate with Maximus. But the conduct of both these holy men was a protest against capital punishment for heresy, and not a defence of the Priscillian party. There is, however, much obscurity as to the exact tenets of the latter, and they died out altogether during the fifth century. [Dict. of Sects and Heresies.]

PRISCILLIANISTS. A name sometimes given to the Montanists, from the so-called prophetess Priscilla. [Montanism.]

PROCESSION OF THE HOLY GHOST. A theological term used to express the mode in which the Divine Essence is eternally existent in the Third Person of the Blessed Trinity. It is a term analogous to that of Eternal Generation, which expresses the mode by which the Divine Essence exists in the Second Person of the Blessed Trinity.

As early as A.D. 373, this term had found its way into the Creed, τὸ ἐκ τοῦ Πατρὸς ἐκπορευόμενον being the words used in a Creed so preserved by Epiphanius, in his Ancorate [Epiphan. Ancorat. cc. 119, 120]. Eight years afterwards [A.D. 381] it obtained a permanent settlement in the Constantinopolitan revision of the Creed of Nicæa, in precisely the same form; in which form it still appears in that Creed as used by the Eastern Church. In the Western Church a word has been added to express the fact of procession from the Son as well as from the Father, a full account of which has been given elsewhere. [Filioque.]

The doctrine itself, as distinct from the history of the controversy respecting this addition, will be here considered with reference to the scriptural and patristic authority on which it is founded. It must first be noticed, that when it is said the Holy Ghost "proceeds from the Father and the Son," we are not to understand that He proceeds in the same sense from one Divine Person as from the other. The Father is the only Fountain of Godhead, and the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father through the Son as from one source, and, in theological phrase, by one spiration—the Divine nature of the Father and of the Son being hypostatically one and the same, though the Persons are distinct. The only difference between the Father and the Son is their personal distinction, that is paternity and filiation; spiration therefore must equally belong to each, otherwise we make a real difference between the Divine nature of the Father and of the Son, which is impossible. But spiration in the same sense (activa spiratio) cannot be affirmed of the Holy Ghost, since His personal distinction in the Godhead consists in His procession, which may be gathered from His name, the Holy Spirit. He proceeds eternally from the Father and the Son—"amor unitivus amborum."

Such is the explanation of this doctrine by St. Thomas Aquinas and mediæval theologians of the Western Church;[1] but the subject, it must be remembered, is necessarily mysterious and incomprehensible; man can only vainly attempt to [1] Aquin. Summa, I. quæst. 36, 37.

"search out the Almighty to perfeetion." We are eompelled to use sueh terms as "spiration" and "procession" in reference to the Third Person of the Trinity, and rival disputants argue from them as if they conveyed a definite meaning or were fully intelligible to ourselves, which assuredly is not true; henee follows, on both sides, much irreverent language, and inferenees and conelusions upon which no real dependence ean be plaeed.[1]

The passage on which the doctrine of the Eastern Church is founded as contained in the Creed is John xv. 26, "the Holy Ghost which proeeds from the Father." Here, it is said, our Lord expressly states that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father, and thus that the Filioque, "and from the Son," is not only an unauthorized addition of the Western Church to the Creed, but also to the teaching of Holy Seripture; this inference is entirely founded on the supposition that our Lord's words refer to the eternal procession, and not, according to an obvious explanation, to the temporal mission of the Holy Ghost. Maldonatus interprets the passage, that "Christ will send the Holy Ghost, Who proeeds from the Father, and is therefore fully acquainted with the mysteries of Divine knowledge,"—a sense fully accordant with our Lord's words and the general meaning of the passage.[2] Bengel argues that the mission of the Holy Ghost from the Father and the Son is here equally intimated. He says "that as saying the Son sends the Comforter does not deny that the Father also does, so saying the Spirit proceeds from the Father does not deny that He also proceeds from the Son." Kuinoel explains "proceeding from" as merely synonymous with being sent by the Father. And even should we admit that the doetrine of an eternal procession is here taught, it does not follow, as the commentator just quoted (Maldonatus) shews, that the passage is to be understood in an exelusive sense—as if the Holy Ghost does not also proceed from the Son:—there are manifest reasons why the procession from the Son should not here have been explicitly mentioned.

But the passage before us cannot fairly be considered as the foundation on which this doctrine rests, and did it stand alone, we could not say with certainty that the procession of the Holy Ghost is revealed in Scripture at all. The passage seems to imply more than a temporal mission from the Father, but this is all that can be affirmed. Passages far more conclusive are contained in Scripture, and to these chiefly must we appeal for any real information on the subject. Such are those which speak of the Holy Ghost as the Spirit of the Father and of Christ, with the inferenees which must certainly follow. Thus the Holy Ghost is called the Spirit of the Father [Matt. x. 20], of God [Rom. viii. 9], of the Lord [Acts v. 9]. Such statements imply a mysterious and (neeessarily) eternal procession from the Father; the Spirit of God being always represented as inherently possessing, through that relationship, all the prerogatives and attributes of Godhead, as omnipresenee [Ps. cxxxix. 2], omniscience [1 Cor. ii. 10], and eternal existence [Heb ix. 14]—in a word, as being really God, because He is the Spirit of God. Admitting this, there is the same proof that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Son as from the Father. Thus He is called the Spirit of Christ [Rom. viii. 9; 1 Peter i. 11], and God is said to have sent forth the Spirit of His Son into our hearts [Gal. iv. 6]. One of the passages quoted [1 Pet. i. 11] has an important bearing on the subject. The Holy Ghost is called the Spirit of Christ which inspired the prophets; hence it appears that the Holy Spirit is not called the Spirit of Christ merely as being sent by Him [John xvi. 7-14] to eomplete His mediatorial work (the usual explanation of those who deny the doctrine of the double procession), which has no connexion with the inspiration of the prophets; nor ean any valid reason be assigned why He is here ealled the Spirit of Christ, but on account of His procession from the Godhead of the Son.

The Eastern Church claims the writings of the Fathers generally as being in aecordance with their teaching, but this claim is exaggerated even as regards the Fathers of the Eastern Church. Petavius has quoted passages from Epiphanius,[3] which at least imply the doetrine of the double proeession; and in other quotations he has given from Fathers of the Eastern Chureh, the same doetrine is implicitly, if not expressly, taught.[4] But the testimony in proof of the double procession from Fathers of the Latin Church is clear and unexceptional, and ean only be set aside by vague and unproved assertions that the works

[1] See some examples in Neale's Hist. East. Ch. 1140.

[2] "Quem mittam ab eo loeo ubi Pater est, a sinu Patris. At quid hoe ad rem attinebat? Ut Ejus eommendaret testimonium; illius enim testimonium gravissimum fore qui ex sinu veniret Patris, omnia mysteria Patris seiens fidusque legatus neminem fallens. Qua eadem ratione paulo post dicit: Qui a Patre procedit. Hine alia explicatur quæstio, eur non dixerit etiam a se proeedere: quia id apud homines magis minuere quam eommendare poterat ejus testimonium. Cum enim de ipsomet ageretur suspeetum potius Spiritus saneti testimonium videretur, si dixisset a se proeedere. Præterquam quod, ut modo diximus, modestius ita loquitur."

[3] St. Epiphanius does not expressly state that the Holy Ghost "proeeeds" (ἐκπορέυεται) from the Father and the Son, but elearly intimates or implies it. He says (in Ancor. see. vii.) that the "Holy Ghost is from the same substanee of the Father and the Son" (αλλ' ἐκ τῆς αυτῆς οὐσίας Πατρὸς καὶ Υἱοῦ, Πνεῦμα ἅγιον), and that "He is from Both" (see. 71, παρ' ἀμφοτέρων), that "He proeeeds from the Father, and ever reeeives from the Son" (ἐκ Πατρὸς ἐκπορευομενον καὶ τοῦ Υἱοῦ λαμβάνον ἀεὶ) [Cont. Sabell. Hæres. 42 sive 62]. Thus, though "proeeeding" is only spoken of as from the Father, yet the truth of a proeession from the Son is elearly implied. We may say of the Fathers of the Eastern Chureh generally—they keep close to the words of Seripture, which only declares an ἐκπορέυσις from the Father, yet they really imply, without direetly stating it, the doetrine of a double proeession. The question is not as to the use of the word, in itself of equivocal meaning, but as to an important doetrine elsewhere elearly implied in Holy Seripture. The dispute between the Churehes seems little else than a logomaehy, both believing in substanee the same truth. When St. Epiphanius asserts that the Spirit reeeives eternally from the Son, it eannot be supposed that his doetrine differs essentially from that of the Western Church.

from which quotations are given are spurious. Passages from St. Hilary, St. Ambrose, St. Augustine and St. Fulgentius, are quoted by Pearson [art. viii.] Two, which are not so quoted, may also be added from Tertullian's treatise against Praxeas, which, considering the age of the writer [A.D. 200] and the undoubted genuineness of his treatise, have an important bearing on the controversy. They clearly shew that the doctrine of the double procession was held from an early period in the Western Church, and disprove the theory of its supposed origination at the time of its insertion in the Creed. Tertullian says that the Holy Spirit is "derived from no other source than from the Father and the Son;"[1] and more plainly, that "the Spirit is the third from God and His Son, as the fruit which comes from the shrub is the third from the root; and the river which proceeds from the stream is third from the fountain."[2]

That the doctrine of the double procession was held at an early period is evident from other reasons, since we cannot otherwise fairly account for its insertion in the Creed in the fifth or sixth century, and its general reception afterwards in the Western Church. A Creed containing in express terms a doctrine which was maintained by the principal Latin Fathers had an unquestionable claim to be acknowledged by the Western Church; although the addition to the Nicene Creed, strictly speaking, was unauthorized, and as such censured by Leo III.

The main objection to the Latin doctrine by the Easterns[3] may be traced to a misapprehension of its right meaning, as if it implied two principles, or what is called a double principiation in the Godhead, but this inference does not follow if the Latin view be correctly explained, and is repudiated by the definition of the Council of Florence, in which the true doctrine is clearly stated. PROPAGANDA. [Missions.]

PROPHECY is that aspect of the Supernatural which, together with Miracles strictly so called, constitutes the fundamental proof of Revelation. [Miracles.] To foreknow and to foretell a future event as far transcend the ordinary laws in accordance with which human knowledge is exhibited, and as much imply the intervention of the all-knowing God, as the act of raising the dead, or of changing water into wine, transcends the laws in accordance with which the ordinary course of the world proceeds, and implies the intervention of the God of Nature. This is the predictive element of the Prophetic Volume; to which must be added as a second element—the moral. To this moral element of Prophecy must be assigned its due prominence when we seek for the significance of the Divine Revelation. The moral Revelation, it has been often pointed out,[4] made by the successive Prophets, holds an intermediate state between the Law of Moses and the Gospel. It is a step in progress beyond the Law, and preparatory to the Gospel. E.g.—"the Prophets taught the doctrine of repentance with a clearness and certainty which were not admitted into the Law of Moses." [Davison, l. c. p. 45. Cf. too such passages as Ps. xl. 1; Isa. i.] It is an error, however, not unusual with modern writers, to confine their attention to the moral element of Prophecy, and to disparage the predictive. Thus Dr. Arnold wrote: "Prophecy fixes our attention on principles, on good and evil, on truth and falsehood, on God and His enemy. . . . Prophecy is God's voice, speaking to us respecting the issue, in all time, of that great struggle which is the real interest of human life, the struggle between good and evil."[5] As an illustration of the results which follow from such a partial estimate of Prophecy, it may be noted that Dr. Arnold concludes that the Book of Daniel is to be ascribed to the time of the Maccabees, chiefly because its latter chapters, "if genuine, would be a clear exception to my canon of interpretation."[6] The most striking characteristic of the predictive element of Prophecy is its double sense, which rests upon what may be termed the law according to which Divine Revelation unveils the future—viz. that when the future was to be foreshadowed, certain events of the time, historical or incidental, were selected as occasions on which were founded the several disclosures of God's Will. Thus, in Heb. i. 5, the words "I will be to him a Father, and he shall be to Me a son," originally spoken of Solomon [2 Sam. vii. 14], are directly applied to Christ.[7] To this head belongs the entire class of types—e.g. the brazen serpent [John iii. 14]. The value of the predictive element of Prophecy as a proof of Christianity depends, manifestly, on the fact that, in no case, have we in the Bible a vaticinium post eventum; and for this fact the evidence is supplied by the testimony to the Canon of Scripture.

PROSTRATI. [Genuflectentes.]

PROTESTANTISM. The name Protestant was first given to those who at the second Diet of Spires [A.D. 1529] protested against the revocation of a resolution of the first Diet [A.D. 1526], which had granted to each prince the power of management of ecclesiastical affairs until the meeting of a general council, and against the edict substituted for that resolution, declaring all change in doctrine, discipline, or worship unlawful. It has since been used first as a convenient historical term designating collectively all who refuse the usurped supremacy of the Pope; secondly, as a term of controversy implying [1] a condemnation of alleged Romish errors and superstitions, and sometimes [2] a yet further assertion of certain tenets supposed to be of the essence of Protestantism.

I. As an historical term. The body of Protestants consists, generally speaking, of Sweden, Denmark, Norway, all Lutheran; the larger half of the population of the Netherlands, about half the population of Switzerland, including the cantons of Aargau, Zurich, Berne, most of Vaud, all Calvinistic; the Catholic English, Irish, and Scottish Churches, with their Colonial and American daughters; the Scottish Presbyterians; the large bodies of Lutherans, Calvinists, Huguenots, in the other countries of Europe; the English and Irish Nonconformists, and their descendants in the United States and the Colonies.

II. As a term of controversy. It is [1] conceivable, but has not occurred, that a national church might renounce the Pope, but retain Romish doctrine. The case occurs from time to time with individual persons, and they reject the title Protestant: from a feeling that the term implies, more or less, a condemnation of Romish error. The term, however, asserts neither the subjects in which the Church of Rome has erred, nor the extent of the error; still less does it assert, on the other hand, the Catholic truth in the matters in question. It is merely a term of indefinite negation, and it is of importance to notice that great harm results from putting forward this negative Protestantism as if it were a definition of the essential nature of a church. It leads the unwary members of that church to mistake their position, to forget their catholicity. That they are Protestants is accidental: that they are Catholics is essential. Again, great harm follows from attempts at ecclesiastical union upon the mere basis of this negation. Union can be based only upon truth; and an attempt to compass an union by a simple denial of error proceeds on the supposition that there are many doctrines which may be indifferently substituted for the error. If the Lutheran and the Zuinglian shake hands because they both deny Transubstantiation, it is that they sink the Catholic doctrine of the Holy Eucharist. The general discussion of this topic belongs to SYNCRETISM: but the impossibility of such a union among Protestants is so apparent, that no real attempt has been made by the governing bodies of Churches and sects to bring it about. Cranmer for some time cherished the notion, and even took the first step, that of inviting a congress of divines; but the scheme soon dropped. [Blunt's Hist. of Reformation, i. 470.] In the Comprehension scheme of 1689, it was designed to recognise the ministry of the foreign Protestants. This the Lower House of Convocation stopped. In our own times the Jerusalem bishopric and the Evangelical Alliance have not recommended these Syncretistic arrangements to English Churchmen.

[2.] The attempts that have been made to discover and supply positive principles to Protestantism have resulted in propounding two dogmas, both erroneous and both mischievous. One is Chillingworth's, who published in 1635 Religion of Protestants a safe way to Salvation. The main proposition of this book is that the Scriptures, and not ecclesiastical tradition, are the sole and infallible rule of faith. The Puritans had held this doctrine, but their controversy with the Church led them to insist upon the sufficiency of Scripture with regard to discipline and forms of worship, rather than with regard to faith. In 1659 it was stated in Milton's Treatise of Civil Power in Ecclesiastical Cases: "It is the general consent of all sound Protestant writers, that neither traditions, councils, nor canons of any visible church, much less edicts of any magistrate or civil session, but the Scripture only, can be the final judge or rule in matters of religion, and that only in the conscience of every Christian to himself." "With the name of Protestant hath ever been received this doctrine, which prefers the Scripture before the Church, and acknowledges none but the Scripture sole interpreter of itself to the conscience." "If by the Protestant doctrine we believe the Scripture, not for the Church's saying, but for its own as the Word of God, then ought we to believe what in our conscience we apprehend the Scripture to say, though the visible Church with all her doctors gainsay." "To interpret the Scripture convincingly to his own conscience none is able but himself, guided by the Holy Spirit; and not so guided, none than he to himself can be a worse deceiver." This is not the doctrine of the Church of England. If the Church have authority in controversies of faith, it is a matter of conscience to submit one's private judgment to that authority. "There co-exist in the Church of God two authorities, mutually corroborative of each other, and so far as individual interpretation of each, mutually corrective of each other: the inspired Word and the inspired Church—the inspired Word receiving its canonicity, its interpretation from the inspired Church; and the inspired Church tested in its development by the inspired Word." [Bishop Forbes, on XXXIX. Art. p. 95.]

The second dogma, which many would make an essential of Protestantism, is that the Pope is Antichrist, the Church of Rome no true church, but strictly idolatrous, her rites and ceremonies so polluted that none may be used with a good conscience. Undoubtedly, there is much to be said for considering the first of these items a maxim of Protestantism, as the continental Reformers in general held it; and it being commonly in England held by the Reformers of Edward VI.'s reign, and thence down to the middle of the seventeenth century. Kennet [Register, p. 77] tells us that Sheldon was the first in Oxford to deny the doctrine, to the scandal of Prideaux, who was presiding in the Schools. Still it is not the doctrine of the English Reformation. The Institution of a Christian Man declares "the pretended monarchy of the Bishop of Rome is not founded upon the Gospel, but is repugnant thereto," and proceeds to treat the matter very coolly; "and as for the Bishop of Rome, he cannot pretend himself no more to be grieved or injured therewith, than the king's chancellor, or any other his officers, might worthily think that the King's highness should do him wrong in case he should, upon good cause, remove him from his said room and office and commit it unto another." [Lloyd's Formularies, pp. 121-123.] The Elizabethan bishops also understood their position. Neale, in laying down this Protestant principle as a Puritan principle, opposes it to the tenet of the Court Reformers, who held that "the Church of Rome was a true church, though corrupt in some points of doctrine and government, that all her ministrations were valid, and that the Pope was a true bishop of Rome, though not of the universal church." [Neale's Hist. of Purit. i. 96, ed. 1754.] Cranmer then learnt the doctrine from the Lutherans: intercourse with Geneva did not lessen its popularity: and it was held as a private opinion for a century. Church of England divines in general have relinquished it: dissenters for the most part hold it. It is easy to understand why the doctrine had stronger hold on the continental divines than on English divines. The throwing off the papal supremacy in England by the Crown, the clergy, and the laity, requires for its justification no such dogma. But it is very doubtful whether the separation caused by Luther can be defended without this dogma, or one equivalent to it. Coleridge has adopted the equivalent, or rather the only rational form of the dogma, in justification of Luther; and declares that nothing less than this could have justified so tremendous a rent in the Catholic Church, with all its foreseen and most calamitous consequences. [Coleridge, Church and State, pp. 157-159.]

Those, however, who advocate this Protestant dogma are not satisfied with the distinction which Coleridge carefully draws between the episcopate of the Romish Church and the Papacy with the hierarchy so far as it is papal, any more than the Puritans were satisfied with the distinction when made by Elizabeth's divines. They go on to the other assertions named above, which, by their narrowness and want of charity, have caused the word Protestant to imply to the minds of many all that is sectarian and unamiable.

The Church of England, then, not being Protestant in this last sense, not holding these two principles, and not resting in the vagueness of a mere negation, has determined [1] that the Bishop of Rome hath no jurisdiction in this realm of England; [2] that as the Church of Jerusalem, Alexandria, and Antioch have erred, so also the Church of Rome hath erred, not only in their living and manner of ceremonies, but also in matters of faith—that is, not in matters which the Church of England declares to be de fide, but in matters which the churches named have taught are to be believed; and [3] it specifies errors, sometimes naming the Church of Rome, sometimes describing the doctrine. It needs much care, and no inconsiderable acquaintance with the language of the schools of theology to determine how far the doctrine of the Schoolmen has been maintained by the Council of Trent; whether the doctrine named in our Articles be the doctrine of the one or the other; whether, when a doctrine is described and condemned without the Church of Rome being named, it is really the doctrine of the Church of Rome.

PROTHESIS. The oblation of the unconsecrated elements which precedes the Pro-Anaphora in Eastern Liturgies. The "Office of the Prothesis" is said, not at the altar itself, but at a side table (or "credence" as it is called in the West); and in large churches a separate apse or chapel is set apart for this, on the north of that in which the altar is placed. The name seems to be derived from the Temple service, the setting in order of the loaves upon the table of shewbread being called by St. Paul ἡ προθέσις τῶν ἄρτων in Hebrews ix. 2, and the loaves themselves ἄρτοι τῆς προθέσεως by our Lord in Matthew xii. 4. The rite going by this name in the Eastern Church is a solemn preparation of the elements before they are taken through the "holy doors" of the iconostasis to the altar, with the ceremony called the "Great Entrance." It includes what is known in our English Liturgy as the Offertory, but a very elaborate ritual is also used in the preparation of the bread, and at the conclusion of the office there is a special prayer of the Prothesis, in which God is besought to accept the oblation for the celebration of the holy mysteries. [Neale's Eastern Church, i. 352.]

PROTOTYPE. The prototypal form in which Adam was created was the image of God; in Christ that image is restored; and it is our hope that this form will be ours also when we wake up after God's likeness and are satisfied [Psa. xv. 17]. It is a term, therefore, that has an anthropological, a Christological, and an eschatological character, as referring to Adam, to the Redeemer, and to the redeemed. Now, in what does that likeness consist? Not surely in outward form; but in spiritual attributes, for God is Spirit. But those attributes pertain to the soul invested in body, which God has not, therefore the likeness of God must be restricted to such divine attributes as are reflected in man independently of his material nature, such as a love for all that is good and holy, right reason and free will, which constitute in him the "likeness and glory" of God [1 Cor. xi. 7; see GLORY], and exclusive of other attributes that serve only to mark the imperfection of the creature. When Irenæus, therefore [c. Hær. v. 6], speaks of the image of God as being "suâ naturâ" of a bodily character, he may express correctly the philosophical notion of the Deity, and therefore of the divine likeness, as derived from ancient schools, but he hardly speaks with the authority of Catholic antiquity on a point which had as yet received but little consideration. Our only safe guide is the Apostle, who expresses himself with sufficient explicitness. With him Christ is the very "image of God" [2 Cor. iv. 4], "in the form of God" [Phil. ii. 6], "and the express image of His Person," as well as "the brightness of His Glory" [Heb. i. 3], "The image of the Invisible God" [Col. i. 15]. He is now to us as the prototypal form in which Adam was created full of grace and truth; and man's hope of having that form restored in him hereafter depends on the genuineness with which some few rays of that glory are reflected in his soul now. So it has been decreed from everlasting, that all who are called according to God's sanctifying purpose should be "conformed to the image of His Son" [Rom. viii. 29]; that "as we have borne the image of the earthy," we may also "bear the image of the heavenly" [1 Cor. xv. 49]; that having His high exemplar before us, and "beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord," by a continually progressive sanctifying process, we "may be changed into the same image from glory to glory as by the Spirit of the Lord" [2 Cor. iii. 18]. It is of this "renewing in the spirit of our mind," according to the prototypal likeness of Christ, that the Apostle speaks, when he exhorts his charge to "put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image" of the Creator [Col. iii. 10], and "after God [כרמות] is created in righteousness and in the holiness of truth" [Eph. iv. 24]. According to Roman doctrine original righteousness was not this prototypal likeness, but a superadded gift conferred after the act of creation was complete. So the Tridentine Catechism says, "Quod ad animam pertinet, eam ad imaginem et similitudinem suam formavit Deus, liberumque ei tribuit arbitrium; omnes præterea motus animi atque appetitiones ita in eo temperavit, ut rationis imperio nunquam non parerent. Tum originalis justitiæ admirabile donum addidit," &c. [ed. Colon. 1565, p. 63]. The council purposed, in the first instance, to express its meaning as "Justitiam et sanctitatem in qua Adam conditus fuerat," but accepted the correction of Paceco, and wrote "constitutus fuerat" [Pallavic. H. Conc. Trid. vii. 9]. For the teaching of the Schools on this point, see SCHOLASTIC THEOLOGY; for the whimsical notions of Judaism, see CABBALA.

PROVIDENCE is the name of the order of the visible creation, so far as it makes provision beforehand for the well-being and government of the sensitive part thereof, especially mankind. We do not speak of God's Providence over angels, good or evil, we speak of them as the instruments of His Providence, because their state is fixed, and they already inherit the supreme good or the supreme evil: whereas providence dispenses spiritual and temporal blessings and trials which are not absolute or final. We speak of God's Providence over the beasts of the field and the fowls of the air, but only in a transcendental (not an unreal) sense of His Providence over the lilies of the field, because providence always, in its ordinary sense, implies either the discipline or the benefit, we may say the gratification, of what is subject to it.

Providence is further said to work by means, by which we understand that the order of providence is an order of secondary causes, and that at no point in the order do we come to the immediate action of the First Cause; consequently the action of Providence is essentially capable of being explained, though we are never in a condition to explain it completely: but the limitation of our knowledge is always a limitation of degree, and does not imply a radical defect of faculty. At the same time, the conception of providence is a provisional conception of the temporal aspect of an eternal operation: when we think of providence, we think of means arranged beforehand and of results following them in due season, yet we know that all things in space and time are ordered by God in an infinite here, an everlasting now. Hence we are not in a position even to state the question, What is the relation of God's Providence to man's free agency? It is only safe to say that the results of human will, like all finite agencies, are absolutely controlled and directed at every point by providence. When we have realized the central paradox of an eternal working in time, which is inconceivable and indisputable, we shall be prepared to believe that a free agency is absolutely controlled and determined in all its results, good and evil, by that eternal love. As it is written, "I make peace and create evil: I the Lord do all these things" [Isa. xlv. 7].

In this sense all providence is special, since each of the individual events which happen in this order are reverently to be accepted as the will of God, by Whom the whole order is directed. When we speak of the whole order we speak provisionally, for the order of the whole creation is undoubtedly one; we think of the order of providence as including only what we can in some sense reckon upon, but spirits which see God understand in Him the order of all things, even of those which we call extraordinary. To such spirits it may well be easier to understand in what order God heals sickness by faith than in what order He heals sickness by medicine. To us the lesson of such extraordinary providences or miracles is that God is above the order which He makes, and that as we see it that order is not complete or self-sustaining. The same lesson is enforced by another kind of providences, which we call special, not extraordinary. A common type of such providences would be, that a perfectly accountable detention should preserve a man from a perfectly accountable calamity, e.g., a railway collision, or that two men should be brought, by independent and accountable process, to the same place without intending to meet. Here it is the co-ordination of independent series of causes to a result which has no accountable connection with any one series, that points to something beyond the order which we conceive and understand. In other words we learn by miracles that the order of the world as we see it is partial, by special providence that our conception of that order is inadequate.

PROVISIONS. A letter or title issued by a superior to an ecclesiastic, stating his institution and promotion to a particular office. There are three kinds: provisio libera, which depends upon the sole will of the granter; provision per force, where the latter cannot refuse; and provision under colour, where it is only an apparently lawful title, wherein the original nullity and defect are covered by the fact of peaceable possession during three years, provided that it has not been acquired by violence. They are invalid where the grantor has not the right of lawful collation, or the grantee is incapable of a benefice, or has been guilty of simony in procuring one. Persons nominated to bishoprics receive six bulls from Rome, the first being that of provision.

The Statute of Provisors defines as subject to a præmunire the offence of persons who purchase from the See of Rome provisions for holding abbeys or priories, &c. It was passed as 25 Edw. III. stat. vi. sec. 3. Matthew Paris, under the year 1245, states that at one time there were so many Italians beneficed in England, that they received more money yearly out of it than all the revenues of the Crown, to the high disservice of God, the great scandal of religion, the decay of hospitality, and the utter ruin of the English Church. In the time of Edward III. the Pope assumed the right to fill almost every vacant see upon the score of these reservations in his own patronage, the right of capitular election was overridden, and bishoprics were often conferred upon unworthy persons. The State at length interfered to check this arbitrary and injurious presumption—which Bramhall calls "sublimated simony"—both in England and France.

PURGATORY. The Roman Catholic doctrine is thus stated by the Council of Trent: "There is a Purgatory, and the souls there detained are helped by prayer, and chiefly by the acceptable sacrifice of the altar"—a statement obviously vague and indefinite, as leaving the most important inquiry undetermined, which is, whether the souls in Purgatory are in a state of happiness or misery: they are "detained," but nothing more as de fide is stated. But, on referring to the Catechism of the Council of Trent, drawn up by order of the Fathers there assembled, we find a clearer and more explicit definition: "There is a purgatorial fire, where the souls of the righteous are purified by a temporary punishment [ad definitum tempus cruciatæ expiantur], that entrance may be given them into their eternal home, where nothing that is defiled can have a place. And of the truth of this doctrine, which holy councils declare to be confirmed by the testimony of Scripture and of Apostolic tradition, the pastor will have to declare more diligently and frequently, because we are fallen on times in which men will not endure sound doctrine." [Conc. Trident. sess. vi. can. 30, sess. xxv. sec. I. Catech. Trident. cap. vi. qu. 3.]

Thus a definite meaning is given to the vague teaching of the Council: there is a purgatorial fire, and the souls of the faithful are punished for a defined period till their sins are expiated. The almost universal belief prevailing amongst Roman Catholics—though they do not consider torment by fire as being de fide, but only the most probable opinion—is that Purgatory is a place of suffering or punishment for imperfect Christians.[1] Bellarmine says "that the Fathers unanimously teach that the pains of Purgatory are most severe or terrible" [De Purgat. ii. 14].

Prayer for the dead, as shewn elsewhere, was the universal usage of the early Church, derived, as the Fathers asserted, from Apostolic tradition. The Fathers also unanimously believed that prayer benefited the departed, though how, or in what sense, there was no consentient belief, and it is sometimes difficult to harmonize their conflicting opinions or theories. All admitted the Apostolic belief and usage, but held various opinions, more or less probable, which originated from it; and we must clearly distinguish between what is of assured faith, and doubtful, though even probable, theories or speculations. Now, on considering the teaching of the Fathers, we find no mention of a "Purgatorius locus" or "ignis," to which the souls of departed Christians were generally conveyed, but of an intermediate state in which was the abode of all the souls of the dead, where they remained until the day of resurrection—a state or place either of happiness or misery according to their past life. Such was the teaching of the Fathers, and had all Christians been in the fullest sense righteous or wicked, no further difficulties on the subject could have arisen; but besides the class of the righteous and the wicked, properly and emphatically so called, there was, as at present, a large intermediate number of imperfect Christians, who could hardly be said to belong to one class or the other—not fit in their present state for the happiness of heaven, nor deserving the punishment of hell: and the teaching of the Fathers as regards the future condition of these requires to be specially investigated.

There were two theories in the Primitive Church which are carefully to be distinguished: they are not inconsistent with each other, and probably, in many cases, were held together. One may called the Judgment day Purgatory, and pleaded in its support the words of St. Paul literally understood, that the "fire shall try every man's work," and that even he who has built wood, hay, straw, stubble on the true foundation "shall be saved, yet so as by fire" [1 Cor. iii. 11-15]. In proof of this doctrine was also quoted the frequent use of the word "fire" in connection with the Lord's Coming or the Day of Judgment [see Psa. l. 3; Isa. iv. 4; Dan. vii. 9; Zech. xii. 9; Mal. iii. 2, 3, iv. 1].

The following extracts will shew the belief of the Fathers, that all Christians must pass through the fire on the Day of Judgment, though all will not be injured by it—the highest saints passing through unhurt, and others suffering a punishment proportioned to their sins, till "the wood, hay, straw, and stubble" built on the true foundation be consumed. Quotations shall first be given from writers of the Western Church. Thus St. Hilary speaks of the severity of the Judgment day purgation by fire, through which all, even the Blessed Virgin, must pass;[2] and St. Ambrose

[1] Thus Dr. Milner, though he says "that in the Council of Trent all is contained that is necessary to be believed on this subject," yet afterwards defines Purgatory "as a place of temporary punishment," which is not asserted by, and goes beyond, the decree of the Council. [End of Controversy, p. 170, 374, ed. 1841.]

[2] "Diem judicii . . . in quo nobis est ille indefessus ignis subeundus, in quo subeunda sunt gravia illa expiandæ a peccatis animæ supplicia? Beatæ Mariæ animam gladius pertransibit ut revelentur multorum cordium cogitationes" [Luc. ii. 35]. "Si in judicii severitatem says: "We must all pass through the fire, whether it be John the Evangelist, whom the Lord so loved, that He said to Peter, 'If I will that he remain, what is that to thee, follow thou Me.' Of his death some have doubted, of his passing through the fire we cannot doubt; for he is in paradise, and not separated from Christ."[1]

St. Jerome, in his Commentary on the Prophet Amos, compares the ten revolted tribes of Israel to heretics, and the other two "to the Church, and to sinners (members) of the Church, who confess the true faith, but on aeeount of the defilement of viee (vitiorum sordes) have need of the purging fires."[2] And again, "As we believe that the torments of the Devil, and of all infidel (negatorum) and wicked men who have said in their hearts 'there is no God,' are eternal, so of sinners, although Christians,[3] whose works are to be tried and purged by fire (in igne), we believe that the sentence of the Judge will be lenient (moderatam), and tempered with mercy."

"Let me not be amongst those," says St. Augustine, "to whom Thou wilt hereafter say, Go into everlasting fire, prepared for the Devil and his angels. Neither chasten me in Thy hot displeasure, so that thou mayest eleanse me in this life, and make me such that I may after that stand in no need of the cleansing fire for those who are to be saved so as by fire. Why? Why, but because they built upon the foundation wood, stubble and hay. Now they should build on it gold, silver and precious stones, and should have nothing to fear from either fire; not only that whieh is to consume the ungodly for ever, but also that which is to purge those who are to escape through (per) the fire. For it is said, he himself shall be saved, yet so as by fire. And beeause it is said he shall be saved that fire is thought lightly of. For all that, though we shall be saved by fire, yet will that fire be more grievous than anything that man ean suffer in this life whatsoever."[4] Again, "But if he shall have built on the foundation wood, hay, stubble, that is, have built worldly attaehments on the foundation of his faith; yet if Christ be in the foundation, so that He have the first place in the heart, and nothing absolutely is preferred to Him, even such are borne, even such are tolerated. The furnace shall come, it shall burn the wood, the hay, the stubble: but 'himself, he saith, shall be saved, yet so as by fire.' This shall the furnaee do; some shall sever to the left, others it shall in a manner melt out to the right."[5]

To illustrate the doctrine of the Eastern Chureh a passage may first be quoted from St. Clement of Alexandria: "We say that fire sanctifies not flesh, but sinful souls, speaking of that fire whieh is not all-devouring, sueh as is used by artisans (παμφάγον καὶ βάνανσον), but of that whieh is discriminative (φρόνιμον), pervading the soul which passes through the fire."[6] Origen often speaks of the Judgment day fire: thus he says that though Peter and Paul must pass through the fire, they shall hear the words, "When thou passest through the fire, the flame shall not harm thee."[7] St. Basil, in his Commentary on Isaiah [iv. 4], says that baptism may be understood in three senses—in the one, of regeneration by the Holy Spirit; in another, of the punishment of sin in the present life; and in a third, "of the trial of judgment by fire." And that they who have committed deadly sins after they have received the knowledge of the truth, need the judgment which is by fire[8] (τῆς ἐν τῷ καύματι κρίσεως). And in his work on the Holy Spirit, illustrating the passage "He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire," he calls the trial of judgment a "baptism of fire;" as the Apostle says, "the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is."[9]

St. Gregory of Nazianzum, speaking of the Novatians, says: "Perehanee in the future world they shall be baptized with fire, the last baptism more severe and long continued, whieh devours as grass the stubble, and consumes every vestige of wiekedness"[10] (δαπανᾷ πάσης κακίας κουφότητα). And in one of his poems he speaks of standing in fear of the fiery river of judgment[11] (μεσος φόβων ἕστηκα πυρωποτάμου).

St. Gregory Nyssen says, speaking of infants who die unbaptized: "How shall we judge of those who thus died? Shall that soul behold its Judge, and shall it be placed with others before His tribunal? Shall its past life be judged, and will it receive a deserved reeompence, purified by fire according to the teaching (φωνὰς) of the Gospel, or refreshed by the dew of benediction?"[12] And he teaches, in another oration, that "we must either be purified in this present life by prayer and the love of wisdom (φιλοσοφίας), or after our departure hence in the furnaee of the purging fire."[13]

Such was the teaching of the Fathers on the Judgment day Purgatory: they seem to have universally, except St. Chrysostom,[14] interpreted in a literal sense the passage of St. Paul which we are illustrating. They also maintained that this interpretation was confirmed by quotations (already given) from the Old Testament; and unquestionably it must be admitted that the passage at least will bear, if it does not positively require, such an interpretation. The Judgment day purgation entirely differs from the Roman Catholic doctrine as

Purgatory

Bellarmine admits,[1] and has not been censured or condemned by the English Church.

But there was another doctrine held generally by the Fathers of the Western Church, which resembled, at least, the Roman Catholic tenet,—namely, that there exists a state of temporary punishment for sin in the intermediate life between death and the resurrection. Thus Tertullian speaks of the widow praying for her departed husband's soul, begging for him in the interim (i.e. before the resurrection) a cooling place or place of refreshment[2] (refrigerium interim adpostulat ei), the same word refrigerium also occurs in inscriptions in the Catacombs, as "Deus refrigeret spiritum tuum." In the vision of St. Perpetua, she sees her brother in a dark place, heated and thirsty, and with a countenance foul and pallid. After frequent prayer for him she has another vision: the place before dark was now light, and she sees her brother clean, well-clothed, and refreshed (refrigeratum); then she knew that he was removed from punishment[3] (translatum eum esse de pœna). St. Augustine commemorates the martyrdom of St. Perpetua, and implicitly at least admits and sanctions the doctrine her visions imply, of a temporary punishment for sin in the intermediate state. He also says, in one of his latest works, "some endure punishment in this life, others after death, others both now and then, and yet before that most terrible judgment."[4] In the Mozarabic and Gallican Liturgies we find the same teaching—prayer is offered for the dead, as being then in a state of suffering or punishment, and even as enduring the torment of lost souls.[5]

The passages last quoted from Fathers of the Western Church appear to imply that the faithful departed generally are in a state of temporary suffering, and such in the West was probably the prevailing belief; but we find in the Eastern Church another and apparently different teaching. Throughout the Eastern Liturgies there is no express mention of the purgatorial suffering of souls in the intermediate state. In the Apostolical Constitutions and in the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom, the Church prays for those who rest in faith.[6] Even in the Roman Canon there is only a prayer for those resting in Christ,[7] and a common inscription in the Catacombs over the departed is "in pace." Such statements are not indeed necessarily inconsistent with the state of the departed Christian being a state of suffering; for even then he would rest from the sorrows and trials of life, and have the assured hope of eternal life. Still, where there is no direct allusion (as in the Mozarabic and Gallican Missals) to the suffering of the departed, we cannot fairly and reasonably suppose that a state of suffering is implied when the faithful departed are said to be at rest. Such an expression must be taken in its ordinary meaning, as denoting a more or less perfect happiness. Besides, the Eucharistic sacrifice was offered for all the faithful departed, as the ancient patriarchs, saints, and the Blessed Virgin, who were not considered to be in a state of suffering; and though it by no means follows that all commemorated with them were enjoying like happiness, still we may suppose that, had the state of the departed been ordinarily one of torment, a distinct allusion would have occurred to their purgatorial suffering and the hope of deliverance from it. Again, some of the Fathers, as St. Cyprian, speak of the happiness of the faithful departed and of the joys which at once await them on their departure from this life.[8] Thus there was apparently in early ages a difference between the teaching of the Eastern and Western Church on the state of the departed, a difference which still exists and may be illustrated from their present belief.

"The doctrine of the Fathers," says Palmer, "and of the early Church, of the present Greek or orthodox Church, and of the other separated Eastern Churches, is this, that, speaking generally and upon the whole, the state of the faithful departed is a state of light and rest and peace and refreshment, of happiness far greater than any belonging to this life, yet inferior to that which shall be enjoyed after the resurrection and final judgment. The doctrine of the Latins, on the other hand, is this that, speaking generally and upon the whole, the state of the faithful departed is a state of penal torment, differing from that of hell only in the certainty of future deliverance." And afterwards: "There are souls in the lower ranks of them that may yet be saved, of which the Greeks can think with hope, and yet cannot think of, as of their being at once and absolutely and unmixedly in a state of happiness. But of such they think as needing the prayers and oblations of the Church to procure their refreshment and to lighten them τῶν κατεχόντων ἀυτους ανιαρῶν."[1] This writer thinks that the difference of belief as to this doctrine between the two Churches is not essential or fundamental, as the Greeks admit that some of the souls in the intermediate place are in a state of suffering. Perhaps not: still there is a real and important difference in the teaching of the Churches—one maintaining that almost all the souls of the faithful are in a state of suffering, the other that, generally and on the whole, they are in a state of rest and happiness.

"Offerimus pro indulgentia fidelium defunctorum ut mutata sorte tristium mansionum felici perfruantur societate justorum" [In Nativitate Domini]. Other similar expressions occur as "eruas e tenebrosa infernali caligine." The following prayer is given from the Gothico-Gallican Missal: "Istis et omnibus in Christo quiescentibus, locum refrigerii lucis et pacis ut indulgeas deprecamur ut si qui peccatorum meritis inferni tenebris et suppliciis detinentur misericordia tua oramus, indulge clementia, cosque ad requiem transire præcipias, et prima anastasi cum sanctis et electis tuis jubeas sociari ut portio tua sint in terra viventium."

Also in the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom, ὑπὲρ τῶν ἐν πίστει ἀναπαυσαμένων Προπατόρων . . . καὶ παντὸς πνεύματος δικαίου ἐν πίστει τετελεωμένου. In other Liturgies, as of St. James, St. Mark, St. Basil, there is prayer for the rest and forgiveness of the departed (τὰς ψυχὰς ἀνάπαυσον: St. Mark).

The difference may be thus further illustrated. The Latin Church whilst admitting the great importance of prayers for the dead in mitigating or shortening their sufferings, believes that the departed must mainly themselves in Hades make an atonement for their past sins, paying off the debt due to Divine Justice: whilst, on the other hand, the Eastern Church, allowing that some of the faithful departed are in a state of suffering, though such is not generally the case, believe that their pardon, or their "sins being done away," mainly depends on the prayers and alms and the offering on their behalf of the Holy Sacrifice.[2] No language can be more emphatic than that of St. Chrysostom, in attributing the greatest possible efficacy to prayers, &c. for the dead, implying that their condition is well-nigh hopeless unless they have relatives or friends to intercede, &c. for them;[3] though not denying that some departed Christians are in a state of suffering, and gain an alleviation by the prayers of their friends—passages from his Homilies evidently imply such a belief[4]—still the mention of, or allusion to, penal sufferings is not as explicit, nor does it hold the same place as in the teaching of writers of the Western Church.

Concluding with the Easterns that there was no certain tradition in the early Church on the state of the departed, a few remarks may be added as to the teaching of Holy Scripture and of the Fathers.[5]

The Scriptures expressly declare that the faithful who die in the Lord "rest from their labours" [Rev. xiv. 13]—a statement to be received in its literal and obvious meaning, and which is quite inconsistent with the belief that almost all departed Christians are for a time in a state of suffering or punishment. Besides, as we have seen, the teaching of the Fathers and Liturgies of the Eastern Church is inconsistent with the ordinary belief of Roman Catholics. So clear and express indeed is scriptural and patristic teaching on this point, that the Church of Rome does not assert, whatever may be the common belief of her members, that Purgatory is a state of suffering. The souls of the departed there "detained"—nothing more is said de fide—are helped by prayer and the Eucharistic Sacrifice. Had the Church of Rome, instead of speaking of souls "detained," defined that they were punished in Purgatory (cruciatæ, as in the Tridentine Catechism, instead of detentæ), and thus made penal pain its normal state, Scripture, tradition and the unanimous belief of the Eastern Church, would have been contradicted and set aside. Hence, whilst teaching in the Tridentine Catechism that souls are "cruciatæ" in Purgatory—of which "tormented" is the popular equivalent—a very different word is used in the decrees of the Council, which really leaves the main question undetermined. Again, the Eastern Church allows that some at least of the faithful who will finally be saved are enduring temporary suffering in Hades, and so far symbolizes with the usual teaching of the Latin Church.

That in the intermediate state there must be a preparation for the final judgment, that the souls of the departed will then be amended or purified, is clear from our Lord's description of the day of judgment. All mankind, He teaches, will at the judgment day be arranged into two classes, finally and determinately, good or evil. A change must therefore have taken place in the condition of many after their departure from the world, since the great mass of Christians do not belong to one class or the other. They are partly good and partly evil, even the lives of those mainly on God's side are imperfect and stained with sin, so that in their present state they are manifestly unfit for His presence and kingdom; and in the case of others who we may hope will finally be saved, there is a far greater amount of imper-

[1] Dissertations on the Orthodox Communion, p. 124, Purgatory [1853]. The Eastern Bishops, in their correspondence with the Nonjurors at the beginning of last century, thus speak of the Latin doctrine, "As for the purgatorial fire invented by the Papists to command the purse of the ignorant, we will by no means hear of it. For it is a fiction and a doting fable invented for lucre and to deceive the simple; and, in a word, has no existence but in the imagination. There is no appearance or mention of it in the Sacred Scriptures or Holy Fathers, whatever the authors or abettors of it may clamour to the contrary. But we say that the benefactions and holy sacrifices, the alms and prayers of the Church and her priests for the dead, are the things that greatly profit them, and not the purgatorial fire, which does not by any means anywhere exist. For these relieve the pains which the souls suffer in Ἅδης, as is plain from the centurion, whose son our Lord healed at the centurion's petition, and from the paralytic whom He recovered by a double cure, for the faith of those that brought him to Him, and might be proved from a thousand other instances as clear as the sun." [The Orthodox and Nonjurors, by Williams, pp. 47, 48, A.D. 1868.]

[2] For if barbarians burn the goods of the departed together with them, more were it a righteous thing for thee to send away with the dead what things he hath, not to be turned to ashes with those, but to invest him with more glory; and that if he departed a sinner, it may do away his sins, but if righteous, it may become an increase of reward and recompence. [St. Chrysostom, Homilies on St. Matthew, p. 456, Oxf. transl.]

[3] "How then say you, if he (the departed Christian) be desolate and a stranger and have none to care for him? And why is it that he has none, I ask you? In this very thing thou sufferest thy desert, that thou hast none to be thus thy friend, thus virtuous, &c." [Homily on Acts, p. 309, Oxf. transl.]

[4] See Homily on St. John, p. 553, Oxf. transl.: "to procure some comfort for him," &c.

[5] Dr. King says the Greek Church "does by no means allow the (Latin) doctrine of Purgatory, or define anything dogmatically of the state or condition of departed souls." [The Rites and Ceremonies of the Greek Church in Russia, p. 17, A.D. 1772.]

fection and sinfulness. The intermediate state being thus one of preparation, each soul will be dealt with according to its individual wants or condition, some, it may be, amended by temporary chastisement, and others prepared for judgment by instruction in divine knowledge, which they had no opportunity of acquiring whilst on earth. The intermediate state has thus a bearing upon, and prepares for, the terrible judgment of the last day.[1]

Another awful inquiry remains—Who amongst the great mass of imperfect and unworthy Christians will, after whatever purgation, be finally saved? That Christians finally impenitent will go into everlasting punishment is certain by the Word of God, and thus that some men have sinned beyond the hope of repentance and pardon. Roman Catholics assert, according to a theory first proposed by the Schoolmen, that the venial sins of the righteous only are purified by purgatorial suffering, and that they who die in mortal sin without repentance are eternally lost. Sins undoubtedly may be classed as venial and mortal, and the distinction is a true and real one. But our almost insuperable difficulty is to make in each case the distinction required. A venial sin, in one instance, may be mortal in another; the circumstances under which it is committed materially alter or even determine its character. Were this classification strictly adhered to, few comparatively could have the hope of a future expiation of sin; the mass of imperfect and unworthy Christians would be eternally beyond the hope of mercy or pardon. But whatever explanation may be given of the Roman Catholic theory, and no doubt practically it is interpreted with considerable latitude, the theory, whether probable or not, is at least a novel one; as the Fathers do not speak of the venial sins of Christians only being forgiven, either in the intermediate state or by the judgment day purgation, but of sin in general, even grievous and mortal sin.[2] On this subject, it must be remembered, we have not the guidance either of Scripture or tradition, and thus can only speak doubtfully or conjecturally. Undoubtedly God will deal with each soul according to its own particular condition. He only can know whether faith and love still exist in any degree in the heart, though well-nigh buried beneath earthly imperfection and corruption; or if sin have been wilfully committed, or through ignorance and almost irresistible temptation; the due allowance also to be made for prejudices often apparently insuperable, and for wrong and defective education. He only, in a word, can fully know, but He will assuredly compassionate, the weakness of fallen nature with its manifold errors and shortcomings. Should the probability of the mediæval theory be admitted, the subtleties of modern casuistry must be laid aside, and we must leave to infinite wisdom and mercy to make in each case the right distinction.

The "Romish" doctrine of Purgatory, censured in the XXII. Article, is that which was believed and taught in the sixteenth century, mainly founded on legends of the Middle Ages, and which, in connection with the sale of indulgences, gave the first impulse to the Reformation in Germany.

PURIFICATION OF WOMEN. By the law of Moses [Lev. xii.], after the birth of a son, the mother was unclean for forty days, and after the birth of a daughter for eighty days. At the end of the period she presented herself at the door of the Tabernacle for re-admission to its offices. If of sufficient means, she brought a lamb and a pigeon; if not, a pair of turtles or two young pigeons [Luke ii. 24]. One of these was for a burnt-offering, one for a sin-offering. Our Christian practice for women to return thanks to God after child-birth has been derived through, rather than from, the Jewish rite. It is but reasonable that the restoration of the woman to the privileges of the Church should be accompanied by a solemn thanksgiving for deliverance in her great danger. The title of the service, "The Thanksgiving of Women after Child-birth," was adopted in 1552 to bring this point into prominence. The old Sarum title, "Ordo ad purificandam mulierem post partum," and that in the Prayer Book of 1549, "The Order of the Purification of Women," seemed to mark an unholiness in the woman which the service removed.[3] The Puritans objected to the use of the service altogether, upon this ground. "For what doth else this churching imply but a restoring her unto the Church, which cannot be without some bar or shutting forth presupposed?" They complained, too, that if we returned thanks to God solemnly and expressly for all mercies equal to this, there would be no time left for preaching, or for the Sacraments. Their objections have been answered by Whitgift and Hooker.[4] In the Sarum Use the service was read at the church door, "ante ostium ecclesiæ:" in the Book of 1549, "nigh unto the quire door," afterwards at the altar-rails: now at "some convenient place." It is thus left to the discretion of the minister, but on all accounts, comparing the final rubric on the expediency of the woman's receiving

[1] "As no soul," says a modern Lutheran bishop, "leaves this present existence in a fully complete and prepared state, we must suppose that there is an intermediate state, a realm of progressive development in which souls are prepared and matured for the final judgment. Though the Romish doctrine of Purgatory is repudiated, because it is mixed up with so many crude and false positions, it nevertheless contains the truth that the intermediate state must, in a purely spiritual sense, be a Purgatory designed for the purifying of the soul." [Martensen's Christian Dogmatics, p. 457; Clark's transl.]

[2] As St. Jerome [Dial. ad Pelagianos, lib. i. sec. 28]; St. Cyril of Jerusalem [Lecture xxiii. Myst. 5], the translator says that St. Cyril's teaching is contradictory to Roman doctrine on Purgatory [note, p. 276, Oxf. transl.]; St. Chrysostom [Homilies on the Acts, p. 308; Oxford transl.].

[3] The rubric in the Sarum rite expressly disclaims this interpretation: "Nota quod mulieres post prolem emissam quandoque ecclesiam intrare voluerunt gratias actura purificari possunt, et nulla proinde peccati mole gravantur, nec ecclesiarum aditus est eis deregandus; ne pœna illis verti videatur in culpam."

[4] In Keble's third ed. of Hooker's works, ii. pp. 434-438 [bk. V. lxxiv. 1-4], the objections of Cartwright and replies of Whitgift are given in the notes.

the Holy Communion, the choir door is the most fitting place. The solemn re-admission of the woman to divine service of the Sarum Use has been wholly discontinued.[1] In the opening address in 1549, "and your child baptism," is added as a subject for thanksgiving. The woman, too, was to "offer her chrisom and other accustomed offerings;" and Hooker justifies the term "oblations" as applied to these offerings. The "decently apparelled" of our Book refers to the custom of wearing a veil for this service. An instance is given[2] of a woman not conforming to an order in the diocese of Norwich that all should come veiled, who was excommunicated. On the case coming before the judges, the bishops were consulted, and they pronounced that the ancient usage of the Church of England was for women to come veiled.

Palmer says that all the Western rituals, and that of Constantinople, had offices for this rite. A service of the tenth century is given by Migne,[3] "Benedictio puerperæ secundum usum Æthiopum."

PURITANISM. In English history, a form of religion claiming to be more pure than the form of the Church. The Puritans, the great anti-hierarchical party, as outside the Church, date from the formation of Presbyterian congregations in 1566; and the Nonconformists of the Revolution are the last phase of old English Puritanism. Modern Puritans are usually called by other names, and there has been sufficient change of character to justify the distinction. This party was in general Calvinistic in doctrine, anti-episcopal in church government, democratic in politics. Its objects cannot be better stated than in the words of the Westminster Assembly of Divines, who wrote to the Protestants of Holland, France, and Switzerland, "The houses of parliament have convened this assembly to assist them with our best advice for the reformation of the Church, for the purging of error and superstition, and retrieving the purity of religion: and here they require us to make God's Word the standard, to work by the pattern in the Mount, to endeavour the nearest conformity to the best reformed churches, and to bring the three kingdoms to an uniformity in belief and worship. And this is the business we are now upon, though the enemy has stirred up the heart of our dear and dread sovereign against us. However, through the good hand of God upon us, we have made some comfortable beginnings;"—that is to say, the Parliament army was in the field, the bishops' estates were sequestered, Lord Strafford had been beheaded, Bishops Wren and Laud were in the Tower.

[1] "Deinde inducat eam sacerdos per manum dextram in ecclesiam, dicens: Ingredere in templum Dei ut habeas vitam æternam et vivas in sæcula sæculorum. Amen."

[2] Hooker, quoted above. See also Annotated Book of Common Prayer, p. 304.

[3] The anointing the forehead of the woman and child "sacra unctione," the imposition of hands, the reception of Holy Communion, the giving of incense, are parts of this rite. The final prayer is of great length, but is very curious. The service is printed in Migne's Cursus, Paris, 1841, vol. cxxxviii.

The principles of this party must be learned by ascertaining what was common to the two great bodies, Presbyterians and Independents: for notwithstanding the remonstrances of the Presbyterians when the Independents took their work out of their hands, and the bitter scorn with which Milton, the mouthpiece of the Independents assailed them, historians have always classed these bodies together as Puritans. For the statement of these principles Neale may be trusted, except that he writes as a Presbyterian, and that his statement must be modified so as not to exclude the Independents. He gives the Puritan principles as follows:—

I. The introduction of reformations is not to be left to the civil power: for the Apostolic rule "That all things be done decently and in order," mean what it will, was not directed to the prince or civil magistrate.

II. The Pope is Antichrist, the Church of Rome no true Church, all her ministrations superstitious and idolatrous, the validity of her ordinations therefore, though claiming to be by succession from the Apostles, not to be trusted.

III. The Holy Scriptures are a standard of discipline as well as of doctrine: and if it be proved that all things necessary to the government of the Church cannot be deduced from Scripture, the discretionary power is not in the magistrate, but in the spiritual officers of the Church.

IV. No church officers or ordinances to be admitted but such as are appointed in Scripture. The government ordained by the Apostles was aristocratic, according to the constitution of the Jewish Sanhedrim, and a pattern for after ages.

V. Things left indifferent by Christ not to be made necessary by any human law. Such rites and ceremonies as had been abused to idolatry are no longer indifferent, but unlawful.

VI. Uniformity in public worship is necessary, and the magistrate ought to enforce it; the standard of uniformity being the decrees of provincial and national synods. [Neal, Hist. of Puritans, i. p. 95, 4th ed. 1754.][4]

The aristocratical principle must be left out, and so much of these six articles as can be joined on to the democratic principle of Independency may be taken as the rules of Puritanism. For the Independent principle Milton may be quoted: "But when every good Christian, thoroughly acquainted with all those glorious privileges of sanctification and adoption . . . shall be restored to his right in the Church, and not excluded from such place of spiritual government, as his Christian abilities and his approved good life . . . shall prefer him to, this and nothing sooner will open his eyes to a wise and true valuation of himself, &c. And this I hold to be a considerable reason why the functions of Church government ought to be free and open to any Christian man, though never so laic, if his capacity, his faith, and prudent demeanour commend him" [Milton's Reason of Church Government, ii. c. 3].

The discussion of these principles of Puritanism has employed our best divines from Whitgift to Hammond. They need not here be dealt with from any other than the historical point of view, and it is only necessary to notice [1] the causes, [2] the progress, [3] the religious character of Puritanism, and [4] its effects upon our Church and nation.

It will be remembered that the intercourse between England and the "Reformed Churches" did not create the anti-church party. That party, as modified by such intercourse, we call Puritan; but its origin is traceable to an earlier date. The common jealousy of the clergy which united the Lollards had prepared a fit soil for the seed of Geneva, and the produce was English Nonconformity, the main body of which was Puritanism.

I. In his singularly instructive tract on Church Controversies, Bacon has noted four principal causes and motives of schisms and divisions.

[1.] Imperfections in the conversation and government of those which have chief place in the Church: it being the double policy of the spiritual enemy, either by counterfeit holiness of life to establish and authorize errors, or by corruption of manners to discredit and draw in question truth and things lawful.

[2.] The nature and humour of some men who love an inward authority over men's minds, in drawing them to depend upon their opinions and to seek knowledge at their lips. These men are the true successors of Diotrephes, the lover of pre-eminence, and not lord bishops. Such spirits light upon another sort of natures, which do adhere to these men: "quorum gloria in obsequio:" stiff followers, and such as zeal marvellously for those whom they have chosen for their masters.

[3.] The extreme and unlimited detestation of some former heresy or corruption of the Church already acknowledged and convicted. Many think it to be the true touchstone to try what is good and evil, by measuring what is more or less opposite to the institutions of the Church of Rome, be it ceremony, be it policy, or government; yea, be it other institutions of greater weight, that is ever most perfect which is removed most degrees from that Church; and that is ever polluted and blemished which participateth in any appearance with it.

[4.] The partial affectation and imitation of foreign churches.

The operation of the first of these causes must be referred principally to the times before Elizabeth. The refugees returned on Mary's death, not merely open to such an influence, but also fully ripe for schism. The misconduct of the prelates had produced its effect, and the teaching of the foreign Protestants had been too faithfully received. While it must be confessed that this first cause has operated more or less through the whole career of the Church of England, there was certainly no special cause of scandal in the conduct of the Elizabethan bishops.

The second cause has never perhaps received so signal an exemplification as it received in Calvin and Beza. The authoritative interference of these two in the Church affairs of England is well known. Collier's pithy remark upon Calvin's letter to the Protector Somerset is of general application, "He addresses the Protector as if the government of the Church was almost wholly at his disposal." And it may be noticed that when the Nonconformists rejected the advice of Calvin and Beza, they did so not only by a more strict adherence to the principles of their leaders, but as if they felt that the leaders would be better pleased by the rejection than by the acceptance of the advice. [Collier, vi. 435 and v. pp. 353-5, ed. 1852; Keble's Preface to Hooker, p. liv.]

An example of the working of the third cause may be seen in the engagement taken by the Puritans, the leading principle of which is "In the Church of the traditioners there is no other discipline than that which hath been maintained by the antichristian pope of Rome; . . . for the which cause I refuse them" [Collier, vi. p. 528-9].

For the fourth of the causes named, the platform of Geneva was avowedly the ideal of the early Puritans, and the Westminster Assembly nearly a century later, set up the same standard.

II. It will have been seen from the instances already given, that after Mary's death the time was past when the mere surrender of certain ceremonies supposed to be superstitious, and the removal of certain acknowledged abuses, would have satisfied those who called for reformation.[1]

The refugees from the Continent had proceeded to the stage of condemning the government of bishops as an hierarchy remaining to us of the corruptions of the Romish Church,[2] and very soon advanced to claiming the establishment of Genevan policy as the only and perpetual form of policy in the Church. At an earlier period many perhaps would have been satisfied by the removal of abuses. But reformations sought in a tumultuary and insubordinate manner are naturally refused—the abuses are then defended, and made a part of the system attacked. And so it happened with the calls for reformation during the fifteenth century. "Even the wild follies of Wickliffe, Huss, Jerome of Prague, and many others of their class were but the exaggerated outcome of the conviction of the necessity of reformation, and much of these men's wildness and folly was provoked by the stolid opposition with which their better aspirations were met by those in authority." A more timely reformation would probably have been effected without (at least) the growth of so large an anti-church party. Perhaps it might have been effected without leaving any abiding schism in England. The delay of reformation, then, in the fifteenth century led to the formation of the anti-church party, and the Puritans, as we have limited the term, were from the first ripe for schism, and without delay entered on a course of schism. Their leaders in Elizabeth's time would have been quite at home in the Westminster Assembly. The continuance to the last of certain abuses doubtless aggravated their hostility: but had the routine of the ecclesiastical courts been amended, and residence of the clergy been better enforced, still there would have remained the determination to introduce Presbyterianism or Congregationalism. Episcopacy to them was at its best a relic of Popery.

1 See Bacon's Tract. Bacon does not name the periods of history to which he refers. If in his first stage of the growth and progression of the controversies he has in mind the disputes of Elizabeth's day, he underrates the amount of the antagonism to Episcopacy which possessed the early Puritans.

2 The contrary is often stated. The opinion of a foreigner may be quoted: "Maxime ii, qui sub prosecutione Mariæ hactenus in Belgio, Helvetia, Germania exulaverant, implacabile imbiberant odium et cæremoniarum omnium et episcopalis disciplinæ" [Daniel, Codex Liturg. iii. p. 306].

The growth of Puritanism, then, was rather an increase of numbers than a development of principle: while at the same time the stiff refusal to make any change afforded but too good a handle for the opponents of the Church. "A contentious retaining of custom," said Bacon, "is a turbulent thing, as well as innovation. . . . Is nothing amiss? Can any man defend the use of excommunication as a base process to lackey up and down for duties and fees; it being a precursory judgment of the latter day?"

On the other hand is to be noticed the growth of the true doctrine of Episcopacy. The uncertainty in the minds of some of the divines of the Reformation on this point may be seen in the resolution of several bishops and divines to Henry VIII.'s questions, printed by Burnet and Collier [Collier, ix. p. 175, ed. 1852]. This uncertainty arose from the difficulty and confusion of thought attending the transfer of the supremacy from the Pope to the King. The Pope's supremacy had been wrongfully extended so as to make him, in the minds of many, the only source of episcopal power, and such men did not properly limit the supremacy in its transfer to the Crown. They could not at once accept the notion that spiritual power was conferred by succession of bishops from the Apostles, without some one centre from which the power was to emanate; nor did they at once distinguish between this spiritual power, and the jurisdiction in an Established Church which the Crown has to confer. It was only by degrees that our controversial divines assumed their true ground [see Keble's Preface to Hooker]. It is difficult to conjecture what would have been the effect on the controversy had the true ground been taken from the first. At any rate, the opponents of Episcopacy would not have had the right on their side when arguing against the true principles of Episcopacy, as they had when arguing against the excess of the Regale. The Puritans were right in claiming a larger degree of independent authority for the Church than was allowed by the early notions of the supremacy: they were wrong in that they lodged that power in wrong hands.

III. The Character of Puritan religion. In considering this point one is glad to remember that not a few of the Puritans, especially in later times, were able to rise above the system of their sect, and to keep themselves clear from the evils to which its principles naturally led. Those principles (which had indeed their consistent result in the general body), may be brought together into this radical form, that the Church (i.e. the body which stood to the Puritans in the place of the Church) was a holy body, not as in Christ, but inasmuch and in so far as each individual member was holy: that each member by his individual holiness helped to make up a holy Church.[1] It is not meant that this was distinctly enunciated as the principle of the sect, but that it was the error which really underlay their thoughts and guided their conduct. Nor, considering the formation of the body, could it have been otherwise. The refugees who fled to avoid persecution returned to the Church, not as children to a mother, but as men who thought that they had become wiser and holier than their mother. They returned to a Church not good enough for them. And those in England who joined them, joined them on precisely the same ground. The notion of individual holiness was the very ground of the separation. It is a notion that must be found more or less in all separatists, but may exist in very different degrees according to the cause of separation. With the Puritans it existed in its widest extent, as their very name shews. Now this putting forward the individual (not to name the pride and conceit which necessarily accompanies it) leads to a magnifying one branch of religion at the expense of the other branch. True religion is not only in the direct reference of the individual to Almighty God, but also in the access to Him as one of His family, as a member of Christ's Body. Nor can the former of these be of a right kind without the latter. In Puritanism the sense of the holiness of the Church as Christ's Body was lost, and access to God through the Church was not recognised, or was greatly impeded. The former branch of religion, the direct reference of the individual to God, appeared to be heightened, but was really injured in its character by the loss or depreciation of the latter. Still, this direct reference of each man to God, in the sense of personal responsibility, is the fairest aspect of Puritanic religion. As such it is dwelt upon, e.g. in the laudatory preface to English Puritanism, Documents. The intensity of the realization of God's Presence is the key-note of the laudation, and yet the very terms of the eulogy betray the imperfect belief of the Puritan, and the cause of the imperfection. The Puritan may have realized the presence of the Sovereign and the Lawgiver, but he did not approach the Father. For he who has not the Church for his mother has not God for his Father, and he who separates himself from the Church, although his schism may [1] See Maurice, Discourses on St. John, xxii. xxiii. xxiv.; and the note on these discourses,—particularly the paragraphs in xxii. regarding this error as exemplified in the Jewish sects. Professor Maurice does not make the application to the Puritans.

How little this alleged realization of God's Presence was effectual in the body at large history tells. "Every advancing stage of that unexampled progress more and more demonstrates the irreconcileable contrariety of the whole anti-hierarchical genus with the Church of England; and that the innate instinct of the former is to bear down and extinguish the latter. And most impressively are we taught what kind of religious and moral institute such reformers would substitute in its room. The religious principles of a Brooke, a Hampden, or a Pym, might doubtless have kept them inwardly upright, and outwardly blameless, in common times; but we see that in a season of uncommon temptation, instead of preserving them, they disposed those men and others of like mind, not only to engage in a ruthless party war, but to become its chief promoters and leaders. Perhaps, because there was still some good in those heresiarchs, they were taken from the scene before the evolving of its full-grown horrors. These, however, we see acted by men not less ardent formerly in Puritanic zeal, and still retaining in show and exercise the self-same character. There is no atrocious act of blood to which they do not coolly and deliberately proceed, and with which they do not associate and blend the semblance of severe and energetic devotion. Cromwell embodies in himself all the qualities of his fellow-actors in that revolting tragedy; and going on with him, from that letter of his, in the sketch of his history in the Quarterly Review, until the colloquy at the last between him and Dr. Goodwin, we have altogether such an exemplification of fallacious religion, as I suppose never was equally afforded in this world's history" [A. Knox to Bishop Jebb, Correspondence, ii. p. 482]. It is vain then to attempt to substitute a sense of individual responsibility for the nurture, the strength, the grace which flow from membership in the Body of Christ; and the fear of God apart from that membership, at the best, has the sternness and severity which arises from considering God as a Lawgiver, not a Father, a fear easily degenerating into abject awe towards God and moroseness towards men. This character of the Puritan fear of God was in most cases heightened by a fatalistic interpretation of the doctrine of election, and by the horrible dogma of reprobation.

It is easy to follow out the radical error of Puritanism into its effects upon the doctrine and use of the sacraments, upon public worship, upon all that depends on the Catholic doctrine of the communion of saints. The Holy Eucharist no longer held its place as the central act of Christian worship: the prevailing notion of individual holiness dictated the extemporary prayer and the exaggerated sermon: public worship and public teaching were marred.

It is also to be observed that the rejection of tradition and of the Primitive Church, the determination to have Scripture authority for every observance, led to a manner of handling Holy Scripture which, while exalting it in name, in reality is most derogatory to its supremacy. The Puritan was obliged to "resort to naked examples, conceited inferences and forced allusions, such as do mine under all certainty of religion." And particularly, as the New Testament evidently does not contain all that the Puritan was determined to find in Scripture, he was obliged to have recourse to the Old Testament, to take his measures and rule from the old dispensation. Hence he became Jewish rather than Christian in spirit. Daniel has noticed this Judaic spirit in the liturgic forms (if they deserve to be so called) of the Reformed Churches. He attributes it to following the pattern of the earliest days of the Christian Church before she was emancipated from the discipline of the synagogue. And of the reformed bodies with which the Puritans were in closest connection he writes, "Apud Batavos et præsertim apud Scotos et Helvetos pristina morositas et genus rituum exile locum suum obtinuit" [Codex Liturgicus, iii. pp. 6, 18. See also pp. 4, 5, regarding the Judaic spirit in general in the Reformed Churches].

Upon the whole, this point may be concluded as Bacon concluded it, "I know they have zeal and hatred of sin, but again let them take heed that it be not true which one of their adversaries said, that they have but two small wants, knowledge and love."

IV. That to the Puritans we owe much of the civil liberty we now enjoy is undeniable. That they shewed no tolerance themselves is equally clear. That which remained of their spirit in the Church has been much strengthened by subsequent intercourse with them; and their opposition to the authority of tradition, their low estimate and teaching regarding the sacraments, their sabbatarianism, their unreasoning protestantism, their uncharitableness, are still prevalent.

Q

QUADRAGESIMA. [LENT.]

QUAKERISM. The popular name of Quakers is given to a religious community known among its members as "The Society of Friends," which originated with George Fox, about A.D. 1648.

This fanatic was one of the products of that strange time which ushered in the temporary triumph of Puritanism and the suppression of the Church of England. He was born, A.D. 1624, at Drayton in Leicestershire, and apprenticed to a dealer in skins, leather, and wool; but two years before his apprenticeship expired, he made himself clothing out of some of the skins, and idled about the country without any means of support, in a restless condition, and full of fantastic dreams which have been dignified with the name of religious reveries. His friends reclaimed the youth, after a year or two of his wandering life, but he was still disinclined for honest labour, would not go to Church for the purpose of Divine Worship, but went there to abuse the clergy and church-goers, and professed a call to become a religious reformer. Being very ignorant, he proclaimed that education was not necessary for the ministerial office, and at once took upon himself the office of an apostle. His first efforts were made by "prophesying" in parish churches, but this naturally led to his being punished for disturbing Divine Service, and he was imprisoned at Nottingham in 1649, as well as at Derby in 1650, the republican schismatics who were then in power not tolerating his irregularities any more than they would have been tolerated by the Laudian party, if they had occurred a few years before. It was at the time of his committal to prison in 1650, that the name of "Quakers" was given to Fox and his followers by a Puritan justice of the peace. Whence the name was derived is not clear, but probably from Fox warning the magistrates to "quake for fear." On being thus nicknamed, Fox made the spirited reply, that there would be Quakers in England when justices of the peace had been forgotten. He and his followers were much persecuted during the time of the Commonwealth, and Cromwell thought Fox dangerous enough to require from him, at a personal interview, a written undertaking that he would not disturb the Government. After the Restoration the Quakers still laid themselves open to the law, and it was only when the strange intimacy between Penn and James II. arose, that they became more orderly and more capable of toleration. Fox married a rich widow in 1669, after a visit to America, and died in 1690, having made several subsequent visits to America, the West Indies, and the Continent. From the time of Penn the Society of Friends has been a prosperous community, very successful in trade, and winning a certain kind of respect by an ostentation of simplicity and exactness; their quaint old world garments and language having also enough mystery about them to gain them influence with the uneducated. They are not now numerous in England, and the intellectual portion of them is being gradually absorbed into the Church.

The religious principles and practice of Quakerism are based upon an extreme form of the theory which supposes the Holy Spirit to indwell within individual persons, independently of sacramental union with Christ through the Incarnation. Quakers do not recognise either Baptism or the Holy Eucharist. They believe that every man is illuminated by the Holy Spirit, and that he becomes holy in proportion to the extent in which that illumination is developed: such development being the result of man's own will exercised in self-discipline. The "Inward Light" thus given produces an immediate inspiration for ministerial purposes, an inspired guidance for a state of probation, and a "saving light" for ultimate salvation.

The meetings which the Quakers hold for worship are conducted without any settled ministry, or form of prayer, or sacraments: the principle of their worship being that of "waiting for the Spirit." They are, in fact, meetings for mental devotion, the theory being that God Who is a Spirit understands the language of the spirit. Spoken language is however permitted both for prayer and exhortation, provided it is used by those who are "under the influence of the Spirit" at the time they pray or preach. Subject to this condition any man or woman is permitted to pray or preach in their assemblies. Among the minor characteristics of Quakerism may be mentioned the theories that holy days are superstitious, Sunday being tolerated in deference to the habits of Christians; that oaths are unlawful; that war is unlawful; that capital punishment is unlawful; that payment of tithes and Church-rates is unlawful; and that no education being required for the Christian ministry no Christian minister ought to receive money for his labours. QUARTODECIMAN. [PASCHAL CONTROVERSY.]

QUATUOR TEMPORA. [JEJUNIA IV. TEMPORA.]

QUICUNQUE VULT. These are the initial words of the hymn known as the Athanasian "Creed," and in fact its only appropriate name, the real composer of this ancient formulary being unknown, its origin a mere matter of conjecture. Much has been written, and much might yet be said on the subject of this venerable heirloom of antiquity. A cursory notice of its history in ancient and modern times is all that can be here attempted.

There can be no doubt but that it took its origin in the Gallican Church. It was first received in that Church. Gallican councils and bishops have always treated it with especial deference. Churches which received the Gallican Psalter received with it this "Expositio fidei." The oldest known translation into the vernacular was Gallican, as prescribed by Hincmar of Rheims to his priests. The first writers who cite its words were Avitus of Vienne and Cæsarius of Arles; the oldest commentator upon its text was Venantius Fortunatus, Bishop of Poictiers; and MSS. were nowhere so abundant or so ancient as in Gaul [Waterland, end of vii.].

This "creed," to use its scholastic title, first appeared in Latin; the Greek copies that exist being independent versions from that language. The age also of the oldest Latin MSS. exceeds that of the Greek exemplars by several centuries. The oldest Latin copy is referred by Archbishop Usher to the very beginning of the seventh century, and was in the Cottonian collection [Usser. de Symb. Præf. ii. 3]. The Treves MS., acephalous, is of nearly equal antiquity. Five MSS. of the eighth century are known, the Ambrosian of Milan; the Cottonian in King Athelstan's Psalter, referable with certainty to A.D. 703, and professing to be "fides St. Athanasii Alexandrini;" the Colbertine, copied in Saxon character from the Treves MS. shortly after the middle of the century, and like the original imperfect at the beginning; the Paris MS. of equal date, also in Saxon character; and the copy written in letters of gold which was presented by Charlemagne, while only king of France, to Adrian I. on his succession to the pontificate, A.D. 772. It is still preserved at Vienna. The Greek copies are of much latter date; and Montfaucon had never seen one that was more than three hundred years old [Diatribe, 727].

The earliest form in which this "expositio fidei" is found is the Commentary of Venantius Fortunatus in the middle of the sixth century, shewing that it was then of popular use. The fourth Council of Toledo also [A.D. 633] adopted many of its more striking expressions. Rome, once distrustful of novelties, only admitted it after long delay, as Waterland says, about A.D. 930. Thus it was accepted by the Churches of the West "as soon, or sooner than, the Nicene Creed."

This dogmatic hymn has a direct bearing on the Apollinarian error, which was condemned by Pope Damasus, A.D. 375. This heresy had much in common with the Eutychian error of the middle of the fifth century; but the latter had certain distinguishing features of which no notice is taken in the Creed, and for this reason the clauses that contravene both errors may be safely applied to Apollinarian notions: we need not look for its origin therefore so low as the Eutychian period [Harvey, Hist. and Theol. of Creeds, 549-557], in which the dying embers of Apollinarianism kindled up again. Neither can its composition range later than the Nestorian controversy, which commenced with the first year of the patriarchate of Nestorius [A.D. 428], and led to the Council of Ephesus [A.D. 431]; otherwise the crucial term θεοτόκος must as certainly have found its way into it, as that the term ὁμοούσιος was made the "lapis Lydius," of orthodoxy by the Nicene Fathers; hence this "expositio fidei" must have been written before the year A.D. 428 [Waterland; Harvey]. But by how many years did it anticipate the Council? There are undeniable points of resemblance between many of its expressions, and the terms used by Augustine in his work De Trinitate [A.D. 416, Harvey, 562-564]; which furnished the copy, the Father or the Creed? Waterland affirms the former, but reasons quite as cogent point to the latter conclusion. Augustine says that the phrases used by him in defining the three Persons of the Godhead were adopted also by catholic writers his predecessors, and in fact the writer of the Creed may have borrowed the corresponding terms, in some few cases, from Tertullian, but abundantly from Ambrose. The Creed, then, so far as its phraseology is concerned, is quite as likely to have been written between A.D. 381, when Ambrose completed his work De Spiritu Sancto, and A.D. 416, when Augustine put forth his work De Trinitate, as after this latter date.

Further, the rudimental statements of the Creed are more fully developed in the work of Augustine. The Creed simply says "The Holy Ghost is of the Father and the Son; neither made nor created nor begotten, but proceeding." The most unbending Greek theologian would have allowed the statement to pass unchallenged.[1] The third Person was universally acknowledged to be of the Father and of the Son, and His origination was allowed to be by procession; that which was denied was His procession from the Son as well as the Father, instead of from the Father by the Son. But the work De Trinitate originated all the discussion that followed, and in fact led to that schism between the Churches of the East and of the West which has never again been healed. Augustine expresses himself with his usual roundness and perspicuity upon a point that was a result of scriptural reasonings collected into one focus of light [Trin. iv. 29, xv. 47]. The concluding chapters of the work are filled with statements of the procession of the Holy Spirit, and a comparison of these with the more shadowy lines of the Creed, satisfies the judgment that Augustine was indebted to the Creed and not the Creed to Augustine. Then again the Creed instances by way of illustration the union of a spiritual and a material nature in the individual man: "As the reasonable soul and flesh is one man, so God and Man is one Christ." The illustration is exactly to the point; but Augustine follows out the idea in a strain of subtle argumentation that runs through six books of his work; finding points of analogy between the doctrine of a Trinity in Unity and the unity of the mind existing in different states; and falling into modes of expression that are exactly square with others in the Creed, "Hæc igitur tria, memoria intelligentia voluntas, quoniam non sunt tres vitæ sed una vita; nec tres mentes sed una mens; consequenter utique nec tres substantiæ sunt sed una substantia" [De Trin. x. 18]. Both the Creed and Augustine argue from man's bodily and mental constitution, but the convincing simplicity of the former and the strained scholastic reasoning of the latter convince the mind that here again the Creed was the archetype. Diverging therefore at this point from Waterland, who dates the Creed A.D. 420, four years after the publication of the work De Trinitate, we may now see whether we can assign a prior date for its composition.

[1] E.g. Cyril of Alexandria says of the Holy Spirit, "For He is termed the Spirit of Truth, and Christ is Truth; and He proceeds (προχεῖται) from Him, as in fact he does from God and the Father" [Ep. Synod. cf. Harvey's Vindex Cathol. i. 188]. Thus also Basil says "the Spirit proceeds from God, not by generation as the Son, but as the Spirit of His mouth;" where it is manifestly intended that as the Spirit proceeds from God the Father, so also He proceeds from God the Word. Ambrose makes the matter more plain, "Dei Spiritus et Spiritus Christi et in Patre est et in Filio, quia oris est Spiritus" [Ambros. De Sp. S. i. 11, 37, 114, iii. 6]. There is an Augustinian definiteness also in those other words of Ambrose, "et si Spiritum dicas, et Deum Patrem, a quo procedit Spiritus, et Filium, quia Filii quoque est Spiritus, nuncupasti." [Ibid.]

It should be borne in mind once more that the Apollinarian heresy is the latest form of error of which the Creed takes cognizance. But that heresy never took root in the Churches of the West; therefore no newly appointed Gallican bishop would have gone out of his way to condemn it, as Waterland supposes Hilary to have done on his appointment to the see of Arles. "It is hardly in keeping with the mild 'credo' of a newly installed prelate. But in the year A.D. 401, we can point to a most popular and zealous bishop of Western Gaul, apostolical in his labours among the benighted population of the Nervii and Morini [Pas de Calais] as well as in his self-inflicted poverty [Paulin. Nol. Ep. 18 ad Victric.], who was accused publicly of teaching heresy, and that evidently of Apollinaris; who also gave account of his faith in a confession that, without any great degree of improbability, may be identified with this exposition of the Catholic faith. This eminent son of the Church was Victricius, Confessor and Bishop of Rouen, who at the close of the fourth century was considerably advanced in years" [Harvey, Creeds, 578]. The terms of this confession are sketched out by Paulinus of Nola [Ep. 37, ad Victric. 3, 4], and they harmonize remarkably with those of the Creed [ibid. 5, 6]. There are historical reasons for believing that this confession was presented at Rome between A.D. 399 and 402 when Anastasius was pope [Harvey on the Creeds]. But the name of Victricius was in time expunged, and it then stood as the production of Anastasius. Hence, since one commentator terms it "Fides Anastasii," and a Codex ascribes it to Anas*th*asius, it is highly probable that this name was connected with the Creed at an earlier date than that of Athanasius, into which it easily passed. The name of Athanasius is first placed at the head in a copy of the eighth century, which leaves a wide margin of three hundred years for the change of title. The earliest MS. [Cottonian now lost] assigned no name to the Creed, but simply styled it "Fides Catholica," as does also Venantius Fortunatus in his commentary. The reasons for assigning it to Victricius have been thus summed up.

[1.] "Its careful well considered terms are more consistent with the mature age of Victricius, who had attained the honour of confessor forty years before the date now assigned to the Creed, in 401, than with the youth of Hilary, who was only eight and twenty years of age when he is supposed by Waterland to have composed the hymn on his advancement to the episcopate. [2.] Its style, though not that of an apology in vindication of the writer's faith, agrees well with the supposition that he was accused of the errors that he anathematizes. [3.] Its matter is exactly parallel with the subjects upon which Victricius, if we may judge from the expressions of Paulinus, was called to defend himself. With respect to both of these particulars the supposition that Hilary should have been the author is singularly unsatisfactory to the judgment. His exposition of faith on entering upon his episcopal office would scarcely have been pointed with anathemas which the history of his time persuades us were not required. Indeed, the Creed can only be assigned to Hilary upon the supposition that Apollinarianism infested the Gallican Church at the date of his appointment to the see of Arles; a supposition wholly contrary to fact. But since we know that Pelagian tenets had then taken a firm root in the south of France, we know also the direction that any inaugural exposition by Hilary must have taken. [4.] Again, if Hilary had been the author of the Creed, his name must have commanded respect, and he would scarcely have met with such hard words from Pope Leo I. as may be found in his epistle to the French bishops, A.D. 445.[1] On the other hand, the highly probable communication between Victricius and Anastasius, and the preparation of a confession of faith by the Gallican confessor, indicate the process whereby the name of Athanasius may have been placed at length, by assimilation, at the head of the Creed.

[1] E.g. "Non est hoc . . . salubritatem impendere diligentiæ pastoralis, sed vim inferre latronis et furis . . . Potest forsitan ad depravandos vestræ sanctitatis animos Hilarius pro suo more mentiri" [Leo, Ep. 10].

For these reasons therefore, it is considered that the authorship of the Creed may be referred to the Confessor Victricius, Bishop of Rouen; and that the date of the production may be asigned to the year 401" [Harvey on the Three Creeds, 583].

The warnings of our Lord were the words of Him to whom the future world and the results of the final judgment were better known than any thing present can be to us; and He has said, "He that rejecteth Me and receiveth not My words hath One that judgeth him, the Word that I have spoken, the same shall judge him at the last day;" "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned;" κατακριθήσεται being the correlative term of σωθήσεται; and our Lord making that declaration knowing the form of faith that should be as the life-blood of His Church. The Apostles taught the same thing, "Believe on the Lord Jesus and thou shalt be saved" [Acts xvi. 31]; "If any man preach any other Gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be accursed" [Gal. i. 9]. So Hymenæus and Alexander were delivered over unto Satan, or separated from the communion of the Church, for denying an article of the primitive Creed, and saying that "the resurrection is past already." Therefore, if we listen with reverence to the words of Christ, if we recognise in the doctrine and practice of the Apostles the working of the same spirit, we cannot do otherwise than accept with confidence the statement that the Church by long use has made her own, "Whosoever will be saved, before all things it is necessary that he hold the Catholic faith." But the faith that saves is not a mere speculative quality; it is essentially operative and practical, and without its guidance the deeper phases of speculative truth are veiled from the intellect. "If a man do His will he shall know of the doctrine" [John vii. 17]. Practice is better than theological lore; and he who studies to do God's will is kept from straying into soul-destroying heresy, the natural "terminus ad quem" of ignorance and self-conceit. "Quando Deus magis creditur nisi cum magis timetur?" is a question put by Tertullian that is of much depth [De Fuga. i.]. Soul and spirit may be justified by faith, but the heart is purified by it [Acts xv. 9]. The converse also is unhappily true, and sin is the sure parent of misbelief. To hold the Catholic faith is to obey as well as to believe, and unless a man do keep the faith whole and undefiled, both in doctrine and practice, as truly as Christ hath spoken, so shall His word judge the erring soul at the last day. Is it too much then to say "except a man believe faithfully he cannot be saved?" Or is our Lord's division of all human souls at the last day to the right and to the left of the dread tribunal to be eliminated from the objects of faith because it is truly alarming? The Catholic faith knows of no such compromise; it can only move straight forward in the path of truth; bearing forth the Lord's decrees to the end of time. [Waterland on the Athanasian Creed. Harvey, Hist. and Theol. of the Three Creeds. Blunt's Annoted Prayer Book, which latter work should be consulted with reference to its liturgical use.

QUIETISM. A form of devotional life and theology founded on the principle that perfect union with God is most nearly attained by a state of passive rest or "quiet," in which total inaction of will and intellect bring the soul into a condition best adapted for the operation of the Holy Spirit, and for union with God.

This exaggeration of a principle whose true development has been illustrated by the contemplative saints of all ages from St. John downwards, originated with Michael de Molinos, a Spanish Jesuit of the seventeenth century, who gained much influence as a Confessor and Director during his residence at Rome, and who eventually condensed his special system of theology into a work published in A.D. 1675, and entitled The Spiritual Guide, which disentangles the soul, and brings it by the Inward Way to the getting of perfect contemplation, and the rich treasure of internal peace. The other most celebrated names associated with Quietism are those of Archbishop Fenelon and Madame Guyon. Molinos' book was condemned and burnt by the Inquisition in A.D. 1685, and he himself remained in prison until his death in A.D. 1696. Fenelon also was obliged to recant his opinions, and Madame Guyon's mad fanaticism brought some persecution upon her. Quietism, however, gained some hold in France, and English Methodism was originally tinged with its colour.

But Quietism was, in reality, no new doctrine, nor was it at first perceived that the doctrines of the Spiritual Guide differed so far from the current doctrine of the Mystics as to require the interference of Church authority. There is a well known line of earlier Spanish Mystics, and their doctrine had in the sixteenth century passed into extravagances which were suppressed, not without persecution. The Spiritual Guide was at first classed with the less hurtful teaching. After a time it was found to be really no less dangerous than the teaching of the Illuminati of Spain, and was dealt with accordingly.

The current doctrine of Quietism is stated by Jeremy Taylor in words so closely resembling the language of the Spiritual Guide as to shew beyond a doubt that Molinos took for his basis the accepted tenets of mystical theology, and raised upon them his further and more dangerous tenets. Taylor writes, "For beyond this I have described (i.e. the legitimate practice of meditation), there is a degree of meditation so exalted that it changes the very name, and is called Contemplation; and it is in the unitive way of religion, that is, it consists in unions and adherences to God; it is a prayer of quietness and silence, and a meditation extraordinary, a discourse without variety, a vision and intuition of Divine excellences, an immediate entry into an orb of light, and a resolution of all our faculties into sweetnesses, affections, and starings upon the Divine beauty; and is carried on to ecstasies, raptures, suspensions, elevations, abstractions, and apprehensions beatifical" [Life of Christ, Works, ii. 118, Heber's ed.]

Mystical theology is defined by its professors to be that doctrine which reveals to man the hidden essence of God's Being. The way to this wisdom is in three stages, the purgative, the illuminative, the unitive; the first purging the will from low affections, the second communicating to the intellect the knowledge of God, and the third leading the soul thus prepared to union and deification.

The following table, from Arnold's Historia Theologiæ Mysticæ, p. 88, gives this theology in outline. Some parts of it need an initiated interpreter.

It is evident that this scheme, if at all carried out to its legitimate consequences, leads directly to the error of those enthusiasts who supposed the kingdom of Christ to be an earlier and inferior dispensation, the reign of the Spirit the later and perfect dispensation. Men are taught by it, not the superiority of love to knowledge in St. Paul's sense, but that they may become more perfect by disregarding the knowledge of an earlier state, by becoming again children in understanding. And to that earlier state are referred the power of Christ's Resurrection and the Sacrament of the Holy Eucharist. What the higher Sacrament of Unction is does not appear. In working out this scheme, Molinos taught as follows :—

1. The perfection of men, even in this life, consists in an uninterrupted act of contemplation and love, which contains virtually all righteousness: that this act once effected lasts always, even during sleep, provided that it be not expressly recalled; whence it follows that the perfect have no need to repeat it.

2. In this state of perfection the soul ought not to reflect either on God or on itself, but its powers ought to be annihilated, in order to abandon itself wholly and passively to God.

3. Perfect prayer is this state of quietude, in which there should be absolutely no thought or wish or hope. Vocal prayer, confession, all external things are but hindrances.

4. In prayer the first act of faith, the first intention of resignation, prevails to constitute the whole an act of worship. "One may persevere in prayer though the imagination be carried about with various and involuntary thoughts." These are not to be actively resisted, but merely neglected.

5. The violent and painful suggestions of impatience, pride, gluttony, luxury, rage, blasphemy, cursing, despair, and an infinite number of others, are God's means for purifying those whom He calls. The soul ought not to be disquieted on account of them.

An example of pure Quietism may be quoted in illustration of these principles: Gregory Lopez having for the space of three years continued that ejaculation, "Thy will be done in time and in eternity, repeating it as often as he breathed, God Almighty discovered to him that infinite treasure of the pure and continued act of faith and love, with silence and resignation; so that he came to say that, during the thirty-six years he lived afterwards, he always continued in his inward man that pure act of love, without ever uttering the least petition, ejaculation, or anything that was sensible or sprung from nature" [Spiritual Guide, translation, 1699, p. 75].

Molinos is charged by Romanist writers with teaching Antinomianism. The charge does not appear to be well founded, but that his teaching regarding evil thoughts is most dangerous there can be no doubt. At the same time the truth of which it is a perversion is very discernible.

Molinos proceeds to his doctrine of self-annihilation through what he calls infused contemplation. The means whereby the soul ascends to infused contemplation are two—the pleasure and the desire of it. The steps of it are three—satiety when the soul is filled with God; intoxication, an excess of mind and elevation of soul arising from satiety of Divine love; security, when the soul is so drenched with love that it loses all fear, and would go willingly to hell if it knew such to be the will of God. Six other steps there are—fire, union, elevation, illumination, pleasure, and repose. But there are many other steps besides, as ecstasies, raptures, meltings, deliquiums, glee, kisses, embraces, exaltation, union, transformation, espousing, and matrimony; which, Molinos says, I omit to explain, to give no occasion to speculation. Madame Guyon, however, does explain: "The essential union is the spiritual marriage, where there is a communication of substance, when God takes the soul for His spouse, unites it to Himself, not personally, nor by any act or means, but immediately reducing all to an unity. The soul ought not, nor can, any more make any distinction between God and itself. God is the soul, and the soul is God." [Explicat. du Cant. des Cant.]

Molinos passes through annihilation to the same result of deification. The soul that would be perfect passes, with the Divine aid, into the state of nothingness: from the spiritual death the true and perfect annihilation derives its original; inasmuch that when the soul is once dead to its will and understanding, it is properly said to be arrived at the perfect and happy state of annihilation, which is the last disposition for transformation and union. The soul no longer lives in itself, because God lives in it. The soul being in that manner the Nothing, the Lord will be the Whole in the soul.

One loses the sense of the ridiculous which is inevitably felt in the first reading of the language used, such phrases, e.g., as "getting snug in the centre of Nothing, taking a nap in Nothing," in the sense of the Pantheism which is thus introduced, and the blasphemies which must follow such a doctrine. Such teaching may be compared with the teaching of the Brethren of the Free Spirit in the thirteenth century. They adopted a "system of mystic theology, built upon pretended philosophical principles, which bore a striking resemblance to the impious doctrines of the Pantheists. Amalric, who was "undoubtedly of the same way of thinking," was a Pantheist [Mosheim, Cent. XIII. pt. II. ch. v.; Bayle, Dict. art. Spinoza, note A], and, according to Fleury, he held that heresy which has been alluded to already, that the dispensation of the Son lasted twelve hundred years, and the age of the Holy Spirit then commenced, in which the sacraments and all external worship were to be abolished.

The words quoted before from Milman regarded the philosophy of Abelard. This, Milman writes, might have opened a safe intermediate ground between the Nominalism of Roscelin and the Realism of Anselm and William of Champeaux. As the former tended to a sensuous Rationalism, so did the latter to a mystic Pantheism. If everything but the individual was a mere name, then knowledge shrunk into that which was furnished by the senses alone. When Nominalism became theology, the three Persons of the Trinity (this was the perpetual touchstone of all systems), if they were more than words, were individuals, and Tritheism inevitable. On the other hand, God, the great Reality, absorbed into Himself all other realities; they became part of God, they became God. [Pantheism.]

Rohrbacher [xxvi. 281] distinguishes between the Quietism of Molinos, Fenelon, and Guyon. Madame Guyon admits, he allows, the fundamental principle of Molinos that the perfection of man in this life is a continued act of contemplation and love, but she rejects with horror the consequences which Molinos drew, viz. that positive resistance should not be made to evil thoughts. If her Quietism did not tend so directly to Antinomianism, it reached the point of heresy. Fenelon condemned expressly the "continued act" of the false Mystics, and placed perfection in an habitual state of pure love, in which the hope of reward and fear of punishment has no part.

It is common for Protestant writers to take for granted that the Jesuits and Dominicans, in their opposition to Quietism, were actuated by the danger in which it put their craft. The foregoing statements will shew that they had better cause for their opposition; and that the Inquisition had the presence of danger of no small evil to justify them in their extraordinary step of examining the Pope himself regarding his belief in Quietism and his patronage of Molinos. [Mysticism.]

QUINISEXT. A name given to a Council held at Constantinople, A.D. 691, for the purpose of passing Canons which had been omitted at the fifth and sixth General Councils; to both of which it is therefore considered complementary. This Council is also called the Trullan, or in Trullo, from the domed building in which it was held. Its authority has never been fully recognised in the Western Church. See, however, a note under Reservation.

QUINQUAGESIMA. The name of the Sunday next before Lent, so called as being nearest to the fiftieth day before Easter. In ordinary years it is the forty-ninth day before Easter, in leap years it is the fiftieth. [Septuagesima.]

R

RATIONALISM. There are two ways by which the human mind can attain the knowledge of truth; first, by receiving a Divine revelation of it; and secondly, by means of observation and ratiocination. The name of Rationalism is given to that school of thought which believes that the latter of these two ways is of itself fully sufficient for the attainment of all truth.

That such is not, and cannot be, the case is manifest from the fact that a Divine revelation has been given, and also from its subject matter. That man could not from his natural powers gain an adequate knowledge of his Creator, and of his own duties and obligations, may be gathered from the fact that a Divine revelation has been given, since if man's reason had been fully sufficient for his guidance the necessity for a revelation would be set aside, as man's inherent powers would have sufficed for his obtaining a knowledge of the will of God and of the service which is acceptable to Him. But Rationalism not only thus renders revelation unnecessary, it is also inconsistent with, and really subversive of, revelation by claiming a right to judge of its truth, and to set aside any portion which is deemed inconsistent or irreconcileable with human reason. Thus revelation teaches the doctrine of an Atonement; this doctrine, it is asserted, is unintelligible or contradictory to man's reason: hence it is explained away or rejected. But in subordinating revelation to man's reason, the former is not only logically set aside, but also in fact and experience, as will presently be fully proved; logically by representing man's reason as superior to Divine Revelation, as being able to judge of its truth or falsehood, and thus affording a higher proof of certainty. Hence revelation is unnecessary, and we cannot escape the conclusion that, in any true or proper sense of the word, it has not been given by God. It cannot, if really from Him, take a subordinate position, and be either true or false in regard to its teaching as seen in the light of man's reason. It is monstrous to suppose that God has revealed anything untrue: prove that it is untrue, and its claim to a Divine revelation must inevitably be abandoned. The case is not really altered if it be said that revelation is partly true and partly false, that some of its statements are untrue and irreconcileable with human reason: for we thus, as before, represent God in a certain degree as the author of falsehood. Such theories, as their ultimate result, can only lead to a rejection of Divine revelation. Whatever else be true, it is at least infallibly certain that God is not the author or revealer of falsehood in any sense whatever.

A Rationalist will probably take the following line of argument and defence. Rightly saying that man's reason is God's gift, he will add, that if we refuse an entire submission to its dictates, we are really setting aside this gift and rejecting Divine teaching. Such an argument would be weighty, and perhaps conclusive, if man had not been in a corrupt and fallen state. Had reason been, as when man was created, in a state of perfection, he would have seen by intuition the surpassing excellence and perfection of Divine revelation: not even apparent discordance would have existed between reason and revelation: the two lights which God had kindled, reflecting alike their divine origin, would have been equally illuminative. But man is in a fallen state, the slave of ignorance, prejudice and sin. Hence, reason alone is an imperfect and totally insufficient guide, and may, and often does, lead astray. Should any deny man's fallen state, and that his reason is now imperfect and has a corrupt bias, with such we have no concern. They set aside revelation by denying a fact which it explicitly asserts and throughout its teaching manifestly implies, and which if denied would render it superfluous.

But the facts of Divine revelation, considered generally, cannot be judged of by human reason, since they relate to matters of which reason cannot take cognizance. The nature and perfections of God: the supernatural communication of grace and its influence upon the heart and life: man's spiritual existence in another world, and a future state of eternal happiness or misery: on these and such like truths reason in our present state can afford no information, and for all assured knowledge we must necessarily depend on the word and teaching of Another. Hence the Scripture most explicitly teaches the necessity of faith. He that cometh unto God must believe that He is, must acknowledge on some ground or other His existence, since He is not visible to mortal sight. In a word, the first condition for approaching God in any sense is faith. All must admit that the very existence of God is a matter of faith. Unbelievers by no means allow that the fact of a visible creation necessarily implies a Creator and a God. The first step in religion therefore, the mere belief in Theism, must in a certain degree be by faith. But if the existence of God can only be accepted on faith, a matter in proof of which reason can give the strongest evidence, much more may we suppose that faith is required as regards other truths where reason is manifestly an imperfect or totally inadequate guide. Hence, as might have been supposed, having two facts before us, man's blind and corrupt state by nature and the stupendous truths which Divine revelation unfolds, not contradictory to but far transcending human intellect and apprehension, the greatest stress throughout Scripture is laid on faith, which plainly intimates that God's revealed truth is obviously antagonistic to Rationalism. One system inculcates reliance upon self, the other upon the word and teaching of God. Such is the real issue between that Divine system founded on faith which the Church brings before us, and a sole reliance for instruction and guidance on man's corrupt and biassed reason.

But the subject before us will be best illustrated by tracing the progress of Rationalism from its beginning to the present day, and the effects which follow its teaching.

Rationalism may be dated from the epoch of the Reformation in the sixteenth century. Some of its leading theories were proposed and obtained partial influence in the Middle Ages,[1] but they were now carried out on a wider basis, and issued in the formation of large societies, bound together by a new organization, separated from the rest of Christendom. Luther and others were members of a Church overspread with gross moral corruptions. Instead of attempting its reformation, with due regard to Apostolic order and Catholic belief and tradition, they fell into fundamental error on the true nature of Christianity itself. It is not, as they supposed, or at least acted on the supposition, it is not a system of belief and practice to be elicited de novo from the Bible by the exegesis of individuals or communities, but a divinely instituted kingdom, founded by our Lord and His Apostles, and endowed with the presence of the Holy Spirit to preserve and perpetuate His religion in the world. By historic evidence, the transmission of Apostolic truth from age to age ever has been and can only be proved.

But the theory of ascertaining truth by a private interpretation of Scripture is not only inconsistent with the primary institution of the Church, but was soon found in practice to be the source of endless divisions. The Bible, like other books, stands in need of interpretation, and will admit of various meanings. Thus Luther taught the doctrine of the Real Presence under the form of Consubstantiation, whilst another Reformer, Zwingle, interpretated the words of Institution in a metaphorical or figurative sense. Calvin elicited from Scripture the doctrine of irrespective election and reprobation, and Socinus maintained that its teaching was inconsistent with Catholic belief in our Lord's Godhead. An appeal to the mere letter of Scripture not only, however, opened the door to the most erroneous opinions, but failed utterly, interpreted without regard to the faith and authority of the Church, in forming a rule of faith. The meaning of Scripture is confessedly doubtful on many points: it bears witness to the truth of the Catholic system of doctrine and discipline, which it does not set forth in its full proportions. Thus it cannot be doubted that the doctrine of the Trinity as taught by the Church is really contained in Scripture, and is the only theory, if we may so speak, upon which its apparent discrepancies can be reconciled, but who can discover its truth by a mere analysis of the letter of Scripture, if we ignore the doctrine of the Council of Nice and the definitions of the Athanasian Creed. If we first admit their interpretative authority, and then consider the teaching of Scripture, the latter will appear lucid and harmonious—manifestly illustrating and confirming the former.

Scripture self-interpreted thus supplies materials for the prevalence of Rationalism to the widest extent. But this is not all. With Scripture only before us, other questions must necessarily arise—as the genuineness and authenticity of its several books: the true nature also of inspiration: whether or in what degree it guards from error—questions, as we know, admitting various replies, and often decided in the present day not only with reckless contempt of the general belief and tradition of the Church, but so as to set aside the claims of Christianity to be in any true sense a revelation from God.

Subsequently to the period of the Reformation, the prevalence of Deistical writings in England, at the end of the seventeenth and in the earlier part of the eighteenth century, gave the first impulse to Rationalism. Deism and Rationalism are inseparably connected, the former system being identical with the latter when fully and consistently developed. Thus Deism wholly denies

[1] A modern writer dates the beginning of Rationalism from the twelfth century. "The more carefully," says Mr. Lecky, "the history of the centuries prior to the Reformation is studied, the more evident it becomes that the twelfth century forms the great turning-point of the European intellect. Owing to many complicated causes, which it would be tedious and difficult to trace, a general revival of Latin literature had taken place which profoundly modified the intellectual condition of Europe, and which therefore implied and necessitated a modification of the popular belief. For the first time for many centuries we find a feeble spirit of doubt combating the spirit of credulity; a curiosity for purely secular knowledge replacing in some degree the passion for theology; and as a consequence of these things, a diminution of the contemptuous hatred with which all who were external to Christianity had been regarded. In every department of thought and knowledge there was manifested a vague disquietude that contrasted strangely with the preceding torpor. The long slumber of untroubled orthodoxy was broken by many heresies, which, though often repressed, seemed in each succeeding century to acquire new force and consistency. Manichæism, which had for some time been smouldering in the Church, burst into a fierce flame among the Albigenses, and was only quenched by that fearful massacre in which tens of thousands were murdered at the instigation of the priests. Then it was that the standard of an impartial philosophy was first planted by Abelard in Europe, and the minds of the learned distracted by subtle and perplexing doubts concerning the leading doctrines of the faith" [Lecky's Rise and Influence of Rationalism in Europe, i. 52, 53. 1865].

the truth of the Christian revelation, which Rationalism, whilst professedly admitting, equally sets aside by rejecting the supernatural system of faith which Christianity reveals and teaches, and by which only it is distinguished from Deism.

The history of the Deistical School will be found in an earlier article [DEISM], in which the opinions of its successive leaders, Viret, Lord Herbert of Chirbury, Hobbes, Charles Blount, and others are fully analyzed. But there are two Rationalist writers, who wrote about the middle of the eighteenth century, during the prevalence of Deism, whose works deserve a special notice here, namely, Locke and Middleton.

Locke [A.D. 1632-1704], whose patron was the Earl of Shaftesbury, with whom he for some time lived, wrote an essay on the Human Understanding, in which in determining the "distinct province" of faith and reason, he maintains a certain theory, which, if admitted, must deprive Christianity of its supernatural character and virtually assimilate it to mere Deism. Thus, after laying down the proposition that "Revelation cannot be admitted against the clear evidence of reason," he thus defines and illustrates his meaning: "Because, though faith be founded on the testimony of God (who cannot lie) revealing any proposition to us, yet we cannot have an assurance of the truth of its being a divine revelation greater than our own knowledge: since the whole strength of the certainty depends on the knowledge that God revealed it, which, in this case, when the proposition supposed contradicts our knowledge or reason, will always have this objection hanging to it, viz. that we cannot tell how to conceive that to come from God, the bountiful Author of our being, which, if received for true, must overturn all the principles and foundations of knowledge He has given us; render all our faculties useless; wholly destroy the most excellent part of His workmanship, our understandings, and put a man in a condition where he will have less light, less conduct than the beast that perisheth. For if the mind of man can never have a clearer (and perhaps not so clear) evidence of anything to be a Divine revelation, as it has of the principles of its own reason, it can never have a ground to quit the clear evidence of its reason, to give a place to a proposition whose revelation has not a greater evidence than those principles have."[1]

Without dwelling on the exaggeration which characterizes this extract, since it is manifestly absurd to say if man's reason be imperfect and only partially adequate for his guidance, that he has less light than the beast that perisheth, let the substance of Locke's theory be stated in a few words. "Divine Revelation," he says, "can never afford any higher or more certain proof of the truth of any proposition than human reason: the latter is from God, and the former cannot have a higher origin: besides there may be some doubt, whether the supposed revelation be rightly understood, or really proceeds from God. Reason therefore, if it does not take a higher ground than revelation, cannot at least, under any pretence, be superseded by it." Such is this writer's view, which is founded on the fallacy of supposing that man's reason is in a state of perfection, as when originally created, neither biassed by prejudice nor bad education—a supposition notoriously contrary to fact and experience. But his theory, which makes reason the supreme judge of the truth or falsehood of any proposition, as if it were impossible that revelation could establish the truth of anything contradictory to what he believes to be the dictates of human reason, strikes at the root of a Divine revelation, or necessarily identifies it with the natural light of reason and conscience. It precludes the possibility of revealed truth being above our natural powers as relating to a higher order of things of which we have no knowledge whatever, and which sometimes, from our present limited faculties, may appear to set aside and contradict human reason. Let us consider some of the essential doctrines of revealed truth and we shall find, as might have been expected, that such is really the case. Locke says, before the extract quoted, "that we can never assent to a proposition that affirms the same body to be in two distant places at once, because it should pretend to the authority of a Divine revelation: since the evidence, first, that we deceive not ourselves in ascribing it to God, secondly, that we understand it right, can never be so great as the evidence of our own intuitive knowledge, whereby we discern it impossible for the same body to be in two places at once. And therefore no proposition can be received for Divine revelation, or obtain the assent due to all such, if it be contradictory to our clear intuitive knowledge." The statement is true that a body cannot be in two places at the same time according to natural laws, or the natural mode of existing; but this does not contradict the doctrine of Christ's supernatural Presence in the Holy Eucharist: nor can we even reasonably argue from the well-known properties of a natural to those of a spiritual Body, of whose mode of existing we know nothing. But let us put to the test, according to this writer's theory, a few essential doctrines of faith. Many writers have attacked the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, on the ground of its being contradictory to human reason:—that the real distinction of the three Persons and the unity of the undivided Essence is, as they say, a contradiction in terms, and that Tritheism or Sabellianism alone can be true. Again, how often has the doctrine of the Atonement been denied for similar reasons, the impossibility of explaining, according to human reason, the necessity for Christ's vicarious suffering, or in what sense, according to our own ideas of justice, the Lord could lay upon Him the iniquities of us all. The scriptural doctrine also of everlasting punishment has been rejected on the same ground: all professing to follow the guidance of reason only, believe that it is manifestly unjust and unworthy of a beneficent Creator.

[1] Locke's Philosophical Works, vol. ii. p. 303, Bohn's ed.

About the middle of last century Dr. Middleton published a work,[1] the professed object of which was to prove that miracles ceased after the Apostolic age. He argues that we cannot rely on the testimony of the Fathers in proof of the miracles of a subsequent period, since they were not only credulous and superstitious, but may, he thinks, rightly be charged with deliberate falsehood and imposture. Besides, he says, even if we do accept their testimony in proof of miracles, the miracles they relate would prove the truth of doctrines or usages which all "Protestants" reject, as "the institution of monkery, the worship of relics, frequent use of the sign of the cross, curing diseases with consecrated oil." Such is Middleton's professed object, according to the title of his work, but it is not his only, or even his principal object, as he himself avows. He wished wholly to discard the testimony of the Fathers, and thus to set aside the historic proof upon which Christianity rests: hence, nothing would be left to "Protestants" from which to derive their ideas of Christianity but each man's interpretation of the Bible.

Thus, he says, the primitive writers are "of some use and service on several accounts. First, in attesting and transmitting to us the genuine books of Holy Scripture; yet this is not owing to any particular sanctity or sagacity of those ancient times, but to the notoriety of the thing, and the authority with which the books themselves were received from their first publication in all churches: whence they have since been handed down to us in the same manner, as the works of all other ancient writers, by the perpetual tradition of successive ages, whether pure or corrupt, learned or unlearned. Secondly, their more immediate and proper use is, to teach us the doctrines, the rites, the manners and the learning of the several ages in which they lived: yet as witnesses only, not as guides: as declaring what was then believed, not what was true; what was practised, not what ought to be practised, since their works abound with instances of foolish, false, and dangerous opinions, universally maintained and zealously propagated by them all. Lastly, their very errors also afford an use and profitable lesson to us: for the many corruptions which crept into the Church in those very early ages are a standing proof and admonition to all the later ages, that there is no way of preserving a purity of faith and worship in any church, but by reviewing them from time to time and reducing them to the original test and standard of the Holy Scriptures." And afterwards, the religion of Protestants rests "on the single but solid foundation of the Sacred Scriptures; unmixed with rubbish of ancient tradition or ancient Fathers, and independent of the character and writings of any men whatsoever, except of Moses and the Prophets, Christ and the Apostles."[2]

Middleton, who was engaged in controversy during the greater part of his life, was considered by some of his opponents as a mere infidel in disguise, who, by an insidious and unsatisfactory defence, was really aiming at the overthrow of Christianity: an imputation reasonable enough, (even though, as we may hope, undeserved,) since by asserting that the testimony of the Fathers is unworthy of credit, he sets aside the only evidence which we can have for the genuineness and authenticity of the books of Scripture. Middleton thus attempts to answer this objection, which was soon made against his statement that patristic testimony was unworthy of credit. "It is objected," he says, "that by the character which I have given of the ancient Fathers, the authority of the books of the New Testament, which were transmitted to us through their hands, will be rendered precarious and uncertain." He says, in reply, "that the objection is trifling and groundless, since the authority of these books does not depend upon the faith of the Fathers, but on the general credit and reception which they found, not only in the churches, but with private Christians; and though it might be the desire of a few to corrupt the Scriptures, yet it was the common interest of all to preserve, and of none to destroy them. Being widely dispersed from their very origin, it was hardly possible that they should have been corrupted or suppressed or counterfeited by a few of what character or abilities soever; that in the natural course of things they would come down to us, like the ancient writings of Greece and Rome; and though in every age there were several perhaps who, from crafty and selfish motives, might be disposed to deprave or suppress particular books, yet their malice could reach only to a few copies; and that the greater number of the same books which were out of their reach would remain still incorrupt." Again, he says, "The Scriptures were likely to be more effectually preserved than other ancient writings from the divinity of their character, the religious regard paid to them by all sects and parties, and the mutual jealousies of those parties watching over each other. Let the craft of the ancient Fathers be as great as we can suppose it to be, let it be capable of adding some of their own forgeries for a while to the Canon of Scripture, yet it was not in the power of any craft to impose spurious pieces in the room of those genuine ones which were actually deposited in all churches, and preserved with the utmost reverence in the hands of so many private Christians." Some of these assertions are not very satisfactory or conclusive as a defence of the writer's theory, and the latter statement it can hardly be doubted is wholly untrue, since we have no proof that genuine copies of the Scriptures (the Apostolic autographs) were deposited in all churches. It can only be supposed that different churches would carefully preserve the epistles addressed to them, as the Church at Corinth St. Paul's two epistles; but there is no proof or probability that they possessed genuine copies of epistles addressed to other churches. But Middleton's statements, implying that genuine copies of all the sacred books were deposited in all churches, is entirely, so far as is known, without foundation. But there is the best proof that Middleton's arguments have really very little weight, from the fact that he seems, from his subsequent remarks to have little assurance of their truth. We may thus learn the inevitable result (which, he says, "he cannot help") of discrediting the testimony of the Fathers. After the defence of his theory already quoted, he adds, "But I may go a step further, and venture to declare, that if we should allow the objection to be true, it cannot in any manner hurt my argument; for if it be natural and necessary that the craft and credulity of witnesses should always detract from the credit of their testimony, who can help it? or on what is the consequence to be charged, but on the nature and constitution of things from which it flows? or if the authority of any books be really weakened by the character which I have given of the Fathers, will it follow from thence that the character must necessarily be false, and that the Fathers were neither crafty nor credulous? That surely can never be pretended; because the craft and credulity which are charged upon them must be determined by another sort of evidence—not by consequences, but by facts; and if the charge be confirmed by these it must be admitted as true how far soever the consequences may reach" [Free Enquiry, p. 190-3].

Middleton not only, however, invalidates the proof derived from patristic testimony of the genuineness and authenticity of the books of Scripture, but overthrows the credibility of many of its narratives and miracles. Take, for example, the case of demoniacal possession. After saying that the most eminent and celebrated of the miraculous powers of the Primitive Church was the gift of casting out devils or the cure of demoniacs, and that the Fathers declare their power of lashing, burning, and tormenting them, and their groaning and howling under the torture of the Christian exorcism, Middleton adds, "And the other circumstances likewise so constantly attested by them all (the Fathers) concerning the speeches and confessions of the devils; their answering to all questions; owning themselves to be wicked spirits; telling whence they came and whither they were going, and pleading for favour and care at the hands of the exorcists, may not improbably be accounted for either by the disordered state of the patient answering wildly and at random to any questions proposed, or by the arts of imposture and contrivance between the parties concerned in the act" [Free Enquiry, pp. 80, 82]. Let it be granted that the disordered state of the patient, or the fraud of the parties concerned, satisfactorily explain patristic miracles of demoniacal possession, and it will certainly follow that they will also explain the miracles of Scripture in which the same phenomena are found; where demons also "make speeches and confessions," "own themselves to be evil spirits," "plead for mercy at the hands of the exorcists." If one class of miracles can only be regarded as an exhibition of fraud and imposture, the other, on the same ground, must be equally discredited. Again, "it is very hard to believe what Origen declares above" [Contr. Celsum, lib. iv.], "that the devils, for the sake of doing the greater mischief to men, used to possess and destroy their cattle:" what credit then can it be supposed that this writer gave, or thinks ought to be given, to the scriptural narrative of devils possessing and destroying swine by driving them into the sea? Ecclesiastical miracles, as such narratives suggest, are unquestionably to be regarded as a continuation of the miracles of Scripture, and answering in some degree the same purpose in the Divine economy, which clearly adds to their probability, and confirms the evidence alleged in their favour. The connection between scriptural and ecclesiastical miracles (with proof of the credibility of the latter) is investigated in Dr. Newman's well-known Essay.[1]

In pursuance of the history before us we have now to call attention to the prevalence of Rationalism in Germany, at the close of the last and the early part of the present century. The first impulse given to Rationalism in Germany, says Mr. Rose, from whose Discourses[2] the following account is abridged, was from the writings of the Socinians and Remonstrants, those of the English Deists who led the way (and it is a melancholy pre-eminence) in the career of disbelief, and subsequently the French so-called philosophers. Semler seems to be recognised by this modern school as its father and its founder; this designation being given to him because he first taught the German divines to reject the Divine origin of Scripture and its universal obligation, to think and speak lightly of a large portion of what at least is received by every Christian Church as Christian doctrine, and to produce theories which involve charges of the most serious nature against the moral character of the Founder and first Teacher of our religion. Semler's opinions shall now be briefly considered as being on some leading points characteristic of German Rationalism generally. It is first necessary to mention that he was a member of the Collegia Pietatis, which were founded by Spener [PIETISM], as the peculiar views of the Pietists in some degree influenced his theories. He first proposed what has been called the theory of Accommodation, asserting that we are not to take all the declarations of Scripture as addressed to ourselves, but to consider them in many points as purposely adapted to the feelings and dispositions of the age when they originated, but by no means to be received by another and more enlightened period. This theory, which Semler carried to great lengths, in the hands of his followers became the most formidable weapon ever devised for the destruction of Christianity. Whatever men were disinclined to receive in the New Testament, and yet could not with decency reject, while they called themselves Christians and retained the Scriptures, they got rid of by this theory: maintaining that the Apostles, and in fact Jesus Himself, had adapted themselves not only in their way of teaching, but also in their doctrines, to the barbarous ignorance and prejudices of the Jews; and that it is therefore our duty to reject the whole of this temporary part of Christianity and retain only what is substantial and eternal. Every notion not suitable to existing opinions is therefore treated as mere adaptation to former ones—everything for example mysterious and difficult, the very notion indeed that Christianity was a revelation from heaven, is said to be merely a wise condescension to the weakness of former ages; and nothing at last remains but what common experience and natural religion suggest. This writer soon proceeded to attack the Canon of Scripture. Admitting that canonical books must be of divine authority, he maintained that their divinity was to be established on a new (though most dangerous) principle. The mark of a Divine origin was to be the utility of a work, or its tendency to promote virtue. Judging by this criterion, he ejected from the Canon the books of Scripture which did not meet his approbation. He decided that the Christian is not bound to receive a single book of the Old Testament as of Divine origin, for he declared that man can receive no moral improvement from them. The historical books of the New Testament were only valuable for the weaker brother, who must be guided by history rather than any principles formally proposed. And even others are only to be valued by the stronger minded Christian, till he has made himself master of the ideas they contain. He may then cast them from him, and pursue by his own strength the path of Christianity to an extent where they could never lead him. The principle which Semler applied to the books of Scripture he applied likewise to their contents, and judged of the history and doctrines by their utility alone, without any reference to the external evidence of prophecy and miracles. Such were his general principles: but we may look also at some particular instance of his treating sacred subjects. One of his favourite theories was that of the existence of two parties of Christians from the commencement—one which desired to connect Christianity closely in its origin and doctrines with the Jewish system, the other a Gnostic and Freethinking school. Christ, he tells us, conciliated both: when He addressed the Judaizing party He professed a reverence for the Jewish system; when speaking to His Gnostic followers He strongly opposed these Jewish prejudices. After His death St. Peter placed himself at the head of the Jewish converts: St. Paul took the lead in the Gnostic party, which endeavoured to generalize Christianity, and prepare it for the conversion of the Gentiles. The four Gospels which we possess, he said, were those of the Jewish party; the documents which recorded Christ's addresses to the Gnostics have perished, except the Gospel of Marcion. The letters of St. Paul belonged to the Gnostics, and the Catholic epistles were written to promote the union of the two parties. With regard to the Epistle to the Hebrews, which contradicted this hypothesis, Semler asserted that St. Paul wrote it to please the Jewish party, at a period of his career when he had some hopes of conciliating them, a hope which he afterwards renounced; and with it, of course, the principles and professions which he had assumed as a mere matter of convenience.

It is unnecessary to give further details of the opinions and theories of this writer, which generally rest, as will be seen, not on any evidence, but only on the most arbitrary and improbable assertions. Besides, though in a certain sense, the founder of German Rationalism, it must not be supposed that his party had one uniform and consentient system, which even their own theory—a reliance on individual opinion and judgment—rendered impossible. It is hopeless, says Mr. Rose, amidst the chaos of writers and the chaos of contradictory opinions, theories, and fancies, which they proposed to the entire confusion of thought and reason, to do more than mark the general tendency of their sentiments. They are bound by no law but their own fancies; some are more and some are less extravagant: but it does them no injustice, after this declaration, to say that the general inclination and tendency of their opinions (more or less forcibly acted on) is this, that in the New Testament we shall find only the opinions of Christ and His Apostles adapted to the age in which they lived, and not eternal truths; that Christ Himself had neither the design nor power of teaching any system which was to endure; that when He taught any enduring truth, as He occasionally did, it was without being aware of its nature; that the Apostles understood still less of real religion; that the whole doctrine both of Christ and His Apostles, as it is directed to the Jews alone, so it was gathered in fact from no other source than the Jewish philosophy; that Christ Himself erred, and that His Apostles spread His errors; and that, consequently, no one of their doctrines is to be received on their authority, but that, without any regard to the authority of the books of Scripture and their asserted Divine origin, each doctrine is to be examined according to the principles of right reason before it is allowed to be Divine.

To give a few samples of the result of an examination of Christianity by German divines on the principles of "right reason." Some assume the hypothesis of a deception practised by the Apostles: in order to introduce a better moral system, they allowed themselves to give many circumstances a different dress from the true one; in other words, the Gospel is what is called a "pious fraud." Again, the Incarnation is rejected on the plea that in every religion many myths of the generations, incarnations, and apparitions of the gods, are found, and that the Christian doctrine is to be classed with similar fables. The evidence for Christianity derived from prophecy is rejected, partly by denying the genuineness of some of the prophetical writings, and partly on the theory that the prophets, being clever and experienced men, were likely to foresee future events. Miracles are said to be a part of that mythology which must attend every religion to gain the attention of the multitude, or, (some have suggested,) they were done by animal magnetism. Some of these writers maintain that Christ did not really die upon the Cross, but by the sedulous care of His friends He revived on the third day. One author has written a book to prove that Christ lived twenty-seven years upon earth after (according to Scripture) His ascension; another, that our Lord's ascension was a myth. The genuineness of most of the books of the New Testament has been denied by different writers of this school on various grounds; the four Gospels, it is asserted, were not published in their present form, or immediately after Christ's death; and many pamphlets have been written against the authenticity of St. John's Gospel.

Here we find Rationalism legitimately and fully developed. Reason, that is every man's own opinion or judgment, being the theologian's only guide, he abandons one portion of Divine revelation after another, till at length he reaches the final goal, that Christianity, rightly understood or purified from error, is identical with Deism or mere natural religion; from whence it must necessarily follow that its promulgation was useless—in no intelligible sense could it be called a revelation, since it revealed nothing, or only what was already universally acknowledged.

Since the publication of the work from which quotations have been given, the progress of Rationalism in Germany has been checked; its leading principles have been refuted by many divines far superior in scholarship to their Neologian predecessors, who have ably maintained the fundamental doctrines of Evangelical Christianity. The names of Neander, Olshausen, Stier, Hengstenberg, Kurtz, Auberlen, and a number of others well known in Germany, are equally celebrated in England and America as learned expositors of Scripture, and as writers to whom theological science generally is much indebted.

German Rationalism, as already stated, originated in some measure from the writings of English Deists: most unhappily in our own day this order has been reversed. Such works as Bishop Colenso on the Pentateuch, and Essays and Reviews are merely an impoverished reproduction of certain theories and speculations of German Rationalists, without even the negative merit of the ability and originality of their authors.

Probably, it will be said, that we have not yet fully examined what may be said in defence of Rationalism, and have too much treated its theories as wholly destitute of credibility and incapable of a fair apology and defence. On the contrary, we wish to state the strongest arguments proposed in its favour. Without dwelling on the apparent unreasonableness of certain Christian doctrines (of which something has been already said) or the supposed insufficiency of the evidence on which Christianity rests, the Rationalist, though not losing sight of such objections, will especially call attention to the discoveries of modern science, as of geology, which, as he asserts, will not allow us to understand literally the Mosaic account of the Creation; or of astronomy, which certainly forbids us to take in a literal sense the statements of Scripture. Hence he concludes that we are compelled to rationalize—to accept what is true, and reject what is erroneous in Scripture. Besides, how can Scripture be a direct revelation from God, and as such infallibly and on all points true, if errors of any kind whatever are to be found in its statements? This objection is founded on a wrong view of the object or purpose for which Holy Scripture was given. It was not written to impart to its readers information on scientific matters: nor have we any reason to suppose that its authors knew more on such subjects than their contemporaries. "These things," says St. John, "were written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Son of God, and that believing ye might have life through His Name" [John xx. 31]. This is the reason for which Scripture was written, and if its professed object be attained, what more have we a right to expect? But it will be answered that if God inspired the sacred writers—all that they taught, whether scientific or theological, would have been simply and entirely true; and we should not read of the earth being set on pillars, or of the sun going round it. Here, again, we see mistaken ideas of the purpose of inspiration, which was solely to communicate supernatural truth to the world, and had no direct reference to any other matters whatever. But the objection itself, as a few words will shew, is of no real weight or value. Let it be supposed that God had inspired prophets and apostles to give cosmical information with minute accuracy, such information, instead of furthering, would only have impeded the end which revelation has in view. Christianity in early ages, on account of the peculiar views of its authors, would probably not have been received at all, their theories would have been deemed so novel and extraordinary; being imposed too on divine authority, an insuperable bar would have been placed against its reception. The Bible would have afforded material for scientific theories and speculations which, instead of promoting, could only have hindered the diffusion of Divine truth, by diverting the minds of inquirers from its primary and all-important object. Besides, even in modern times, would a perfect statement of cosmical truths be likely to promote the object which revelation has in view? Is the world now prepared to receive it? would all scientific men accept it? Our knowledge on the two sciences referred to, astronomy and geology, is only yet in an imperfect or inchoate state: considerable information respecting the latter has been gained in modern times, yet disputes still prevail on important points, nor is it universally agreed whether or not the facts of science are reconcileable with the literal meaning of the Mosaic account of the Creation. And of astronomy even less has been discovered. We have no certain theory on the creation of the planetary system: nor are learned writers yet agreed whether or not the innumerable worlds pervading infinite space are inhabited. Suppose that all such matters were fully revealed in God's Word, would writers of the present day accept the revelation? On the contrary, the Bible would be more likely, even than with its present contents, to afford the materials and occasion for speculative unbelief: since we have no right to take for granted, that if the exact truth on matters referred to were set forth in its fulness, that it would necessarily command general assent. It cannot, therefore, be fairly questioned, even humanly speaking, that it was the wisest course, as most likely to promote the desired end, to leave the sacred writers solely in possession of contemporary information. Such limited knowledge, it can hardly be doubted, best fitted them for the guidance of their own generation, and also really best enables them to be the instructors of future ages.

Another observation must be added. All unnecessary difficulties should be removed which hinder the reception of the truths of revelation. Rationalists, with much probability, question the truth of certain statements of Scripture literally understood, when probably the literal sense is not a matter of faith or certainty. Thus St. Augustine did not think that the six days of Creation ought to be understood in the letter, but that they indicated, as many geologists assert, an indefinite period of time.[1] He suggests, and some modern scholars have adopted his theory, that animals were created in certain localities after the Deluge[2]—a theory by which we might explain the fact, that, e.g., in Australia the animal creation widely differs from that of the Old World. Again, there are disputes amongst orthodox theologians on the chronology of Holy Scripture, which is evidently in a crude or unsettled state; and also on the universality of the Deluge. Now, a certain view or theory on such matters ought not to be considered as de fide, or to expose those maintaining it to the charge of Rationalism or infidelity. A greater latitude of opinion on these and like subjects than many modern theologians suppose, would certainly have been allowed in the Primitive Church.[3] But whilst maintaining that it is an imperative duty to remove every stumbling-block from the sincere inquirer's path; it must also be remembered that this can only be done imperfectly and inadequately. There is much in Divine revelation, viewing only its subject-matter, which is beyond, and sometimes apparently opposed to, man's reason and intellect, and only to be received by faith. The Holy Ghost, foreseeing this, has provided an assured guidance for us amidst such perplexities and trials, a certain means of gaining enlightenment and a knowledge of the truth, which if neglected must leave men without apology or excuse. Our Lord declares, "If any man will do (is disposed or wills to do, θέλῃ ποιεῖν) His will he shall know of the doctrine" [John vii. 17], and also promises to all who are walking in the path of obedience a present guidance and support. "He that hath My commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth Me; and I will love him, and will manifest Myself to him" [John xiv. 21; see also Rev. ii. 20]. Hence St. John says, "We have an unction from the Holy One, and the same anointing teaches us of all things" [1 John ii. 20, 27]. Our Lord also in the Apocalypse assures us that to him who is overcoming (νικῶντι) in the spiritual warfare, shall be given of the tree of life and of the hidden manna[4] [Rev. ii. 7, 17]. Thus, we cannot doubt that in seeking after God by faith and obedience, knowledge already possessed will be increased, and fresh light and guidance afforded. "The manifestation (δήλωσις) of Thy word," says the Psalmist, "giveth light" [cxix. 130]; "Light is sprung up for the righteous" [xcvii. 11]. "The path of the just is a shining light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day" [Prov. iv. 18]. Let none think that this divine arrangement either can or will be altered. It is founded on unchangeable necessity. That knowledge of God which is life eternal [John xvii. 2] can only be communicated to those who love Him and keep His commandments; they only are capable of His inward presence, guidance, and consolation. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God"—see Him now by faith, and afterwards behold His Presence unveiled in the Beatific Vision.

Again, the doubts and obscurities overshadowing our path as Christians, and our conduct as regards them, are intended to test our fitness for sharing the blessings of redemption: faith is chiefly brought before us in Scripture, not as an exercise of the intellect, but an affection of the heart. "Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven." Until as children we lean on Another, [3] The following statement in his work against the Manichæans should also be attentively considered. It is an extract from one of the chapters entitled Genesis ad literam ubique non potest exponi: "Sane quisquis voluerit omnia quæ dicta sunt secundum literam accipere, id est non aliter intelligere quam littera sonat, et potuerit evitare blasphemias et omnia congruentia fidei Catholicæ prædicare, non solum non ei invidendum, sed præcipuus multumque laudabilis intellector habendus est. and like true disciples sit at the feet of our Master and learn of Him, we are not only unworthy of, but morally unfit for, divine guidance and instruction, and amidst spiritual doubts and darkness cannot hope to find rest unto our souls.

Possibly, there may be some who, seeking divine illumination in the path of duty, cannot find the guidance promised, but such cases can only be assigned to peculiar or individual circumstances, and cannot set aside the general rule of Scripture. Christian experience in all ages has fully proved, that to those who seek after God in the path of faith and obedience the promises of assured light and guidance are abundantly fulfilled—"yea, the wayfaring man though a fool shall not err therein."

READERS. [Lectores; ἀναγνῶσται.] One of the minor orders of the Primitive Church, whose duty was to read Holy Scripture during divine service. The order is of ecclesiastical rather than Apostolic institution, and cannot be traced back further than to the third century. Bona [Rer. Liturg. I. xxv. n. 17] says that the orders of acolytes, exoreists, readers, and doorkeepers were not instituted by the Apostles—"quos ab apostolis, vel ab immediatis eorum successoribus institutos, doctores scholastici adserunt, sed non probant." The reason of this is doubtless supplied by the passage which he quotes from St. Thomas Aquinas [Supplem. part iii. quæst. 36, art. ii.]: "In primitiva ecclesia, propter paucitatem ministrorum, omnia inferiora ministeria diaconibus committebantur, ut patet per Dionysium, cap. iii. Eccles. Hierarchiæ, &c. . . . Nihilominus erant omnes prædictæ potestates, sed implicite, in una diaconi potestate. Sed postea ampliatus est cultus divinus; et ecclesia quod implicite habebat in uno ordine, explicite tradidit in diversis."

The first to make mention of Readers is Tertullian. In his treatise, De Præscript. c. 41, he plainly shews by the complaint which he makes against heretics that they were a recognised order of the Church. St. Cyprian mentions them frequently, and Cornelius, Bishop of Rome [A.D. 251, 252], in his letter to Fabius, Bishop of Antioch, states it as a fact well known to Novatus that the Roman Church possessed exoreists, readers, and doorkeepers [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 43]. Socrates relates how the office was undertaken by Julian, afterwards "the Apostate," at Nicomedia, in order to deceive his cousin Constantine as to his belief [Socr. Hist. Eccl. iii. 1]. Sozomen mentions how both he and his brother Gallus fulfilled this duty, and were reckoned worthy, ὡς καὶ ὑπαναγινώσκειν τῷ λαῷ τὰς ἐκκλησιαστικὰς βίβλους [Sozom. Hist. Eccl. v. 2]. "And there is no writer of that age," says Bingham, "but always speaks of readers as a distinct order of the clergy in the Church."

In the Church of Alexandria, the catechumens as well as the faithful were admitted to be readers [Socr. Hist. Eccles. v. 22]. In this case, probably, there was not the same solemn form of ordination which elsewhere prevailed. In general, readers were formally set apart for their work, in some Churches of the East, by imposition of hands, but in the West rather by the commission of the bishop. They were nowhere set apart like the "sacrati ordines," by καθιέρωσις, or consecration, but by εὐλογία, or benediction. The Fourth Council of Carthage [A.D. 398] thus ordered: "When the reader is ordained let the bishop address the people concerning him, making mention of his faith, life, and ability. Then, while the people are looking on, let him deliver to him the book out of which he is to read, saying, Take this, and be thou a reader of the word of God (lector Verbi Dei), which office, if thou fulfil faithfully and profitably, thou shalt have part with those that minister the Word of God."

The duty of this order was to read Holy Scripture to the people from the "pulpitum, id est, tribunal ecclesiæ" [St. Cyprian, Epist. 34 al. 39], standing in the body of the Church, but not to minister or read at the altar, which was the duty of the deacons. In the Apostolic Constitutions we have the following description of the reader's office in divine service: "The reader is in the middle, standing upon a high place, and reads the Books of Moses, of Joshua the son of Nun, of Judges, and of Kings, and of Chronicles, and of the things which were written about the return of the people, and, in addition to these, the Books of Job, and of Solomon, and the sixteen prophetical books. The two lessons having been read aloud, some other one sings the Psalms of David, and the people sing softly the Antiphons (τὰ ἀκροστίχια), and afterwards our own acts are recited, and the Epistles of Paul our fellow-labourer, which he sent to the churches under the guidance of the Holy Spirit. After these things the deacon or the presbyter reads the gospel," &c. [Const. Apost. ii. 57].

The law of Justinian [Novell. cxxiii. c. 13] forbad any person under the age of eighteen to be admitted a reader. Before this even infants (infantuli) were admitted; children dedicated to God by their parents being trained in this and other inferior offices for the higher orders of the Church.

In Burn's Ecclesiastical Law (under title "Readers") we find that it was usual in England to admit readers to officiate in churches or chapels where the endowment was very small, "to the end that divine service in such places might not altogether be neglected." A series of injunctions was drawn up at the Reformation, and signed by the archbishops and several bishops. Amongst them we find that the readers were not to preach or interpret, but only read what was set forth by public authority; and they were, of course, not allowed to minister the Sacraments or public rites of the Church, save only burial of the dead and purification of women after childbirth.

In the last century, Marshall, the translator of St. Cyprian, wrote that "the nearest resemblance we now have to the office of reader is that part which is performed by our singing-men in cathedrals; viz. reading the lesson" [Epp. of St. Cyprian, part ii. p. 93, n. ed. 1717].

It is interesting to notice that at the General Synod of the Church of Scotland in 1863 a canon was passed empowering the bishops to appoint "lay readers and catechists to read the Holy Scriptures and conduct the ordinary service of the Church." This canon was carried into effect on Sunday, January 29th, 1865, when to Lord Rollo, kneeling at the altar rails, the Bishop of St. Andrews delivered the Bible, saying, "Take thou authority to read the Common Prayer and Holy Scriptures in the congregation of God's people assembled for His holy worship: and in this and all thy works, begun, continued, and ended in Him, may the blessing of God Almighty, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, be upon thee, and remain with thee for ever. Amen." Since that time readers have been solemnly set apart for particular parishes in several English dioceses. [Thomassin, Vet. et Nov. Ecc. Disciplin. ii. 1. Bingham's Antiq. III. v. Burn's Ecclesiastical Law, Phillimore's ed.]

REAL PRESENCE. A term used to express our Lord's Presence in the Holy Eucharist, in contradiction to certain modern theories which, though partially true, do not fully and adequately express the scriptural and catholic verity. Thus the word "Real" obviously means far more than a figurative Presence, as if the Bread and Wine were only memorials of Christ's Body and Blood; and more also than a virtual presence, as if our Lord only bestowed in the Eucharist the graces and blessings derived from His atoning sacrifice. The word "real," whilst not defining the mode of the sacramental presence, is intended, in contradiction to the theories mentioned, clearly and expressly to assert its truth.

The theory that our Lord's presence is only memorial is elsewhere examined [EUCHARIST]; a few words are here added respecting a "virtual presence." Certain modern writers most unhappily use terms which have a definite theological meaning in their own peculiar sense, and thus teach error or heresy under the guise of orthodox phraseology. Hence the theory of Virtualism, though essentially differing from the true doctrine of the Real Presence, is represented as being identical with it; but so far is it from being so, that it is a novel theory, totally unknown in the early ages of the Church. It was probably invented by Calvin in the sixteenth century, being first met with in his writings; and it is an attempted via media between the Primitive or Catholic doctrine on the Eucharist and the theory of Zuinglius, who denied altogether our Lord's sacramental presence, representing the Eucharist as being only a sign or representation of His sufferings and death. As regards Calvin's theory,—though he sometimes uses Catholic phraseology, and speaks of Christ being in the "symbol"[1] (in symbolo) and of our being "partakers of His substance"[2] (participes substantiæ ejus), yet it is certain that he wholly rejected the true doctrine of the Eucharist. Thus he asserts that our Lord's human nature can only be present at the right hand of God, and cannot in any sense whatever be present under Eucharistic signs:[3] but if our Lord's humanity be not there present, He Himself cannot in any true sense be present, as His two natures (divine and human) after the ascension are indivisible. Besides, if our Lord be not present with the signs or symbols, the Eucharist would not be a sacrament, which as such must consist of two parts, the outward sign and the inward accompanying grace.[4] Calvin maintained that the Eucharist was especially designed to kindle the believer's faith, and to raise his heart to Christ sitting at the right hand of God. He thus illustrates his theory, that as the sun, though so distant, can infuse light and heat, so Christ, though at the right hand of God, shines into the hearts of faithful receivers, and fills them with His grace and presence.[5] Whatever may be thought of Calvin's illustration it is certain that his theory does not essentially differ from Zuinglianism. Christ is sacramentally absent, according to Calvin's theory, no less than according to that of the Zurich reformer. Hence Calvin, in endeavouring to set forth his theory to the best advantage, is compelled to attempt the proof that the words of Institution are to be explained figuratively or metaphorically.[6] Thus Virtualism and the memorial theory are really identical: indeed, only two rational opinions on the subject are possible—a real presence or a real absence.

The chief objection in modern times to the doctrine of the Real Presence arises from unwillingness to admit that earthly elements can be the vehicle for the communication of divine grace. And yet this truth is abundantly confirmed by scriptural teaching and illustration. A woman touched the hem of our Lord's garment and was

[1] In symbolo panis habemus corpus Christi [Catech. Genev.].

[2] Calvin, Inst. lib. iv. c. 17, sec. 11.

[3] Ibid. lib. iv. sec. 19, sec. 26.

[4] Calvin [ibid. lib. iv. c. 17, sec. 11] unsuccessfully attempts, on his own theory, an explanation of the sacramental nature of the Holy Eucharist. He admits that it consists of two parts, the outward sign and the inward grace; and says of the "presence" of the inward grace, that by the outward signs the Body and Blood of Christ are truly exhibited (exhiberi): but surely this "exhibition" of Christ by the symbols (per symbola panis et vini) totally differs from a real presence, or any presence whatever, in the ordinary meaning of the word.

[5] Ibid. lib. iv. c. 17, sec. 22. Calvin sometimes goes beyond such illustrations, and apparently nearly approaches Catholic belief, but his true meaning must be carefully investigated. Thus in the Institutes he speaks of its being a wonderful and incomprehensible thing, that the Flesh of Christ, though at so great a distance, should be the food of our souls, which, he says, can only take effect through the power of the Spirit; but this spiritual "eating" he really attributes to faith viewed per se, and not to sacramental manducation (i.e. to faith in and through the sacrament). Thus, also, in the Genevan Catechism, after the statement that we are partakers of Christ's "substance" (though He is at the right hand of God) by the secret and wonderful efficacy (virtute) of His Spirit, the following question and answer are added: "M. Ergo nec corpus in pane inclusum esse sive sanguinem in calice imaginaris? P. Nequaquam. Quin potius ita sentio, ut veritate potiamur signorum, erigendas esse in cœlum mentes ubi Christus est, et unde Eum expectamus judicem et redemptorem: in his vero terrenis elementis perperam et frustra quæri."

healed, virtue going out of Him [Mark v. 30]; the eyes of a blind man were anointed with clay, and his sight was restored [John ix. 6]; handkerchiefs and aprons were taken from St. Paul's body, and the sick were healed by them [Acts xix. 12]; sins were washed away by baptism [Acts xxii. 16]; the Apostles laid their hands on converts and they receive the Holy Ghost [Acts viii. 17]. Why then should the earthly elements of bread and wine be an unworthy medium to convey heavenly and spiritual gifts? Their unfitness in themselves only places more strikingly in contrast the wonder-working power of God and His independence of human agency. He can transform the feeblest, meanest instrument, so that it becomes the channel of His grace, and the very token and pledge of His adorable Presence. [EUCHARIST. TRANSUBSTANTIATION.]

REALISM. [CONCEPTUALISM. THEOLOGY, SCHOLASTIC.]

RE-BAPTISM. The question of re-baptism was one which agitated the Church in the days of St. Cyprian in the latter half of the third century, and gave rise to much dissension. It arose out of a practical difficulty which was then making itself felt among Christians, viz. that of deciding how heretics and schismatics should be reconciled to the Church. St. Cyprian, the African Church, and the Church of Asia Minor, on the one side, held that all thus seeking reconciliation ought to receive Catholic baptism; Stephen, Bishop of Rome, and the rest of the Church, maintained that the heretical or schismatical baptism, if due matter and form had been observed, was valid, that it would be sacrilegious to repeat it, and that the imposition of hands was the right means of restoring heretics and schismatics to communion.

It is important to notice that there was no dispute as to the repetition of Catholic baptism. All agreed that, if baptism had really and truly been administered, it could not be repeated; and of all the heretics the Marcionites only taught the contrary, allowing it to be repeated thrice. St. Cyprian, while contending that heretics ought to be re-baptized, makes a special exception in the case of those who had been baptized in the Catholic Church and had afterwards lapsed. The Novatians, Donatists, Eunomians, moreover, re-baptized Catholics on the same principle, maintaining that their former baptism was null and void.

The history of the dispute is not clear. Stephen at one time used the strongest language against St. Cyprian, and broke off communion with the African Church. But Dionysius of Alexandria mediated between St. Cyprian and the next Bishop of Rome, Xystus or Sixtus II., and the result seems to have been that each church retained and observed its own practice. The question was, however, finally settled by the Council of Arles [A.D. 314], the eighth canon of which enacted that "if the schismatical baptism had been administered in the name of the Trinity, converts should be admitted into the Church by imposition of hands." [Routh's Reliq. Sacr. iii. 308, 309.]

Various laws, civil and ecclesiastical, were made against re-baptism, though apparently only against the repetition of Catholic baptism. The Council of Lerida forbids the faithful to eat with those who allowed themselves to be re-baptized. Long penances and degradation from orders were inflicted by the canons of Popes Innocent and Leo. The Donatists were laid under the civil penalty of confiscation of goods, and the same punishment was inflicted upon the Eunomians, with the addition of banishment.

In later times the question has been re-opened by the Anabaptists, who re-baptize all who have been baptized in infancy; and by the Roman Church, which receives converts by baptism. In the one case, the argument used depends on the denial of infant baptism; in the other, baptism is administered conditionally, on the ground that there is room for doubt as to its due administration in the first instance. The early Church, on similar grounds, allowed several cases of re-baptism, such as [1] the case of persons who could neither produce proof, nor themselves give any account of, their baptism—these were baptized without scruple [V. Council of Carthage, can. vi., Leon. Epp. xxxvii. 92]; but the discovery that one so baptized had been baptized before deprived him of ecclesiastical promotion: and [2] that of persons who had been unduly baptized in heresy, i.e. with some other form or matter than that ordained by Christ. [BAPTISM.]

It remains only to state briefly the main arguments used by the chief contending parties on this question. For the all but universal belief that true baptism, acknowledged to be such, ought on no account to be repeated, the following were some of the methods of argument:—

1. Because in baptism we are baptized into Christ's death, and Christ died once.

2. From St. John xiii. 10, Optatus, St. Augustine, St. Ambrose.

3. From Heb. vi. 4, St. Chrysostom, Theodoret. This was strongly urged by the ancients against the Novatians.

4. From Eph. iv. 5—"One Lord, one faith, one baptism,"—St. Cyril of Jerusalem, Leo the Great.

5. Later, because there is no affirmative command to repeat it as there is in the case of the Holy Eucharist.

6. Because the rite of circumcision was never repeated.

7. From the strong analogy between baptism and the natural birth, on the ground that the heavenly birth cannot be repeated. St. Augustine, Hooker.

St. Cyprian's main arguments for the re-baptism of heretics were taken from Eph. iv. 5, "One Lord, one faith, one baptism." He held that water could not be sanctified to the washing away of sin outside the Catholic Church; and the same principle was held by the Novatians and Donatists, each of which sects regarded its own body as the one only Church, possessing and administering the one only Baptism. Stephen and the Roman Church held that heretical or schismatical baptism was of a like character with lay baptism, that it was valid, if administered with water and in the name of the Holy Trinity. This, as we have seen, was the view ultimately adopted by the Church in her councils. The doctrine and practice of the modern Roman Church on this question are thus summarized in the Tridentine Catechism: "But as, from the force and nature of this character, it has been defined by the Church, that the sacrament of baptism is on no account to be iterated, the pastor should frequently and diligently admonish the faithful on the subject, lest at any time they may be led into error. That baptism is not to be repeated, the Apostle teaches when he says, 'one Lord, one faith, one baptism' [Eph. iv. 5]. Again, when exhorting the Romans, that, dead in Christ by baptism, they take care not to lose the life which they had received from Him, saying, 'In that Christ died to sin, He died once' [Rom. vi. 10], he seems clearly to signify that Christ cannot die again, neither can we die again by baptism. Hence the Church also openly professes that she believes 'one baptism:' and that this accords with the nature of the thing, and with reason, is understood from the very idea of baptism, which is a certain spiritual regeneration. As then, by virtue of the laws of nature, we are generated and born but once, and as St. Augustine observes, 'there is no returning to the womb,' so in like manner, there is but one spiritual generation, nor is baptism ever at any time to be repeated.

"Nor let any one suppose that it is repeated by the Church, when she admits to the baptismal font one of whose previous baptism doubts are entertained, making use of this formula: 'If thou art baptized I baptize thee not again; but if thou art not yet baptized, I baptize thee in the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost,' for in such cases baptism is not to be considered as impiously repeated, but as holily, because conditionally administered" [Catech. Trident. De Bapt. ii. 55, 56].

RECOGNITIONS, CLEMENTINE. A work of didactic theology, belonging to the early part of the third century, by an anonymous writer who personates Clement of Rome. It takes its title from the events of a narrative which brings together St. Peter, Simon Magus, Zacchæus, Clement, with his father, mother, and brothers. Clement's family had been separated, and the Recognitions are their discovery of one another. St. Peter's disputations with Simon, and his instructions to the others, are the staple of the book, and its sole interest. It is a work that does not claim to be history, nor pretend to the interest of a romantic narrative. It belongs to that class of which "imaginary conversations" are the simplest and rudimentary form.

A narrative almost identical, and told often in the same words, is the connecting thread of the Clementine Homilies. Other portions of the Homilies too are worked up in the Recognitions, a list of which may be seen in Schliemann, Die Clementinen, p. 301. But the theology of the two works is quite different. There can be little doubt that the Recognitions are the later of the two, an attempt to amend the Homilies by dropping their heresy. Although the more finished work, they are the less consistent, and the inconsistency arises from emendation. Thus the doctrine of syzygies, the leading doctrine of the Homilies, appears in a modified form in the Recognitions, and evidently corrected. The doctrine requires a false prophet to appear before a true prophet, and in the Homilies our Lord is preceded by a false prophet, John Hemerobaptist: in the Recognitions the contrast to our Lord is the tempter, which is in accordance with early opinions about ANTICHRIST. The doctrine of the Recognitions then is properly approached through the Homilies. Of these Gieseler has ably summed up the teaching [Compendium, i. p. 209]: "God, a pure simple Being of light, has allowed the world to be formed in contrasts, and so also the history of the world and of men runs off in contrasts (συζυγίαι), corresponding by way of pairs, in which the lower constantly precedes the higher. From the beginning onward, God has revealed Himself to men, while His Holy Spirit (σοφία, υἱὸς θεοῦ, θεῖον πνεῦμα, πνεῦμα ἅγιον), from time to time in the form of individual men (Adam, Enoch, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, Jesus), as the true prophet (ὁ προφήτης τῆς ἀληθείας), constantly announced the very same truth, and in Jesus caused it also to be communicated to the heathen. According to the law of syzygies, false prophets also are always produced in addition to the true (γεννητοὶ γυναικῶν, Matt. xi. 11), who corrupt the truth. Thus the original doctrines of Mosaism are perfectly identical with Christianity, though they have not been preserved in their purity in the Pentateuch, which was not composed till long after Moses, and in the present form of Judaism have been utterly perverted. In general, the truth has been constantly maintained in its purity only by a few by means of secret tradition. Man is free, and must expect after death a spiritual continuation of life, with rewards and punishments. The conditions of happiness are love to God and man, and struggling against the demons, which draw away to evil through sensuality. For this purpose these sectaries prescribed abstinence from animal food, frequent fastings and washings, recommended early marriage and voluntary poverty, but rejected all sacrifice."

In this scheme, then, our Lord's divinity is denied, the doctrines of the Gospel are consequently lost, and Christianity is made a continuation of Judaism. In the Recognitions our Lord's divinity is asserted; He is the True Prophet, and the doctrines of the Gospel are nominally preserved. The continuity of principle from Judaism to Christianity is still asserted, but maintained by the doctrine that the True Prophet "Christ was ever present with the pious, though secretly, through all their generations, especially with those who waited for Him, to whom He frequently appeared" [i. 52]. So He appeared to Abraham [i. 33], to Moses [i. 34]. This action of the True Prophet is not such as the Church acknowledges, namely the Spirit of Christ speaking by the prophets as the ordinary rule, with occasional and rare manifestations of the Word of God [THEOPHANIES], but an action involving the heretical tenet of a pre-existent Messiah, the tenet that the Divine Word, antecedently to His conception in the fulness of time of the Virgin Mary, assumed humanity by uniting Himself to a pre-existent human soul. [PRE-EXISTENCE.] This tenet appears to us to be plainly stated in i. 45. St. Peter there instructs Clement thus: "When God had made the world, He appointed chiefs over the several creatures, an angel over the angels, . . . a man over men, who is Christ Jesus. But He is called Christ by a certain excellent rite of religion. Him first God anointed with oil taken from the wood of the Tree of Life: from that anointing therefore He is called Christ."

The manhood of Christ is here dated from the beginning of the world, on which account it becomes necessary to assert another and mystical anointing in place of the historical descent of the Holy Spirit on our Lord in Jordan. In place then of the line of Prophets given in the Homilies, we have the continuous action from the first of the one True Prophet, effected by antedating the assumption of humanity by the Word. This, though in another way, asserts the identity of Judaism and Christianity, and makes it possible to hold that the Jews rejecting Jesus still believed in Christ. Accordingly it is said [i. 43] that "there is no difference between Jews and Christians, except that the latter receive Jesus as the True Prophet:" and again [i. 50], "the Jews have erred concerning the first coming of the Lord, and on this point only there is disagreement between us and them."

Theoretically this doctrine saves the doctrines of the Gospel; for the tenet of a pre-existent Messiah, though heretical, denies neither the true Divinity of our Lord nor the reality of His Incarnation. But practically, when it is held in order to establish the identity of Judaism and Christianity, it cannot but render theology very defective. Judaism cannot be raised to the level of Christianity, and Christianity must needs be dragged down. This is seen in the Recognitions, which perpetually represent our Lord as the Prophet, giving a one-sided view of His office. At the same time the attempt to identify Judaism and Christianity, though it apparently exalts Judaism, yet really disgraces it. For, to account for the cessation of sacrifices, the writer is obliged to state that they were allowed only as a concession to the ingrained sin of the Jews, who had learnt sacrifices from the heathen, and that the Temple (with its ritual therefore) arose only from regal ambition [i. 36, 38].

With the exceptions and defects arising from these causes, the Recognitions may be called orthodox. Still, they were felt in later times to be unsatisfactory, as will be seen by comparing with them the more precise statements of the Epitome.

The desire to identify Judaism and Christianity could not but cause a strong antagonism to St. Paul. In the Homilies this antagonism is more strongly exhibited than in the Recognitions, though in the latter there is the same anti-Pauline framework of narrative as in the former. The writer intending to set forth a book of Catholic instruction, an ideal of the Christian Church, has chosen a point of time at which he can represent St. James as primate of Christendom, Barnabas a missionary from St. James, Clement a disciple of St. Peter. From the same point of time he can tell of Saul the persecutor, and ignore St. Paul the Apostle, yet denouncing, as by anticipation, St. Paul's mission and authority. From the same point of time he can represent his ideal, St. Peter, living as a Hebrew of the Hebrews. A Catholic Christian of the third century would hardly have chosen for his ideal the Church as it was before St. Paul's conversion. The writer of the Recognitions dares to put into St. Peter's mouth the statements, that after all the Apostles in turn had in full discussion declared the truth in Christ, an enemy excited the people to murder, and snatching a brand from the altar, attacked St. James; that this enemy obtained a commission from Caiaphas to go to Damascus, because he believed that Peter had fled thither [i. 70, 71]. St. Peter [iv. 35] gives a strict caution that no teacher is to be received without a testimonial from St. James [compare 2 Cor. iii. 1], and a warning that no Apostle is to be looked for besides the twelve. He names [ii. 33] the mission of the twelve, and proceeds, "If I should speak anything different from what He who has sent me enjoined me, I should be a false Apostle, not saying what I am commanded to say, but what seems good to myself. Whoever does this . . . is without doubt a traitor."

And further, in the doctrine of syzygies (as modified in the Recognitions) we are led to a condemnation of St. Paul in a way which can hardly be mistaken. "God has appointed for the world certain pairs; and he who comes first of the pairs is of evil, he who comes second of good" [iii. 59]. A man is not to be led away by the signs which the former exhibits. Then [ch. 61] ten pairs are enumerated, "Cain and Abel, &c., the tempter and the Son of Man, Simon and Peter, all nations, and he who shall be sent to sow the Word among the nations." The clumsy correction of the tempter for a false prophet has been noticed; no less clumsy is the substitution of all nations for a false prophet. And it may be fairly asked whether the passage was not retained in order that the reader might supply for himself the only possible contrast, "he who pretends to sow the Word among all nations."

A notice of the Recognitions, however short, would have given a false impression, unless this anti-Pauline character was named.

The Recognitions, then, we may conclude to be an attempt by a writer of the more orthodox section of the anti-Pauline school to amend the heretical Clementine Homilies: an attempt, successful so far as his Judaism permitted, that Judaism rejecting St. Paul, calumniating St. Peter, and erring by defect in the representation of our Blessed Lord.

We reserve to the Dictionary of Sects and Heresies the questions of the sects and heresies with which these pseudo-Clementines are connected, of the other names by which they were known, or of the other works used in the compilation of the Recognitions. [See SIMONIANS, EBIONITES, ELCHESAITES in that Dictionary.]

RECONCILIATION. When it is said that God is reconciled to man, it never can be meant that any change can take place in Him who is eternally one and the same. His attributes are not separable one from the other, but they are blended together in one Supreme Perfection. "His whole nature is as one great impulse to what is best" [Magee on the Atonement, i. 28]; and it is without variation or self-contradiction. Man is the variable element. When Adam was first made he was thoroughly acceptable to God; God pronounced His creation to be very good. But sin came into the world, and death by sin, and all was altered. Man was no longer acceptable to God, though the Divine Creator remained unaltered. It then became necessary that the quality of acceptableness should once more be restored to him by renewal of the likeness in which he was originally created, or he must remain for ever an outcast from all spiritual communion with the Unchangeable. It is this superinducing of the Divine likeness over the Cain-like brand of sin, this smoothing of the substance of the lake that it might once more reflect the pure face of heaven, that constitutes man's reconciliation with God. In a human and anthropopathic sense, indeed, the Divine Being may be said to be reconciled, to have his wrath appeased, and so to be changed in his regard to man, but this can only be the language of accommodation. As men, we understand what reconciliation is after some period of offence, and not knowing in our blindness how to speak of God as He is, we apply the same kind of language to Him, when we speak of His being reconciled to us and changed from a state of wrath to a condition of loving regard. "Caphar," literally to overlay, is the word that usually represents Atonement, with which "reconciliation" is closely connected in idea. The same word καταλλαγὴ expresses both. [Rom. v. 11.] In the work of reconciliation that which is overlaid is sin; that which overlays it is the blood of Christ [ATONEMENT], which is the very life, and was typified by the blood of bulls and goats that overlaid the covering of the mercy-seat or ἱλαστήριον, and whatever else required to be sanctified with the blood of the atonement. Without blood there was no remission of sin, which symbolized at the same time the Lamb of God slain from the foundation of the world; and the holy life of Christ, which by overlaying with its purity the heart of faith, reconciles it to God by cancelling its antagonism.

Bearing these Hebrew and sacrificial analogies in mind, we may next investigate the "usus loquendi" of the New Testament writers in speaking of man's reconciliation with God. Διαλλάσσων, though it occurs only once in the New Testament, is a crucial word, as shewing the sense in which Scripture intends that its terms should be understood when speaking of the sinner being reconciled to God, and not vice versa God reconciled to the sinner. The verb is used in the LXX., ἐν τίνι διαλλαγήσεται τῷ κυρίῳ αὐτοῦ [1 Sam. xxix. 10], "How shall he ingratiate himself?" make himself acceptable after a state of antagonism—the reciprocal or Hithpahel form being used, יתרצה. So in the New Testament, "If thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother HATH AUGHT AGAINST THEE, leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way, first BE RECONCILED [διαλλάγηθι] to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift" [Matt. v. 23, 24]. The offender is here said to be reconciled. Confession of sin has wrought a thorough change, and the transgressor who before was hardened and impracticable, has by the return of a better spirit become gracious and loving, and the antagonism of the offended party, which is the cardinal point, is resolved in love. At-oned antagonism, therefore, total and absolute, is the idea involved. The effects of separation from God's holiness, humanly speaking, can only be expressed as a state of wrath, the judicial visitation of God's displeasure upon sin—for the effect in both cases is the same; exclusion from the Divine Presence of sin and evil, which cannot possibly exist before Him Whose eyes are too pure to behold iniquity, is as the necessary consequence of the universal law of truth, and is just as exterminating in its action as a judicial visitation of burning wrath would be. We anthropomorphize in our theology when we speak of the eye or the feet or the right arm of the Deity, for God is Spirit; so also we speak of the Deity in a human way when we ascribe to him mutation from a state of favourable regard to the opposite condition of wrath, or vice versa. The punishment of sin and disobedience is as certain when it overtakes the sinner by the action of a general law, as it would be when inflicted by a judicial visitation of wrath. But the eternal law, that without holiness no man shall see the Lord, is constant and equable in its action; and exclusion from the Divine Presence, from whatever cause, is as the blackness of darkness and as the bitterness of despair that is eternal, in the true biblical sense of that term. The just retribution upon sin is certain, whether we trace it back to the Divine wrath or to the inevitable action of Divine law.

Sin, in this point of view, receives its penal award by necessary consequence, and the antagonism of man's corrupt will with the will of God is that which has to be reconciled. The word so generally used by St. Paul καταλάσσειν, and its derivatives, completely expresses this bringing over to the same side of that which was before opposed and contrary; ἀλλάσσειν is simply to change, καταλλάσσειν is to change with respect to some one or something else; it has a reciprocal sense, as in the exchange of money where silver and gold may be supposed to change hands. The word also has a conversive power; thus the "casting away" of the Jews "is the reconciling of the world," whereby the ancient antagonism is resolved, and they "who were not the people" of God have by conversion become His people. At some time God's ancient people will be His once more by conversion to the faith of the Cross, when Christ shall have brought all to God, and God shall be all in all; then cometh the end, and the receiving of them shall be as life from the dead [Rom. xi. 13]. This reconciliation, however, is not owing to any moral or spiritual change in those who receive it. "While we were yet sinners Christ died for the ungodly" [Rom. v. 6, 8]. The perfect obedience of Christ, His holy life and death, in complete accordance with God's will as a power, is more than co-extensive with Adam's disobedience; the one made us all personally sinners in direct antagonism with the holiness of God, the other makes us personally righteous, in a relative sense indeed, though by union with Christ there is no longer that hopeless inability to live according to the will of God, which is the eternal law of holiness, justice, and truth. The whole matter is briefly set forth in a single verse, where the Apostle says [Rom. v. 10], "For if when we were enemies we were reconciled (κατηλλάγημεν) to God by the death of His Son, much more being reconciled (καταλλαγέντες) we shall be saved by His life." We were enemies and in a state of antagonism, but God Himself found the means of resolving it, by the holy obedience of His Son through life and to the death of the Cross; and being in Christ made acceptable, "we shall be saved by His life:" by the inward spirit of the life-blood that He shed for us, whereby He now lives in the glory of the Father, and whereby He communicates Himself to each believing soul through the Spirit. [See also Eph. ii. 13-18.] It is thus that by Christ we have received "reconciliation" [Rom. v. 11], or "at-one-ment," καταλλαγήν; and reconciliation is seen to be synonymous with justification by a comparison of ver. 10 with 9, πολλῷ μᾶλλον καταλλαγέντες in the one case being the echo of πολλῷ μᾶλλον δικαιωθέντες in the other.

The antagonism, then, between the perfect holiness of God and the sinfulness of man has been harmonized. The human element of weakness has been "overlaid" by the righteousness of God in Christ. Union with Christ through faith is thenceforth no mere speculative notion, it is a substantial reality. The believer is spiritually one with his Lord, as he is one with Adam in the nature of his being; bone of his bone and flesh of his flesh; and there is no longer any condemnation for them that are in Christ Jesus by a living and daily working faith. "If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature;" but in this new creation, as in the first formation of nature, "all things are of God, Who hath reconciled us to Himself by Christ Jesus;" "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them;" the καταλλαγὴ or exchange of relation is complete, "for He hath made Him to be sin for us who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him" [2 Cor. v. 17-21]. By this marvellous scheme, which "angels desire to look into" [1 Pet. i. 12], God "is both just and the justifier of him who is of the faith of Jesus" [Rom. iii. 26].

And by the blood of reconciliation, Christ is the "end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth in Him" [Rom. x. 5], i.e. the fulfilment of every significant type of the law; He is the victim whose blood alone can purge away sin, and the sacrificant priest, entering into the Holy of Holies with the blood of expiation. "By His own blood He entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us" [Heb. ix. 12]. That blood applied to the soul is the very life [ATONEMENT. BLOOD]; the very principle of reconciliation overlaying the foulness of sin, and "purging the conscience from dead works to serve the living God" [Heb. ix. 14]. Thus, as He is the Truth and the Life, so also He is the "living way" which He hath consecrated for us, whereby we have "boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus."

Lastly, this reconciliation affects not only every individual believing soul, but the whole of creation in some hidden mysterious way, of which for the present we know but little; we seeing but through a glass darkly.

By reason of man's apostasy from God, a curse glanced aslope from him upon the earth from which he was taken, "cursed be the ground for thy sake;" and the whole creation groaned and travailed in pain together until the day of Christ [Rom. viii. 19, 22]; but now since the "manifestation of the sons of God," the sentence has in part been reversed; and as evil traversed the whole face of creation at the Fall, so the creature partakes in the universal reconciliation brought about by Christ. The brute creation has a more merciful Master. The earth which before was nigh unto cursing [Heb. vi. 8], is now the Lord's and the fulness thereof; for her Lord is the Word made Flesh. This reconciliation of the lower creation was typified in the Law, like every other part of redemption. The Sabbath was a day of rest not only to man but to his beast; and the Sabbatical rest of the tilth in the seventh year foreshadowed the day of earth's redemption from the curse of Adam. Thus it is said of the Temple, "The place itself that was partaker with them of the adversity that did happen to the nation, did afterward communicate in the benefits sent from the Lord" [2 Macc. v. 20]. In this point of view the Christian scheme is a state of transition to that "dispensation of the fulness of time," when all things shall be gathered "together in one in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are in earth" [Eph. i. 10]; where the term "gather together in one in Christ" is shewn to be synonymous with "reconcile" by the parallel text [Col. i. 20], "and having made peace by the blood of the Cross, by Him to reconcile all things unto Himself by Him; whether they be things in earth or things in heaven;" and thus "God was in Christ reconciling the world (κόσμον) to Himself" [2 Cor. v. 19]. REDEMPTION. [Ἀπολύτρωσις.] The ransom of sinners from the consequences of sin by the humiliation, sufferings, and death of Christ, Who is hence called our Redeemer.[1]

[1.] The idea of "redemption" is, therefore, that of buying back again from a condition of slavery. That condition has come upon mankind universally by original sin, and is perpetuated by actual sin. For both original and actual sin entail ties of obedience to the tempter: "Know ye not, that to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are to whom ye obey, whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness?" [Rom. vi. 16.] It is from such a bondage that Christ has redeemed, and is redeeming, sinners, REGENERATION from original sin and pardon of actual sin being each accorded on account of the Ransom which He has paid.

[2.] Hence the idea of redemption contains also that of claim to the service of the redeemed on the part of their Redeemer. "Being then made free from sin, ye became the servants of righteousness" [Rom. vi. 18]. "He that is called, being free, is the servant of Christ. Ye are bought with a price, be not ye the servants of men" [1 Cor. vii. 22]. The Redeemer has not only redeemed us to freedom by His Ransom, but has also bought us for His own service, that bondage which is "perfect freedom." [ATONEMENT. SATISFACTION.]

REGALE. I. In French canon law the right which the kings of France had to enjoy the revenues of all bishopries during their vacancy, and also to present to their prebends and all other their dignities without cure of souls. Such presentations might be made whether the dignity were vacant both de jure and de facto as by death; or only either de jure, as if the incumbent were convicted of a crime, or had accepted another dignity, or de facto, as if the Regale should open after the presentation of an incumbent, but before he had taken possession. The Regale lasted till a new admission to the bishopric was fully completed by the taking the oath of allegiance; when a mandate was issued by the Chambre des Comptes to the Commissary of the Regale to restore the revenues.

This right had one or two singular privileges: it opened not only on a vacancy, but also when a bishop was made a cardinal, and lasted till he repeated the oath of allegiance: it lasted thirty years as regarded patronage, so that if the king should leave a dignity vacant and the new bishop fill it up, the king might appoint a fresh incumbent at any time within this date: it was absolutely in the king's discretion, and subject to no other constitutions whatever.

The Regale was at different times deprived of much of its original extent: certain bishopries as those of Languedoc, Provence, and Dauphiné claimed entire exemption; and though a decision of Parliament pronounced at one time that the right extended over the whole kingdom, this was afterwards quashed, and the question remained undecided. Abbeys which were formerly subject to the Regale were discharged, and an attempt to replace them under it quite failed. Finally, all right to the revenues was resigned by Louis XIII. and that of patronage only retained. [Commentaire de M. Dupuy, sur le Traité des libertes de M. Pithou, i. p. 146.]

II. In general history, Regale is the power of the sovereign in Church matters. In countries within the obedience of Rome this power is usually defined in a Concordat between the sovereign and the Pope [see CONCORDAT]: in independent churches the Regale becomes the Royal Supremacy. [SUPREMACY, ROYAL.]

REGENERATION [παλιγγενεσία]. The spiritual new-begetting by which the original sin inherited through natural conception [Psa. li. 5; 2 Pet. i. 4] is counteracted.

The only occasion on which this word was used by our Lord was when He told His Apostles "That ye which have followed Me in the regeneration [ἐν τῇ παλιγγενεσίᾳ], when the Son of Man shall sit in the throne of His glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel" [Matt. xix. 28]. Elsewhere it is used by St. Paul, who writes that "according to His mercy He saved us by the washing of regeneration [διὰ λουτροῦ παλιγγενεσίας] and renewing of the Holy Ghost" [Tit. iii. 5]. Its equivalent is twice used by St. Peter, first when he says God the Father, "according to His abundant mercy hath begotten us again [ἀναγεννήσας] unto a living hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead" [1 Pet. i. 3]; and secondly, when he exhorts Christians to love one another, because they have purified their souls, "Being begotten again [ἀναγεγεννημένοι] not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the Word of God, Which liveth and abideth for ever" [1 Pet. i. 23]. The idea of a spiritual begetting, without mention of it as a second begetting, is found in John i. 13, iii. 3 (where, however, the ἄνωθεν has the same force, "again"), 1 John iii. 9, iv. 7, v. 1, 4, 18; 1 Cor. iv. 15, and Phil. 10. Wherever the term is used, except in the first case quoted, it is perfectly consistent with the idea that the spiritual new-begetting is contemporaneous with the Christianization of the person or persons referred to: in Titus iii. 5, it is distinctly associated with the use of water and the work of the Holy Ghost: and in John iii. 5, our Lord says, with equal clearness, "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, except one be begotten from above (ἐὰν μή τις γεννηθῇ ἄνωθεν) . . . except one be begotten of water and of the Spirit (ἐὰν μή τις γεννηθῇ ἐξ ὕδατος καὶ πνεύματος) . . . he cannot see . . . he cannot enter into the kingdom of God."

The sense of most of these passages has been somewhat obscured in the English Version of the New Testament by substituting the idea of being born for that of being begotten, but it is clear that they all refer to the act by which God establishes between Himself and men a new relation of spiritual paternity. It is equally clear that the establishment of this new relation of paternity is associated by our Blessed Lord and by St. Paul with the act of Baptism.

It is shewn by Bishop Bethell that although in a few rare cases the term Regeneration was used in ancient days for the idea of a transition from a state of sin to a state of holiness in the case of a person who had fallen into sin after Baptism, yet the general and only usual sense of the word is that of such a transition in and by the act of Baptism. "In those few passages of the ancient Christian writers where it bears another signification, it is used apparently in a figurative manner, to express such a change as seemed to bear some analogy in magnitude and importance to the change effected in Baptism." [Bethell on Regeneration, p. 7, fifth ed.]

In the Prayer Book the words "new-birth," "regeneration," "born again," and "born anew" are invariably used with reference to what is popularly known as "Baptismal regeneration."

The loose sense in which the English equivalent of the scriptural word παλιγγενεσία has been used, as if it were equivalent to that conviction of sin and sense of pardon which has been named conversion, is entirely unauthorized by Holy Scripture, and is barely justifiable by a few exceptional cases in the elder literature of Christianity. It is, practically, a new application of the word invented by Calvin, who maintained that only elect Christians are regenerated [CALVINISM. ELECTION], and adopted by that school of English divines which exalted the value of conversion at the expense of the Sacrament instituted by Christ. [BAPTISM.]

RELIGION, NATURAL. The term "Natural Religion" has become less prominent in recent theological controversy than it was in the last century, chiefly from two causes: first, because it has been felt that the extent of meaning which the term was then made to bear was arbitrary and inaccurate; and further, because among the advocates of Christianity there has been less perfect agreement as to the value of a system of natural religion, or even as to the possibility of its existence.

The definition of natural religion is simple enough—the sum of knowledge of things superhuman which is discoverable to the human mind by its ordinary faculties, and the ordinary methods of scientific investigation. The natural way to inquire how much knowledge is thus discoverable would be by an appeal to history—how much has, without supernatural assistance, been discovered by man. But the eighteenth century theologians, both orthodox and infidel, in general preferred an analytical method: deducting from the popular religion as much as is confessed to be derived from a real or pretended revelation, the residuum represents the body of doctrine of natural religion. The doctrines, for instance, of the Holy Trinity and the Resurrection are peculiar to Christianity, and, true or false, are confessedly derived from its founders: the existence, perhaps the unity, of God, and the immortality of the human soul, had been believed before the proclamation of Christianity, and (what had more influence on the nomenclature) were then believed by some who rejected it; and therefore, it was assumed, these truths were discoverable and demonstrable by the unassisted reason. The assumption, arbitrary as it was, passed muster because of the general popularity of this half dogmatic scheme. The profounder scepticism of Hume was an inconsiderable power, in comparison with an often shallow deism: and it is the latter against which the great Christian apologists directed their works. Butler's Analogy starts avowedly from the assumption of the existence of a God, as something unquestioned and unquestionable: and though this is far from reducing his work to a mere argument ex concesso, yet it deprives it of what we consider essential to the completeness of a system of natural religion, a statement of the proof of this its fundamental doctrine.

In one passage of the introduction, however, Butler has given, in an allusive way, his reasons for thinking this doctrine not only true, but clear beyond the need of demonstration. "It has," he says, "been often proved with accumulated evidence; from this argument of analogy and final causes; from abstract reasonings; from the most ancient tradition and testimony; and from the general consent of mankind." These arguments would, in the present state of men's minds, be hardly admitted as conclusive, or at least as unquestionably so: yet their past reputation deserves at least that their cogency should be examined in some detail.

The first of Butler's arguments is, unfortunately, rather obscurely worded. From the coupling of "analogy" and "final causes" one may suppose he means the analogy between the phenomena of the world and those which are the result of (human) design: the adaptation of means to ends, in nature as in art, the argument, in short, of Paley's often-quoted watch. We see some things existing, and discharging certain functions, and we know that men made them: we see other things existing and discharging functions, which it is beyond the power of men to make; we infer that they have a superhuman maker, to whose design they owe the success of their various functions.

This is a sort of analogy, but not one of the most convincing kind; its effect goes little further than to establish what Butler has said just before, "there is no presumption against this prior to the proof of it." Design is one way, and the most familiar, in which means producing ends, i.e. causes and effects tending to perpetuate themselves and each other, are found in our experience: natural selection is another. It is a question, and by no means an easy one, which accounts more perfectly for a larger number of the phenomena of nature.

"From abstract reasonings" hardly any recent school in metaphysics would allow us to derive much certainty. Looking from without on the tendency of the dominant metaphysical schools, one would rather pronounce that the drift of abstract reasonings was towards either scepticism or pantheism than towards theism. Such arguments as are founded on the necessary conceptions of the mind are either incompetent to prove anything—psychological facts, not theological premisses; or, if they do give any information as to real existence, at any rate the mind that testifies by its own properties to the existence of Infinite can hardly do so, except by sharing its essence. If, indeed, we do assume a Creator of the human intellect, and assume further that its faculties are as He made them, it may be probable that they will convey true information as to His own nature; but thus theism is a postulate of rational dogmatism, not a deduction from it.

"The most ancient tradition and testimony" could hardly be adduced in the present day as confidently as it is by Butler. We have no uncontroverted direct evidence as to what was the earliest religion, and indirect or à priori evidence can hardly be thought to point to any very profound or exalted theism. Hardly any one would admit the historical character of the Book of Genesis on purely critical evidence; any one who accepts it, does so as an integral part of the revelation to which it belongs, which he considers sufficiently attested as a whole; and that the attestations of the oldest part should be least apparent is, he will think, no more than natural. The historical evidences of a religion are all-important, but to talk of its pre-historic evidence is self-contradictory. And, if the Hebrew history of the origin of religion be, critically speaking, unproved, it can hardly be thought unfair to assume that every other such history known to exist is improbable.

Still, "the general consent of mankind" is a thing that, if real, needs accounting for. Grant that mere ancient tradition is worthless; still, if all or nearly all ancient traditions, though independent, agree in one point, their converging testimony is important. But in what sense is it true, that all branches of the human race have, in their original condition, acknowledged a God? Not in the sense in which it is desired to prove that a God exists; to say that all nations have acknowledged an almighty, eternal, omnipresent Creator and Governor of the world would be manifestly absurd. And if this cannot be maintained, the fact that all or nearly all nations have acknowledged some personal power or powers superior to man becomes much less significant. There are many witnesses, but they do not testify to the same facts. The universal existence of theism could hardly be accounted for, except by supposing that the common ancestors of mankind had, at one time, a direct perception of God; but the universal existence of some form of either theism, polytheism, or fetichism can hardly be thought to prove more than a tendency in the human mind. How far this tendency does lead to belief in a God, and how far it is trustworthy, are the two problems on which the existence of a system of natural religion depends.

Setting aside any records of possible authenticity of a primitive revelation, the earliest natural religion which we find in history is Sabaism, which may be called the highest form of fetichism. Using the term in a wide sense, it may be said to have been the earliest religion of both the Aryan and Semitic races; both worship the heavens and the earth, the sun, moon, and stars, the fire and waters, and other powers of nature; while the worship of each varies so much, in its ceremonies and temper, and in the choice of special objects of devotion, that it is plain that the two are practically independent, and so are spontaneous developments of the human mind, not the invention of one school or family.

Nor is it impossible to determine à priori the process by which fetichism is developed. If we admit, as most psychologists tell us, that our notions of both substance and causation are derived from the consciousness of our own personality and volitions; that these are the only cases in which we know certainly that there is any real substratum, distinct from successive or contemporary phenomena, any real origination distinct from invariable sequence;—it is easy to see how, when people first observed things appearing to exist, and events following one another, they supposed the being to have consciousness, and the cause to will its effect, because it was so with the only beings and causes of which they had direct consciousness. Now this is exactly the spirit of fetichism, to regard every important thing as a person, i.e. a conscious subject capable of volition. The difference between it and theism, or even polytheism, is well illustrated by the instance of the watch; a savage, when he sees a watch, thinks it is alive; he is not led to infer an intelligent watchmaker.

The fact of worship of the fetich, in addition to its personification, is not harder to account for. It depends on the two allied causes of terror and wonder. A lion is fetich to a negro: why? because the lion can eat him. If he wears a necklace of lion's teeth, perhaps he will get some of the lion's strength, and the other lions will be afraid to meddle with one who shares their nature. If he has occasion to kill a lion, he will do it respectfully, and speak well of the dead; then perhaps the dead lion's cubs will not feel bound to take vengeance, as if a negro were murdered, the dead man's sons would.

And again, the lion does not talk to me. I understand the ways of my fellow savages, but not his: I quarrel with them on definite grounds; I sometimes win and sometimes lose. But between me and him is an ἄσπονδος καὶ ἀκήρυκτος πόλεμος, no one knows why, nor from how long a date. Then my fellow-savages are no better than myself, but the lion is so in some undeniable respects; he is comely in going, strongest among beasts, and turneth not away from any. So the lion is fetich—a mighty, terrible, mysterious, admirable power.

As means of self-defence are improved, and minds grow more refined, the second motive of worship will have more extensive influence than the first, awe than fear. To this stage belongs elemental worship, already called the highest type of fetichism, and the one from which, historically, polytheism has, for the most part, been derived. The transition from one to the other is not very definite; even older or coarser fetiches, as Soma and perhaps Iacchus, co-exist with the thoroughly humanized, or at least personified, gods of the Greek and Hindu pantheon. And idolatry may be regarded as a sort of compromise between the two; the idol is an object which the vulgar can reverence as fetich, the wise contemplate as a symbol of the spirit whose works declare him. The Magian fire-worship is a more refined means to the same end; light is at once a work and a symbol of the good God, perhaps a sacrament of his presence.

But though polytheism be not always separate from fetichism in fact, one can trace the distinction in idea. The Spartans who propitiated the earthquake were pro tanto fetich-worshippers. Herodotus himself, who thought that Poseidon caused earthquakes, was a polytheist; he, or the stage of thought he represents, had made the effort of abstraction that separates persons from things.

This separation of the material work from the spiritual agent, has the immediate effect of exalting men's ideas of the latter. How wise is the man who works skilfully in metals at the fire! then how much wiser must he be, who brought from heaven the fire of which he makes use! How beautiful is my beloved! how much more beautiful must be the moon or morning goddess, how happy and glorious the sun-god, her one worthy lover!

And thus it is natural for men to look upon the gods as in every way better than themselves. Hitherto they have been revered only or chiefly as more powerful; it was bad policy to offend them, but it was not necessarily a sin or an injustice. Menelaus reviles Zeus for a supposed wrong, in the same terms as he does Antiochus, and no one seemed shocked; nay, no harm comes of it. But when once it is known that the gods are wiser and better than we, they have a claim, and offer a motive, for childlike trust in their goodness, even if we receive evil from their hand.

Moreover, whatever be the origin of man's moral sentiments, they have by this time a tendency to associate themselves with his religious belief. They have become vigorous and prominent, and are becoming increasingly pure. In this, the best and highest part (as we now feel it to be) of our nature, the gods must doubtless excel us, and by how much? Surely "not by measure" at all: we must attribute to them nothing short of perfect righteousness. Such is the practical theology of Plato, leaving the obscure question, whether polytheism, monotheism, or something between this and pantheism, be the less unfair designation of his speculative opinions. And it is the want of a higher moral standard, not of the belief that the gods must conform to the highest, that prevented the same point being reached earlier.

But when we have got to morally perfect gods, what need is there of the complication we find among them? We have doubtless by this time rejected the popular mythology; its lives and filiations of the gods are carnal, often immoral. Their names and numbers may have a mystical truth, or may be such as we ought to accept as "regulative representations" of the real divine nature; but we have no evidence that they are more, no positive proof that they are so much. So with their outward forms. It is our mission in life to keep under the body, to rejoice when we are freed from it; it becomes the gods to be wholly incorporeal. And why need we a separate god for every element? The elements have ceased to be the objects of our worship, why should they be the chief object of the gods' care? We think more of Zeus being father of gods and men than of his gathering the thunder-clouds; if he can fill that great office, why cannot he do all the lesser works—of God, we begin now to call them, not works of the lesser gods? Thus the philosophical desire of simplification, the principle of parsimony in hypothesis, comes in to aid the new-born devotional feeling. In place of vague feelings of reverence for something above us, for those whose names we have been taught to speak below our breath, we have one Almighty Father, out of Whose very nature proceeds the obligation to love and fear Him, because of His works for us and around us which we see, and to trust in Him that the works of His which we do not see are good like the rest.

Meanwhile, if the doctrine of the being of God has been growing, that of the immortality of the soul has been developing. Unlike the other, it may be said that this is a primitive and universal belief of mankind. At first, no doubt, the view taken is materialistic enough; "the spirit does but mean the breath," but it is conceived to continue to exist after the man has ceased to breathe. And in proportion as men learn that the physical notion is false, they advance in capacity for a more spiritual notion, which silently substitutes itself for the other. The Homeric notion of death is for a man's soul to go to Hades, while he is eaten by dogs; it is a less change from this to the view that he goes to the other world, while his body is eaten of worms, than from fetich-worship to monotheism. Perhaps Homer's belief, such as it is, in the immortality of the soul, rests only on the difficulty of imagining absolute annihilation, but this difficulty is one which the progress of science rather increases than diminishes, and the progress of refinement of thought makes the doubt of the opinion unwelcome. Moreover, the growing theistic doctrine both gives and receives strength from this. The just government of man by God becomes more credible, if we believe that men still live under God's government, when they have ceased to live under our sight. And our own moral aspirations, our own infinite hopes, cease to be meaningless if, and only if, there be a just God, who, in the unseen world, supplies them with an adequate object.

The above is an attempt to examine how, as a matter of fact, the two central doctrines of natural religion have originated and obtained belief; whether the reasoning on which they rest be logically convincing is a further question. Religion is primarily a matter of practice, and it is sufficient for a religious system that it supplies motives enough to secure practical adherence, whether it be open to speculative objections or not.

RELIGION, REVEALED. If the foregoing account of the origin of the belief in a God, in the highest sense of the term, and of the practical acceptance of religion and its obligations, be admitted as accurate, the question arises, Why has a pure theism never been a popular or practically influential system, if it be derivable from the common characteristics of the human mind? The intellectual necessity of a revelation depends on the uncertainty or inadequacy of the knowledge attainable without it, and therefore it is appropriate, in approaching the question of an alleged revelation, to examine the weakness as well as the strength of natural religion.

And for this it is not necessary that we should point out positive errors or fallacies in the process by which its doctrines have been established. It may be that such exist: it may be that the arguments, though not absolutely convincing, are sufficient to establish a reasonable probability and practical conviction. But even if intellectually sufficient, we must take account of motives for belief, as well as reasons for it: and as motives, we shall find these grounds less adequate than they deserve to be.

For by this time we have reached a stern and definite moral standard and moral law, have formed a judgment on the questions, By whom is it imposed, and how is it to be enforced? But this law men fall short of: the best and wisest, since their comprehension of the law is the strictest, are most sensible of all men, that all, and that they themselves, cannot but fall short of it. Nay, all but the best and wisest rebel against the law, almost on principle: it is possible to honour the law, but it is possible also to honour transgression. Even short of this deliberate rebellion, it is a source of weakness and uncertainty to feel the will in conflict with the law. One of the two must be right: which? If we are right and the law wrong, we are flung back on atheism, with or without a shocking picture of an almighty tyrant, whose will can neither be performed nor resisted. But most men shrink from this pitch of self-assertion—though Aristippus did not, going, at least, to the extent of denying the existence of the law. But if the law exist, and is in the right, what is to become of us who break it? Some practical hope and comfort, no doubt, may be found in the notion of ἐπιεικεία, the trust that God will not be extreme to mark what is done amiss, but will remember whereof we are made. This may be enough to encourage a man of settled virtue; but not to attract a man who gives at least half his will to rebellion. Mildness in the Judge may make Him excuse one or two slight negligences in a course of obedience, or partial failures in a steady and generally successful struggle: but it gives no hope to any one whose will is undecided; no assurance, at least, that an effort at obedience will be accepted, if sincere, though unsuccessful.

And moreover, this trust or hypothesis, even if successful as a practical motive, is clearly untenable as a logical one. Equity only comes in when law is imperfect. How can this compromise with evil, this tolerance of the breach of His laws, be worthy of Him Who hath done all things well, Who made everything very good, and gave all things a law which shall not be broken?

At this point then arises the question, is there a possibility of atonement for wilful sin? Not that the question is a new one, except in being thus distinctly stated. Most if not all traditional religions furnished some ceremonial atonement, which "sanctified to the purifying of the flesh" from some kind of pollution; and in this conception of pollution there was generally a moral idea involved. But the moral idea was obscure: a man who had, e.g., slain another, especially a near kinsman, was an object of horror rather than of disapprobation. His neighbours would not endure to let him mix among them as before; even if the slaughter was just or accidental, this might diminish the guilt of his act, but not the horror.

This confusion of thought in the earliest notions of atonement, makes it less likely than it might otherwise be, that they are derived in all cases from a primitive revelation. If the first notion of sin be one not in all cases coinciding with guilt, it becomes natural, as the moral feelings rise in purity, to look for a means whereby the guiltless may evade the consequences of their sins. Apollo and Athena rightly forgive Orestes: therefore it is just, though it is still necessary that they should buy off the Eumenides. As the conception of the Divine law improves, and it is seen to coincide with absolute justice, the ceremonial purification is assumed, more or less avowedly, to be a Divine ordinance provided for the good only: vengeance on the sinner, and exemption from it for the unfortunate who have fallen into a state that looks like sin, are thus combined in an equitable though rather complicated system. If the complication be not noticed as an objection, the tendency to monotheism may be strengthened: Apollo the redeemer, and the Eumenides the ministers of vengeance, are alike employed by Zeus, the just arbiter of both mercy and wrath. But if à priori reasoning be carried to its natural limit, the tendency is either to dualism, or to the modified dualism that, in later times, appears in Calvinism and kindred systems. Either the powers of vengeance are absolutely evil, and God delivers men out of their hand if he can; or the powers of vengeance are really divine, and man, if he is to be delivered, must be delivered out of the hand of God. In either case, the conception of deity suffers: either God is not almighty, or, even though we may call Him All-good, there is something which we desire as good, and believe most firmly to be good, which He does not supply but opposes.

Thus, with a system of pure theism, supposing that this has been reached by any process, the conception of atonement becomes untenable. It postulates a practical polytheism: it is, moreover, (assuming that the pure religion has been naturally developed from a traditional one) associated with avowed polytheism. We could believe, strange as it might be, that it would cleanse the conscience to wash the body in water or in blood, if we had reason to think that our ancestors were commanded to do so, as a condition of forgiveness by the true God: but if all their purifications were performed in the name of false gods, what likelihood is there that they will be effectual? what chance is there, that their principle embodies a genuine revelation, when all their details are interwoven with a spurious or diabolical one?

If then sin is unavoidable, what possible way remains to cure it? In contrition, confession, and amendment there is a natural fitness: any satisfaction for sin must include these, but they do not constitute satisfaction. Plato's last word to the sinner is, in substance, "Seek an atonement if one may be found: if not, despair and die." [Plato, Laws, ix. p. 854, c.]

It is thus that natural religion begins to be weak as soon as it has begun to be pure. When the human soul has begun to be a law to itself, the law written in the heart asserts its character as a law: it is holy and just and good, it is spiritual while the man is carnal. With the traditional morality of Paganism, it was possible for a man to be self-satisfied: its standard was the usual level of human virtue, a standard above the average, perhaps, since men oftener sink below their normal state than rise above it, but one which all or most could feel to be within their reach. But theism, and the high moral feelings that are its cause and effect, destroy this harmony. The immortal God says "Thou shalt," and the immortal man answers either "I cannot" or "I will not." In the former case, he is thrown back on the question, "Why cannot I, if God made me to do His will? Either He made me not, or He made me in vain: He has failed of His purpose, He is not almighty, i.e. He is not God." In the latter, the step to denying God is simpler still: "I will not, and Thou canst not compel my will." In either case, theism as a religion gives way. It must either be changed into dualism, or refined away into what is, at best, a hypothetical philosophy. The theist has believed "There is a God, Who is my Lord:" he is now forced to choose between the two doctrines, "There is a God Who has power over me: His enemies have power over me too," and "There is or may be a God: but His will is a law to me, not in the political sense but in the physical: what is done is thereby known to be decreed, if there is, after all, any one who decrees it." Or lastly, he may deny a God altogther; which is perhaps not the least rational course. For the grounds by which the belief was historically reached are not, to the mature intellect, convincing in themselves. The belief only survives, because the hypothesis, however suggested, has hitherto seemed to be verified, by its suiting and accounting for the facts of human nature. This it now apparently fails to do: we are led to a choice between two hypotheses, two practically, for the difference between the dogmatic denial and the practical omission of a God may be disregarded. Either we adopt dualism, or pantheism (of which positivism is only another form), not dogmatically perhaps, but tentatively, as the hypothesis to which the facts seem to point, so far as yet examined.

It is hardly worth saying, and not worth proving, that Panthcism and Positivism are even more impotent then Theism as moral systems. Neither of them can recognise the existence of sin; and, therefore, though either can supply motives for virtue, neither can give an efficient motive against temptation. The one tells us that the sinner, as a part of the universe, is divine, and in real, though obscured, harmony with the other parts: the other, that the sin is a fact, a disagreeable one no doubt, but resulting from other facts in the ordinary way, and to be recognised, accounted for, and made the best of, like any other fact. And dualism is little better: at most it shares the strength as well as the weakness of theism. If good and evil be twins, it is a motive of faith or love, not of reason, that decides us to attach ourselves to good and not to evil: and the worst that could be said of theism was, that it left faith and love alone, to defend themselves as they best might against passion and temptation, without support from reason.

Neither can utilitarianism, or any non-religious system, supplement any form of dogma by affording an efficient moral law. Any religion, polytheist, dualist, monotheist, or pantheist, supplies the conception of obligation: which, whatever be the correct analysis or the true source of the conception, certainly includes the existence of some law external to self. But utilitarianism makes self the source as well as the record of the law: and then it seems impossible to deny that a man has a right, as Butler expresses it, "to make himself as miserable as he pleases:" as he does please, in a case of prevailing temptation.

If then natural religion be unsuccessful in maintaining its ground, either as a theory or as a law, either against argument or against temptation; if the systems alternative to theism be at least equally unsuccessful—almost as arbitrary viewed as hypotheses, far more impotent as moral principles: has historical theism—revealed religion, and emphatically Christianity — a better right to acceptance, or a better chance of success?

For the former of these questions, it may be necessary to examine the whole question of the Christian evidences, before deciding absolutely in the affirmative. This, however, is too wide a question to be included as a πάρεργον here: it will be enough to establish the à priori credibility of a revelation, as a necessary and sufficient proof of God's existence and support to His law; and the special fitness of the revelation actually given for that purpose. Natural religion fails, [1] because its existence can be accounted for from causes not involving its truth; and [2] because it suggests difficulties which it cannot solve. Revealed religion does not fail similarly, [1] because its existence is a fact not explained by natural causes; and [2] because, though it suggests at least as many difficulties as the other, it accounts, as the other does not, for the existence of difficulties.

For a natural religion has no right to contain mysteries. If man has by searching found out God, what limit can be placed to the search he may make into Him? His Providence is like a newly discovered continent: we may not have circumnavigated it yet, but if our seamanship improves a little we shall. A difficulty may exist, but not an antinomy: there may be points in God's nature or actions that we do not understand, but none that are essentially beyond our reach.

In the scheme of revelation, we know nothing of God but what He has told us, either when first He made us or since. We, therefore, have no ground for hope that we can, by our own effort, find out anything further about Him. He who has discovered that God is may easily find what He is: he to whom God has revealed Himself can only wait for the time when, not by our study but by His mere permission, "we shall see Him as He is." It may be that in that day we shall perceive some of the present mysteries to be not only true, but intelligible: it is no more than natural, that while we know in part, our knowledge should fall short of comprehension. If we are acquainted with part, but not the whole of the divine nature or purposes, it is credible that the known part may require something of the unknown to balance it and fit it for our understanding. We are sure that our actual knowledge, however limited, is absolutely true, and that no further enlightenment can contradict it. It may illustrate it: but we can wait for such illustration; we know enough for our immediate necessities, if we know as much as we have to take into account in action. For example, it concerns us to know that God created us, if we are to behave as becomes His creatures; we can believe in the Creation without knowing, at least in this life, why He created when He did, and not before.

Accordingly, as revelation was extended, it increased the number of mysteries. It gave, as one may say, two half-told truths for every half-truth of which it told the other half. Natural religion made its progress by simplification, by the elimination of needless hypotheses. An invented reformation or republication of it would continue the process; a revealed one may, conceivably, in appearance reverse it. St. John had no motive to invent the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, as a means for purifying men's conceptions of God; Mahomet had such a motive for contradicting it.

Natural religion can hardly be said to have proved the love of God for man. Of His goodness, in a sense short of this, it did testify; He was known as not only a just, but a beneficent ruler. But to do good is a limited thing—to love is infinite. And natural religion never said to the believer "all things are yours." It hardly justified the belief in a special providence. Revelation, on the contrary, and emphatically Christianity, establishes that God has done certain acts solely and directly for the benefit of men, of each and every man (at least) who believes them; and this, monstrous as it seems, at the greatest sacrifice to Himself.

It is superfluous to say how the need of an atonement, which was the final and crucial failure of natural religion, is supplied by Christianity. While the natural difficulties of the doctrine are not solved—are perhaps complicated by the more emphatic introduction of the notion of substitution, of vicarious suffering and obedience—we have seen that we have no right to expect a solution of all. And, at any rate, the moral grandeur of the machinery is on a scale commensurate with its efficacy. We have at least escaped from the charge of frivolity. And the tendency to dualism, which appeared to follow from the most successful attempt at rationalizing the idea, is counteracted by the doctrine of the Unity of the Divine Persons. [2 Cor. v. 18, 19.]

The duties enjoined by natural religion, moreover, become more attractive, and receive fresh motives and sanctions, from the Christian revelation; and its doctrines, even where not explained or not needing explanation, are better adapted to the apprehension of ordinary minds. For example, the love of God is assisted by the knowledge of the Person of Christ; the belief in a future life by the doctrines of the resurrection and judgment.

It may be added, as a partial explanation of the evident and important fact that natural theism never was, and can hardly be conceived to become, a popular religion, while Christianity is so actually and essentially, that the Christian scheme gives a test for judging whether the blessings promised in general terms by religion are appropriated by an individual. A blameless philosopher may reasonably feel assured, that he is serving God to the best of his power,—however conscious he may be of his own human weakness—he may, as above stated, trust that this habitual and progressive virtue will suffice, and either feel no want of an atonement, or be content to leave its nature unaccounted for. But a man who is conscious of sins of purpose no less than of infirmity has no right to determine for himself, on the testimony of his own heart alone, whether his sins have separated him from God's service. Yet without some assurance that they have not, he has no encouragement to persevere in it. And such an assurance is provided by the Christian sacraments, even according to the lower view of them; for, if not considered to be actual channels and instruments of grace, they must still be allowed to be authoritative testimonies to grace given. Where these exist, they prevent a man from being left uncertain whether his sins are forgiven, whether he is recognised by God as a son, and admitted to personal union with Him.

In this aspect, revealed religion may be regarded as the culmination of natural. The latter was adopted in view, partly of the actual evidence afforded by the universe, principally of the subjective wants of the human mind. The Christian revelation partly improves on it, in the former respect, by the doctrine of the Fall, which accounts for the world as it is appearing unworthy of its supposed divine origin. And still more decidedly, it succeeds better in satisfying the second requisite—in affording something that the human mind can believe, and will be the better for believing.

REMONSTRANTS. A name given to the Arminians of Holland, upon their presentation to the States in 1610 of a Remonstrance against the proceedings of the Calvinists. The Calvinists presented a Counter-Remonstrance, and were called Contra-Remonstrants.

In the controversy between Arminius and Gomar, the power of the civil magistrate in matters of religion came into question. The Arminians asserted that it rests with the magistrate, although he is not theologically a judge in controversy, to determine what doctrine shall be preached in the churches of the States, and that at the same time he is bound to allow and protect other doctrine in private churches. The Calvinists maintained that the magistrate possesses only the power of the sword to enforce the determinations of the spiritualty.

About the time of the death of Arminius in 1609, the Calvinists, in several of their "classes," attempted, contrary to the orders of the States, to drive the Arminians from their churches, by ordering subscription to the Heidelberg Confession and Catechism. Several Arminian ministers therefore presented their "Remonstrance" to the States. In it they complain of the severe measures adopted by the clergy against those who could not receive the doctrine of predestination, and state their own belief regarding the points of the Quinquarticular controversy.

They pray that the States will procure them a hearing in a legitimate synod under the authority of the government. If this cannot be done, they pray for toleration, and for protection by the States from any measures which may be taken against them in consequence of this their Remonstrance. They declare that they make the Remonstrance, not to cause separation or contention, but only in self-defence, and for the sake of the truth; adding, lastly, that if they can obtain neither of their requests they are willing at the command of the States to resign their ministry. It was objected to these Remonstrants that in appealing to the civil power they were deserting the legitimate, that is the ecclesiastical, tribunal.

The States decreed that orders should be sent to the classes to observe peace; and, until further orders, not to press any minister in the disputed articles beyond the terms of the Remonstrance. Some classes resisting, members of the government were sent to them to enforce the decree.

In consequence of the contest which took place on the nomination of Vorstius to succeed Arminius in the professorship at Leyden, the States, in 1611, appointed a conference at the Hague. It was to be managed by six ministers on each side. Before the conference was opened the six Calvinists presented their Counter-Remonstrance, which states in six articles their belief as to the disputed points, denies that the Remonstrants can be tolerated as ministers of the Reformed Church, and urges that they ought to be subjected to ecclesiastical censure. The conference was a lengthy one; and its proceedings, published under the title "Collatio Hagiensis," were much quoted in the further controversy, and at the Synod of Dort.

The States declared for neither party, but enjoined toleration. The Calvinistic party however, being countenanced by the Stadtholder Prince Maurice, to whom the Arminian leaders Grotius and Barneveldt as republicans were obnoxious, harassed their opponents in the consistories, and proceeded to suspend and deprive them. Another conference in smaller numbers was held in 1613 at Delft; and in the same year, through the influence of Barneveldt, an edict was issued by the States enjoining toleration. The "Contra-Remonstrants," as the more numerous party, now called for a general synod; and the Orange or Stadtholder faction knew that it would be no small gain to have their political opponents condemned as heretics.

The Synod of Dort assembled in 1618. Calvinism was declared to be the doctrine of the Reformed Church. The Remonstrants were banished from the United Provinces. The States were overawed; Grotius was imprisoned; Barneveldt tried and executed. But on the death of Maurice in 1625, the Remonstrants were allowed to return home; and although the Presbyterian Synod of Dort was apparently the triumph of Calvinism, yet from that time Calvinism began to decline. RENOVATION. Renovation is a step in the scale of salvation that arises, but is distinct, from regeneration. The latter removes the child of Adam from a state of wrath and places him in a state of grace; renovation then takes up the work, and whereas even the most faithful of God's servants errs daily in the sight of Him Who is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, daily renewal in God's grace is requisite to guide the steadiest steps in the way of life. Renovation therefore is the complement of baptism; and the way in which this indispensable work is set forth in Scripture marks its sacramental origin in very clear characters. For, with the exception of one place, renewal is everywhere expressed by some derivative of the verb ἀνακαινίζω or ἀνακαινόω, carrying the mind back at once to the cognate verb ἐγκαινίζω, to dedicate, as the Temple of old was dedicated once for all to God's service; after which solemn initiation its ordinary services were acts of daily dedication to God. Without laying too much stress however on this analogy, it may be stated confidently that the way in which renovation is set forth in Scripture marks its sacramental origin in very clear characters. Thus St. Paul reminds Titus that "not by works of righteousness that we have done, but according to His mercy He saved us, by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost;" where the original marks an inseparable connection, διὰ λουτροῦ παλιγγενεσίας, καὶ ἀνακαινώσεως Πνεύματος Ἁγίου [iii. 5]. Similarly, in Heb. vi. 5, the difficulty of that text disappears if we bear in mind this sacramental origin of renovation. "It is impossible for those who were once enlightened . . . if they should fall away, to renew them again [ἀνακαινίζειν] to repentance;" where St. Athanasius says [Hom. in Matt. xii. 31], "This passage in the Epistle to the Hebrews does not shut out sinners from repentance, but it testifies that the baptism of the Church Catholic is single, and never a duplicate act; wherefore the Apostle exhorts to repentance, but shews that there is only one renewal by baptism and not two; he does not affirm that it is impossible to repent, but that it is not competent for us to renew any (by baptism) under a pretext of repentance. The difference is vast. He who repents, ceases indeed from his sin, but he retains the scars of sin; while he who is baptized puts off the old man, and is renewed as having been regenerated by the grace of the Spirit." The same connection may be traced in Col. iii. 10, where "putting off the old man with his deeds, and putting on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of Him that created him," marks at the same time the sacramental connection of renewal, and its continuous character, as leading the faithful recipient step by step to a greater conformity with the likeness of God in Christ, which is destined at length to issue in the full restoration of that likeness in heaven. Elsewhere renovation is made an act of daily duty, which regeneration cannot be, as when St. Paul exhorts the Romans to make good the dedication of themselves in soul and body to God; "I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God" [whereby they had been graffed in to the Body of Christ], "that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service, and be not conformed to this world; but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God" [Rom. xii. 1, 2]. In like manner the hardships and trials of the Christian warfare are contrasted with the far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory that shall be revealed in Christ's people as the final cause of those sufferings, "for though our outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day" [2 Cor. iv. 16],[1] a mode of speaking again that cannot possibly apply to regeneration. The single passage in which renewal is expressed in the original by ἀνανεοῦσθαι [Eph. iv. 23], is scarcely to be distinguished from the use of the cognate verb in Col. iii. 10; the two Epistles in great measure echoing each other's words and sentiments; "that ye put off concerning the former conversation the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts, and be renewed in the spirit of your mind, and that ye put on the new man which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness." The Apostle then proceeds to give practical directions how the Christian's daily walk in life should be regulated, so as to realize that renewal.

Human nature in a general sense was renewed by the holy living and dying of the Lord Jesus, the Incarnate Son of God [see Aug. Enarr. in Ps. xxxvii. 22]; it is renewed in a spiritual sense now, it will be finally renewed hereafter in the spiritual body, admitted to the regeneration of heaven, when both body and soul will be invested with the glory that shall then be revealed. Man's recovery by renovation of all that was lost to him of the likeness of God in Adam is now made possible; and he receives in addition the hope of being made "as the angels of God in heaven," which is far better than the life of paradise [see Aug. De Genesi ad. Lit. imperf. 4, and vi. sec. 31, 35; also De Pecc. Or. c. Pelag. et Cœlest. sec. 45]. But the renovation of each individual soul dates from baptism, as St. Augustine shews in his commentary on the difficult text, 1 John iii. 9 [De Pecc. mer. et rem. ii. sec. 9]. All human infirmity, he says, is not removed in baptism, though renovation dates from the remission of sins, and in proportion as he who is now endued with the Spirit of wisdom becomes spiritually wise. This renewal is a matter of hope and of gradual progress, otherwise the Apostle would not have spoken of our renewal "day by day;" for they who are in the course of renewal are not yet renewed: and in proportion as they fall short of perfect renewal, they are yet under their old condition of infirmity, and children of this world [see De Spir. et Lit. sec. 59, on Ps. cii. 2]. But they are also the sons of God in direct ratio to the degree in which their renewal has been realized in holiness of life, and the degree in which they are spiritually wise and live according to the dictates of heavenly wisdom. We are baptized into the death of Christ, Who came for the express purpose of effecting our renewal in Him. "Desiderando eum et imitando eum renovamur" [Enarr. in Ps. xxxvii. 22].

RE-ORDINATION. The repetition of the sacramental ordinance of ordination, provided it be certain that such ordination has been duly performed, has ever been held to be contrary to the true theory of sacraments, and has been forbidden by the Church under pain of severe penalties. The ground of this prohibition is well-expressed by Morinus, quoting the Council of Trent [Sess. xxiii. c. 4]: "In the Sacrament of Orders, as in Baptism and Confirmation, a character is conferred, which cannot be effaced or taken away." The historical evidence as to both the doctrine and practice of the Church is full and complete. The sixty-eighth Apostolical Canon condemned it, and pronounced sentence of deposition on the ordainer and the ordained. The third Council of Carthage [canon 52] forbade it along with re-baptization. St. Augustine [Contra Parmen. lib. ii. c. 13] and St. Gregory the Great [Epist. lib. ii.; Ep. xlvi. ad Jo. Episc. Ravennat. t. ii. p. 608, ed. Bened.] both class it with re-baptism as unlawful, the latter observing that "as he who has once been baptized ought not to be baptized again, so he who has once been consecrated ought not to be consecrated again in the same order." On this head it will suffice to add the terse expression of Theodoret [Histor. Relig. c. 13] οὐ δυνατὸν δὶς τὴν αὐτὴν ἐπιτεθεῖναι χειροτονίαν.

So far the question is simple, both the doctrine and practice of the Church being clear and unvarying. But the further point, whether the ordinations of heretics and schismatics are to be held valid, and whether those who have received them are, on their reconciliation, to be received in their several orders, is one full of doubt and perplexity. Peter Lombard in beginning to discuss the point says, "Hanc quæstionem perplexam ac pene insolubilem faciunt Doctorum verba; qui plurimum dissentire videntur."

If we refer first to history we find that the practice of the Church varied considerably. The Council of Nice decreed that those presbyters and deacons who had been ordained by the schismatic Meletius, after he had been deposed by the Metropolitan of Alexandria, should be admitted to serve in the Church by re-ordination [Ep. Synod. ap. Socrat. lib. i. c. 9; et Theodor. lib. i. c. 9]. The sixty-eighth Apostolical Canon, while condemning the re-ordination of those once ordained in the Church, allows that of those who had only received heretical ordination. The second Council of Saragossa [A.D. 592] ratifies the baptism of the Arians, but condemns their ordinations. On the other hand, St. Augustine distinctly says that in the case of the Donatists, it was decreed that Donatus, the author of the schism, should be condemned, but that the rest, on their repentance, should be received in their own degrees "even if they had been ordained outside the Church" [Ep. 50, ad Bonifac.].

St. Thomas Aquinas [Pars. iii. qu. xxxviii. artic. 2], in answer to the question "Whether heretics, &c., cut off from the Church can confer orders?" decides that they can. They confer true sacraments, but with them they do not give grace, not because of inefficacy in the sacraments, but because of the sins of those who receive them contrary to the prohibition of the Church.

In later times the practice of the Roman Catholic Church has also been very contradictory. In the ninth century there were several cases of re-ordination of those who had received simoniacal ordination, or ordination from simoniacal persons. Thus the ordinations of Formosus were declared null by Stephen VI., and those ordained by him were re-ordained. John IX., on the contrary, held them valid, and Sergius III. again declared them invalid. But Morinus asserts that the question between these different Popes was one of fact and not of right. The modern Roman practice of re-ordaining those ordained in the Church of England, is not based on any decree of the Church resulting from an examination of the question, and moreover, according to Courayer, who quotes the Bull of Julius III. to Cardinal Pole, it has not been invariable.

Taking into consideration the conflicting opinions of the Fathers and Schoolmen, and the varying practice of the early Church, it does not seem right to conclude, notwithstanding the strong words used by St. Augustine, that re-ordination stands exactly on the same footing as re-baptism.

Morinus, after stating numerous opinions of the Schoolmen, and reviewing the historical evidence, lays down three axioms which may be accepted as a fair statement of the generally received theory. [1] The one quoted above as to the indelible character conferred in baptism, confirmation, and orders; [2] that Catholic ordinations are nowhere to be repeated; [3] that the ordinations of all heretics and schismatics, if performed according to the rite (forma) of the Church (the heretics who ordain having themselves been ordained according to that rite), are valid in respect of substance, and therefore not to be repeated: but they are unlawful, both the giver and receiver of them sinning heinously; and that in no case is it lawful for a Catholic to receive ordination from heretics or schismatics. He goes on to argue that ceremonies prescribed and added to the rite of ordination by the Church become essential parts of ordination, and that the omission of them renders the ordination null and void. The main argument that ordinations are valid if form and substance are preserved, agrees with St. Thomas and St. Augustine, and contradicts the theory on which opposite decrees are based, while the later proviso, that ceremonies prescribed by the Church become essential parts of ordination, is a principle unknown to the Church at the time that re-ordinations were allowed.

The custom of the Church of England forbids re-ordination in the case of those ordained within the Church, and asserts the indelibility of the ordination character. As to the point of form, the preface to the Ordinal excepts from the necessity of ordination those who have "had formerly episcopal consecration or ordination," meaning ordination in due form by one who is a bishop according to the ancient threefold order of the ministry, and whose own ordination is undoubted. REPENTANCE. The word repentance is represented in the Hebrew by תשובה, "return,"[1] and in the Greek by μεταμελεία, pœnitentia,[2] denoting the contritional, and μετανοία, resipiscentia, expressing the conversive power of repentance.

[1] The name Job has been referred to the cognate Arabic root أوب "converti ad Deum," which in the second conjugation is "laudare Deum."

[2] Quasi "punitentia;" or from "pœna," as "pœna teneri," the etymon given by Thomas Aquinas from Pseudo-Augustine, implying a permanent self-punishing and a castigation of the heart.

In its present acceptation it runs parallel with the term in the Old Testament, meaning a return to obedience and to the performance of God's will after a period of rebellion or neglect of duty ;[1] fear for the terrible consequences of sin, and the love of God for His mercy and goodness, being the constraining causes; perfect love in the end "casting out fear." But a difference is perceptible in the New Testament use of the word. There it very generally bears reference to first acceptance of the faith of Christ. "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand;" "bring forth therefore fruits meet for repentance;" "repent and be baptized every one of you in the Name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins;" "Him hath God exalted for to give repentance to Israel;" "God also to the Gentiles hath granted repentance to life;" "having commanded all men everywhere to repent;" "and testifying to the Greeks repentance towards God;" "if God peradventure will grant them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth." So far as the preparatory condition of baptism was concerned, Christian baptism in no respect differed from the baptism of John, who also baptized "with water unto repentance." Hence repentance is mentioned by St. Paul as the very foundation of all [Heb vi. 1], which could not be repeated, in a sacramental sense, as the very first round on the ladder of salvation; for since baptism could never be repeated, it was impossible, if any should fall away, to renew them again by baptismal repentance [Heb. vi. 6]. The word also occurs in a wider sense in the New Testament, though the instances are comparatively rare. In one of these St. Paul sets forth with a burning eloquence the distinctive features of a true contrition, "For, behold, this same thing, that ye sorrowed after a godly sort, what carefulness it wrought in you, yea, what a clearing of yourselves, yea, what indignation, yea, what fear, yea, what vehement desire, yea, what zeal, yea, what revenge!" [2 Cor. vii. 11]. In the first days of the Gospel heaven had visibly come down to earth; the holy lives of the first preachers of the Gospel, and the miracles that were wrought in attestation of its divine origin, insured holiness of life in its various members; the life of Paradise had been restored; or if any, as Simon Magus or Hymenæus and Alexander, accepted the faith in hypocrisy, or fell into grievous sin, they were cast out again from the Church, or delivered over to Satan, until such time as they should have shewn by a post-baptismal repentance true contrition for their sin [Acts viii. 21; 1 Cor. v. 5; 1 Tim. i. 20]. But as churches were established in the great centres of heathenism, the god-like character of apostolic faith became insensibly lowered; the enemy had sown tares broadcast in the Church: and St. John, in his address to the Churches of Asia, calls five out of the seven to repentance on account of their lapse from holiness and forgetfulness of their first love [Rev. ii. 5, 16, 22, ii. 3, 19]; the Churches of Smyrna, under Polycarp, and of Philadelphia being the two only exceptions. Repentance, therefore, which men think so high and rare an excellence, is after all the lowest of the Christian graces, and only admits the penitent to the ordinary privileges of Gospel life, or restores him to them when forfeited through sin. For the Christian's everyday walk a higher excellence is demanded, and a fuller development of that which in its first germ is μετανοία, a new mind.

That which was said by St. John to the backsliding Churches of Asia is still as the voice of Christ to the soul of sin: "Behold, I stand at the door, and knock: if any man hear My voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with Me" [Rev. iii. 20]; i.e. the memorial of Christ's dying love shall be restored to him, the long withholden guerdon of penitent faith.

The effect of unrepented sin being everlasting death is so truly terrible, that the Church from the earliest period prescribed certain courses of penitential discipline for offenders, "for the destruction[2] of the flesh, that the spirit might be saved in the day of the Lord" [1 Cor. v. 5]. What these were may be seen under the head Discipline, Ecclesiastical. Nearly all vestiges of them were swept away from the Reformed Churches in the sixteenth century; the abuses of the penitentiary by Indulgences, and the aggression of the Roman See upon the liberty of princes and people by Excommunication and Interdict, caused them to fall into desuetude, the grains of wheat being no longer discernible in the mountain of chaff that overlaid them. Our Church does not fail to regret the loss on the yearly recurring "Dies Cinerum;" this "aspiration, however, after the revival of an open penance which is utterly impossible, is apt to lead the thoughts away from the restoration of a discipline and penance which is both possible and desirable." [Blunt's Ann. Book of Com. P., Commination S.]

Since every day "in many things we offend all," it is a matter of closest interest that our views of the position and constituent elements of repentance in the order of grace should be clear and definite. Repentance is either internal or external. The first has reference to God alone, and involves that compunction of heart when "there ariseth a pensive and corrosive desire that we had done otherwise; a desire which suffereth us to forslow no time, to feel no quietness within ourselves, to take neither sleep nor food with contentment, never to give over supplications, confessions, and other penitent duties, till the light of God's reconciled favour shine in our darkened soul" [Hooker, bk. vi.]. It is of an external character when satisfaction is made to others for any wrong done; or, as of old, to the Church for scandal brought upon the common calling of Christians. The former is termed by Hooker the "virtue," the latter the "discipline" of repent-

[1] "All His speeches in Holy Scripture are almost nothing else but entreaties of men to prevent destruction by amendment of their wicked lives." [Hooker.]

[2] Εἰς ὄλεθρον τῆς σαρκός. Thus LXX. in 1 Kings xiii. 3 has εἰς ὄλεθρον for the Hebrew להשמיד, English version, "to cut it off." The term, therefore, as used by the Apostle means "for excommunication in the body."

ance. Both are essential elements of a true repentance.

The Roman differs from the Reformed view of the rise and progress of repentance within the soul in words, rather than in the psychological notion of it. The Roman theology teaches that repentance arising from the first weak stirrings of faith is the ATTRITION of a terror-stricken conscience; thence through the infusion of love becoming CONTRITION. Faith, fear, and love, therefore, are the three steps that lead to a valid repentance. Anglican theology teaches the same thing, combining however in one attrition and its congener as a more perfect contrition, while faith that is itself inseparable from love is as the third step of the Roman scheme. So the Augsburg Confession also says: "Constat autem pœnitentia proprie his duabus partibus; altera est contritio seu terrores incussi conscientiæ agnito peccato. Altera est fides, quæ concipitur ex evangelio, seu absolutione, et credit propter Christum remitti peccata, et consolatur conscientiam, et ex terroribus liberat. Deinde sequi debent bona opera quæ sunt 'fructus pœnitentiæ'" [Art. xii.]. Melanchthon, the compiler of these articles, elsewhere explains the meaning of these "fruits meet for repentance." "Si quis volet addere tertiam (contritioni sc. et confessioni) videlicet dignos fructus pœnitentiæ, hoc est mutationem totius vitæ ac morum in melius, non refragabimur" [Apol. art. v.].

The love of God, again, in the Roman theory, pre-supposes faith: "Denique fides non est pars pœnitentiæ sed eam præcedit" [Bellarm. De Pœn. i. 19]. Möhler therefore is scarcely just when he says that repentance as a Protestant grace is wholly based on the "terrors of conscience."[1] Fear may quicken the first germ of serious thought in the one scheme as in the other, but the whole work of repentance is the effect of God's grace, and in time "perfect love casteth out fear" [1 John iv. 18]; which is the teaching of Roman as well as of Anglican theology. "Wherefore the well-spring of repentance is faith, first breeding fear and then love, which love causeth hope, hope resolution of attempt, 'I will go to my Father and say, I have sinned against heaven and against Thee;' that is to say, I will do what the duty of a convert requireth" [Hooker, bk. vi.]. The effect of a hearty repentance is a change of the perverse will, whereby it is released from the thraldom of sin, and enabled to move in lines parallel with the holy and good will of God. That will then becomes the penitent's law; but it is the "perfect law of liberty."

CONFESSION, ABSOLUTION and SATISFACTION, as constituent elements of an effectual repentance, were not set aside by the German Reformation, but much commended. Thus the Augsburg Confession [A.D. 1530], prepared by Melanchthon from the Schwalbach Articles [A.D. 1529], in its eleventh Article commends the practice of private absolution, and therefore of private confession, "quamquam in confessione non sit necessaria omnium delictorum enumeratio, est enim impossibilis juxta Ps. xix. 12, 'delicta quis intelligit?'" [Art. xi.]; and in the fourth section of the appendix of articles taken from the Torgau Confession of the early part of the same year, it is added, "Confession is not abolished in our churches; for the Body of the Lord is not communicated to any, except they be first examined and absolved." Auricular confession is still retained by the Lutheran community as a regular part of Church order and discipline; for it was a practice commended by Luther; "Occulta autem confessio quæ modo celebratur, etsi probari ex Scripturis non potest, miro tamen modo placet, et utilis, immo necessaria, est; nec vellem eam non esse, imo gaudeo eam esse in ecclesia Christi" [De Captiv. Bab. Opp. ii. 292]. Elsewhere he finds fault with papal indulgences as an abrogation of penance, though a self-imposed penance be judged to be the best. "Wenn sie fromme Hirten wären, so würden sie vielmehr Strafen auflegen, und nach der Kirchen Exempel Gotte in seinem Strafgerichte zuvorkommen; . . . das allerbeste aber wäre, wenn wir uns selbst strafeten" [Luth. c. Indulg. ad art. v. Assert. 41]. Absolution also was never formally discharged from its position as a sacrament by the German Reformers. For the articles of the Smalkald League, drawn up by Luther in the year after the Augsburg Confession, say, "Nequaquam in ecclesia confessio et absolutio abolenda est;" and Melanchthon retained it as a sacramental rite: "In ecclesiis nostris plurimi sæpe in anno utuntur sacramentis, Absolutione et Cœna Domini" [Apol. art. iv.]; and, "Absolutio proprie dici potest sacramentum pœnitentiæ" [art. v.]; again, "Vere igitur sunt Sacramenta, Baptismus, Cœna Domini, Absolutio, quæ est Sacramentum Pœnitentiæ" [art. vii.]; and in the Loc. Theol., "Numerantur hæc Sacramenta, Baptismus, Cœna Domini, Absolutio" [see Augusti, Archäol. ix. 28]; absolution always implying antecedent confession.

The Church of England rejects penitential absolution from the number of primary sacraments, as having no "visible sign or ceremony ordained of God" [Art. XXV.], but rather encourages the practice of private confession to some "discreet minister." Ridley expressed himself shortly before his death in terms very similar to those of Luther, as quoted above, with respect to private confession; "Confession unto the minister, which is able to instruct, correct, comfort, and inform the weak, wounded, and ignorant conscience, indeed I ever thought might do much good in Christ's congregation; and so I assure you I think unto this day" [Letter to West; Letters of the Martyrs, p. 30]. For more authorative declarations, see CONFESSION, § 5. Hooker considers that the general confession of our daily service is sufficient to cover all special acts of confession; and if daily service is only a name, yet his opinion holds good with respect to weekly service. "The Church of England hitherto hath thought it the safer way to refer men's hidden crimes unto God and themselves only" [bk. vi.], "severely admonishing" the guilty that they presume not to approach the Mystery of the Lord's Supper with an impenitent heart; and reserving a particular absolution for the confession of those who are to all appearance sick unto death. REPRESENTATION. The theological use of this word by English writers of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries was, in the strict sense of its Latin original, that of "presenting over again" in reality; the subordinate idea of "portrayal" as in a picture, being little, if at all, in use by them. Thus when Bishop Pearson writes "by virtue of His Death, perpetually represented to His Father, 'He destroyeth him that hath the power of death,'" the word refers to our Lord's continual pleading of the sacrifice once offered. The word is not used in the English Bible, but the force of it may be deduced from that of the verb "to present," which is used in the sense of "to offer" [παραστῆσαι, Luke ii. 22; Rom. xii. 1; 2 Cor. xi. 2]; and also from the participle "present," and the adverb "presently;" the latter word always meaning "now," and not any future time.

It is of importance to remember this usage of the term "representation," as it is not unfrequently used with reference to the Eucharistic Sacrifice; and by losing sight of the sense in which the word was understood by former writers, modern readers have understood "representation" to mean a dramatic or pictorial imitation, rather than a real and actual making present, and offering over again, of that which is present by virtue of the once only offered sacrifice.

REPROBATION. The Calvinistic doctrine that a portion of mankind by the eternal counsel or decree of God has been predestined to eternal death. [Calvinism.]

The first objection against this doctrine is its entire want of scriptural proof: had it been a part of divine revelation, such a doctrine would not only, it may fairly be supposed, have been expressly stated, but would have been implied throughout Scripture, and have coloured (so to speak) its teaching generally. On the contrary, there is not merely an absence of any direct proof or statement of this doctrine in Scripture, but its teaching is clearly and expressly contradictory to it. The dogma is not only wanting, but what we do find in Scripture is inconsistent with it. Thus the condemnation of the wicked is not attributed to God's decree of reprobation, but to their own unwillingness to listen to God's call to repentance, to their own wilful perseverance in sin in spite of divine prohibition and warning. God has also positively declared Himself unwilling that the sinner should die, but rather that he should turn from his sin and be saved [Ezek. xviii. 32]. We know also that through divine grace, man has the will and the power to repent of sin, and to live in obedience to God's commandments. [Free-Will.]

Thus the doctrine of reprobation can only be described as a fearful perversion of the general teaching of Scripture; it really sets aside the professed object of Christ's atoning sacrifice [John xii. 32], and its universality, which Scripture expressly declares [Universal Redemption], and is inconsistent moreover with God's attributes of love and justice, either viewed separately, or as being harmoniously united in His dealings with His creatures.

RESERVATION. The practice of reserving one or both of the elements consecrated at the Holy Eucharist for future use, either in divine service or in the communion of the sick. Reservation for either purpose involves the doctrine of a "real," "objective," Presence of Christ's Body and Blood in the consecrated elements.

The early use of this practice is shewn by the well-known account which Justin Martyr gives of the celebration of the Eucharist, in which he says that "a portion is sent by the deacons to those who are absent" [Apol. i. 67]. Eusebius quotes also an epistle from Irenæus to Victor, Bishop of Rome, in which he refers to the habit which bishops had of sending the Eucharist to one another at Easter [Euseb. Hist. Eccl. v. 24]. The same historian quotes from Dionysius a narrative of the martyr Serapion sending a messenger for a priest when he was dying in prison, in which the writer says, "It was night, and the priest was sick, . . . but I gave the boy a morsel of the Eucharist, telling him to dip it in water, and drop it into the mouth of the old man" [Ibid. vi. 44]. This was in the reign of Decius, and so about A.D. 250. About the same year Cyprian wrote "cum quædam arcam suam in qua Domini sanctum fuit," &c. [De Lapsis, p. 132, of Fell's ed. 1682]. And Tertullian, A.D. 200: "Non sciet maritus quid secreto ante omnem cibum gustes?" [Ad Uxorem, lib. ii. c. 5, p. 190, Rigault]. These shew the privilege granted to the faithful in private in times of persecution, and they must be allowed to presuppose a reservation in the Church. There can hardly have been a reservation in private if there had not existed a reservation in the Church from which the concession to private men might spring. The Clementine Constitutions also [viii. 13] order the deacons to carry into the Pastophoria what remains, and these constitutions are generally referred to the end of the second century.

Early in the fourth century [A.D. 325] we find the thirteenth of the Canons of the Council of Nicæa ordaining that none, even of the lapsed, shall be "deprived of the last and most necessary Viaticum [τοῦ τελευταίου καὶ ἀναγκαιοτάτου ἐφοδίου μὴ ἀποστερεῖσθαι], but the old canonical law shall be observed. . . . Let the bishop, upon examination, give the oblation to all who desire it at the hour of death." Taking into account the preceding evidence we can hardly refuse to interpret this Nicene canon of the Viaticum so administered as well as of consecration in private. The evidence that next meets us greatly strengthens this conclusion. Optatus [about A.D. 368] speaks of the Donatist bishops being so horribly profane as to throw the Eucharist which they found in Catholic churches to the dogs. Chrysostom [A.D. 404] complains of the soldiers breaking into the sanctuary of his church, and spilling upon their clothes the Holy Blood of Christ [Ep. ad Innocent.]. It is not necessary to give later evidence as regards reservation for the sick.

Upon this evidence Bona [Rerum Liturg. ii. 17] and Morinus [De Pœnit. viii. 14] state that reservation in the Church was designed for communion of the sick, and that the modern custom of reservation for communion of the faithful in Church "extra sacrificium" was first introduced by the Mendicant friars, contrary to the Roman ritual itself, which lays down that reservation is for the sick. Catalani [Pontificale Rom. tit. xviii.; De Benedic. Tabernaculi, vol. ii. p. 444, ed. 1851] denies this, arguing that Fr. Berlendi [In celeberrimo Opusculo, De Oblationibus ad Altare, Italice scripto, p. 97, ed. secundæ] has shewn that in the fourth century the sacrifice was not offered daily at Rome; while St. Jerome [Ep. xxviii. ad Lucinium Boet. and Ep. l. ad Pammachium] witnesses that in his time the faithful of Rome communicated daily. If these premisses are established the communion must have been of the reserved Elements.

In the fourth century another undoubted purpose of reservation presents itself, that of communion in Lent, and especially on Good Friday. In the Greek Church consecration in Lent is allowed only on Saturdays, Sundays, and on the Feast of the Annunciation. In the Romish Church consecration is omitted only on Good Friday and Easter Eve. [Missa Præsanctificatorum.] The fifty-second canon of the Council in Trullo enjoined that on every day in the holy fast of Lent, excepting the days already named, such a liturgy of the presanctified shall be performed; and canon forty-nine of Laodicea forbids the offering of the Eucharist in Lent, except on the Sabbath and on the Sunday. Different dates, from A.D. 314 to A.D. 366, are assigned to the Council of Laodicea. Baronius and Leo Allatius adopt the date A.D. 314. Inasmuch as this Council was in general for restoring the failing discipline of the Church, it appears probable that reservation in Lent was a primitive custom, the observance of which was enforced by this canon against a growing habit of consecration. Beveridge, however, thinks otherwise, and attributes to this canon the institution of the Greek custom. It is in favour of his opinion that there seems to be no undoubted allusion to this custom of an earlier date. Leo Allatius thinks that the Missa Præsanctificatorum is intended by Socrates, when he says that at Alexandria they had, on Wednesdays and Fridays, all divine service except the consecration [Socr. Hist. Eccl. v. 22], but this must be considered doubtful.

From Tertullian, Ambrose, and others, it appears that in the Latin Church the custom was to consecrate as well as to communicate about three in the afternoon all the days of Lent [Bingham, xv. 4, 12]. This militates strongly against the position of Berlendi named above. It is hardly possible to conceive daily consecration in Lent and reservation in the rest of the year.

Upon the whole, then, from this evidence it may be concluded that reservation for the sick is a primitive custom, that reservation in Lent is perhaps primitive, certainly of very early date, and with regard to Good Friday, that the consent of East and West must be held to proceed from a primitive custom of abstaining from consecration on that day. But these customs are customs of permission, not of obligation; for each independent church, as a steward of God's mysteries, has the power of adopting consecration or reservation as it may judge expedient.

From these conclusions we may pass to the other purposes of reservation, or permissible ends of reservation, when the principle is established.

1. The consecrated elements remaining that which they were made by consecration, and their presence being the sacramental presence of Christ, that adoration of Christ which is proper to the Eucharist is also to be continued. Hence piety appears to suggest that the reserved sacrament may be openly kept in the Church for the perpetual Eucharistic adoration of the faithful.

The earliest evidence on this point is that of the Clementine Constitutions before quoted. There is some doubt about the meaning of the word "Pastophoria."[1] But it can hardly be denied that the constitution speaks of bearing the elements into a secluded place, a chapel or sacrarium of reservation. But the pious feeling of the faithful soon led to the use of a Ciborium in the open Church, a Columba, or Turris, or Armarium at the foot of the Cross; the form being immaterial, the principle being the maintenance in public of the sacramental presence of the reservation for perpetual Eucharistic adoration, and as the centre of Christian unity. The examples of this custom begin about the middle of the fifth century, and are numerous in the sixth century.

2. In the next place, may the host be carried out of the Church for any other purpose than the communion of the sick? If (as we have said) the reserved sacrament retains the sacramental presence of Christ, its proper place appears to be in the congregation assembled in Christ's name, that is, ordinarily, in the Church. But if the congregation, for purposes of worship, leave the Church, it would appear that the sacramental presence, the centre of their unity, may piously be borne with them. It is fearful to think of the consecrated host carried in procession merely to add to the pomp of an emperor or a bishop; but our sense of this abuse does not prevent us from conceiving, nor is it difficult to conceive, a body of Christian men in the procession of a litany holily and without superstition bearing with them the centre and symbol of their unity in Christ.[1]

Upon the whole, then, we may conclude that reservation for communion of the sick is a primitive custom, but not obligatory; it being in the power of the Church to consecrate instead, as occasion requires: and that the power of reserving being thus granted, other ends naturally and piously follow from it, which are at the discretion of the Church. [Missa Præsanctificatorum. Missa Sicca.]

RESERVATION OF BENEFICES. A privilege which the Pope assumes of reserving to himself the collation to any benefice on its becoming vacant, thus superseding its legitimate patron.

In this, as in purely spiritual things, the Papacy appears as the competitor or antagonist of the episcopate. In the earlier ages the bishops were the ordinary collators to all benefices. Their rights were narrowed by the growth of lay-patronage, which sprung up earlier in the East than in the West. But the chief infringements of their rights were by the Popes, whose claims were adverse, indeed, both to ecclesiastical and lay patrons, but were more successful against the former than against the latter.

The history of these encroachments begins with Gregory VII. [A.D. 1073], who asserts the power of the Holy See to create new abbeys, to divide rich bishoprics, and unite poor ones. But he lays no claim to a universal right of patronage. Hadrian IV. [A.D. 1154] appears first to have prayed, requested, and at last commanded the ordinaries to confer benefices by his recommendation. Alexander III. [A.D. 1159] not merely issued such mandates, but also sent officers to enforce their execution. He also compelled prebendaries to grant pensions to clerks of his nomination. Innocent III. [A.D. 1198] first asserted for the supreme pontiff the plenary power of disposing of all benefices, for the advantage of such persons as should have deserved well of the See of Rome. Clement IV. [A.D. 1265] reserved to himself all benefices of which the possessors died at Rome.[2] Clement V. [A.D. 1305] systematized the practice of holding benefices in commendam, dispensing with the canons against pluralities and non-residence. John XXII., his successor [A.D. 1316], not only extended the special reservation to whole dioceses, Aquileia, Milan, Ravenna, Genoa, and Pisa, but proclaimed the papal reservation of all benefices vacated by promotions through the grace of the Roman See, and of all bishopries in Christendom.

Thus the claim of the Holy See to appoint to all benefices was worked out into the abuses of reservations, provisions, dispensations, annates, commendams, pluralities. The claim was originally based on the doctrine of Gregory the Great, "Quisquis eligit, præsentat, instituit, præferre tenetur indigno dignum, digno digniorem." For the prerogative might seem necessarily vested in the universal bishop, enabling him by his higher episcopal authority to place the worthiest man in every office or function of the Universal Church [Thomassinus, Vetus et Nova Disciplina, part ii. lib. i. cap. xxxvii. Milman, Hist. Lat. Christ., xiii. 10, note, p. 312, vol. viii. ed. 1867]. And as an example of the better working of the system may be quoted the conduct of Benedict XII. [A.D. 1335], whose decretal, Ad regimen, embraces many reservations both old and new, but who was resolutely superior to the papal vice of nepotism; and of whom the continuators of Baronius justly observe, that he made these reservations for no other end than to give the benefices to the most worthy. But this is a rare example.

Against the system of reservations reforming councils were powerless. That of Vienne, for example [A.D. 1311], attempted in vain to deal with it. Immediately after, in 1313, Clement V. reserved the archbishopric of Canterbury, and in 1314 Walter Reynolds was translated from Worcester by papal provision.

Resistance was successful only when the powers of states were called into action. In France these papal abuses led to the Pragmatic Sanction. In England they were met by the Statutes of Provisors.[3] Of these there is a series from 25 Ed. III., Stat. 6 [A.D. 1350], to 3 Hen. V., c. 4 [A.D. 1415]. The first of these is that which is known as the Statute of Provisors. By it in case the Pope collated to any archbishopric, bishopric, dignity, or benefice in disturbance of free elections, collations or presentations, the collation to such benefice was to escheat to the Crown for one turn. Provisors were to be arrested and brought in to answer; if convicted, to be imprisoned till they had paid fine to the king at his will, and made "gree to the party that should feel himself grieved" [Gibson, Codex. tit. iii. cap. i., where see the petitions against provisions]. The later statutes confirm and enforce this, and add penalties for cognate offences.

While the papal reservations were one of the Pontificibus iter confidentibus præferendo*, Works, vol. i. p. 33; also Maskell, Monumenta Ritualia, iii. 366. There can be little hesitation in pronouncing the interment of the reserved host with the dead a gross abuse and profanation [see Bingham, XV. iv. 20].

[2] This is stated with some bitterness by the Roman Catholic author of The Pope and the Council, "Meanwhile the Popes had another gate open for attaining rights of patronage. A great number of bishops and prelates were drawn to Rome and detained there by processes spun out interminably. They died off by shoals in that unhealthy city, the home of fevers, as Peter Damiani calls it, and now suddenly a new papal right was devised, of giving away all benefices vacated by the death or resignation of their occupants at Rome. Clement IV. announced it to the world in 1266, while at the same time broadly affirming the right of the Pope to give away all Church offices without distinction" [transl. 1869, p. 175].

[3] "Provisores dicuntur, qui vel Episcopatum vel Ecclesiasticam aliam dignitatem in Romana Curia sibi ambiebant de futuro, quod ex gratia expectativa nunc-uparunt: quia usque dum vacaret, expectandum esset" [Spelman, Gloss.].

leading subjects in the concordats between different states and the see of Rome [CONCORDAT], the Council of Trent endeavoured to reform their abuses. The matter was certainly included, though not specified, in the first article of reformation proposed by the Emperor's ambassadors, which was, that the Pope would be content to make a just reformation of himself and the court of Rome. It was specified by the Spaniards, who spoke of divers abuses, and shewed that the fountain of them all was the court of Rome, which is not only corrupt in itself, but the cause of deformation in all churches; and particularly the usurpation of the episcopal authority by reservations, which if it were not restored, and the court deprived of that which they have taken from bishops, it would be impossible the abuses should be redressed [Sarpi's Hist. by Brent, pp. 513, 588]. In the twenty-fourth session, De Reformatione, it was decreed that no ecclesiastical person, though a cardinal, shall have more than one benefice; that candidates and presentees shall be examined, and not admitted unless found to be fit; that expectative graces for benefices shall not be granted hereafter, nor any other extending to benefices not yet vacant, and that mental reservations shall be prohibited. [Decretum de Ref., sess. xxiv. c. xvii. xviii. xix.]

The rules regarding collations to benefices in the different states of Europe may be seen in the Report of a Committee of the House of Commons on the regulation of Roman Catholic subjects, A.D. 1816.

RESERVE. That which is now called "the doctrine of reserve" is an example of the mode in which truths which were once latent in the Catholic faith develope themselves into distinct articles of doctrine. That God had always exercised reserve in the communication of religious knowledge to mankind, and that the Saviour had not only done the same in His intercourse with the world, but also charged His Apostles to act upon the same principle, may be deduced from Holy Scripture. This had never been controverted, and therefore had never been termed a doctrine until about thirty years ago. In 1839, No. 80 of the Tracts for the Times appeared, of which Isaac Williams was the author. The title which this tract bore was, On Reserve in communicating Religious Knowledge, and in it the principle of reserve which pervades all God's dealings was contrasted with the free circulation of the Scriptures, the education of children in all the doctrines of the Christian faith without provision for their leading holy lives at home, and the prevalent opinion that no sermon could be profitable in which the doctrine of the Atonement was not the prevailing theme. This was followed by Tract 87, in which the Disciplina Arcani of the ancient Church, and many passages from the Fathers, were produced as evidence of the antiquity and universality of this doctrine. A warm controversy arose, but, as it was not the theory of reserve so much as its practical application which aroused it, the excitement was soon allayed, and in a few years the controversy was scarcely ever heard of. The doctrine may rather be called the observation of God's dealings with men, of which the following particulars may be given.

I. That God revealed Himself only gradually to the world. The Father was first made known, afterwards the Son, and lastly, the Holy Ghost; and in the days which preceded the Mosaic dispensation it was not to all men, but to a faithful few, as to Noah, Abraham, and Lot, that He revealed Himself.

II. That under the Mosaic dispensation the revelation of religious truth was veiled under the types and shadows of the Law. The Jews generally regarded only the outward rites, but those who were taught of God saw something deeper than the external sign, and looked through it to the fulfilment which it was to receive under the Gospel dispensation. This was the secret of the Lord which was with them that feared Him. It was, for instance, of long life and an inheritance in Canaan that God spake openly, but there were those who could interpret them as signs of an unending life in heaven.

III. In all God's providential acts it is the same. He is a God that hideth Himself. He reveals Himself only as men have faith to receive Him, and the same dispensation in which He manifests Himself to one blinds yet more entirely the heart of another. If He were to reveal Himself openly and be rejected, the guilt of the sinner would be overwhelming, and therefore He hides Himself from men who are not prepared to receive Him.

IV. When our Saviour was on earth the same principle was manifested in His intercourse with men. His glory was hidden from the world and only revealed to the favoured disciples when He was transfigured before them. In the performance of His miracles He did not seek observation; and the devils He charged that they should not make Him known. He enjoined secrecy on some whom He had miraculously cured. He spoke unto His disciples as they were able to bear it, not telling them of His sufferings until He had first prepared them for the announcement. He spoke to the people in parables, but the explanation he reserved for His disciples, and He told them that if they would know the doctrine they must first do the will of God. After His resurrection, moreover, He did not manifest Himself unto the world, but unto witnesses chosen before of God. In all this there appears a studied concealment united to an earnest desire to reveal Himself. The reason of this was, that the full manifestation of Himself as the Son of God would have increased the guilt of those who received Him not, and therefore He concealed Himself from those who were without the moral qualifications which enabled them to receive them. Even to His disciples His words were as dark sayings, and many of them remained so until the sanctifying influences of the Holy Spirit were shed abroad in their hearts.

V. This principle of reserve He enjoined upon His apostles, when he forbade them to cast pearls before swine, or give that which was holy unto dogs. We find, therefore, in the sermons of the Apostles, recorded in the Acts, a remarkable absence of the deepest and holiest truths of the Gospel. It was some simple fact that they insisted on, such as the Resurrection or the Messiahship of Christ. There was a difference between the sermons which they preached to the unbaptized and those that were designed to edify believers. And even to them the deepest mysteries of the Gospel were not all at once unfolded, but instruction was suited to the moral capacity of hearers for receiving it. There was milk for babes and strong meat for those of full stature. Heb. v. 12. [DISCIPLINA ARCANI. Tracts for the Times, 80, 87. Isaac Williams on the Study of the Gospels, part ii.]

RESERVED CASES. Great crimes reserved for the spiritual cognizance, first, of the Pope or his legate, secondly, of the ordinary.

The Council of Trent, in dealing with this question, stated the general principle that the absolution must needs be ineffectual which is pronounced by a priest to those over whom he has no ordinary or delegated jurisdiction; then that it is right that absolution for greater crimes should be given only to the higher order of priests; that accordingly the Pope, by virtue of his supreme authority, rightly reserves certain cases to himself; that bishops, "quando omnia quæ a Deo sunt constituta sunt," have a superior power, "supra reliquos inferiores sacerdotes," especially as regards those crimes which are punishable by excommunication; that this reservation is valid, not only "in externa politia," but also "coram Deo," there being, however, no reservation "in articulo mortis." Founded upon this decree is the canon against those who deny the power of reservation. [Conc. Trid., sess. xiv.; De Pœn. Dec. c. vii. can. xi.]

I. The cases reserved to the Pope are twenty-five in number; and the catalogue of them is instructive. [1] Laying violent hands on clergy or monks; [2] hostile aggression on a cardinal; [3] or on a bishop; [4] simony and "confidentia[1] realis;" [5] arson, when the criminal has been publicly denounced; [6] spoliation of church goods; [7] falsifying papal letters; [8] communion of a clergyman with an excommunicate; [9] partaking in the crime for which a man is under papal excommunication; [10] compelling to celebrate divine offices in a place under interdict; [11] excommunicates remaining in church after warning; [12] administration by Religious of sacraments without leave of parish priest, and unlicensed absolving from canonical or synodical sentences; [13] supplying infidels with arms; [14] secular clergy inducing men to bind themselves to be interred in their churches; [15] without license giving absolution in reserved cases; [16] taking fee or reward for receiving into a religious society; [17] religious mendicants passing into another order, except the Carthusian, and the receiving them; [18] charging with heresy the affirmers of the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin; [19] malicious delay of judgment in beneficiary matters; [20] Religious betaking themselves without license to infidel lands; [21] mangling the dead to carry their bones elsewhere for interment; [22] coining in France; [23] doing papal business by proxy; [24] inquisitors neglecting their duty through humanity; [25] buying justice or favour in the court of Rome.

These cases may be seen, as stated at length, with the authority for each, in Richard et Giraud, Bibliothèque Sacrée, art. Cas Réservés.

II. The cases reserved to ordinaries vary in some measure according to the customs of different dioceses. A specified list may be seen in Johnson's Canons, A.D. 1363, Constit. 5. [Constitutions of Thoresby, Archbishop of York.] Gross sins of violence, lust, blasphemy, perjury, sorcery, breach of lawful vows, falsifying documents, offences against the rules of holy orders or of the sacraments, are reserved.

The chief rules regarding reservations are the following:—No venial sin can be reserved, because confession of it is not compulsory. No sin whatever of a man "in articulo mortis" can be reserved. The sin must be consummated, not merely attempted, and a sin not merely of will, but of word or action. It must also be sufficiently proved. The terms of a permission to absolve in such cases are to be liberally construed. No argument is to be drawn from a comparison of sins as to what is reserved and what is not reserved. Under the ages of fourteen and twelve, for male and female, there is no reservation.

This reservation of cases, as matters of spiritual cognizance, is distinct from the earlier reference of causes to the appellate jurisdiction of Rome. No very high antiquity appears to be claimed for the power. The exercise of it is stated to be from the eleventh century, the Councils of Vienne [A.D. 1311] and of Arles [A.D. 1260] being quoted.

RESTITUTION is the making reparation or satisfaction to another for injuries done to him, and is reckoned an essential part of repentance by moral theologians of every school.

The Mosaic Law contained very particular and exact details in respect to the duty of restitution. If a man stole an ox, he was to restore fivefold, or a sheep, fourfold, but if the theft was found in the hands of the thief, he was to restore double [Exod. xxii. 1-4]. Restitution was also required in the case of other injuries, and the circumstances of different cases are specified as minutely as in the penitentials of the Christian Church.

The principle of restitution being part of the moral law of Moses, was adopted in the Christian Church. It was inculcated by our Lord [Matt. v. 23-26]. Zaccheus not only gave half his goods to the poor, but restored fourfold to any one whom he had formerly wronged. In Eph. iv. 28, St. Paul shews how the principle of restitution was to be extended. He who had once been a robber must not only cease from theft, but must labour with his hands that he might restore what he had wrongfully taken away, but in case those whom he had wronged could not be found, restitution should be made to the poor.

In the Tridentine Catechism, part ii. q. 73, it is taught that absolution cannot be given to men who do not promise to make restitution. There are seven kinds of persons besides the actual perpetrators of an injury of whom restitution must be required:—1. Those who commanded a wrong to be done. 2. Those who persuaded others to do it. 3. Those who consented to it. 4. Those who partook of the gains. 5. Those who did not prevent it when it was in their power to do so. 6. Those who knew of the deed when it was done and did not declare it, or pretended that they were ignorant of it. 7. Those who fostered or concealed the doer of the wrong [Tridentine Catechism, part iii. cap. 8]. Sons and wives inheriting ill-gotten gains are bound to make restitution. The duty of restitution also extends to the repair, as far as possible, of injuries inflicted on the souls of others by evil example, bad advice, &c.

Although the Church of England has put forth no authoritative statement on the subject of restitution, with the exception of the Homily on repentance, yet all divines have agreed that without this repentance cannot be sincere or acceptable to God. It is one of those moral questions in which the statements of the Churches of England and Rome essentially agree, although their modes of definition may differ; for that which, according to the English view, belongs to amendment of life, is, according to the Roman view, a part of satisfaction, which is but another term for amendment of life. In the book which Henry VIII. wrote against Luther, he charged him with misrepresenting the Church, by affirming that the people were not instructed in the necessity of reforming their manners. "This," said the king, "is a notorious calumny, for what priest was ever so ignorant as to enjoin penance for former miscarriage, and at the same time give an indulgence for repetition? What priest, when he gives absolution, does not suggest those words of our blessed Saviour, 'Go, and sin no more?' Who does not put his penitent in mind of St. Paul's exhortation, 'As ye have yielded your members servants unto iniquity, even so now yield your members servants unto holiness?' What confessor is unacquainted with St. Gregory's description of repentance? 'To repent,' says this Father, 'is to lament our faults and not repeat them, for he that returns to the commission of what he is sorry for, either knows nothing of repentance or else dissembles in his compunction.'" [Taylor's Holy Living, c. iii. sect. 4. Method of Devotion for Sick and Dying Persons, by Dr. W. Assheton, A.D. 1706. Visitatio Infirmorum, Cope and Stretton, p. 614.]

RESTORATION OF THE CREATURE. [SPIRIT. NEW CREATION.]

RESURRECTION OF CHRIST. Very early in the course of our Lord's ministry the Jews asked Him for a "sign" by which to vindicate His authoritative act in clearing the temple, and our Lord gave them, in mystical language, that of His resurrection, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up" [John ii. 19], words which the Evangelist says "He spake of the temple of His Body." Later on in His ministry, when a similar demand was made by "certain of the Scribes and Pharisees," "He answered and said unto them, An evil and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign; and there shall no sign be given to it, but the sign of the prophet Jonas: for as Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth" [Matt. xii. 39, 40]. To His disciples He spoke with greater plainness, ending the prediction of His Passion with the words "and the third day He shall rise again" [Matt. xvi. 21, xx. 19; Mark viii. 31, ix. 31, x. 34; Luke xviii. 33]. The disciples "understood not that saying," "questioning one with another what the rising from the dead should mean" [Mark ix. 10, 32]; and the understanding of the words seems only to have come to them when recalled by the angel to the memory of those who went to the empty tomb [Luke xxiv. 7, 8]. But our Lord seems to have made the idea of His Resurrection familiar to them and to the Jews as if it were the foundation stone of doctrine respecting His work, and the crowning evidence respecting His person. So familiar had it become to the Jews that the saying as to the temple was brought against Him by His accusers [Matt. xxvi. 61]; and after His Crucifixion the Sanhedrim made His words, "After three days I will rise again," their plea for the placing of a Roman guard over the sepulchre [Matt. xxvii. 63-66].

The event which our Lord thus predicted was one of a surprising character, and one which could only be believed on very strong evidence: and yet its actual accomplishment was at once established as a fact which rested on evidence that could not be confuted; a fact acknowledged by those who had set the watch and sealed the stone, publicly declared without fear of contradiction by St. Peter, within two months' time, in the streets of the city where Christ had been conspicuously put to death; made the great subject of Apostolic preaching when they went forth among Jews and Gentiles "preaching Jesus and the resurrection from the dead;" and declared by St. Paul to be so completely the corner stone of Christian doctrine that he could say, "If Christ be not risen then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain" [1 Cor. xv. 14]. Such an unfaltering and unreserved declaration of our Lord's resurrection, as an actual fact, shews that the proof of it was of a character that made it incontrovertible, and a short recapitulation of the evidence as it has come down to us—there may have been much more extant in Apostolic times—may not be without its value in days when assertions are made that are, in reality, of a most unhistorical kind, calling in question the truth so universally confessed in all ages by the Church.

This evidence of our Lord's Resurrection begins with the fact of His burial. In respect to this the unbelief of a large portion of the Sanhedrim in the mission of Jesus led them to take steps which formed a remarkable and most important link in the chain of proof. They made an official representation to the Roman governor that Jesus having predicted His resurrection they feared His disciples might steal away His dead body with the view of proving by its absence that His words had come true. "Sir, we remember that that deceiver said, while He was yet alive, After three days I will rise again. Command therefore that the sepulchre be made sure until the third day, lest His disciples come by night, and steal Him away, and say unto the people, He is risen from the dead: so the last error shall be worse than the first" [Matt. xxvii. 63, 64]. Pilate acceded to their request, giving them a "watch" or guard of four soldiers, and bade them "make it as sure as ye can. So they went and made the sepulchre sure, sealing the stone, and setting a watch." Before doing this they would certainly make sure that the body of Jesus was actually in the sepulchre and, having done so, this evidence of its deposit there was confirmed by the seal of the Sanhedrim affixed to the stone with which the mouth of the tomb was closed. In the morning, however, some of the Roman soldiers who had formed the watch came and told the chief priests of the appearance of the angel, the rolling away of the stone, and the resurrection to life of Him Whose death and burial had been so authoritatively evidenced by the Roman governor and by themselves. They had no doubt as to the truthfulness of the soldiers' story, but at once assembled the Sanhedrim again, and having "taken counsel, they gave large money unto the soldiers, saying, Say ye, His disciples came by night, and stole Him away while we slept;" and because such misconduct on the part of Roman soldiers was punishable with death they added, "And if this come to the governor's ears, we will persuade him, and secure you" [Matt. xxviii. 11-14]. The soldiers took the money and did as they were taught, and the story was "commonly reported" among the Jews. And yet few could have believed a story which was so full of the grossest improbabilities. "The fabrication was an idle tale, because it is impossible to imagine that while four soldiers were slumbering at their post, a stone that was too heavy for the united strength of three women to move, should have been rolled aside without rousing the sleeping guard; and that the dead body should have been removed from the sepulchre by a party of the disciples, with so little sound of voice or foot as not to betray the act. It was idle, for the disciples had forsaken the Lord and fled, and a deed, that required no common amount of courage and daring, was ascribed to men who were so broken in spirit and lost to hope, that when they began to rally after the resurrection of the Lord, and to meet together, still it was with 'closed doors, for fear of the Jews.' It was hardly in this spirit that they could have gone forth at the dead of night, through a city thronged with paschal devotees, and braved the danger of a certain collision with four armed and reckless soldiers, whom they knew to be faithfully watching over their trust. It was idle, again, because from the dawn of day the attention of a whole population must have been turned upon these few men by the marvellous story; and what hope could they have had of effectually concealing the stolen body, or of guarding against its production in evidence of their deed? It was idle, again, because the Roman governor, Pilate, could not fail to hear of an event that had been discussed by a special meeting of the Sanhedrim, and had become a matter of public notoriety in a city filled with his agents and emissaries. The very statement whereby the Jews attempted to account for the grave despoiled of its tenant, if it had been less a fiction, would have involved the necessity of a public inquiry and a public example. The four soldiers would have been amenable to punishment for their remissness, and the disciples for their daring crime against the majesty of the Roman laws. Whether or no the rulers persuaded the Roman governor and secured the soldiery we know not; but we do know, that the disciples were never taxed with the offence by Pilate; they never attempted to secrete themselves, nor to escape home to the rocky shores of the Lake of Gennesareth. They remained for a week at least, where guilty men would never have been found, at Jerusalem. But it is needless to multiply reasons to shew the infatuation and want of common forethought in the Jewish council, when they put their money into the hands, and this self-convicting falsehood into the mouths, of the Roman soldiers; truly it was an 'open triumph' that they were giving to the Christian cause" [Harvey's Creeds, p. 352].

The heathen soldiers seem to have been eye-witnesses of the Resurrection; or if, in their terror at the sight of the angel, they failed to see the revived body of Jesus passing from the sepulchre, the supernatural circumstances and the empty sepulchre convinced them beyond doubt of the fact. But whether or not they saw the risen body of Jesus, it was soon made visible to some of His disciples. At day-dawn on Easter morning Mary Magdalen, Mary the mother of James, Salome, Joanna, "and other women that were with them" [Matt. xxviii. 1; Mark xvi. 1; Luke xxiv. 1, 10], went to the sepulchre for the purpose of embalming the Holy Body of their Lord, not knowing all the details of His hurried burial, nor of the Sanhedrim seal and the Roman guard. On their way they ask who is to move away the heavy stone for them: but they find it already moved, and an angel announces to them that He Whom they seek is not there but risen. "Come, see the place where the Lord lay." And when they entered in they "found not the body of the Lord Jesus."[1] This visit of the holy women to the tomb was shortly followed by that of St. Peter and St. John, who also went within,

[1] Some consider that there were two separate companies of women, who each brought spices, the one led by Mary Magdalen, the other by Joanna the wife of Herod's steward. [See Greswell's Harm. Evangel. 393, and Dissert. iii. 257.]

and found that the body of Jesus was gone, but that the linen cloths which had been wrapped about it were laid there in an orderly manner, doubtless by the angels who had taken the place of the Roman guard.

So far the evidence, to the disciples at least, was chiefly of a negative kind: they saw the empty sepulchre, and were told that Jesus had risen. But positive evidence was given within a very short time afterwards by the appearance of the risen Jesus Himself; and this evidence was repeated over and over again during the space of forty days; ten such appearances before His ascension being recorded.

The first of all His disciples who actually saw the risen Jesus was Mary Magdalen, to whom He spoke, but whom He forbad to touch Him [Mark xvi. 9-11; John xx. 11-18]. On the same day He was seen, and entertained by the two disciples at Emmaus [Mark xvi. 12; Luke xxiv. 13], appearing also to Simon [Luke xxiv. 34], and to ten of the eleven remaining apostles [1 Cor. xv. 5], to whom collectively He proved that He was not a spirit, but the same Jesus Whom they had known so long. "Behold My hands and My feet, that it is I Myself: handle Me and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see Me have. And when He had thus spoken He shewed them His hands and His feet;" and for more effectual confirmation of His bodily reality, took from their hands "a piece of broiled fish and of an honeycomb, and did eat before them" [Luke xxiv. 36-43; John xx. 19, 20]. On the octave of that first Easter Day our Lord again appeared among the apostles, when St. Thomas, who had not been with the other ten before, was now present; and a fresh confirmation of the reality was given to take away the incredulity of that apostle, "Reach hither thy finger, and behold My hands; and reach hither thy hand and thrust it into My side; and be not faithless, but believing" [John xx. 26, 27]. A sixth time Jesus appeared to the eleven on "the mountain in Galilee where He had appointed them" to meet Him [Matt. xxviii. 16]. A seventh time He was seen by "above five hundred brethren at once;" then by St. James [1 Cor. xv. 6, 7]; a ninth time by seven of the apostles at the Sea of Tiberias [John xxi. 1, 2], "the third time" to them in one collected body; and lastly by all the apostles again, when He ascended up to heaven in their sight [Luke xxiv. 50].

During the succession of interviews with His apostles and other disciples, our Lord condescended to give them proofs, that there was a perfect identity between His human nature before and after His resurrection. This was a fact so wonderful and so seemingly improbable to those who had as yet no clear understanding what the resurrection of the body meant that the apostles were only led to a perfect conviction of it by a gradual re-assertion of our Lord's Manhood and Godhead. He was made known to them first by the recognition of His love. His sheep know His voice, and He calleth them by their name. So in the garden He said, "Mary," and in the upper chamber, "Peace be unto you." He revealed Himself in the breaking of bread as the same Jesus Who had given them the tokens of His love on the eve of the Passover, saying, "This is My Body," "This is My Blood." He convinced them, still probably doubting the reality of what they saw—because His glorified body passed in and out uncontrolled by the laws of ordinary corporeal substance,—that He was not merely the spirit of Jesus, but the very Man in body and soul Who had been nailed to the Cross, and had cried, "Father, into Thy hands I commend My spirit." And by the evidence of a wondrous miracle in which He displayed His providential power over the natural world, they were taught that the perfect Man was still the perfect God. In all this it was shewn that He Who had risen the third day from the dead, was in person, and power, and love, the very Jesus Who had been taken down from the Cross and laid in the cave of the rock, He Who came down from heaven, was Incarnate, and made Man; and by such evidence, as well, perhaps, as by much more which is unrecorded, "He shewed Himself alive after His passion" to His apostles "by many infallible proofs" [Acts i. 3], so that they could go forth to the world with the fullest confidence in the truth of His resurrection, and act on His words, "Ye are witnesses of these things" [Luke xxiv. 48; Acts i. 8, ii. 32, iii. 15, x. 40, 41]. They could henceforth declare not only the love of One Who had died, but the power of One Who had risen again.

For that Resurrection was, in fact, a triumphant victory over death, which had hitherto been conquering men ever since the Fall. Christ had within Him an inalienable principle of life, so that "it was not possible that He should be holden of death" [Acts ii. 24]. He willed that His holy body should be separated from His soul, but it neither was nor could be any more separated from His Divine nature, and when by His descent into hell He had begun His victory in the world of spirits, then the will of His Godhead united body and soul together again; and His reappearance among men assured them of the truth contained in His own words, "I have power to lay down" My life, "and I have power to take it again" [John x. 18]. When therefore He said, "Because I live," His words are such as those of the Evangelist, "In Him was life" [John i. 4], and they were meant to convey the truth which He taught at other times when He said, "I am the resurrection and the life" [John xi. 25]; "As the Father hath life in Himself, so hath He given to the Son to have life in Himself" [John v. 26]. And as often as He alluded to the resurrection of the faithful dead, He named it as a consequence flowing from the life which is inherent in Himself. When therefore it is said that God the Father raised Christ from the dead [Gal. i. 1], it is not to be understood as an act of the First Person of the Blessed Trinity apart from our Lord's divine nature: but as one in which there was a perfect co-operation, so that the Lord's own words, "Destroy this Temple, and in three days I will raise it up"

[John ii. 19], were equally fulfilled, when He raised that Temple in which "dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily" [Col. ii. 9] by the will and act of that Godhead.

This complete evidence of our Lord's resurrection was then given to His Apostles, and through them to the Church, first, as a confirmation of His previous mission, so that there might be no doubt whatever that this was in reality He Who had redeemed Israel in the true, spiritual sense of REDEMPTION [Luke xxiv. 21]; secondly, as a proof of His continued existence and care, so that they might believe and trust in a still living Lord, even when He was removed out of their sight; thirdly, that the proof of His inherent Life, and the example of His resurrection, might be a pledge for His communication of that Life to others, and for the entire fulfilment of that hope of a future resurrection which the elder saints had perseveringly though vaguely entertained.

RESURRECTION OF THE BODY. Like other important doctrines, this was imperfectly known under the Mosaic dispensation, but intimated with greater or less clearness by the prophets and in the later period of Jewish history before the coming of Christ. Without referring to the well-known passage of Job [xix. 22-27], the meaning of which is doubtful, though it was interpreted as in the English Version by one of the Apostolical Fathers [St. Clement, Epist. i. sec. 26], we read in Isaiah [xxvi. 19], "Thy dead men shall rise, together with My dead body shall they arise; . . . the earth shall cast out the dead;" and in Ezekiel's vision of the valley which was full of bones, "Son of man, can these bones live? And I answered, O Lord God, Thou knowest. . . . So I prophesied, as He commanded me, and the breath came into them, and they lived, and stood upon their feet, an exceeding great army" [xxxvii. 3, 10]. Hosea says, "I will ransom them from the power of the grave; I will redeem them from death: O death I will be thy plagues; O grave I will be thy destruction" [xiii. 14]; and Daniel more clearly, "Many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt" [xii. 2]. In the Apocrypha, the doctrine of the resurrection as an article of Jewish belief is plainly declared [2 Macc. vii. 9]; and in our Lord's days the sister of Lazarus uttered a well-known and generally acknowledged truth, "I know that my brother shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day" [John xi. 24].

But the doctrine of the Resurrection, though at our Lord's Advent held by the Pharisees, was not universally received; it was denied by the sect of the Sadducees. They proposed a question to our Lord [Matt. xxii.], that of a woman who had married seven husbands, inquiring whose wife she should be of the seven on rising from the dead. Our Lord replied by stating that in the Resurrection the righteous shall not marry, nor be given in marriage, but be as the angels; and also by shewing that the doctrine of the Resurrection was in a certain sense intimated in the Law, where God is said to be the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, since He could not be the God of those who were no longer in existence after death. Our Lord might perhaps allude to the Rabbinical saying, "They have no part in the world to come who say the Law is not from heaven, or that the Resurrection cannot be proved from the Law." [Schoettgen, in loc.] But His words, though clearly implying that the patriarchs are still in existence, fall far short of shewing that their bodies will at last be raised from the dust.

The doctrine of the Resurrection of the body, before our Lord's coming, Who brought life and immortality to light, was rather an opinion held by Jewish sects than an article of assured faith. Besides even the prophet Daniel only speaks of "some" awaking from the dust of the earth: a passage not universally interpreted by Jewish writers as referring to the future resurrection of the dead.[1] Even the Pharisees did not believe that all the dead would be raised, but only the bodies of the righteous. They also held the belief of a transmigration of souls.[2] [Wisd. viii. 10; John ix. 2.] Josephus speaks of the righteous entering into "another body," an expression which will bear at least a sound meaning [Acts xxiii. 6].

In our Lord's teaching we find a distinct revelation of this doctrine. Thus He says, "all that are in the graves shall hear His voice and come forth; they that have done good to the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil to the resurrection of damnation" [John v. 28, 29]. After the Crucifixion, an apostle was chosen in place of Judas to bear witness of Christ's Resurrection [Acts i. 22, 23]; and the Apostles began their ministry by preaching "through Jesus the resurrection from the dead." [Acts iv. 2; see also 1 Thess. iv. 14.] The new doctrine was opposed and blasphemed by Pagan unbelievers. When St. Paul preached at Athens, on hearing of the resurrection of the dead, "some mocked" [Acts xvii. 32]; and on his pleading in defence of the Gospel before the Jews and Agrippa, the doctrine of the resurrection was the great objection to his teaching [Acts xxvi. 8]. All the early Fathers maintain and defend this doctrine—St. Clement of Rome,[3] St. Justin,[4] Tatian,[5] St. Athenagoras,[6] Tertullian,[7] Minucius Felix,[8] and Origen.[9] Even in the fifth century, St. Augustine says that the doctrine of the Resurrection of the Body was the greatest stumbling-block to the conversion of the heathen.[1] The same testimony is given by the sufferings of the martyrs: their relics were dispersed or thrown into rivers, to prevent, as the heathen supposed, the possibility of a resurrection. Also from inscriptions in the catacombs, which were called cemeteries or sleeping-places: portions reserved for certain families, being called cubicula (bedrooms); well-known symbols of the resurrection being everywhere sculptured, as Jonah cast forth from the whale's belly, the phœnix rising from its ashes, Lazarus from the grave: and from the fact that the departed Christian was turned with his face towards the east, that he might at once behold and arise to meet the Lord at His coming. If any statement, indeed, can be regarded as certain and unquestionable, it is the unanimous belief of the early Christians in the resurrection of the body—proved alike from their own distinct and oft-repeated statements, and from the scoffs of heathen unbelievers, who treated the doctrine as an old woman's fable (anîles fabulas) worthy only of contempt and derision.

[1] See Cor. à Lap. in loc., who, according to the general teaching of the Fathers, considers that the future resurrection of the dead is here predicted. He says, "Omnes dormientes qui sunt multi et pœne innumeri resurgent, sive tota multitudo dormientium quæ plurima est resurget. Sensus est, omnes qui mortui sunt resurgent. Sic 'multi' capitur pro 'omnes.' [Rom. v. 19; Matt. xxvi. 28.] . . . Quod vero Rabbini aliqui putant Judæos ab Antiocho oppressos hic vocari mortuos, eorumque liberationem vocari resurrectionem insulsum est; nec enim Judæi tunc resurrexerunt ad vitam æternam, quod tamen de mortuis hisce dicitur."

[2] Thus Josephus, who was a Pharisee and held the doctrine of the transmigration of souls, says, "All souls are incorruptible, but the souls of good men only will enter into other bodies, while the souls of bad men are tormented with everlasting punishment." [Jewish Wars, bk. ii. c. 8.]

But the very important question has been asked both in ancient and modern times, What is meant by the resurrection of the body? does the body, after its dissolution in the dust, arise with every portion reproduced or restored as in its earthly state? If so, the doctrine is beset with innumerable and apparently insuperable difficulties. The same body which was committed to the grave, as Holy Scripture teaches or implies, is raised, but the important inquiry is—What is necessary to constitute identity or sameness? The human body may be described as a floating mass of particles which are undergoing perpetual change: not one portion of matter which formed the body of a child belongs to him when arrived at mature age. There is unceasing alteration, the passing away of old particles and the accretion of new, and yet most mysteriously the identity of the body remains; it is certain that the body of a child, on his becoming man, continues the same body, though the particles of which it has been composed have been repeatedly changed. Identity, therefore, cannot depend upon this floating mass of particles of which the body is composed, but on something which is unchangeable and indestructible. A modern writer who has examined the subject with great ability supposes, that it consists in a germ or stamen which preserves the identity of the body through all its stages of existence. "By the word germ or stamen," the writer says, "I understand a certain principle of future being which was lodged in the human body at its primary formation; which has 'grown with its growth' through all the intermediate changes of life; which constitutes perpetual sameness, and which shall form the rudiments of our future bodies. That it shall remain for ever as a radical and immoveable principle; and shall either collect matter around it, which collected matter shall adhere for ever, or contain within itself all those particles which are necessary to constitute those bodies which we shall perpetually possess.

"On its magnitude and dimensions I will not presume even to risk a thought; and the recess of its residence which, while included in the present vehicle, is perhaps of such a nature as will not admit of investigation. It may be diffused throughout the present body by an innate expansive power which it possesses, and by the shock of death it may be capable of such contraction as to render it impervious to attack, and invulnerable by all assaults. During its repose in the grave it will no doubt be preserved from incorporating with the identity of other bodies, and from putting forth any operations except such as are peculiar to its state.

"We see this principle of sameness perfectly preserved in every species of grain which is around us; and we can have no kind of conception that a germ of future wheat can by any possible process become a constituent part of a grain of rye or of barley. This strange commixture would break down the order which God has established in the empire of nature, and finally tend to banish sameness from the world. The identity of grain must therefore be preserved, and if the identity of grain must be preserved, why should we suppose that the germ of future life (in which consists the identity of the body, and which is now lodged within its confines) should be swallowed up in diversity sooner than that of a simple grain with which St. Paul has compared it? The same power which has preserved, and does preserve the one, can, without doubt, preserve the other also. The order and harmony of all nature require it. In the case of grain, events have fully demonstrated it; and the veracity of God is engaged to ensure to us the certainty of its preservation in man. And the evidence is of equal validity in both cases so far as the progress of time will identify the correspondent analogy."[2]

In the Gospel it is expressly stated in a passage already quoted, that the bodies of all the dead will be raised, but we are not told whether or not every portion of the body sown in corruption will be restored or reproduced, nor if this be necessary to constitute personal identity. The teaching of St. Paul must be especially investigated, as being the only inspired writer who has illustrated the subject [1 Cor. xv.]. The question bearing on the point in dispute is asked and answered, "How are the dead raised up, and with what body do they come?" The Apostle replies by an illustration from the vegetable world, "That which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be, but mere grain, as of wheat or of other grain, to each of which God gives a body of its own kind." The Apostle here expressly says that the resurrection body is not the same as the earthly body sown in corruption: which he confirms by stating that the body sown is a natural body, and the body raised is a spiritual body, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, neither doth corruption inherit incorruption—and thus we must be changed. The resurrection body springs from the body sown in the earth, just as a plant springs from its seed, which, apparently dying, puts forth new powers and rises into perfect and fully matured life. But though it be true that the resurrection body is not the same as the body sown in corruption; yet, viewed from another point, it is undoubtedly true, according to St. Paul's illustration, that it is the same body. The seed is really identical with the plant that springs from it; it is the plant itself, though in an undeveloped state. Hence the Apostle says, the body is sown in corruption and raised in incorruption—the same body, but transfigured, glorified, and changed into a spiritual body. Thus it appears certain from St. Paul's illustrations that it is not necessary to personal identity that the body in its present or earthly state should be reproduced: the earthly body may, in a certain sense, be said to perish at death[1] ("if our house of this tabernacle were dissolved," καταλυθῇ, 2 Cor. v. 1), or rather reappears with a true identity in a spiritual and glorified body, which in substance must be identical with our earthly body, as is clearly implied by the Apostle's illustration of the seed and the plant.

On considering the teaching of the early Church, we find two different opinions on the resurrection—a gross and sensuous one, which some thought was necessarily implied by the doctrine, and a more spiritual explanation founded on the teaching of St. Paul. Thus Justin Martyr, in the fragments of his lost work on the Resurrection, speaks of God collecting together the decomposed members of the flesh, and uniting them again to the body as in their former state.[2] Tatian, his disciple, says, "Though my flesh be destroyed by fire, the world receives the vapourized matter (ἐξατμισθεῖσαν τὴν ὕλην), and though I be drowned in rivers and in seas, or torn in pieces by beasts, I am laid up in the treasury of a rich Lord."[3] Athenagoras mentions, as a common objection of the heathen to the Resurrection, the practice of cannibalism (the body of one man thus becoming a part of the substance of another), to which he replies by asserting that human flesh eaten by man is not turned into the substance of the eater[4]—a statement manifestly incorrect. We find similar language on the resurrection body in Minucius Felix[5] and the Apostolical Constitutions.[6]

Another view of the Resurrection was held by some of the Fathers, chiefly founded on the teaching of St. Paul. Tertullian maintained against Gnostic and other heretics the resurrection of the body or the flesh.[7] In his treatise against Marcion,[8] he fully admits the obvious inferences from St. Paul's teaching: thus he says, "We do not claim the kingdom of God for the flesh but for the substance thereof, it will be no longer [the former] flesh and blood, but the body which God has given it." St. Gregory Nyssen maintains, according to St. Paul's teaching, that the resurrection body will not be formed by a re-collection of dissolved elements (συνδρομὴ στοιχείων), and that such an opinion is represented by the Apostle as foolish, "thou fool" [1 Cor. xv. 35]; he says that the resurrection body is not the same as the mortal body, nor yet wholly different from it; that one, in St. Paul's words, is the seed, and the other the plant that springs from it in new form and beauty.[9] St. Basil terms the resurrection of the body a "creation,"[10] comparing the body in corruption to the chrysalis, and the glorified body to the beautiful insect springing from it.[11] The teaching of Origen on the subject is uncertain: sometimes he wholly denies the resurrection, and yet in other passages maintains the doctrine of St. Paul, that as the plant from the seed so the same body will rise in glory and immortality: his followers, like the Gnostic and Manichæan heretics, rejected in every sense the doctrine, and were anathematized by the fifth General Council.[12]

A few words may be added on the nature of the resurrection body as brought before us in Scripture and by the Fathers. St. Paul tells us that it will be fashioned like unto Christ's glorious body [Phil. iii. 21], and St. John, "that when Christ shall appear we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is" [1 John iii. 2]. In the account of our Lord's transfigured body, "His face did shine as the sun, and His raiment was white as the light" [Matt. xvii. 2], or as St. Mark says "as no fuller on earth can whiten them" [ix. 3]. And when St. John saw the glorified humanity of the Redeemer, he "fell at His feet as dead" [Rev. i. 17].

St. Augustine describes the qualities of the resurrection body; its impassibility, as being no longer in a mortal condition liable to earthly wants and sufferings;[13] its brightness according to the merits of the redeemed;[1] and its agility divested of the characteristics of the present body[2] (sine onere et pondere), there will also be, he teaches, a mutual knowledge of each other by the saints: not merely as of acquaintances, friends, or relatives; but, as by divine intuition, all the redeemed will recognise each other.[3]

St. Thomas Aquinas maintains [see 1 Cor. xv. 41] that Martyrs, Virgins, and Doctors, being of pre-eminent sanctity, will be distinguished from other saints, by an aureola or crown of glory.[4] He has other interesting speculations on this subject, as, e.g., that the righteous, whether dying in infancy, youth, or old age, will all rise at the age of perfect youth.[5] It may rather be supposed, since among the saints it can only be in outward appearance, that it will be at the time, whether of youth or age, at which they died: but of such matters we can only speak cautiously and doubtfully. "It doth not yet appear what we shall be." [BODY, SPIRITUAL. NEW CREATION.]

REVEALED RELIGION. [RELIGION, REVEALED.]

REVELATION. In the New Testament dialect the term ἀποκάλυψις has the fixed signification, "divine communication," "Revelation." In the LXX. the word is found, although seldom [e.g. 1 Sam. xx. 30; Ecclus. xi. 27]; but nowhere does it occur in the sense of "divine communication." St. Jerome, moreover, notices that, in the sense of Revelation, the word ἀποκάλυψις "a nullo sapientum sæculi apud Græcos usurpatum."[6]

The Bible is the record of Revelation; and, as such, has been composed under the Inspiration of the Divine Spirit. Holy Scripture contains certain matters which are, strictly speaking, Revelations: i.e. matters which, from their supernatural character, or the circumstances of the writer who records them, could not have been known to him without a special communication from heaven. Other statements of the Bible, however, are not of this nature. The historical incidents, e.g., recorded in both Old and New Testaments were such as must frequently have been well known to the sacred writers either from their own observation, or from sources which were at their command—cf. 1 Kings xiv. 4, 5; 2 Kings iv. 27; St. Luke i. 2; 1 St. John i. 1-3. Accordingly Revelation is carefully to be distinguished from Inspiration [see art. on INSPIRATION], and may be defined, A direct communication from God to man, either of such knowledge as man could not of himself attain to; or of information which, although it might have been attained in the ordinary way, was not, in point of fact, from whatever cause, known to the person who received the Revelation. As Inspiration is the result of the actuating energy of the Holy Spirit, so Revelation is to be ascribed to the Divine Logos, the Eternal Word, the Second Person in the Blessed Trinity. "No man," taught Christ Himself, "knoweth Who the Son is, but the Father; and Who the Father is, but the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal Him"—ᾧ ἂν βούληται ὁ Υἱὸς ἀποκαλύψαι—[St. Luke x. 22]. St. Paul declares as to his own knowledge of the Christian faith: "I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ" [Gal. i. 12]. St. Peter teaches generally respecting the Prophets that it was "the Spirit of Christ which was in them" [1 St. Pet. i. 11]; and the first words of the one prophetical book of the New Testament are "The Revelation of Jesus Christ" [Rev. i. 1]. The Revelations of the Divine Word are communicated to man through the channel of Scripture inspired by the Holy Ghost. Our Lord has described this function of the Spirit: "He shall glorify Me: for He shall receive of Mine, and shall shew it unto you" [St. John xvi. 13, 14]. Hence it is that the agencies of the two Divine Persons are sometimes spoken of in conjunction. St. Paul writes: "How that by Revelation He made known unto me the mystery . . . which in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men, as it is now revealed unto His holy Apostles and Prophets by the Spirit" [Eph. iii. 3-5; cf. 1 Cor. ii. 10]. The complete doctrine, indeed, of Scripture inspired by the Holy Ghost being the appointed channel through which are conveyed to man the Revelations of the Divine Word—is thus expressed by St. Justin Martyr: "Think not that the words which you hear the Prophet speaking in his own person were uttered by himself, when filled with the Spirit, but by the Divine Word Who moved him."[7] And the principle which the texts of Scripture quoted above disclose is thus lucidly expressed by St. Athanasius: οὐ γὰρ ἐκτός ἐστι τοῦ Λόγου τὸ Πνεῦμα, ἀλλὰ ἐν τῷ Λόγῳ ὂν ἐν τῷ Θεῷ δι' αὐτοῦ ἐστιν· ὥστε τὰ χαρίσματα ἐν τῇ Τριάδι δίδοσθαι.[8]

RITUAL. Divine worship, which is the necessary accompaniment of a belief in the existence of God, may be divided into two parts: [1] internal worship, consisting of the feelings of love, admiration, confidence, and submission to the Deity as a superior Being; and [2] external worship or the manifestation of those feelings by outward signs, such as, prayer, prostrations, genuflexions, &c. The latter is expressed by the term "ritual," which has therefore been defined as "the external body of words and action by which worship is expressed and exhibited before God and man."

The necessity of ritual, whether of a more or less elaborate kind, may be supported [1] on historical grounds, from its universality both in point of time and in point of area. Its traces may be found among the earliest records of worship in the inspired account of primeval man, and in the earliest histories and traditions of the ancient nations of the world. Every form of religion on the face of the globe, whether true or false, Christianity, Mahommedanism, Buddhism, and the different forms of idolatry, have each had a ritual of their own. [2] On internal grounds. From the twofold constitution of man as body and spirit. As long as the body is an essential element of man, so long will ritual be a necessary feature in his worship. Nature herself teaches us that prostration of the body is a mark of respect, that lifting the eyes or hands is a sign of supplication, that an offering or sacrifice is a recognition of inferiority, that smiting the breast is a token of sorrow; and a natural meaning will be found to underlie many other actions which at first sight may appear entirely arbitrary and conventional. One other explanation of ritual has been attempted on purely physical grounds. According to it, incense was first introduced to dissipate bad odours; tapers for the purpose of affording light; action and gesture were naturally required to emphasize certain words; and a symbolical meaning became subsequently devised by the learned leisure or fancy of ecclesiastics. This view has been worked out at length by Claude de Vert in his Explication littérale et historique des Cérémonies de l'Eglise. But while some have been led to ignore the real meaning of ritual, and to defend it on the lower ground of utility, others have denounced it on higher but false premisses. God, they say, requires only the internal worship of the heart. Whatever was the case before Christianity, the Jewish system of external observances, and by inference all worship of a similar kind, was abolished by our Lord when He said, "The hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth; for the Father seeketh such to worship Him. God is a Spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth" [John iv. 23, 24], and all attempts to re-introduce a system of ritual are a violation of the genius and intention of the Founder of Christianity. This was the basis of the teaching of George Fox [A.D. 1647]. It is the doctrine of the Quakers that a portion of divine reason or wisdom is implanted in every man's soul, and that by consulting and following the dictates of this internal word or operation of the Holy Spirit they will arrive at eternal life, to which a formal religion would be rather an impediment than an assistance. Look, they urge, at the disciples in the New Testament. They spoke as the Spirit moved them [Acts iv. 8]. They had neither temple, nor altar, nor incense, nor ceremonial. But it must be retorted that the circumstances by which these primitive Christians were surrounded rendered this impossible; and that, again, the genuineness of inspiration was attested in their case by the miraculous gifts by which it was accompanied, and against the misuse of which St. Paul found it necessary to warn the Church of the Corinthians [1 Cor. xii., xiii.]. When Christ ordered His disciples to worship Him in spirit and in truth, it could not be to the exclusion of those outward rites which He Himself was about to institute, Baptism and the Holy Eucharist. The widow's offering [Luke xxi. 2, 3], the bended knee in prayer [Luke xxii. 41], the smiting of the breast [Luke xviii. 13], have His sanction or approbation: and on one occasion when He had enumerated a variety of ceremonial observances, He added, "These ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone" [Luke xi. 42]. Whence it appears that the real object of His animadversion was a permanent external worship from which the heart and affections were absent, the worship of a people who could draw nigh unto Him with their mouth and honour Him with their lips, while their heart was far from Him [Matt. xv. 8].

General objects of ritual. Ritual may be defended, and has been employed, on three several grounds. [1.] For organization. There are families and tribes among the Eastern nations, whose ties of kindred are strengthened by the common observance at stated periods of domestic or national rites of worship. [2.] For educational purposes. To an Israelite his ritual was a constant monument of the past history of his nation, and of the miracles of God's overshadowing providence. When Jordan was passed twelve men were ordered by Joshua to take up as many stones from the river's bed, "that this may be a sign among you, that when your children ask their fathers in time to come, saying, What mean ye by these stones? then ye shall answer them that the waters of Jordan were cut off before the ark of the covenant of the Lord; when it passed over Jordan, the waters of Jordan were cut off, and these stones shall be for a memorial unto the Children of Israel for ever" [Josh. iv. 6, 7]; and on the same principle, the feast of the Passover and the presentation of the first-born reminded them of their escape from Egypt [Exod. xii. 26, 27]; the Feast of Weeks, of the giving of the Law on Mount Sinai; the Feast of Tabernacles, of their dwelling in booths in the wilderness [Lev. xxiii. 39-44]. [3.] To do honour to God. If the taunt of Persius is repeated,— the answer is, it is there as an outward mark of respect to God, and as a sensible witness of it before the eyes of men. The divine will, so far as it is revealed on this subject, nowhere seems disinclined to accept such homage. The ceremonial divinely instituted on Mount Sinai, and the future worship of the redeemed foreshadowed in the Apocalypse, are in favour of it. David's sentiment that he would not offer unto the Lord his God of that which did cost him nothing [2 Sam. xxiv. 24], as well as the conduct of the woman who broke an alabaster box of ointment worth three hundred pence over Christ's head [Mark xiv. 3], are alike recorded for our admiration. The pretext has often been advanced, "Might this not have been sold for much and given to the poor?" [John xii. 5], but experience does not bear out the inference that those who are loudest in their declamation about the costliness of God's service, are the most liberal in their alms to the poor.

"Dicite, pontifices, in templo quid facit aurum?"

Special objects of Christian ritual. Besides the above general grounds on which all ritual is capable of defence, there are the following special objects for its employment under the Christian dispensation. Both the eye and the ear being the medium of gaining information, a visible ceremonial is to the one what oral instruction is to the other: [1.] a mode of imparting the historic truths of religion. As the Israelites were reminded by their ceremonial law of their past history, so Christians have their attention called to the divine origin of their religion by the various festivals of the Christian Church and their attendant ceremonies. Their need is indeed increased, rather than diminished, inasmuch as such feasts as Easter and Whitsunday commemorate events of far more world-wide importance than the Passover and the Feast of Weeks. [2.] It is a constant witness to doctrinal truth. The immersion at baptism is a symbol of the "death unto sin and new birth unto righteousness." The minute ceremonial of the Holy Eucharist attests the real Presence of Christ; the sign of the cross, the mysteries of the Holy Trinity. [3.] It is an outward witness in some cases to moral as well as to doctrinal truths. The corruption of human nature and the necessity of purity are shewn in a figure at baptism: the duties and privileges of wedded life, by matrimony. [4.] The sense of a common brotherhood is kept alive among mankind. Before the altar all are equally privileged; social distinctions are swept away, and the common form of worship is one of the strongest protests against that alienation of classes which worldly circumstances are apt to produce.
